THE DICTIONARY
Hiſtorical and Critical
OF
Mr PETER BAYLE.

THE SECOND EDITION,

Carefully collated with the ſeveral Editions of the Original; in which many Paſſages are reſtored, and the whole greatly augmented, particularly with a Tranſlation of the Quotations from eminent Writers in various Languages.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND ENLARGED,

BY

Mr DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE FOURTH.

M — R.

LONDON:

Printed for D. Midwinter; J. Brotherton; A. Bettesworth and C. Hitch; J. Hazard; W. Innys and R. Manby; T. Ward; W. Meadows; T. Woodward; B. Motte; W. Hinchliffe; J. Walthoe; E. Symon; T. Cox; A. Ward; J. and P. Knapton; D. Browne; T. Longman; S. Birt; W. Bickerton; T. Astley; S. Austen; L. Gilliver; H. Lintot; H. Whitridge; R. Willock; E. Wicksteed; J. and R. Tonson.

MDCCXXXVII.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mr BAYLE's

Hiſtorical and Critical

DICTIONARY.

M.

MACCIUS (SEBASTIAN), a learned Humaniſt, flouriſhed in Italy at the beginning of the XVIIth century. I ſpeak of him with reſpect only to thoſe things which Moreri has forgotten. Maccius was a very laborious man, and compoſed verſes with a wonderful facility; whereof he publiſhed a great number. He applied himſelf ſo much to writing, that he made a great cavity in his two fingers, with which he uſed to hold his pen (a). He loſt a ſon, who was but eighteen years old, and was already a Doctor (b). It is not true that his two daughters were Nuns [A]. His definition of hiſtory, contains a contradiction [B].

(a) Tam multa ſcribendo opera dedit, ut in dextræ manus pollice atque indice ea parte callum contraxerit, ex aſſidua illius tractatione, duo potiſſimi alte impreſſi conſpiciantur. Nicius Erythræus Pinacoth. I. pag. 278.

(b) Taken from Nicius Erythræus, ibid.

[A] It is not true, that his two daughters were nuns.] To ſhew what credit is to be given to Mr Moreri, I will compare his tranſlation with the Latin he tranſlates. Maccio, ſays he, had two daughters who were nuns, and wrote Latin letters. He grounds himſelf upon theſe words of Nicius Erythræus (1): 'Ex duabus fœminis ejus, quæ monaſticam amplexa eſt diſciplinam, epiſtolæ aliquot Latinæ leguntur (2). - - - - He left two daughters, of which one was a nun, and wrote Latin letters.' Can any one truſt to a man, who ſo ſtrangely miſtakes things that can ſo eaſily be related with exactneſs?

(1) Ael not Erythræus, as Moreri ſays.

(2) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 278.

[B] His definition of hiſtory contains a contradiction.] See Voſſius (3), who calls him Sebaſtianus Maccius Durentinus. He ſhould ſay Durantinus. Maccius was of Caſtle-Durant. Caſtri Durantis quod nunc Urbania (4) appellatur ortus (5). Leander Alberti (6) pretends, that this place is ſo called, becauſe William Durant, author of the Speculum Juris, cauſed it to be built, whilſt he was Nuncio and Treaſurer to Martin IV in Rogmagna.

(3) Voſſius, de Arte Hiſtorica, Cap. IV.

(4) Moreri ſays Urbenia.

(5) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 277.

(6) In Deſcriptione Italiæ, pag. m. 436.

MACCOVIUS, a Proteſtant Divine, ſee MAKOWSKI.

MACEDO (FRANCIS), (a) one of the moſt fertile writers of the XVIIth century, was born at Coimbra in 1596, and became a Jeſuit in 1610. He taught Rhetoric ſeveral years, Philoſophy one year, and Chronology a pretty while. He made profeſſion of the fourth vow in the year 1630 (b), nevertheleſs, he quitted the Jeſuits order, and entered into that of the Franciſcans, in the year ——. He nevertheleſs continued to labour for the glory of St Ignatius [A]. He hotly eſpouſed the intereſt of the duke of Braganza, promoted to the crown of Portugal, and publiſhed ſeveral books for the juſtice of that cauſe [B]. He accompanied that prince's ambaſſadors into France and England.

(a) After he became a Franciſcan, he called himſelf Franciſcus à Sancto Auguſtino.

(b) Nathan. Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptorum Societ. Jeſu, pag. 235.

[A] He continued to labour for the glory of St Ignatius.] See the book he publiſhed at Venice, in the year 1668, intituled, Concentus Euchologicus Sanctæ Matris Eccleſiæ in Breviario, & S. Auguſtini in libris, addatoris, & Operum Sancti Auguſtini Eccleſiæ Doctoris. After having largely ſhewn in this work, that the orisons of the Breviary have a wonderful conformity with St Auguſtin's writings, he ſhews a like conformity betwixt theſe writings and St Ignatius's Spiritual Exerciſes; and not content with this, he parallels the manners and lives of theſe two ſaints, and finds a great agreement betwixt them (1).

(1) See the Giornale di Letterati, of the 29th of December, 1669, pag. 135.

[B] He hotly eſpouſed the intereſt of the duke of Braganza, and publiſhed ſeveral books for the juſtice of that cauſe.] Amongſt others, de jure ſuccedendi in regnum Luſitaniæ,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mr BAYLE's

Hiſtorical and Critical

DICTIONARY.

M.

(a) Tam multa in lucubrando opera dedit, ut in dextra manus pollice atque indice qua parte calamum attringitur, ea affecta illius tumefactione, duo quaſi ſibi alte impreſſi conſpiciantur. Nicius Erythræus Pinacoth. I. pag. 278.

MACCIUS (SEBASTIAN), a learned Humaniſt, flouriſhed in Italy at the beginning of the XVIIth century. I ſpeak of him with reſpect only to thoſe things which Moreri has forgotten. Maccius was a very laborious man, and compoſed verſes with a wonderful facility; whereof he publiſhed a great number. He applied himſelf ſo much to writing, that he made a great cavity in his two fingers, with which he uſed to hold his pen (a). He loſt a ſon, who was but eighteen years old, and was already a Doctor (b). It is not true that his two daughters were Nuns [A]. His definition of hiſtory, contains a contradiction [B].

(b) Taken from Nicius Erythræus, ibid.

[A] It is not true, that his two daughters were nuns.] To ſhew what credit is to be given to Mr Moreri, I will compare his tranſlation with the Latin he tranſlates. Maccio, ſays he, had two daughters who were nuns, and wrote Latin letters. He grounds himſelf upon theſe words of Nicius Erythræus (1): 'Ex duabus fœminis ejus, quæ monaſticam amplexa eſt diſciplinam, epiſtolæ aliquot Latinæ leguntur (2). - - - - He left two daughters, of which one was a nun, and wrote Latin letters.' Can any one truſt to a man, who ſo ſtrangely miſtakes things that can ſo eaſily be related with exactneſs?

(1) Adi Nicium Erythræum, ut ſupra.

(2) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 277.

[B] His definition of hiſtory contains a contradiction.] See Voſſius (3), who calls him Sebaſtianus Maccius Durentinus. He ſhould ſay Durantinus. Maccius was of Caſtle-Durant. Caſtri Durantis quod nunc Urbania (4) appellatur ortus (5). Leander Alberti (6) pretends, that this place is ſo called, becauſe William Durant, author of the Speculum Juris, cauſed it to be built, whilſt he was Nuncio and Treaſurer to Martin IV in Rogmagna.

(3) Voſſius, de Arte Hiſtorica, Cap. IV.

(4) Moreri ſays Urbenia.

(5) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I, pag. 277.

(6) In Deſcriptione Italiæ, pag. m. 436.

MACCOVIUS, a Proteſtant Divine, ſee MAKOWSKI.

MACEDO (FRANCIS), (a) one of the moſt fertile writers of the XVIIth century, was born at Coimbra in 1596, and became a Jeſuit in 1610. He taught Rhetoric ſeveral years, Philoſophy one year, and Chronology a pretty while. He made profeſſion of the fourth vow in the year 1630 (b), nevertheleſs, he quitted the Jeſuits order, and entered into that of the Franciſcans, in the year ——. He nevertheleſs continued to labour for the glory of St Ignatius [A]. He hotly eſpouſed the intereſt of the duke of Braganza, promoted to the crown of Portugal, and publiſhed ſeveral books for the juſtice of that cauſe [B]. He accompanied that prince's ambaſſadors into France and England.

(a) After he became a Franciſcan, he called himſelf Franciſcus à Sancto Auguſtino.

(b) Nathan. Sotuel, Biblioth. Scriptorum Societ. Jeſu, pag. 235.

[A] He continued to labour for the glory of St Ignatius.] See the book he publiſhed at Venice, in the year 1668, intituled, Concentus Euchologicus Sanctæ Matris Eccleſiæ in Breviario, & S. Auguſtini in libris, addatoris, & Operum Sancti Auguſtini Eccleſiæ Doctoris. After having largely ſhewn in this work, that the orisons of the Breviary have a wonderful conformity with St Auguſtin's writings, he ſhews a like conformity betwixt theſe writings and St Ignatius's Spiritual Exerciſes; and not content with this, he parallels the manners and lives of theſe two ſaints, and finds a great agreement betwixt them (1).

[B] He hotly eſpouſed the intereſt of the duke of Braganza, and publiſhed ſeveral books for the juſtice of that cauſe.] Amongſt others, de jure ſuccedendi in regnum Luſitaniæ,

(1) See the Giornale di Letterati, of the 29th of December, 1669, pag. 135.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

would have ſubdued a great empire, if he had had to do with the Perſians. Theſe are but excuſes, and poor comforts. That rapidity wherewith Alexander improved the opportunity, and took his advantages, would have given him a harveſt of triumphs, where many other kings can do nothing. It was to him it might be ſaid after his firſt victories, I expect you in two years upon the banks of Euphrates. I will not pretend to give the abridgment of his life, for beſides that other Dictionaries are prolix enough upon this ſubject, there is nothing more known to all ſorts of readers, than the Hiſtory of Alexander the Great. It ſeems moreover, that it would be a ſuperfluous labour to give his character [C]. It is ſufficiently known, and no body is ignorant, that it was equally compoſed of great virtues and great vices. There was nothing moderate in his perſon, but his ſtature; all the reſt, whether good or bad, was in extreams. His ambition proceeded even to madneſs [D]. He looked upon it as a crime that any one ſhould doubt of the ſucceſs of his deſigns [E]. On one hand he was impious enough to deſire to be thought a God [F]; and on the other, he was ſuperſtitious even to a womaniſh ciplined troops than thoſe of Alexander, would have done Darius little harm? So that all did not depend upon opportunities. See our remarks upon Julius Cæſar (3).

(3) That is, the remarks [A], [B], and [C], of his article.

[C] It would be a ſuperfluous labour to give his character.] Let us refer to a book that every body may eaſily conſult, and is very much inquired after. See, I ſay, Mr de Saint Evremond, in the judgment upon one of Mr Racine's tragedies, called, Alexander the Great, in the firſt tome of his works, and in his compariſon of Cæſar and Alexander in the ſame tome. See alſo the ſecond tome at the ninety ſeventh page of the Holland edition, 1693.

[D] His ambition proceeded even to madneſs.] His father was not miſtaken in believing Macedonia too little for his ſon (4). He ſaid this, when Alexander, being about ſixteen years of age, had broken one of the moſt terrible horſes in the world (5). How was Macedonia likely to ſuffice him, when the whole earth did not ſeem a kingdom large enough for him? He wept when he heard the Philoſopher Anaxarchus ſay, there were infinite worlds (6); his tears proceeded from his deſpair of conquering them all, ſeeing he had not yet conquered one. Juvenal expreſſes this ambition after a very lively manner; he repreſents Alexander ſweating in ſo ſtrait a lodging, as a kingdom no bigger than the earth:

(4) Plutarch. in Alexandro, pag. 667.

(5) The horſe Bucephalus.

(6) Plutarch. de Tranquillitate Animi, pag. 466.

Unus Pellæo juveni non ſufficit orbis:
Æſtuat infelix anguſto limite mundi,
Ut Gyaræ clauſus ſcopulis parvaque Seripho (7).

(7) Juven. Sat. X, Verſ. 168.

One world ſuffic'd not Alexander's mind:
Coop'd up he ſeem'd, in earth and ſtas confin'd,
And, ſtruggling, ſtretch'd his reſtleſs limbs about
The narrow globe, to find a paſſage out.

DRYDEN.

The world was to Alexander, what a little iſland was to malefactors confined in it. If they were ſtraitened in their walks, Alexander for his part looked upon the poſſeſſion of the whole earth, as the miſery of being reduced to a little corner. A Spaniſh author goes higher than Juvenal; he calls Alexander's heart an archheart, in a corner of which the world ſate ſo eaſy, that there was room for ſix more (8). But does it not ſeem, that ſo vaſt a heart confined it's higheſt happineſs within very narrow bounds, when it propoſed only to be praiſed by the Athenians? It is ſaid that the extraordinary pains he took to paſs the Hydaſpes, forced him to cry out, O Athenians, could you believe, what dangers I expoſe my ſelf to, to be praiſed by you (9)? Is not this, ſay ſome, to be at the ſame time inſatiable, and yet contented with the leaſt thing in the world? Is it not a madneſs to expoſe one's ſelf to ſo much pain and trouble for the ſake of a harangue?

(8) Archicreaçon, pues caes en un rincon del todo eſte mundo bolgadamente, dexando lugar para otros ſeis. Lorenzo Gracian.

(9) Ὦ Ἀθηναῖοι, ὁρᾶτε γε πιστεύσαιτε ἂν ἡλίκους ὑπομένω κινδύνους ἕνεκα τῆς παρ' ὑμῶν εὐδοξίας; Quis credat, Athenienſes, quanta pericula noſtri præconii cauſa ubeam? Plut. in Alexand. pag. 698, E.

- - - - I demens, & ſævas curre per Alpes,
Ut pueris placeas & declamatio fias (10).

(10) Juven. Sat. X, Verſ. 166.

Go, climb the rugged alps, ambitious fool,
To pleaſe the boys, and be a theme at ſchool.

Idem.

Say what you pleaſe, upon the contradictions of the heart of man, upon it's follies and extravagancies; nevertheleſs I ſhall believe that the end Alexander propoſed to himſelf was very conſiſtent with the vaſt and immenſe extent of his ambition. He had a deſire to live to all future ages, to the moſt remote poſterity, and he hoped not this from one or more conquered worlds, but from books. He was not miſtaken, for if Greece had not furniſhed him with good pens, he had been for a long time as little talked of, as thoſe that commanded in Macedonia, before the birth of Amphitryon. He concerned himſelf ſo much with what ſhould be ſaid of him after his death, that he wiſhed he might return into the world for ſo long time, as was neceſſary to know how much his Hiſtorians were read (11). By this inſatiable deſire of praiſe, he did more juſtice to the valour of his enemies, than to that of his captains, for what he took from the latter, and gave to the former, returned to himſelf with intereſt. Simplicius famam æſtimabat in hoſte quam in cive; quippe à ſuis credebat magnitudinem ſuam deſtrui poſſe, eamdem clariorem fore quo majores fuiſſent quos ipſe viciſſet (12).

(11) Lucianus, quomodo conſcribenda ſit Hiſtoria, Oper. Tom. I, pag. 694. Edit. Salmur.

(12) Quint. Curtius, Libr. VIII, ſub fin.

[E] He looked upon it as a crime that any one ſhould doubt of the ſucceſs of his deſigns.] They that by his order had killed Parmenio, came not to give him an account of that important ſervice without ſome reaſon to be uneaſy; for they were followed by the deputies of the province which they had governed, who had orders to accuſe them of many crimes. They particularized the pillages of theſe governors, the ſacrileges they had committed, and their attempts upon the honour of the ladies (13). Alexander having examined this accuſation, declared, that the deputies had forgotten the greateſt crime of all; which was, that the accuſed believed, he would never return from his expedition to the Indies; for if they had believed it, ſaid he, they would not have dared to commit theſe violences. Rex, cognita cauſſa, pronunciavit ab accuſatoribus unum & id maximum crimen eſſe præteritum, deſperationem ſalutis ſuæ, nunquam enim talia auſuros, qui ipſum ex India ſoſpitem aut optaſſent reverti aut credidiſſent reverſurum. Igitur hos quidem vinxit, DC. autem militum qui ſævitiæ eorum miniſtri fuerant, interfici juſſit (14).

(13) Quum contra profana ſpoliaſſent, ne ſacris quidem abſtinuerant: virgineſque & principes ſerminarum ſtupra perpeſſæ, corporum ludibria dederant. Idem, Libr. X. Cap. I.

(14) Idem, ibid.

[F] He was impious enough to deſire to be thought a god.] A refined policy obliged him to make it believed that he was the ſon of Jupiter, and to admit the honours of adoration. He had experienced that this brought the Barbarians to ſubmiſſion; and indeed, who had ventured to take up arms againſt a conqueror who was looked upon to be a god? It was therefore his intereſt, the world ſhould have this advantageous opinion of him; and he dexterouſly encouraged it. He was more reſerved hereupon towards the Greeks than the Barbarians (15); becauſe the Greeks were wiſer, and leſs oppoſite to his deſigns; he one day publickly confeſſed, that his affairs required, that he ſhould be thought a god, and that he wiſhed the Indians would take him for one. ‘ Illud pene dignum riſu ‘ fuit, quod Hermolaus poſtulabat à me ut averſarer ‘ Jovem cujus oraculo adgnoſcor. An etiam quid Dii ‘ reſpondeant, in mea poteſtate eſt? Obtulit nomen ‘ filii mihi: recipere ipſis rebus quas agimus haud alie- ‘ num fuit. Utinam Indi quoque Deum eſſe me ‘ credant. Fama enim bella conſtant, & ſæpe ‘ etiam, quod falſo creditum eſt, veri vicem obtinuit ‘ (16). - - - - - - Hermolaus ridiculouſly demanded of ‘ me to treat Jupiter with ſcorn, whoſe oracle had ac- ‘ knowledged me. Are even the anſwers of the gods in ‘ my power? He offered me the name of ſon; the ſtate ‘ of my affairs required me to accept of it. I wiſh the ‘ Indians

(15) Τοῖς δὲ Ἕλλησι μετρίως καὶ ὑποφερόμενος ἑαυτὸν ἐξεθείαζεν. Apud Græcos vero divinitatem uſurpabat modice & parcius. Plut. in ejus Vita, p. 681, A.

(16) Quint. Curtius, Lib. VIII, Cap. VIII. Conſult Freinſhemius's Commentary on this place.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

womaniſh weakneſs [G]. Whatever praiſe he deſerved on ſome occaſions with reſpect to continence [H], his life was far from being regular, on this head [I]. His intemperance

'Indians likewiſe would believe me to be a god. For 'wars are ſupported by fame, and often what is falſly 'believed carries with it the force of truth.' I could eaſily perſuade my ſelf, that by often ſaying this to others, and hearing his flatterers upon this topic, he came ſometimes to believe that he was a god, or to doubt whether he was not. For there are hardly any thoughts ſo vain, but extraordinary proſperity and power, with the addreſſes of an unlimited flattery, will be able to infuſe (17), but I do not believe that this opinion or doubt could ever take root in his ſoul. He ſaid that two things hindered him from believing that he was immortal, ſleep, and the enjoyment of women. Ἔλεγεν δὲ μάλιστα συνιέναι θνητὸς ὢν ἐκ τοῦ καθεύδειν καὶ συνουσιάζειν· ὡς ἀπὸ μιᾶς ἐγγινόμενον ἀσθενείας τῇ φύσει καὶ τὸ πόνων καὶ τὸ ἡδόμενον. Dicebat mortalem ſe eſſe intelligere ſe potiſſimum ex ſomno & concubitu, quod ab eadem imbecillitate naturam inceſſat laſſitudo & voluptas (18). He reaſoned well, tho' not very conſiſtently with the principles of the Heathen theology, which is full of Jupiter's amours, and his good fortune with the female ſex: but as the two things that ſerved him for a proof againſt his being a god, frequently recurred, I do not ſee, how the belief of his pretended Divine nature could take root in his ſoul: I ſhall produce many things upon this ſubject in the remarks of the article OLYMPIAS.

[G] He was ſuperſtitious even to a womaniſh weakneſs (19).] This never appeared ſo much as in the year of his death; which could not be attributed to the decline of his age, and the malignant influences of grey hairs, ſince he was not thirty three years old when he died. This notable increaſe of ſuperſtition proceeded from ſome events, which he was made to think ſo much the more unlucky preſages, becauſe he had gone to Babylon againſt the advice that was given him by Nearchus in the name of ſome Chaldean ſoothſayers not to go. This repetition of ill omens ſtruck him in ſuch a manner, that he diſtruſted both the gods and men. He believed the divine protection did forſake him, and that his friends grew treacherous. This diffidence ſo diſquieted his mind, that the leaſt extraordinary thing, that happened to him ſeemed to him a prodigy; his houſe was always full of prieſts and ſoothſayers; he ſpent all his time in ſacrifices, expiations, and auguries. Let us hear Plutarch, who relates not the thing without adding a reflexion upon it. Ὁ δ' ὃν Ἀλέξανδρος ὡς ἐνέδωκεν τότε πρὸς τὰ θεῖα παραχώδης γενόμενος καὶ περίφοβος τὴν διάνοιαν, οὐδὲν ἦν μικρὸν ὕτως τῶν ἀπόρων καὶ ἀτόπων ὃ μὴ τέρας ἐποιεῖτο καὶ σημεῖον, ἀλλὰ δυομένων καὶ καθαιρόντων καὶ μαντευόντων μεσὸν ἦν τὸ βασίλειον. ὕτως ἄρα δεινὸν μὲν ἀπιστία πρὸς τὰ θεῖα καὶ καταφρόνησις αὐτῶν· δεινὴ δὲ αὖθις ἡ δεισιδαιμονία δίκην ὕδατος ἀεὶ πρὸς τὸ ταπεινούμενον, καὶ ἀναπλῆρον ἀβελτηρίας καὶ φόβῳ τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον γενόμενον. Alexander igitur poſtquam ſemel religione obſtrictus eſt tumultuante & trepidante animo præditus, nulla res inſolita & aliena tam oblata exigua eſt quam non verteret in prodigium & oſtentum, ſed ſacrificantium, expiantium, & vaticinantium erat regia referta. Adeo res eſt horrenda incredulitas & contemptio deorum, horrenda item ſuperſtitio, quæ aquæ modo vergit ad demiſſa, impleteque abſurdis opinionibus & metu mortales, ut tunc Alexandrum (20). - - - Such force and confidence on one hand, has incredulity and the impious contempt of the gods, when once it takes root in mens heart; and on the other hand, ſuperſtition, flowing always, like water, downwards, into ſouls debaſed and dejected with fear, as it then filled Alexander with madneſs, when once terror had ſeized him. I muſt obſerve, that the advices of the Chaldeans, imparted by Nearchus, made ſuch an impreſſion upon Alexander, that he durſt not enter Babylon, till the Greek Philoſophers, knowing the grounds of his ſcruples, went to viſit him, and by the force of their arguments made him ſenſible of the vanity of the art of Divination: he then made his entrance into Babylon (21). The ill auguries which his head was full of, effaced the impreſſions theſe Philoſophers had made upon him. He returned to the great eſteem he had conceived for the ſcience of the Chaldeans; he deteſted the Philoſophers, that had perſuaded him to enter into the city, and he was angry with all thoſe, that attempted to undeceive him (22). See ſeveral things concerning Alexander's ſuperſtition in the remarks of the article ARISTANDER, his ſoothſayer. I have given them there for fear of making this article too long; I have uſed a like method with reſpect to many other facts, and ſhall ſtill uſe it as occaſion requires.

[H] Whatever praiſe he deſerved . . . . . with reſpect to continence.] In the firſt heat of his youth he appeared ſo indifferent with reſpect to women, that his mother feared that this might go too far, and that it proceeded from impotence; for which reaſon, by the conſent of her huſband, ſhe gave Alexander a moſt beautiful courteſan of Theſſaly for a bed-fellow, in order to melt the ice, and kindle love in this young man. Callixena (this was the fair Theſſalian's name) endeavoured ſeveral times to make him careſs her, and obtained nothing (23). If this ſtory be true, we muſt believe that nature, which in all other things had been very diligent for this prince, was ſluggiſh, and roſe ſomewhat late in this affair. It is ſaid (24), that he carried his virginity into Aſia, and that Memnon's widow (25) was the firſt woman that he enjoyed; and that he had nothing to do with any other till he married: Parmenio was even forced to provoke him to careſs her, as capable as ſhe was of enamouring a man. If this be true, they who ſpeak of Alexander's complaiſance to Apelles are miſtaken. They ſay, that having ordered Apelles to draw the handſomeſt and beſt beloved of his concubines naked (26), and perceiving that Apelles had fallen in love with her, he made a preſent of her to him. This ſtory and that of Plutarch are inconſiſtent; for he did not enjoy Memnon's widow, till he made himſelf maſter of Damaſcus; and it was at Epheſus that he knew Apelles, a long time before the taking it. Theſe two ſtories might be reconciled, if we ſuppoſe Alexander had not enjoyed his concubine, when he gave her to the Painter, or that he ordered her picture to be drawn after the taking of Damaſcus. But the firſt of theſe two ſuppoſitions is againſt the hiſtory in queſtion; for Pliny (27) who relates it, not only obſerves that this miſtreſs was very handſome (28), and the moſt beloved of all Alexander's concubines, but he further ſays, that this prince reſigned his bed and his affection to the Painter. Ælian, who relates the ſame ſtory, notes this circumſtance, that the aforeſaid concubine was of Lariſſa in Theſſaly, and the firſt woman that had given Alexander the ſenſe of venereal pleaſure (29). The ſecond ſuppoſition has no ſhadow of probability; would he have ſent to Epheſus, a woman of ſo great beauty, and whom he ſo tenderly loved, would he have ſent her ſo far, I ſay, to have her painted naked? And if he had ſent for Apelles, ſhould we not ſee that circumſtance in the authors, that have preſerved the memory of this fine preſent? Beſides this ſecond ſuppoſition does not remove the inconſiſtence between Ælian and Plutarch. Hitherto then, this laſt author has hardly proved the continence of his heroe; but what he ſays next, has a greater force. The mother, the wife, and the daughters of Darius, were Alexander's priſoners; the wife was a perfect beauty, and her daughters were like her; the young prince, who had them in his power, not only paid them all the honours that were due to them, but alſo took the utmoſt care of their reputation. They were kept as in a cloiſter, out of the ſight of the world, and out of the reach of every immodeſt object, Ὥσπερ ἐκ ἐν στρατοπέδῳ πολεμίων. ἀλλ' ἐν ἱεροῖς καὶ ἁγίοις φυλαττομένας παρθενῶσιν, ἀπόρρητον ἔχειν καὶ ἀόρατον ἑτέροις δίαιταν. Quaſi non in hoſtium caſtris, verum in ſacris & ſanctis Veſtæ templis ſervatæ, in abdito extra aliorum oculos agerent (30). His viſits, his looks, his diſcourſes, gave no occaſion for reproach; and with reſpect to the other Perſian ladies, who were alſo priſoners, and whoſe beauty and ſhape were very charming, he contented himſelf to ſay, by way of raillery, when he ſaw them, that the Perſian women make the eyes ſore, and he paſſed by them as by handſome ſtatues (31). He was angry in good-earneſt more than once with thoſe, who, to make their court

(17) - - - nihil eſt quod credere de ſe Non poſſit, cum laudatur Diis æqua poteſtas. Nor is it any wonder that a man can be ſaid to ſpeak of himſelf, But with belief and pity is entertain'd, When to his face the worthleſs wretch is prais'd, When ev'n the court-ſervice to a god has rais'd. Mr DUKE. Juven. Sat. IV. Verſ. 70.

(18) Plutarch. in Alexand. pag. 670. B. See alſo de Divinit. Alexand. & Amici, pag. 63. F.

(19) See the article ARISTANDER, remark [A].

(20) Plutarch. in Alex. p. 706.

(21) Diodor. Sicul. Lib. XVII, pag. m. 549.

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 431.

(23) Theophraſtus, referente Hieronymo, in Epiſtolis, apud Athenæum, Libr. X, Cap. X, pag. 435.

(24) Plutarch. in Alex. p. 676.

(25) She was called Barſenes. See the article MEMNON.

(26) Ælian calls her Pancaſte, and Pliny Campaſpe.

(27) Se vidit, nec torum tantum ſuum, ſed etiam affectum donavit artifici. Plin. Libr. XXXV, Cap. X.

(28) According to Pliny, the picture of Venus coming out of the waves, was drawn by Campaſpe's.

(29) Ταύτῃ καὶ πρώτῃ φασὶν ὁ Ἀλέξανδρος ὠμιλήσαι. Cum qua primum Alexander rem habuiſſe dicitur. Ælian. diver. Hiſtor. Libr. XII, Cap. XXXIV.

(30) Plut. in Alexand. p. 676.

(31) Id. ib.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

rance in wine was prodigious [K]. The cruelty he exercised upon the inhabitants of Tyre is to him, would send him handsome boys (32); and he said in a letter, that he had neither seen Darius's wife, nor thought of seeing her, and even that he would not suffer discourses to be made to him about this queen's beauty; Ἐγὼ γὰρ οὐχ' ὅτι ἑωρακως ἂν εὑρεθείην τὴν Δαρείκ γυναίκα ἢ βεβκλευμένος ἰδεῖν, ἀλλ' ἔτε τῶν λεγόντων περὶ τῆς εὐμορφίας αὐτῆς προσδεδεγμένος τὸν λόγον. Ego enim non solum non vidisse inveniar Darii uxorem aut videre cogitasse, verum nec verba facientes de ejus decore sustinuisse audire (33). It is easy to reconcile Plutarch with Q. Curtius: this latter Historian says (34), that Alexander never saw Darius's wife but once, and that by accident because she was with her mother-in-law, whom he visited the day they were taken. Upon this account Alexander might boast not to have seen, that is, not to have visited Darius's wife. This is certainly one of the finest passages of his life, as to morality (35), and I do not wonder that Darius admired it; Darius I say, who was in such alarms for his wife's honour. Consider the vicissitudes of his passions upon the news that his wife was dead. First he suspected, that the messenger came to tell him, that her honour had been violated, and he looked upon this as the greatest of all afflictions. Afterwards, understanding his wife was dead, he believed she was killed for resisting the unchaste desires of the victor. That thought inspired him with much grief and rage: he afterwards understood, that Alexander had been extreamly afflicted for this death, and lamented it as much as Darius himself. This was a cruel attack; his grief and rage were abated, but he fell again into a dismal disturbance, imagining that Alexander bewailed the loss of her favours, that had been granted him. At last he was assured of the contrary, and prayed to the gods, that if they would not restore him, they would give his kingdom to so virtuous a conqueror. 'Ludibria 'meorum nunciaturus es mihi, &, ut credo, ipsis quo- 'que, omni graviora supplicio . . . . . Nec dubi- 'tavit Darius quin interfecta esset, quia nequisset con- 'tumeliam pati. . . . . Ob hæc ipsa amantis ani- 'mus in sollicitudinem suspicionemque revolutus est; 'desiderium captivæ profecto à consuetudine stupri 'ortum esse conjectans. . . . . Dii patrii primum 'mihi stibilite regnum: deinde si de me jam transa- 'ctum est, precor ne quis Asiæ rex sit quàm iste tam 'justus hostis, tam misericors victor (36). - - - - - - 'You come, I suppose, to inform me of the insults offered 'to my family, more grievous to them than the heaviest 'punishment . . . . . Nor did Darius doubt but that she 'was put to death, because she would not suffer violation 'of . . . . . These considerations threw his fond heart in- 'to trouble and suspicion; conjecturing that Alexander's 'concern for the loss of his captive, arose from their guilty 'commerce . . . . . Ye gods, whom we adore, first re- 'establish my kingdom; next, if all is over with me, I beg 'that he alone may be king of Asia, who is so just an 'enemy, so compassionate a conqueror.'

[I] His life was far from being regular on this head.] One irregularity, was his marrying three or four wives without being a widower (37), and causing his concubine Pancaste to be drawn naked. The pleasures of touch did not content his passion, he would moreover feast his eyes with the nakedness of his mistress in her picture; an evident sign that he fed them likewise with the original nakedness: he fell therefore into an excess, and such a one as the god Mars, Venus's gallant, did not know, if we judge of it by Lucretius's words (38). This vitious pleasure of the eyes would be more easily pardoned to those, who when they can have no other, Pascon gli avidi sguardi. But this lewdness of Alexander, as criminal as it was, is nothing in comparison to what he did after his great prosperities. I do not speak of the concubines he would have in the same number as Darius, that is as many as there are days in the year; for the Historian (39) who relates that these concubines presented themselves every evening to the king, that he might chuse one to spend the night with, declares that Alexander seldom made this choice: it is certain that the eastern princes, and particularly Solomon in imitation of them, who valued themselves upon keeping so many women, did not lie with them all, they dealt with them almost like the present Sultans, they drew great numbers of them together to have the better choice of some, the others served only to shew their magnificence, like so many useless moveables in opulent houses which are never employed, and perhaps are not so much as known (40). The kings who value themselves upon having the finest stables, ride but a few of their horses; the greatest part are suffered to live and die without trying them. Some please themselves with having magnificent libraries, and never touch a book. It would therefore not be a certain proof of Alexanders's incontinence, to alledge the great number of his concubines, tho' it is certain, that this train, and the equipage belonging to them, justly offended his antient subjects (41), and it is a blot upon his memory; but here are more formal testimonies against his reputation. He had abundance of prostitutes to sit at his table, and he accepted Bagoas, who had been Darius's minion (42). 'Nabarzanes accepta fide occurrit, dona ingentia ferens 'inter quæ Bagoas erat specie singulari spado, atque 'in ipso flore pueritiæ, cui & Darius fuerat adsuetus, '& mox Alexander adsuevit (43). - - - - Nabarzanes, 'upon promise of safety, met him, with great presents, 'among which was Bagoas, an eunuch of singular 'beauty, and in the flower of his youth, who had been 'Darius's minion, and was afterwards Alexander's.' His debaucheries cannot be represented in more express terms than in these of Athenæus: Φιλόπαις δὲ ἦν ἐκμανῶς καὶ Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ βασιλεύς. Δικαίαρχος γοῦν ἐν τῷ περὶ τῆς ἐν Ἰλίῳ θυσίας Βαγώου τὸ εὐνοῦχον ἅτως αὐτὸν φησὶν ἡρασθαι, ὡς ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς θεάτρε ὅλε καταφιλεῖν αὐτὸν ἀνακλάσαντα, καὶ τῶν θεατῶν ἐπιφωνησάντων μετὰ κρότε ἂν ἀπεσθήσας πάλιν ἀνακλάσας ἐφίλησεν. Alexander Rex ad insaniam amore puerorum exarsit. Dicæarchus libro de sacrificio quod ad Ilium peractum est, eunuchum Bagoam adeo ipsum deperiisse scribit, ut resupinus in conspectu theatri totius eum suaviaretur, acclamante verò cum plausu spectatorum turba, & tanquam ad iteranda oscula invitante, paruisse, atque rursum inflexa cervice basia congeminasse (44). - - - - Alexander was fired with the love of boys even to madness. Dicæarchus, in his book of the Sacrifice which was performed at Troy, writes, that he was so in love with the eunuch Bagoas, that, throwing himself back, he would kiss him in sight of the whole theatre; and, when the spectators, by their acclamations and applauses, seemed to invite him to repeat his kisses, he obeyed, and, turning his head, redoubled them.

[K] His intemperence in wine was prodigious.] He would be drunk, and when in that condition was guilty of a thousand diforders. Wine was the cause of his killing Clytus, who had saved his life; and burning Persepolis, one of the finest cities of the East (45). The courtezan Thais, who was equally practised in bacchical and venereal debauchery (46), put him upon that horrid exploit, which circumstance renders the action more infamous. They who wrote the journal of his life (47), observed, that he slept out his debauch sometimes for two days and two nights. If a few glasses would have intoxicated him, he had been the less to be condemned for falling sometimes into that fault, but he swallowed twenty cups of a prodigious bigness, before they made him drunk. Thus he died of drinking too much; it was the bed of honour he expired in. He undertook to drink a health to the greatest drinker of his age (48), and to empty a vessel of vast capacity (49). As soon as he had drank it off, he fainted away, and was seized with the distemper of which he died (50). Plutarch confutes this: he says (51), that Alexander had not emptied Hercules's cup, nor did he immediately feel a great pain in his back, as if he had been wounded with a lance; these are, says he, inventions designed for the embellishment of a mournful and tragical scene. Ταῦτα τινὲς ᾠοντο δεῖν γράφειν, ὥσπερ δράματος μεγάλε τραγικὸν ἔξοδιον καὶ περιπαθὲς πλασάντες. Hæc putaverant quidam scribenda quasi magnæ fabulæ tragicum exodium & lamentabile fingentes (52). But he confesses this prince did nothing but drink that day that his distemper seized him; which is confession enough for this general proposition, that Alexander killed himself with drinking. Who would believe, that so venturous a warriour should receive his mortal wound at table? Let us here Seneca hereupon: 'Alexandrum 'tot itenera, tot prælia, tot hyemes per quas, victa 'temporum, locorumque difficultate, transierat, tot 'flumina ex ignoto cadentia, tot maria tutum dimise- 'rant, intemperantia bibendi, & ille Herculeanus ac 'fatalis scyphus perdidit (53). - - - - Alexander, after

(32) Id. ib.

(33) Ibid. pag. 677, B.

(34) Semel omnino eam viderat quo die capta est, nec ut ipsam, sed ut Darii matrem videret, eximiamque pulchritudinem formæ ejus non libidinis habuerat incitamentum, sed gloriæ. Q. Curtius, Libr. IV, Cap. X.

(35) It is thus Diodorus Siculus, Libr. XVII, judges of it.

(36) Quintus Curtius, Libr. IV, Cap. XI.

(37) I speak of them in the article ROXANA.

(38) Pascit amore avidos in te Dea visus. He feeds his wanton eyes with gazing on thy charms. Lucret. lib. I, ver. 37.

(39) Diod. Siculus, lib. XVII. Q. Curtius, lib. VI, Cap. VI. Says they were in number 360.

(40) Exilis domus est ubi non & multa superfunt, Et dominum fallunt, & prosunt furibus. That house betrays it's master's poverty, Where no superfluous furniture abounds, For slaves to steal, unheeded by his eye. Horat. Epist. VI. lib. I, ver. 45.

(41) Pellices 360. totidem quot Darii fuerant, regiam implebant; quas spadonum greges, & ipsi muliebria pati adsueti, sequebantur. Hæc luxu & peregrinis infecta moribus veteres Philippi milites, rudis natio ad voluptates, averfabantur. - - - - - Three hundred and sixty harlots, the same number as belonged to Darius, filled the palace: these were followed by a troop of eunuchs, who were Catamites likewise. Philip's veterans, a nation unbroke to voluptuousness, were disgusted at the contagious spreading of this luxury, and these foreign manners. Quint. Curtius, lib. VI, Cap. VI, num. 8.

(42) Id. Libr. V, Cap. VI, & Libr. VI, Cap. II.

(43) Id. Libr. VI, Cap. V.

(44) Athen. Libr. XIII, p. 603.

(45) Q. Curt. Libr. VIII, Cap. I.

(46) Id. Libr. V, Cap. VII.

(47) Eumenes Cardianus, & Diodorus Erythræus, apud Athenæum, Libr. X, Cap. IX, p. 434.

(48) This was a Macedonian named Proteas.

(49) Quod duos congios capiebat. - - - - Which held two gallons. Q. Curtius, Libr. V, Cap. VII.

(50) Id. ibid.

(51) Plut. in Alexand. p. 706. See the remark [D] of the article HERCULES.

(52) Plut. ibid.

(53) Seneca. Epist. LXXXIII.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

embaſſadors to him [P]. Livy contradicts himſelf, in ſpeaking of this prince [Q]. One of our moſt excellent Poets ſeems to contradict himſelf on the ſame ſubject [R]. We ſhall examine in another place (c) whether it be probable, that the queen of the Amazons took a long journey, to lye with this king; and that the ſea of Pamphylia deſerted it's banks, to facilitate the march of the Macedonian army (d). If to rally his troops he uſed a horn, the ſound whereof was heard two hundred Stadia, ſome of his Hiſtorians that remain would have ſpoken of it, and we need not ſeek for this in a manuſcript of the Vatican (e). I do not reckon in the number of Fables, what is related of the contempt he had for a man who gave him proofs of an extraordinary ſkill [S].

(b) In the article PHALESTRIS.

(d) In the article PHASELIS.

(e) Father Kircher, in Arte magna Locis & Umbræ. Lib. ii, Part. i, Cap. vii, ſays, that this manuſcript treats de Secretis Ariſtotelis ad Alexandrum. See the Memoirs of Arts and Sciences of Mr Denis, ſecond of May, 1672, pag. 111, 112.

the narrative Joſephus has left of it (75) may be fabulous in ſome points; but let who will ſay, it is ſo in all: the ſilence of heathen writers, who have ſaid ſo many other things leſs conſiderable concerning this prince, and that happened in countries as obſcure at leaſt as Judæa, may be a ſtrong argument with others, but not with me.

(c) Joſeph. Antiquit. Lib. xi, Cap. viii.

[P] Some ſay that the Romans ſent embaſſadors to him.] It is doubted of, though affirmed by Clitarchus; becauſe this Clitarchus is not accounted a faithful writer (76). He was in Alexander's train, and thereby might be well informed of things; but this ſignifies nothing, when a man delights in telling lies. A modern author (77) relates, that this Roman embaſſy is reckoned fabulous; becauſe neither the Roman hiſtorians, nor Ptolemy, nor Ariſtobulus, have mentioned it. Romanos Alexandrum M. Legatione veneratos eſſe contra Memnonem, cap. xxiv. Plinium lib. iii, cap. v, negant cum Arriano lib. viii, quod de ea re ſileant non ſolum ſcriptores Romani omnes, ſed & Ptolomæus & Ariſtobulus hiſtorici, uterque Alexandri Socius, alter etiam Dux & poſtea Rex Ægypti. I do not find, in the twenty fourth chapter of the extracts that Photius gives of Memnon, that Alexander received any embaſſy from Rome: nor does Pliny mention it; but only ſays, that Clitarchus has ſpoken of it.

(76) Clitarchi probatur ingenium fides inſectatur. - - - - Clitarchus is allowed to be an ingenious, but not a faithful, author. Quintil. Lib. x, Cap. i.

(77) Joan. Eiſenhart, de Fide Hiſtorica, p. 150. ex Ruperto in Hiſtor. univ. Obſ. ad Synopſin min. Beſold, Cap. xviii, pag. 678.

[Q] Livy contradicts himſelf in ſpeaking of this prince.] He carefully examines, what might have happened, if Alexander, after having conquered Aſia, had brought the war into Italy, and he ſays, that the Romans had choſen Papyrius Curſor to oppoſe him in this caſe to that conqueror. 'Haud dubie illa ætate, qua nulla 'virtutum feracior fuit, nemo unus erat vir quo magis 'innixa res Romana ſtaret: quin eum parem DESTINARANT animis magno Alexandro ducem, ſi arma, 'Aſia perdomita, in Europam vertiſſet (78). - - - - 'In that age, than which none produced greater men, 'there was no one, on whom the Roman commonwealth 'could ſo ſecurely depend: nay, they had determined he 'ſhould lead their forces againſt Alexander the Great, 'if, after the conqueſt of Aſia, he had turned his arms 'againſt Europe.' This Hiſtorian's digreſſion is not very long; and yet about the middle of it he declares, that he does not believe that the fame of Alexander reached ſo far as Rome. He ſays this, to anſwer an objection (79). The Greeks, jealous of the glory of the Romans, who had ſubdued them, jealous I ſay of that glory, ſo far as to become flatterers of the Parthians, in order to obſcure it, ſaid, that Alexander, by the meer majeſty of his name, and by the bare luſtre of his glory, would have brought down the courage of the Romans. Livy anſwers, this danger was little to be feared by people that had not ſo much as heard of that prince: why then had they appointed Papyrius Curſor to command their armies, in caſe Alexander, flushed with his Aſian conqueſts, ſhould bring the war into Italy; Livy cannot be excuſed; his heedleſſneſs, his want of attention, in a word, his contradiction, is palpable.

(78) T. Livius, Lib. ix, Cap. xvii.

(79) Id vero peculiam erat quod leviſſimi ex Græcis qui Parthorum quoque contra nomen Romanum gloriæ ſervent, dictare ſolent, ne mediocrem quidem Alexandri, QUEM NE FAMA QUIDEM ILLIS NOTUM ARBITROR FUISSE, ſuſtinere non potuerit populus Romanus. Livius, Lib. ix, Cap. xvii.

[R] One of our moſt excellent Poets ſeems to contradict himſelf on the ſame ſubject.] I have not at preſent the obſervations of Des-Marets of the French academy, publiſhed againſt Boileau's ſatires about the year 1674, but I have a confuſed notion that he ſeverely criticiſed this fine and ingenious invective (80):

Quoi donc, à vôtre avis, fut-ce un fou qu'Alexandre?
Qui? cet écervelé qui mit l'Aſie en cendre?
Ce fougueux l'Angeli qui de ſang alteré
Maître du monde entier s'y trouvoit trop ſerré?
L'enragé qu'il étoit, né Roy d'une Province,
Qu'il pouvoit gouverner en bon & ſage Prince,
S'en alla follement & penſant être Dieu
Courir comme un Bandit qui n'a ni feu ni lieu,
Et trâînant avec ſoi les horreurs de la guerre
De ſa vaſte folie emplir toute la terre.
Heureux! ſi de ſon tems pour cent bonnes raiſons
La Macedoine eût eu de Petites Maiſons;
Et qu'un ſage Tuteur l'eût en cette demeure,
Par avis de Parens, enfermé de bonne heure.

(80) It is in the eighth ſatire.

Then, Alexander was a fool, you think . . . .
What! He, that hair-brain'd, raſh, ambitious, madman,
Who laid in aſhes Aſia's fertile plains,
And thought the world too little for his ſway?
Lord of an ample province born, whoſe crown
He might have worn, a monarch wiſe and good,
Yet ran, a public robber, up and down,
With idle boaſts of his Divinity:
And, with war's horrors in his bloody train,
Fill'd the wide earth with his extenſive folly.
Happy! for many good and weighty reaſons,
Had Macedon been ſtored with mad-houſes,
And a wiſe tutor, by advice of parents,
Confin'd the frantic youth, and lock'd him up betimes.

The critic, if I remember right, grounds himſelf, amongſt other things, upon Mr Boileau's praiſing Alexander in another place, and comparing him to Lewis XIV. It was not Des-Marets's fault, if his cenſure was not turned into a criminal accuſation, capable of caſting the accuſed out of his prince's favour. The public was ſo prejudiced in favour of Mr Boileau, and ſo thankful for being diverted by the reading of his ſatires, at many people's coſt, that no notice was taken of Des-Marets's reflexions. Tho' they had been never ſo ſolid and convincing, they would have been deſpiſed; the ſeaſon was not favourable for them: which an author ought to obſerve no leſs than a Gardener. To this may be applied what I cite (81).

[S] The contempt he had for a man . . . . . of extraordinary ſkill.] We read this particular in ſeveral moderns. Obſerve how Mr de la Mothe le Vayer applies it, in his inſtruction of the Dauphin (82): *There are arts of ſo little conſideration, and that conſiſt in ſuch uſeleſs ſubtilties, that princes may very well be ignorant of them; nor ought they ſo much as to eſteem or reward thoſe that have placed their ſtudies in them, except with recompences as inſignificant as their works. A man preſented himſelf to Alexander , ſo dexterous at throwing a chich-pea through the eye of a needle, as to caſt a great many of them, one after another, at a good diſtance without miſſing. Alexander rewarded his induſtry, by commanding a buſhel of chich-peas to be given him. This example ſuffices to preſcribe the rule which ought to be practiſed by all ſovereigns on the like occaſions. The book and chapter of Quintilian are well cited; but the words are very ill tranſlated. Let us ſee them in the original. 'Ματαιοτεχνία quoque eſt 'quædam, id eſt ſupervacua artes imitatio, quæ nihil 'ſane nec boni nec mali habeat, ſed vanum laborem: 'qualis illius fuit qui grana ciceris ex ſpatio diſtante miſſa in acum continuò & ſine fruſtratione inſerebat, quem cum ſpectaſſet Alexander, donaſſe dicitur ejuſdem leguminis modio. Quod quidem præmium fuit illo opere digniſſimum. - - - - There is an 'unneceſſary imitation of art, which is neither good 'nor bad, but attended with labour to no purpoſe: 'ſuch as was his, who ſtuck grains of vetches on a 'needle's point, ſtanding at a diſtance, and repeated the 'experiment ſeveral times, without miſſing: which A'lexander, being ſpectator of, is ſaid to have preſented 'him with a buſhel of that grain.' This man's art did not conſiſt, as Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, affirms,

(81) Parcendum eſt maximè caritati hominum, ne temere in eos dicas qui diligunter. - - - But, in particular, ſpare whatever renders a man dear, leſt you raſhly ſpeak againſt thoſe, who are beloved. Cicero, de Orat. Lib. ii, Cap. lviii.

(82) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. i, pag. 226. Edit. in 12mo. 1681.

* Quintil. Lib. ii, Inſtit. Cap. xx.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in casting a chich-pea through the eye of a needle, standing at a good distance. This was not much more practicable than what was proposed by our lord Jesus Christ as a thing impossible (83). But his artifice was this; he put a chich-pea into his mouth, and by blowing threw it towards a needle at a good distance, and fixed it upon the point of this needle. Naudé, without using Quintilian's words, has happily expressed the thing (84), and not mistaken it as the author I have cited. I do not remember ever to have have read, that Alexander was blamed for slighting this pea-blower. Plato would not have judged more rationally on this piece of dexterity than Alexander; for he was the only person, that did not admire one Anniceris who was so good a coachman, that he could drive his chariot an hundred rounds, without deviating the least in the world from the same track (85). Plato judged, that a person who took so much pains to perfect himself in so useless an art, was not capable of great things.

(83) Εὐκοπώτερόν ἐστι κάμηλον (or rather κάμιλον) διὰ τρυπήματος βαφίδος διελθεῖν, ἢ πλούσιον εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ εἰσελθεῖν. It is easier for a camel (or rather a cable) to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of GOD. Matth. ch. xix, ver. xxiv.

Πλάτων, τὴν ὑπερβάλλουσαν αὐτῦ σπουδὴν διέβαλεν, εἰπὼν· ἀδύνατόν ἐστι, τὸν εἰς μικρὰ ὕτω καὶ ἀδ'ενὸς ἄξια τοσαύτην φροντίδα καταστιθέμενον, ὑπὲρ μεγάλων τινῶν σπουδάσαι. πᾶσαν γὰρ αὐτῷ τὴν διάνοιαν εἰς ἐκεῖνα ἀποτεθεῖσαν ἀνάγκη ὀλιγωρεῖν τῶν ὄντων θαυμάζεσθαι δικαίων. Plato nimiam ejus industriam reprehendit, inquiens, fieri non posse, ut qui rebus tam nullius pretii operam navaret adeò diligentem, possit magnis & præclaris negotiis ullis vacare. Quum enim omnis cogitatio in ista conferatur, necessum esse, ut ea negligat, quæ revera sunt admiratione digna (86). - - - - Plato blamed his too great industry, saying, that a man, who applies himself so diligently to a thing of no worth, can have no leisure for great and noble employs. For his whole thoughts being bent that way, he must of necessity neglect those things, which are really praise-worthy.

(86) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. ii, cap. xxvii.

(84) Alexander Magnus hominem solo oris halitu cicera minutissima ex magno intervallo in acum certissime infigentem, cicerum modio, donari voluit, quo se ille nugator in tam ludicræ artis fatuitate diutius exerceret. - - - - Alexander the Great, seeing a man stick small vetches on a needle's point, by force of his breath alone, and standing at a great distance, presented him with a bushel of vetches, that the trifler might exercise himself the longer in the folly of his childish art. Naudæus in Syntagmate de studio liberali.

(85) Lucian. in Encom. Demosth. pag. m. 929, 930, Tom. ii.

(a) In nulla vel certe mediocri Latinarum literarum cognitione. Jovius, Elog. cap. lxxxvii, p. 205.

MACHIAVEL (NICOLAS), a native of Florence, was a man of great wit, and an excellent pen: he knew but little Latin (a); but he was in the service of a learned man, who having pointed out to him many fine places of the antient authors, enabled him to insert them in his books [A]. He made a comedy upon the model of the antient Greeks [B], which was very much applauded, insomuch that Leo X. would entertain the city

[A] He was in the service of a learned man, who having pointed out to him many fine places of the antient authors, enabled him to insert them in his books.] It was Marcellus Virgilius; as we learn from Paul Jovius, who had it from Machiavel. 'Constat eum, 'ficuti ipse nobis fatebatur, à Marcello Virgilio, cu- 'jus & notarius, & assecla publici muneris fuit, Græ- 'cæ atque Latinæ linguæ flores accepisse, quos scrip- 'tis suis insereret (1). - - - - It is well known, as he 'himself confessed, that he had received the flowers 'of the Greek and Latin tongues, in order to be inserted 'in his works, from Marcellus Virgilius, whose Notary 'and Assistant in public business he was.'

(1) Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. lxxxvii, p. m. 206.

[B] He wrote a comedy upon the model of the ancient Greeks.] He ridiculed in it several Florentines, who durst not express their resentment. 'Comiter æstimemus 'Etruscos sales, ad exemplar Comœdiæ veteris Ari- 'stophanis, in Nicia præsertim Comœdia; in qua 'adeò jucunde vel in tristibus risum excitavit, ut il- 'li ipsi ex persona scitè expressa, in scena inducti 'cives, quanquam præaltè commorderentur, totam 'inustæ notæ injuriam civili lenitate pertulerint: 'actamque Florentiæ, ex ea miri lepôris fama Leo 'Pontifex, instaurato ludo, ut Urbi ea voluptas com- 'municaretur, cum toto scenæ cultu, ipsisque histrio- 'nibus Romam acciverit (2). - - - - Let us form a good 'natured judgment of the Tuscan wit, on the model of the 'comedy of Aristophanes, particularly the Nicias, in 'which, even on a melancholy subject he so pleasantly 'excited mirth, that those very persons, whom he lashed 'under theatrical characters, bore the injury without 'resentment; and having been acted at Florence, Pope Leo 'upon the fame of it's great wit, ordered it to be perform- 'ed at Rome, with all it's decorations, and by the same 'actors, that that city might enjoy the pleasure of it.' This passage of Paul Jovius informs us, that the Pope, hearing what great success this play had on the stage of Florence, gave orders that it should be acted at Rome by the same actors, and with the same scenes. I know not from whence Mr Varillas had so many other particulars, which he did not read in Paul Jovius. Here is his narrative (3): 'One 'day as Machiavel mimicked the gestures and irregular 'motions of some of the Florentines, the cardinal told 'him, they would appear much more ridiculous on the 'stage, in a comedy made in imitation of the come- 'dies of Aristophanes. There needed no more to put 'Machiavel upon writing his Sanitia (4), in which 'the persons he designed to ridicule were so lively 'described, that they durst not shew their resentment 'tho' they were present at it's first acting, for fear of 'increasing the public laughter, by discovering them- 'selves. The cardinal de Medicis was so charmed 'with it, that after he was Pope, he caused the scenes, 'the habits, and the actors themselves, to be brought 'to Rome, to divert his court with it.' Mr Varillas not only relates things which Paul Jovius has not said; but he supposes, against the narrative of this author, that this play was acted at the theatre of Florence before Leo X was Pope. Mr de Balzac observes, that Machiavel's Clitia is a copy of Plautus's Casina, and he justly blames this Florentine for following his original, even in things where matters of religion were ridiculed. 'Scriba quem nôsti Florentinus .... à 'Latinâ bonâ Hetruscam fecit meo judicio non ma- 'lam. Clitia siquidem illius, eadem est quæ Plauti 'Casina; ex quâ nonnulla interpres fidissimus penè 'ad verbum redidit, quædam correxit cum arte, 'multa felicissimè imitatus est, aliqua verò aut im- 'prudenter aut perversè; velut illa Olympionis vil- 'lici ad Stalionem herum:

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 205.

(3) Varillas Anecdotes of Florence, pag. 248.

(4) Paul Jovius calls this comedy Nicia. This piece is not inserted in Machiavel's works. Only two comedies are found there, the first is intituled Mandragola, and the second Clitia.

Inimica est tua uxor mihi, inimicus filius,
Inimici familiares. STAL. Quid id refert tua?
Unus tibi hic dum propitius sit Jupiter,
Tu istos minutos cave Deos floccifeceris.
OLYMP. Nugæ sunt istæ magnæ, quasi tu nescias,
Repentè ut emoriantur humani Joves.
Sed tandem si tu Jupiter sis emortuus,
Cùm ad Deos minores redierit regnum tuum,
Quis mihi subveniet, tergo, aut capiti, aut cruribus?

'Quæ sic Thuscus effinxit Scena sexta Actus tertii, ubi 'Pyrrhus hunc cum Nicomacho sermonem habet.

NIC. Ch'importa à te? Stà ben con Christo, & fatti besse dè' Santi (5).
PIR. Si, ma se voi morissi, e Santi mi tratterebbeno assai male.
NIC. Non dubitare, io ti farò tal parte, che i Santi ti potranno dar poca briga, &c.

(5) Compare above, citat. (39) of the article D'ASSOUCI.

'Hæc quod ad elegantiam, multò inferiora sunt Plau- 'tinis; indigna verò homine Christiano, qui sanctiores 'Musas colit, & in ludicris quoque meminisse debet 'severitatis (6). - - - - - The Florentine scribe, whom 'you know, has turned a good Latin play into one not 'bad in the Tuscan language; for his Clitia is the same 'with Plautus's Casina; some parts of which he has tran- 'slated word for word, some artfully corrected, and ma- 'ny most happily imitated; tho' some passages either im- 'prudently or perversely; as that of the bailiff Olympio 'to his master Stalionon. Your wife hates me, your 'son hates me, and all your acquaintance hate me. 'STAL. What is that to you? Whilil Jupiter is your 'friend, never mind those minute deities. OLYMP. 'They are indeed not worth my regard, provided 'these human Jupiters die soon; but if you, Mr Ju- 'piter,

(6) Balzacius, Epist. Select. p. m. 202, 203.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

city of Rome with it. He was Secretary, and afterwards Hiſtoriographer to the republic of Florence. The Medicis procured him this laſt employment with a good ſalary, as a ſatisfaction for his having been put to the rack (b). This was done upon the ſuſpicion of his being an accomplice in the conſpiracies of the Soderini, againſt the houſe of Medicis. He had the ſtrength to bear the torments, and confeſs nothing (c). The praiſes he gave Brutus and Caſſius in his diſcourſes and books, made him vehemently ſuſpected to be the principal director of a plot that was diſcovered (d) [C]. Nevertheleſs, there was no proſecution againſt him. But from that time he lived in poverty, ridiculing every thing, and having no religion (e). A medicine he had taken, by way of prevention,

(b) Jovius, ubi ſupra, p. 206.

(c) Varillas, Anecdotes of Florence, pag. 247.

(d) Jovius, ubi ſupra.

(e) See the remark [D].

' piter, ſhould die, and your kingdom come to the ' minor gods, what will become of my back, and ' ſhoulders, and ſhins? Which the Tuſcan Poet has thus ' turned in the ſixth ſcene of the third act, where Pyrrhus holds this dialogue with Nicomachus. NIC. ' What is it to you? keep in favour with CHRIST, ' and laugh at the ſaints. PYR. Yes; but if you ' die, and the ſaints uſe me very ill. NIC. Fear not; ' I will put you in ſuch a condition, that the ſaints ' ſhall be able to give you very little trouble. This ' is much inferior in elegance to the paſſage of Plautus; ' but unworthy of a Chriſtian, whoſe muſe ought to be ' more holy, and, even in ludicrous ſubjects, remember ſo- ' verity.'

I ſhall here occaſionally tell you what I promiſed (7). Leo X forgetting the dignity of his character, was preſent one day publickly at a comedy. It was at the requeſt of cardinal Bibienna, who was a good Italian Poet, and writ a play in honour of the ducheſs of Mantua. ' Poëtices & Hetruſcæ linguæ ſtudioſus, comœdias multo ſale, multiſque facetiis refertas componebat: ingenuos juvenes ad hiſtrionicam hortabatur, & ſcenas in Vaticano ſpatioſis in conclavibus inſtituebat. Propterea quum ſorte Calandrum comœdiam à mollibus argutiſque leporibus perjucundam ' in gratiam Iſabellæ Mantuani principis uxoris per ' nobiles comœdos agere ſtatuiſſet, precibus impetravit, ut ipſe pontifex è conſpicuo loco deſpectaret (8). ' - - - - Being a Poet, and maſter of the Tuſcan language, he wrote comedies full of wit and pleaſantry: ' he exhorted young perſons of diſtinction to turn actors, ' and got plays performed in the ſpatious apartments of the ' Vatican. Wherefore, having reſolved to exhibit, by ' actors of quality, the comedy of Calander, written ' with genteel and ſharp wit, in honour of Iſabella ducheſs of Mantua, he prevailed on the Pope to be ſpectator of it from a conſpicuous place.' I could eaſily believe, tho' the Hiſtorian doth not ſay it, that Leo X was preſent at the acting of the Pœnulus. It is a piece of Plautus which was acted in the court of the Capitol with all kind of pomp in the year 1513. ' Eodem quoque anno Julianus Medices Leonis frater ab ' Senatu populoque Romano civitate donatus eſt: in ' cujus gratiam, in area Capitolii temporarium theatrum extructum eſt omni picturarum varietate mirificè cultum. Egere in Scena Plauti Pœnulum decore ' mirabili, & priſca quidem elegantia Romanæ juventutis lepidiſſimi quique, variaque extra ordinem poëmata recitata, florentibus non aliàs ſæcundiore ſæculo poëtarum ingeniis (9). - - - - - The ſame year likewiſe Julian Medicis, brother of Leo, was made ' free by the ſenate and people of Rome; in honour of ' whom an extemporaneous theatre was erected in the ' ſquare of the Capitol, wonderfully adorned with a ' variety of pictures. The Pœnulus of Plautus was acted ' by the moſt ſprightly of the Roman youth, with ſurpriſing decency and ancient elegance, and ſeveral pieces of ' poetry repeated beſides; no age having produced better ' Poets.' Famian Strada relates, that this Pope not only aſſiſted at the conferences of the Poets, but that he alſo approved their inſtituting public diſputes at which he was preſent (10). It is true he placed himſelf in a box where he could not be ſeen by the aſſembly. ' In Aula omnium ordinum frequentia, & Pontificiis potiſſimum aſſeclis referta, nullo exedrarum, locique diſcrimine confidunt. Nam Leo Pontifex ratus inferius eſſe majeſtate Principis, ſi ſe in conſpectum concioni daret; in Aulæ receſſu, loculamento ſe ſuo ſublatus in ſpeculam inſeruerat (11). - - - - They ſit down, without regard to precedency, in the hall, crowded with all ranks, and particularly the Pope's attendants. For Pope Leo, thinking it beneath the majeſty of a prince, to be preſent ' at the aſſembly, viewed it at a diſtance from his apart- ' ment.' There is no doubt but the fiction which Strada relates, was founded upon ſome known matter of fact.

(a) In the article LEO X, at the end of the remark [F].

(8) Paul. Jovius, in vita Leonis X, pag. m. 189.

(9) Idem, Hiſtor. lib. xl, ſub fin. See him alſo in Vita Leonis X, lib. iii, pag. m. 145.

(10) Strada Proluſion. Academ. lib. ii, Proluſ. v, pag. m. 334. See alſo pag. 359, where he ſays, Fuit id Leoni perjucundum qui experta haberet illorum ingenia, & ſolitus eſſet interdum ſeveritatem imperii atque acres generis humani curas exhilaratis hilce voluptatibus temperare.

(11) Id. ib. Prolu. vi, p. 363.

[C] He was ſuſpected to be director of a plot that was diſcovered.] It coſt a Poet and a life-guard-man their lives, if we believe Paul Jovius. ' Quum ' dicendo ſcribendoque Brutos & Caſſios laudaret ' ejus conjurationis architectus fuiſſe putaretur, in qua ' Ajacetus Poëta, & Alamanus ex ipſa turma prætoria leviſſimus eques, concepti ſceleris capite pœnas dederunt. - - - - Having, in converſation and writing, praiſed ſuch men as Brutus and Caſſius, he was ' thought to be the principal contriver of that conſpiracy, in ' which Ajacetus the Poet, and Alamanus of the Prætorian ' guard, loſt their heads.' Theſe people had a deſign to kill cardinal Julian de Medicis, who was afterwards Pope Clement VII. He that Paul Jovius calls Ajacetus, is called by others James Diacettin, or Jacobo da Diacetto, or Jacobus Jacettus. ' He often ' frequented the houſes and gardens of Ruſcellay: ' Scholars, citizens, and ſtrangers, were welcome ' there, and, amongſt others, Zanobi Buondelmonte, ' and Lewis Alamanni, and they commonly diſcourſed before Coſimin Ruſcellay . . . an impotent man, ' who was carried as in a cradle; and amongſt theſe was Nicholas Machiavel, who ſhewed them his ' works and dedicated his Diſcourſes, a work of a new ' invention, to Coſimin. Theſe men of learning and ' Philoſophy entered upon a project of killing the ' cardinal, not for any ill will, but to reſtore, as ' they ſaid, the republic to it's liberty. Diacettin confeſſed it before the judges, and he and the meſſenger ' were condemned and executed. Machiavel was ' much ſuſpected: Alamanni happened to be in the ' country and eſcaped into the duchy of Urbino: Buondelmonte was forced by his wife to leave his houſe, ' and to get out of the city, and ſo eſcaped to Carfagnana, where the Poet Lewis Arioſto, who was go- ' vernor for the duke of Ferrara, ſaved him (12). Mr Varillas (13) ſuppoſes that Leo X was alive at the time of this conſpiracy; he is miſtaken in this, as much as in the interval he puts between Machiavel's promotion to the employment of Hiſtoriographer, and the exaltation of this Pope (14). But Paul Jovius's faults are much greater. He ſuppoſes, that the chief quality and diſtinguiſhing character of his Ajacetus was the being a Poet; which is not true (15): He ſhould have ſaid this of his Alamannus, inſtead of making him one of the light-horſe-guard; and he ought not to have put him in the number of the beheaded. Aloiſio Alamanni, a very ingenious man, and a great Poet, was an accomplice in this conſpiracy, but he was not puniſhed for it: he eſcaped beyond the Alps, and was very well received by Francis I. He publiſhed ſeveral poems in this prince's praiſe, and on many other ſubjects, and he flouriſhed in France in the year 1540, as Poccianti has obſerved (16), and in the year 1544, as we have ſeen above (17). There is a chapter (18) concerning him in Boccalini's Ragguagli. He is there blamed for the exceſſive praiſes he had given the French in an oration, and it is added, that he was quickly diſguſted with this nation, becauſe the French gave him too plainly to underſtand, that they deſpiſed him. Here is a paſſage of James Gohory: " Finally, he wrote pret- ' ty little tracts, namely the Life of Caſtruccio Caſtra- ' cani (who, as I hear, has a relation, a very worthy ' gentleman now in this city) ſent by him to Luigi ' Alemanni, who wrote a book of Agriculture, and ' tranſlated the romance of Giron the courteous, by ' the great Francis's command very elegantly into Italian verſe; and he left two ſons in the court of ' France, one the preſent biſhop of Macon, a man of ' very good learning, the other ſteward of the king's ' houſhold, very expert in arms (19).'

(12) Peter de Boiſſat's Genealogical Hiſtory of the houſe of Medicis, p. 241, 242.

(13) Anecdotes of Florence, p. 249.

(14) Ibid. pag. 248.

(15) See the article JACCETIUS.

(16) Floruit in maximo pretio in Gallia tranſalpina, 1540. Michael Poccantius, in Catalogo Scriptorum Florentinorum, pag. 7. Edit. Florent. 1589.

(17) Citat. (26) of the article FRANCIS I.

(18) It is the nineteenth of the ſecond century.

(19) James Gohery, in Machiavel's Life before his French tranſlation of the Prince, and the diſcourſes upon Livy, printed at Paris in 1571.

[D] A

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion, occaſioned his death in 1530 [D]. Some ſay that they were obliged to uſe the public authority, to force him to receive the ſacraments (f). Others ſay that he died uttering blaſphemies (g). That of all his books, which has been moſt cenſured (b), is a treatiſe of politics, intituled, The Prince [E]. Several authors have confuted it. Poſſevin, who

(f) See Varillas ubi ſupra, pag. 249.

(g) Blaſphemans evomuit impro-bum Spiritum. Th. Raynaudus, de malis & bonis libris, num. xlvi, pag. 28.

(b) Th. Raynaudus, ubi ſupra, has given a liſt of ſeveral authors who have refuted Machiavel.

[D] A medicine he had taken by way of prevention, occaſioned his death in 1530.] See the words of Paul Jovius (20). ‘ Fato functus eſt quum accepto temere ‘ pharmaco, quo ſe adverſus morbos præmuniret, ‘ VITÆ SUÆ JOCABUNDUS ILLUSISSET, paulo ‘ antequam Florentia Cæſarianis ſubacta armis, Medi-‘ ceos veteres dominos recipere cogeretur (21). - - - - ‘ He died, having raſhly taken a medicine to prevent ‘ diſtempers, and JESTING UPON HIS OWN LIFE, ‘ a little before Florence, conquered by the Imperial ‘ arms, was obliged to receive their old maſters of the ‘ family of Medicis.’ He had ſaid a little before, Fuit exinde ſemper inops, uti irriſor & Atheos. He ſuppoſes then that the Medicis forſook him, as ſoon as they ſuſpected him to be in Diacettin's plot; but he is miſtaken. Clement VII was not yet Pope; and we find, that Machiavel, dedicating his eight books of the Hiſtory of Florence to Clement VII, confeſſes he ſubſiſted by the bounties of this Pope. ‘ Io vengo allegro in ‘ campo ſperando che come io ſono dalla humanita ‘ di V. B. honorato e NUTRITO, coſi ſarò delle ar-‘ mate legioni del ſuo ſanctiſſimo giudicio ajutato e ‘ difeſo. - - - - - I come with alacrity into the field, ‘ hoping, that as I am obliged to your holineſs for my ‘ ſupport, ſo your judgment will aſſiſt and defend me in ‘ the armed legions.’ This circumſtance of time manifeſts a notable falſhood of Varillas. He ſays (22), ‘ That Machiavel wrote the eight books which we ‘ have of the hiſtory of his country in ſo florid and ‘ correct a ſtile, that it is blamed for being too much ‘ ſo. And it is principally in this, that Boccacio's ‘ eaſineſs and ſweet liberty is preferred before Ma-‘ chiavel's ſtile. His narration is ſometimes ill-natured ‘ and ſatirical; and Mark Muſurus ſo clearly con-‘ victed him of it that he durſt not reply.’ Muſurus died in Pope Leo the tenth's time; he could not therefore criticiſe a work of Machiavel, that came not out till Clement VII. Mr Varillas ſtrangely perverts and falſifies theſe words of Paul Jovius (23). ‘ Pedeſtrem ‘ patrii ſermonis facultatem à Boccacii conditoris ve-‘ tuſtate diffluentem novis & plane Atticis vinculis ‘ aſtrinxerat, ſic ut ille caſtigatior, ſed non purior aut ‘ gravior otioſis ingeniis exiſtimetur. - - - - He confined ‘ with new and perfectly Attic chains, the old rambling ‘ proſe of Boccace, it's founder; yet ſo, as that the latter ‘ is eſteemed by the men of leiſure the more correct, but ‘ not the more pure or more weighty.’ According to Paul Jovius, Boccacio's ſtile is more correct than that of Machiavel, but it is not purer or graver. However, when I ſay that Machiavel died in the year 1530. I accommodate myſelf to Paul Jovius's expreſſions; without knowing, whether it will be better to follow him or Poccianti, who places his death in the year 1526 (24). The Feuillant, Peter de St Romuald, puts it on the fifth of December 1530. See the ſecond tome (25) of his Chronological Journal. This doth not agree with Paul Jovius. See above, citation (20).

(20) Jovius, Elog. pag. 206.

(21) Florence was ſurrendered the ninth of Auguſt 1530.

(22) Varillas, Anecdotes of Florence. pag. 248.

(23) Jovius, Elog. p. 206.

(24) Poccianti, ubi ſupra, p. 137.

(25) Pag. m. 592.

[E] A treatiſe of Politics, intituled, The Prince.] This author's maxims are very pernicious; the world is ſo perſuaded of it, that Machiaveliſm, and the art of reigning tyrannically, are terms of the ſame import. This work of Machiavel was tranſlated into French by Mr Amelot de la Houſſaye. The author of the News from the Republic of Letters (26), ſpeaking of the third edition of this tranſlation, makes the following remark. The preface ‘ is full of reflexions which are ‘ very judicious; we there read amongſt other ‘ things this thought of Mr de Wicquefort; Machia-‘ vel ſays almoſt every where what princes do, and not ‘ what they ought to do (27). It is ſtrange there are ſo ‘ many people, who believe, that Machiavel teaches ‘ princes dangerous politics; for on the contrary princes ‘ have taught Machiavel what he has written. It is ‘ the ſtudy of the world, and the obſervation of the ‘ tranſactions in it, and not a fanciful cloſet meditation, ‘ that have been Machiavel's maſters. Let his books ‘ be burned, anſwered, tranſlated, and commented, it ‘ will be all one with reſpect to government. By an ‘ unhappy and fatal neceſſity, Politics ſet themſelves ‘ above Morality; they do not confeſs it, but yet they ‘ do as Achilles, Jura negat ſibi nata. A great Phi-‘ loſopher of this age can not bear they ſhould ſay, ‘ that it was neceſſary man ſhould ſin: I believe, how-‘ ever, that he owns, with reſpect to princes, that ſin ‘ is now become a neceſſary thing, although that does ‘ not make them excuſable; for beſides that there are ‘ few who content themſelves with what is neceſſary, ‘ they would not be under this wretched condition, ‘ if they were all good men.’ To this may be added the ſaying of an ancient Poet, that by the bare exerciſe of royalty, the moſt innocent would learn to be guilty, without any tutor: Ut nemo doceat fraudis & ſcelerum vias, regnum docebit (28). - - - - - Though no one were to teach the ways of fraud and wickedneſs, a kingdom will teach them. Every body has heard that maxim, qui neſcit diſſimulare neſcit regnare, and he who denies the truth of it, muſt be very ignorant of affairs of ſtate. Boccalini cunningly gives us to underſtand, that the reign of ſome Popes taught Machiavel the politics of his Prince. Obſerve the apology he lends this writer. ‘ Io in tanto non intendo difendere gli ſcritti ‘ miei, che pubblicamente gli accuſo, e condanno per ‘ empi, per pieni di crudeli, & eſecrandi documenti ‘ da governare gli ſtati. Di modo, che ſe quella, che ‘ ho publicata alla Stampa, è dottrina inventata di mio ‘ capo, e ſono Precetti nuovi, dimando, che pur' hora ‘ contro di me irremiſſibilmente, ſi eſeguiſca la ſenten-‘ za, che a i Giudici e piaciuto darmi contro: ma ſe ‘ gli Scritti miei altro non contengono, che quei Pre-‘ cetti Politici, e quelle regole di Stato, che ho cavate ‘ dalle attioni di alcuni Principi, che ſe voſtra Maeſtà ‘ mi darà licenza nominarò in queſto luogo, de quali ‘ è pena la vita dir male, qual giuſtitia, qual ragione ‘ vuole, ch'eſſi, che hanno inventata l'arrabbiata, è di-‘ ſperata Politica ſcritta da me, ſieno tenuti ſacroſanti, ‘ io che ſolo l'ho publicata, un ribaldo, un atheiſta? ‘ Che certo non sò vedere, per qual cagione ſtia bene ‘ adorar l'originale di una coſa come ſanta, & abbruc-‘ ciare la copia di eſſa come eſecrabile: è come io tanto ‘ debba eſſer perſeguitato, quando la lettione delle ‘ Hiſtorie, non ſolo permeſſa, ma tanto commendata ‘ da ogn'uno notoriamente hà vertù di convertire in ‘ tanti Machiavelli quelli, che vi attendono con l'occhiale ‘ Politico (29).’ Obſerve theſe laſt words; Boccalini pretends, that ſince the reading of Hiſtory is both permitted and recommended, the reading of Machiavel is unjuſtly condemned. The meaning of which is, that the ſame maxims are found in Hiſtory, as in this author's Prince. There we ſee them put in practice, they are only here adviſed. It is perhaps upon this foundation, that men of ſenſe judge, that it were to be wiſhed no hiſtories were written (30). This does not excuſe Machiavel: he advances maxims which he does not blame; but a good Hiſtorian, who relates the practice of theſe maxims, condemns it. This makes a great difference between this Florentine's book and Hiſtory; and yet it is certain, that, by accident, the reading of Hiſtory is very apt to produce the ſame effect, as the reading of Machiavel. There are ingenious people, who have made his apology (31), ſaying, that all thoſe, who have attacked him, ſhow their ignorance in matters of policy (32). ‘ Quicunque ſane hactenus ‘ MACHIAVELLUM ſibi ſumpſere confutandum, ſi ‘ verum licet profiteri, ſuam civilis philoſophiæ ἀπαι-‘ δευσίαν nimis apertè prodiderunt. Ita voco cum ‘ Ariſtotele, ſummo dicendi magiſtro, imperitiam τοῦ ‘ τρόπου τῆς ἐπιςήμης, five naturæ & indolis politicæ ‘ ſcientiæ ignorantiam (33). Enim verò omnes penè ‘ videas differere, quaſi non aliæ ſint Reſpublicæ, quam ‘ quæ primo ac per ſeſe, imò unicè, ſalutem populi ‘ ſpectant, aut verò affectant plenam exactamque hu-‘ manæ vitæ felicitatem; eoque & politico magiſtro

(26) News from the Republic of Letters, January, 1687. p. 99.

(27) The Chancellor Bacon, de augment. Scientiar. lib. vii, cap. ii, pag. m. 397, had ſaid the ſame. Eſt quod gratias agamus Machiavello & hujuſmodi Scriptoribus qui aperte & indiſſimulanter proferunt quid homines facere ſolent non quid debeant.

(28) Seneca in Thyeſte, Act ii, ver. 313. He had ſaid ver. 217. Sanctitas, pietas, fides, privata bona ſunt: qua juvat, Reges cant. - - - - - Sanctity, piety, fidelity, are private goods: let kings go where they pleaſe.

(29) Boccalin, Ragguagli di Parnaſſo, centuria I, cap. lxxxix.

(30) See Machiavel, de Arte Hiſtorica.

(31) Pro Machiavello inter alios Apologiam ſcripſit Gaſp. Sciopp. in libello Pædiæ Politicæ, & Diſſertatione adverſus Paganinum Gaudentium. Boſius de comparanda prud. Civil. num. xciii, apud Magirum Eponymol. pag. 552.

(32) Conringius in Præfat. ſuæ libri de Principe editionis, apud Magirum, pag. 554.

(33) Refer to this, theſe words of the Sieur Naudé, chap. i, of Coups d'Etat (State politics.) To ſpeak of politics, as they are handled and practiſed at this day, without ſaying any thing of theſe ſtate-politics, is properly to be ignorant of the diſcipline and method which Ariſtotle teaches, in his Analytics, to ſpeak of all things pertinently, and according to the principles and demonſtrations proper and eſſential to them: Eſt enim pædiæ inſcientia neſcire quorum oporteat quærere demonſtrationem, quorum vero non oporteat: as he ſays in his Metaphyſics.

de

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is inexcuſable [L]. Notwithſtanding all thoſe vices, he was after his death honoured as a god, and even in the times of the Roman emperors there were ſome families that choſe him for their tutelar deity [M]. Flattery had no hand in this, as it had when in his life-time divine honours were paid him: it was a true ſuperſtitious worſhip. He died at Babylon about the thirty third year of his age. Some ſay he was poiſoned, but more deny it (a). His conqueſts were indeed broke into many pieces after his death, but theſe pieces were large ones, and for a long time rendered the Greek nation famous and potent in Aſia. He had not much time to perform them in; for he paſſed the Helleſpont, the ſecond year of the CXIth Olympiad, and he died the firſt year of the CXIVth. He was born the firſt year of the CVIth, and he began his reign the firſt year of the CXIth (b). He had one particular good fortune, which is, that it cannot be ſaid to eclipſe

(a) See Plutarch, in Alex ſub fin. pag. 707: and above remark [K].

(b) According to Seth. Calviſius, who makes the year of Alexander's death co-incident with the 430*th year of Rome, and the* 323*d before* JESUS CHRIST.

' ſo many expeditions, ſo many battles, ſo many winters, ' during which, ſurmounting the difficulties of place and ' time, he had paſſed ſo many rivers, deſcending from un- ' known countries, and ſo many ſeas, in all which he ' had come off with ſafety, was at laſt killed by intem- ' perate drinking, and that fatal Herculean cup.' Diodorus Siculus (54) relates, that Alexander having already drank too much, would drink off Hercules's cup, which he had no ſooner done, but he was ſeized with a cruel pain, as if he had received a great blow. Thus you ſee the only poiſon that killed him, and which made the Aſtrologers get the advantage which the Philoſophers had made them loſe (55). For as for actual poiſon, it was not mentioned till ſixteen years after Alexander's death, and probably thoſe who were the informers, deſigned only to cauſe Olympias to put a great many people to death, as ſhe did. Ariſtotle was not charged with being concerned in it, but upon the word of one Agnothemis, who, as they ſaid, had heard Antigonus ſay, that Ariſtotle diſcovered the poiſon to Antipater, that he was to uſe (56). Let us not forget, that Alexander cauſed Calanus's funeral to be pompouſly celebrated (57). There was a funeral oration, tournaments, ſolemn games, and every thing: but conſidering the Indian's inclination for wine, he bethought himſelf of ſetting up a combat of drunkenneſs (58); there were three prizes for the conquerors; the firſt was worth a talent. Of thoſe that entered the liſt, there were thirty five that died upon the ſpot, and ſix that followed them quickly after. The conqueror named Promachus drank four Congii (59), and lived but three days after his victory (60).

(54) Libr. XVII, ſub fin.

(55) See what has been cited from Diodorus Siculus, in the remark [G].

(56) Plut. in Alexand. p. 707.

(57) An Indian Philoſopher, who burned himſelf with great ceremony.

(58) Ἀπρατοποτίας ἀγὼνα, more potatus certamen. Clarei Mitylenæus in Hiſtoriis de Alexandro, apud Athenæum, Libr. X, pag. 437.

(59) Ibid.

(60) Plut. in Alexand. pag. 703.

[L] The cruelty he excerciſed upon the inhabitants of Tyre, is inexcuſable.] Alexander's fortune, that hitherto had run with the rapidity of a torrent, found before this place a ſtrong reſiſtance, which checked it's courſe ſeveral months (61). This prince underſtood but too well, the miſchievous conſequences of ſuch an interruption; he loſt his main point, if he gave room to believe, that he could be ſtopped. Finding therefore a thouſand ſubjects of diſcontent, both in raiſing the ſiege and continuing it, he reſolved to make new efforts againſt this city. ' Hic rex fatigatus ſtatuerat ſoluta ' obſidione Ægyptum petere, quippe quum Aſiam in- ' genti celeritate percurriſſet circa muros unius urbis ' hærebat, tot maximarum rerum opportunitate di- ' miſſa. Cæterum tam diſcedere invitum quam mo- ' rari pudebat. Fama quoque qua plura quam armis ' everterat ratus leviorem fore, ſi Tyrum quaſi teſtem ' ſe poſſe vinci reliquiſſet. Igitur ne quid inexpertum ' omitteret, &c (62). - - - - - - Here the king, being ' wearied out, reſolved to raiſe the ſiege, and march in- ' to Egypt; the rapidity, with which he had over-run ' Aſia, being checked by the walls of a ſingle town, by ' which he loſt the opportunity of ſo many great actions. ' Yet he was as much aſhamed to depart, as to ſtay: be- ' ſides he conſidered, it would leſſen his fame, which had ' contributed more to his victories than his arms, if he ' left Tyre as a proof that he might be conquered. There- ' fore, to leave nothing unattempted, &c.' His new efforts ſucceeded, he ſtormed the place, but diſhonoured the victory by his cruelty. He commanded the houſes to be fired, and all to be put to the ſword, that had not retired to the temples; and he crucified two thouſand inhabitants, who had not ſo much eſcaped the fury of the ſoldiers, as their wearineſs of killing. Triſte deinde ſpectaculum victoribus ira præbuit regis: duo millia in quibus occidendi defecerat rabies crucibus adfixi per ingens litoris ſpatium pependerunt (63). There is no prince in theſe days, but would be degraded from all his glory in a thouſand volumes, ſhould he do the twentieth part of what Alexander did.

(61) Apply to this the words. Hæc ſive invidia Deum, ſive fato, expeditionis procontenti imperii cursus paruimper . . . . ſupprimitur. - - - - Here, either through the envy of the gods, or fate, the rapid progreſs of the empire was ſtayed for a while. Florus, Libr. I, Cap. XIII.

(62) Q. Curt. Libr. IV. Cap. V.

(63) Ib. ib.

[M] Some families . . . . . choſe him for their tutelar deity.] I would not venture to affirm that his doublet, which they boaſted to have at Rome, was reckoned a pledge of ſome celeſtial benediction; and we muſt not reckon much upon Caligula's wearing it on a ſolemn day. Caligula was no ſuperſtitious man, and if he had been a Chriſtian, I do not think he would have had much faith for the ſcapulary. Not that I pretend to deny, that great villains have had childiſh ſuperſtitions. But be it how it will, I can ſay nothing of Caligula's opinion, with reſpect to that relic of Alexander, ſince Dion ſays nothing of it (64). Caracalla had a great affection for Alexander: this emperor made uſe of arms and goblets, and ſoldiers like thoſe of this conqueror; he perſecuted the Peripatetics, and would burn all the books of their maſter, becauſe of the report that was ſpread, that he was an accomplice in the poiſoning of Alexander. He teſtified by a hundred other things his veneration for him, but I ſhall take care not to imitate a learned critic (65), who makes uſe of theſe facts to prove, that a religious worſhip was paid to Alexander. What he cites from Trebellius Pollio, and Lampridius, has quite another force. The firſt of theſe two Hiſtorians tells us it was believed, that Alexander's effigies engraven in gold or ſilver, brought good luck to the perſon that wore it. The other Hiſtorian tells us, that there was in the city of Arcena a temple conſecrated to Alexander the Great. ' Alexandri ' nomen accepit (Alexander Severus) quod in templo ' dicato apud Arcenam urbem Alexandro magno natus ' eſſet, quum caſu illuc die feſto Alexandri pater cum ' uxore patriæ ſolennitatis implendæ cauſa veniſſet. Cui ' rei argumentum eſt quod eadem die natalem habet ' hic Mammeæ Alexander, qua ille Magnus exceſſit è ' vita (66). - - - - - Severus took the name of Alexander, ' becauſe he was born in a temple dedicated to Alexander ' the Great in the city of Arcena, the father of Alexander ' coming thither by chance, with his wife, to celebrate ' ſome feſtival. In confirmation of this, it is obſervable ' that this Alexander, the ſon of Mammæa, was born ' the ſame day, on which Alexander the Great died.' This paſſage ſhews that the inhabitants of Arcena kept Alexander's feſtival every year the day that he died. Which is the ſame that is done at preſent with reſpect to ſeveral ſaints, whoſe feſtival falls on the day of their death. As for Trebellius Pollio's paſſage, I will recite it at large, in favour of thoſe, who ſhall read this Dictionary, without having many other books, or who do not care to ſtir from their place to conſult this author. They who do not care to know what he has ſaid may paſs over the following lines. ' Videtur mihi non prætermittendum de Macriano- ' rum familia, quæ hodieque floret, id dicere quod ' ſpeciale ſemper habuerunt. Alexandrum Magnum ' Macedonem viri in annulis & argento, mulieres in ' reticulis & dextrocheriis, & in annulis, & in omni ' ornamentorum genere, exſculptum ſemper habuerunt: ' eo uſque ut tunicæ & limbi & penulæ matronales ' in familia ejus hodieque ſint, quæ Alexandri effigiem ' de liciis variantibus, monſtrent. Vidimus proxime ' Cornelium Macrum in eadem familia virum, quum ' cœnam in templo Herculis daret, pateram electrinam, ' quæ in medio vultum Alexandri haberet, & in cir- ' cuitu omnem hiſtoriam contineret ſignis brevibus & ' minutulis, pontifici propinare, quam quidem circum- ' ferri ad omnes tanti illius viri cupidiſſimos juſſit. ' Quod id circo poſui, quia dicuntur juvari in omni ' actu ſuo, qui Alexandrum expreſſum vel auro ge- ' ſtitant vel argento (67). - - - - - I think I ought not ' to paſs by a circumſtance peculiar to the family of the ' Macriani, which ſtill flouriſhes. The men have al- ' ways carried about them the effigies of Alexander the ' Great

(64) Libr. LIX.

(65) Barthius in Statium, Tom. I. pag. 404.

(66) Lampridius, in Alexandro Severo, pag. m. 889, Tom. I.

(67) Trebellius Pollio, in 30. Tyrann. pag. 295, Tom. II.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

eclipſe the luſtre of his glory, that treachery had any great ſhare in his triumphs [N]. There is no need to ſay that Philip his father deſcended from Hercules, and Olympias his mother from Achilles, and thus his extraction was as glorious, as it could have been, if he had had the liberty of chuſing it in Hiſtory. We ſhall not ſpeak here of his wives and children, referring this to the article ROXANA. According to the nature of this Dictionary, I ſhould obſerve all the errors that people have committed concerning this conqueror, yet I ſhall note only ſome of them. The Jews pretend, that he determined ſeveral diſputes they had with their neighbours [O]. Some ſay, that the Romans ſent embaſſadors

' Great of Macedon, engraven on their rings and mo- ' ney, and the women on their head-dreſſes, bracelets,
' rings, and all other ornaments: inſomuch that there
' are gowns and petticoats now in the family interwoven
' with the figure of Alexander. I my ſelf ſaw Corne-
' lius Macer, of the ſame family upon his giving an en-
' tertainment in the temple of Hercules, drink to the
' prieſt in an amber cup, which had Alexander's head
' in the middle, and contained his whole hiſtory in ſmall
' characters round the brim, which he ordered to be car- ' ried round to all the admirers of ſo great a man. I
' mention this, becauſe they, who carry about them the
' effigies of Alexander in gold or ſilver, are ſaid to be
' aſſiſted in all their undertakings.' I do not alledge the prayers Juſtin ſpeaks of; they are no proof of a fixed worſhip and invocation. The Macedonians were then in the utmoſt conſternation, they imitated drowning people, who catch at every thing they meet with. In ſuch caſes people canonize thoſe who have neither temples nor feſtivals. If you would however know, what Juſtin has ſaid, you may ſatisfy your ſelf without riſing from your place. ' Hæc cum nunciata per
' omnem Macedoniam eſſent, portæ urbium claudun-
' tur, luctu omnia replentur, nunc orbitatem amiſſo-
' rum filiorum dolebant, nunc excidia urbium metue-
' bant, nunc Alexandri Philippique Regum ſuorum
' nomina ſicuti Numina in auxilium vocabant. Sub
' illis ſe non ſolum tutos, verum etiam victores orbis
' terrarum extitiſſe, ut tuerentur patriam ſuam quam
' gloria rerum geſtarum cœlo proximam reddidiſſent,
' ac opem afflictis ferrent quos furor & temeritas Pto-
' lemæi Regis perdidiſſet, orabant (68). - - - - When
' the news of theſe things was ſpread all over Macedon,
' the gates of the cities were ſhut up, nothing was ſeen
' but tears and lamentations; one while they lamented
' their loſt ſons, then they feared the deſtruction of their
' cities, next they invoked the names of their kings, Ale-
' xander and Philip, as gods to their aſſiſtance. Under ' them they had not only been ſafe, but conquerors of the ' world; they entreated them to protect their country,
' which they had rendered ſo famous by their glorious ex-
' ploits, and aſſiſt their afflicted country-men, whom the
' rage and raſhneſs of Ptolemy endeavoured to ruin.'

(68) Juſtinus, Libr. XXIV, Cap. V.

[N] It cannot be ſaid, that treachery had any great ſhare in his triumphs.] Read Pauſanias, where he ſhews what prejudice was ſeveral times done to the liberty of the Greeks by the practices of thoſe who ſuffered themſelves to be bribed; you will there find that Philip king of Macedonia held thoſe correſpondences to aggrandize himſelf, but that Alexander, his ſon, had the good fortune to fortify and augment his power without theſe means. Κατὰ δὲ τὴν Φιλίππου βασιλείαν τὸ Ἀμύντα, Λακεδαίμονα πόλεων μόνην οὐ προδοθεῖσαν τῶν ἐν Ἕλλησιν εὕροις τίς ἂν. αἱ δὲ ἄλλαι πόλεις αἱ ἐν τῇ Ἑλλάδι, ὑπὸ προδοσίας μᾶλλον, ἢ ὑπὸ νόσου πρότερον τῆς λοιμώδους ἐφθάρησαν. Ἀλεξάνδρῳ δὲ τῷ Φιλίππου πάρεσχεν ἡ εὐτυχία, μικρὰ ἀνδρῶν προδοτῶν καὶ οὐκ ἄξια λόγου προσδεηθῆναι. Philippo vero Amyntæ filio ad Græciæ imperium adſpirante unam invenias proditionis immunem Spartam: ceteras Græcorum urbes non magis peſtilentia ſuperiorum temporum, quam proditiones deleverunt. Alexandri felicitas effecit, ut nullum magnopere inſigne proditionis exemplum, quo res ejus adjutæ fuerint, poſſit commemorari (69). - - - - But when Philip, the ſon of Amyntas, aſpired to the empire of Greece, Sparta alone was not betrayed; as for the other cities of Greece, they were deſtroyed no leſs by treachery, than the peſtilence which had ſpread among them. It was Alexander's happineſs, that no ſignal inſtance of treachery, in the ſucceſs of his undertakings, can be recollected. This oppoſition betwixt the character of the father and the ſon, has been very well deſcribed by the Hiſtorian Juſtin. ' Nulla apud eum (Philippum)
' turpis ratio vincendi, ... Amicitias utilitate, non ' fide colebat. Gratiam fingere in odio, in gratia
' offenſam ſimulare, inſtruere inter concordantes odia,
' apud utrumque gratiam quærere, ſolennis illi con-
' ſuetudo. . . . . Huic Alexander filius ſucceſſit, &
' virtute & vitiis patre major. Vincendi ratio utrique
' diverſa. Hic aparte, ille artibus bella tractabat.
' Deceptis ille gaudere hoſtibus, hic palam fuſis,
' Prudentior ille conſilio, hic animo magnificentior
' (70). - - - - He (Philip) took no baſe methods of con-
' quering . . . . he cultivated friendſhips, not on a point
' of honour, but of intereſt . . . . It was common with ' him to pretend kindneſs where he hated; and to take of-
' fence, where he had a kindneſs; to ſet at variance thoſe
' who were in agreement, and inſinuate himſelf into the good
' liking of both . . . . To him ſucceeded his ſon Alexander,
' greater than his father both in his virtues and his vices.
' They took different methods of conquering. The ſon carried ' on his wars openly, the father by ſtratagems. The latter
' took a pleaſure in deceiving his enemies, the former in
' routing them. The father conducted his deſigns with
' the greateſt prudence, the ſon with the greateſt cou-
' rage, and magnanimity.' There is hardly any occaſion where fortune has better ſhewed the prodigality of her favours to Alexander than this; for after all, men are naturally inclined to leſſen the glory of a conqueror, or rather entirely to efface it, when they know that he has corrupted the generals of his enemies, and the governors of places he deſigned to beſiege.

(69) Pauſan. Libr. VII, Cap. X, p. 546. Lipſ. Edit. 1696.

(70) Juſtinus, Libr. IX, Cap. VIII, pag. m. 207.

[O] The Jews pretend that he determined ſeveral diſputes they had with their neighbours.] They ſuppoſe that three ſorts of people applied to Alexander, to requeſt the reſtitution of the goods, which the Jews unjuſtly detained from them. The Canaanites, who eſcaped from Joſhua came to complain of the uſurpations of the Jews: the Egyptians came to demand the houſhold goods, which the Jews borrowed of them on leaving Egypt; the Arabians or the deſcendants of Iſhmael, and of the ſons of Keturah, came to demand their part of the ſucceſſion of Abraham. The Rabbi Gibea Ben-Peſiſa (71) pleaded for the Jews; the plaintiffs cited ſome paſſages of Scripture, and the Rabbi anſwering them in the like manner from Scripture, they knew not what to ſay and retired with ſhame. Never cauſe was more eaſily gained. I do not underſtand the anſwer Gibea made the Egyptians; one would think that he uſed this principle, that the Jews had laboured ſo much for the Egyptians, that what they borrowed, equalled not the leaſt ſalary of a labourer. Tertullian has ſaid ſomewhere (72) that the Jews pretend there were ſome conference betwixt the Egyptian envoys and theirs, and that the Egyptians renounced their jewels, when they heard the pretenſions, which the Jews founded on their great labours in Egypt. He ſeems on account of this reaſon to approve their keeping the jewels that had been lent them; but it is certain, that this would be introducing the bad morality of the modern Caſuiſts, to ground one's ſelf on ſuch a right: how could one by this principle blame a ſervant who robs his maſter, as far as the value of his wages? It is even true, that this ſervant's cauſe would be better than that of the Iſraelites, ſince they carried away the goods of thoſe, for whom they had not laboured; their labour was for the prince, and they paid themſelves with the goods of the ſubject. It is as if at preſent, the Proteſtants, whom the perſecution has robbed of their eſtate in France, ſhould indemnify themſelves upon their Catholic fellow-citizens, when they retire into foreign countries. There is no juſtifying the Iſraelites therefore, but by the expreſs command of God, who, being abſolute maſter of all things, can transfer the property of one perſon to another, as he pleaſes. I need not ſay, that theſe ſuits brought againſt the Jews before Alexander, are chimeras; it ſuffices to obſerve, that this ſtory is told otherwiſe in the Bereſchith Rabba (73) than in the Gemara Babylonica (74). I am far from reckoning in the number of fables, Alexander's march to Jeruſalem;

(71) He was alſo called Gibea Ben Koſan: He was a famous Lawyer, as Abraham Zacuth ſays in Sepher Juchaſin, folio 13, apud Autorem Poiygamiæ triumph. p. 287.

(72) Adverſus Marcionem, Tom. II, Cap. XX, apud eumdem.

(73) Paraſch. LXI, folio 68, col. 21, apud Autorem Polygam. triumph. pag. 283.

(74) Ad Titul. Sanhedr. Cap. XI, folio 91, apud eumdem Autorem, p. 287.

the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google who had not read it, was nevertheleſs the cauſe of it's being condemned by the Inquiſition [F]. Machiavel publiſhed ſeven books of the Military art, which made him paſs

'de ſolis illis agendum eſſe: hinc ſanè omnem doctri-
'nam, quæ non eſt de Rebuſpublicis, quas illi unicè
'cognoſcendas hominibus arbitrantur, damnare ſolent,
'& extra limites politicæ methodi abjicere. - - - - - -
'Whoever hitherto have undertaken to confute Machiavel,
'if I may ſpeak the truth, have too plainly diſcovered
'their ignorance of Politics. You will find them almoſt
'all diſputing, as if there were no other republics, than
'ſuch as principally, if not ſolely, regard the good of the 'people, or aim at a full and exact happineſs of human
'life; and therefore that a Politician ought ſolely to con-
'fine himſelf to them: hence they condemn all doctrine, as
'without the limits of Politics, which does not regard
'ſuch republics, as they think ought alone to be inquired
'into by men.' You will find ſeveral reflexions of this nature, in the preface which the learned Conringius has prefixed to Machiavel's Prince. Obſerve, that our Florentine is accuſed of enriching himſelf with the ſpoils of Ariſtotle: his political maxims therefore have for a long time been in books. It is the ſame Conringius who charges him with this: 'Nicolaus Ma-
'chiavellus cymbalum illud Politicarum artium nullum
'ferè dominatùs arcanum conſilium Principem ſuum
'potuit docere, quod non dudum ante ad tyrannidem
'& dominatum conſervandum facere Ariſtoteli ſit libro
'V (Politicorum) obſervatum. Quin ſua omnia vaſer-
'rimus hic nequitiæ doctor diſſimulato plagio ex Ariſto-
'tele fortaſſe tranſcripſit: eo tamen diſcrimine, quod
'hic impiè ac impudenter omni Principi commendet,
'quæ non niſi Dominis ac Tyrannis convenire longè
'rectius ac prudentius ſcripſerat antè Ariſtoteles (34).
'- - - Nicolas Machiavel, that cymbal of the arts of 'Politics, could teach his prince no ſecret ſpring of govern-
'ment, which Ariſtotle had not long ago obſerved, for
'the preſervation of power, in the fifth book of his Politics.
'Nay, perhaps this cunning doctor of iniquity tranſcribed
'his whole doctrine from Ariſtotle, without confeſſing the
'theft; yet with this difference, that Machiavel impiouſly
'and impudently recommends to all princes, that, which,
'according to Ariſtotle, is applicable only to tyrants.'
Gentillet (35) accuſes him of being Bartolus's plagiary. I wonder they do not ſay, that he has ſtole his maxims from the angelic doctor, the great St Thomas Aquinas. See in Naudé's State-Politics (36) a long paſſage of Thomas Aquinas's commentary upon the fifth book of Ariſtotle's Politics. Mr Amelot (37) proves, that Machiavel was but the diſciple or interpreter of Tacitus, and he makes uſe of the ſame obſervation as Conringius. 'Of all thoſe, ſays he (38), that cenſure Ma-
'chiavel, you will find that ſome confeſs, they never 'read him; and the others who have read him, have 'never underſtood him; as appears by their taking ſe-
'veral paſſages in a literal ſenſe, which the Politicians
'know how to interpret otherwiſe. So that, to tell the 'truth, he is cenſured only becauſe he is ill under-
'ſtood; and he is ill underſtood by many, who are 'capable of underſtanding him better, only becauſe
'they read him with prejudice: whereas, if they read
'him as judges, that is, holding the balance even be'tween him and his adverſaries, they would ſee, that
'his maxims are for the moſt part abſolutely neceſſa-
'ry to princes, who, as the great Coſmo de Medicis
'ſaid, cannot always govern their ſtates with their 'heads in their hand *.' He had been ſaying (39),
'That it is no wonder, that Machiavel is cenſured by
'ſo many people; ſince there are ſo few that under-
'ſtand the Reaſons of State, and conſequently ſo few
'qualified to be competent judges of his precepts
'and maxims. And I will ſay by the way, That 'there are abundance of miniſters and princes, that
'ſtudy them, and even practiſe them in every point,
'who had condemned and deteſted them, before they 'came to the miniſtry, or the throne. So true it is 'that a man muſt be a prince, or at leaſt a miniſter,
'to know, I ſay not the uſefulneſs, but the abſolute
'neceſſity of theſe maxims.' This is applying to Machiavel, what another had ſaid of Tacitus; 'They 'who accuſe him of holding impious maxims, and
'oppoſite to morality, muſt pardon me, if I tell them,
'That never Politician handled ſtate-maxims more rea-
'ſonably than he; and that the moſt ſcrupulous who 'have blamed them, whilſt they were private perſons,
'have ſtudied and practiſed them, when they were 'called to the management of public affairs (40).'
Mr Amelot having cited thoſe words of Mr de Chanvalon, immediately confirms them by an example:
'Germany, ſays he (41), has very lately ſeen a notable
'example of this in the laſt biſhop of Vienna, who,
'when he was only Father Emeric, in puris naturali-
'bus, inveighed, in all his ſermons, againſt the maxims
'of Policy, ſo far as to believe there was no ſalvation
'for thoſe who practiſed them; but who was no
'ſooner introduced into the emperor's court, and
'drawn into the miniſtry, but he changed his opinion
'as his fortune, and he himſelf practiſed (but more 'artfully) whatever he condemned before in his pre-
'deceſſors, the princes of Averſberg and Lobkowitz,
'whoſe diſgrace he had procured, and in count
'Auguſtin of Walſtein, his competitor, for the
'biſhopric of Vienna, and the cardinalſhip **.'

We muſt ſay ſomething of the book written by Innocent Gentillet, againſt that of Machiavel: It is called, in the edition I uſe (42), Diſcourſes upon the Means of Well-governing and Maintaining a Kingdom, or Principality, in Peace, divided into three books: concerning the Council, Religion, and Policy, that a Prince ought to uſe. Againſt Nicolas Machiavel, a Florentine. It is dedicated to the duke of Alençon, brother to king Henry III. There is neither the name of the author nor the Printer to it, nor the place where it was printed, but only the date 1576. This book is commonly cited, as if intituled Anti-Machiavel. This citation is ſhorter than that of the true title, and that was the occaſion of giving it the name of Anti-Machiavel. Conſult Mr Baillet (43).

I am perſuaded, that what I am going to quote from the Sieur de la Popeliniere, relates to Gentillet's treatiſe. He blames the tolerating this Florentine's books, filled with pernicious maxims; and then he adds (44): 'Now ſince Chriſtian magiſtrates connived
'at ſuch prejudicial writings, a genteel wit aroſe in 'France, to confute the errors and impieties which he 'thought too open, and ſo much countenanced by the 'generality. But with ſo poor a ſucceſs, that by
'grounding himſelf only on authorities, and impro-
'per examples (which both ſides may uſe, and which 'the Florentine calls ridiculous), and ſhewing himſelf
'unprovided of ſolid reaſons, which are the true arms,
'wherewith he challenges all the world to a combat;
'the poor author could obtain no other recompence
'for ſo much labour in defending the ſtate, the reli'gion, and duty of all together, but reproaches and 'menaces, inſtead of honours, and other worthy ſalaries,
'that ſuch a well-meant and laborious work deſerved.'
If we judged of the merit of a book, by the multitude of editions and tranſlations, that of Gentillet might pretend to a high degree of glory; for it has been tranſlated into divers languages, and printed ſeveral times. The edition of Leyden 1609 ſays, that it had been augmented above one half. The epiſtle dedicatory has been retrenched in that edition.

If we had the work entire, a part of which was publiſhed in the year 1622, perhaps we ſhould have the beſt book that has been written on Machiavel's Prince. This part, full of chaſms, is intituled, A Fragment of the Examination of Machiavel's Prince; in which is diſcourſed of the Confidents, Miniſters, and Privy-Counſellors of a Prince, as alſo of the Fortune of his Favourites. It is in 12mo, and contains 339 pages. I have quoted ſomething out of it, in the article of the chancellor de l'Hoſpital. There is a new Latin edition of Machiavel's Prince publiſhed at Amſterdam, in 8vo, 1699. Interprete Caſparo Langenbert Philoſopho, qui ſua ei Commentaria adjecit: He who gives this new tranſlation, undertook it only, becauſe that, which we had before, ſeemed to him to be imperfect (45).

[F] Poſſevin, who had not read it, was . . . . the cauſe of it's being condemned by the Inquiſition.] It was very late, when this tribunal thought of condemning that book. Machiavel's Prince was publiſhed about the year 1515, and dedicated to Laurence de Medicis, nephew to Leo X. It did not prejudice the author with this Pope, who nevertheleſs was the firſt who threatened thoſe with excommunication, that read a prohibited book. Nec tamen à Papa iſthoc vel liber ullo fuit ſiniſtro verbo notatus (quamvis Leo omnium pri-

(34) Conringius Introduct. in Polit. Ariſtotelis, cap. iii, p. 583, apud Thomaſium de Plagio literario, pag. 223, 224.

(35) In Præfat. lib. iii. Commentarior. adverſus Machiavellum.

(36) In chap. i, pag. m. 16.

(37) In his notes upon Machiavel's Prince.

(38) Amelot de la Houſſaye, preface to Machiavel's Prince.

* Che gli Stati non ſi tenevano con Pater-noſtri. Machiavel, Hiſtor. vii.

(39) In the Epiſtle Dedicatory.

(40) Monſieur de Harlai Chanvalon's preface to the tranſlation of Tacitus.

(41) In his Critical Diſcourſe before Tacitus's Morals, printed in 1686. He put it afterwards before his French tranſlation of the ſix firſt books of Tacitus's Annals.

 In a German prince's manuſcript account of the court of Vienna.

(42) It is in 8vo.

(43) In the ſecond tome of the Anti, p. 129, & ſeq.

(44) La Popeliniere, Hiſt. of Hiſtories, book viii, pag. 405, 406.

(45) Journal des Sçavans, 15th of March, 1700. p. 211. Dutch edition.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pass with the duke of Urbino for a man very capable of drawing up an army in Battalia; but he was so wise, that he never would venture to try his theory, no, not so much as upon one squadron [G]. They lately published a new French translation of the greatest part of his works [H]. His novel of Belphegor, a very ingenious piece, was published by mus intenderit vim librorum prohibitoriam, vetitis legi dissidentium scriptis omnibus sub excommunicationis pœna, quod hactenus curebat exemplo) vel auctor pristino gratiæ loco motus (46). Which I observe, to shew, that the toleration of this book of Machiavel, ought not to be attributed to any general remissness of Leo's pontificate, with respect to bad books. The Pope was so far from discontinuing the expressions of his friendship to the author, that he employed him in writing a book that required secrecy. He ordered him to write a treatise concerning the reformation of the republic of Florence. Valuit in tantum apud Leonem, ut hujus jussu arcanam dissertationem concinnaverit de Reformatione Resp. Florentinæ, quam manuscriptam in bibliotheca Gaddiana superesse testatur Jacobus Gaddus (47). - - - - Which manuscript, James Gaddus says, is extant in the Gaddian library. Hadrian VI, successor to Leo X, did not censure Machiavel's book. Clement VII, successor to Hadrian VI, did more; for he not only allowed of Machiavel's dedicating his History of Florence to him, but also granted a privilege (48) to Antony Bladus to print this author's works at Rome. The successors of Clement VII, to Clement VIII, exclusively, permitted the sale of Machiavel's Prince, in all Italy, whereof there were frequent editions and translations. It was however known, that this book did not please some doctors; for a book of Ambrose Catharinus (49), printed at Rome in 1552, has a chapter against the Discourses and the Prince of Machiavel. At last, under the pontificate of Clement VIII, the writings of this Florentine were condemned, after the loud complaints made at Rome, by the Jesuit Possevin, and a priest of the Oratory called Thomas Bozius: tho' it is certain, that this Jesuit had never read Machiavel's Prince; for if you look into the judgment he has published on four writers, La Nouë, Bodin, Du Plessis Mornai, and Machiavel (50), you will find that he supposes the Prince, written by the fourth, to be divided into three books; which is evidently false. He charges Machiavel with such things as are not in the Prince. Conringius conjectures very well, that the occasion of these mistakes, was, because Possevin never knew this work, but by the reading of Gentillet. ' In ea (Dissertatione Possevini) verò ita disseritur, ' quasi à Machiavello tres de Principe libri compositi ' sint: hinc statim initio, ubi de Machiavello agit, ' aliquot ejus sententiis enumeratis, & hæc quidem, ' inquit ille, sceleratum illud Satanæ organum prioribus ' duobus libris, quibus de Principe agit, insipienti mun- ' do obtrusit. Non multò post cum diceret: redeo ad ' easdem labes Machiavelli, ut cognita pestis magis ca- ' veatur. In margine libri notat librum tertium: quasi ' libro tertio Machiavellus doceat, belli justitiam in ' ea, quam sibi quisque putat esse necessitatem, collo- ' cari. At verò certò est certius, non nisi unicum, & ' quidem exiguum libellum de Principe Machiavello ' auctore esse conscriptum, & nusquam terrarum tres ' in partes illum fuisse sectum, nec in hoc libello re- ' periri ea, quæ inter alia criminatur Possevinus, re- ' ligionem Ethnicam Christianæ Præferendam, aut Do- ' ctores Christianæ Religionis nihili faciendos: ut nec ' quicquam hoc libro (quod itidem Possevinus conque- ' ritur) inclementius dicitur in Romanam Ecclesiam, ' sed potiùs illud cap. xi. ipsum principatum Ponti- ' ficium non humanis consiliis atque artibus, sed quâ- ' dam inusitatâ vi, & quidem solius Dei favore, sal- ' vum esse; quod vix quisquam Zelotici gregis af- ' firmaverit. Nec tamen longè petenda aut hariolan- ' da venit causa crassi illius Possleviniani erroris modò ' quis inspexerit volumen illud, quod Anti-Machiavel- ' li titulo ἀνονύμως oppositi, hinc inde ex variis li- ' bris Machiavellicis excerptis sententiis Innocentius ' Gentilletus. Hoc enim tres in libros est distinctum ' & in ejus duobus prioribus reprehensa sunt illa, quæ ' duobus prioribus de principe libris haberi Possevi- ' nus ridicule affirmat: in tertio etiam illorum libro- ' rum animadvertitur in ea, quæ ex tertio libro de ' Principe frustra repetit MACHIAVELLUS (51). ' Ut liquidò appareat, ex illo volumine Anti-Machi- ' avellico, non autem ex MACHIAVELLO ipso ' Possevinum sua accepisse, &c. (52). - - - - - Pos- ' sevin's Dissertation would persuade us, that Machiavel ' composed three books of the Prince: hence at the very ' beginning, where he treats of MACHIAVEL, ha- ' ving enumerated some of his opinions, he says these ' principles which that wicked instrument of satan ob- ' truded on an ignorant world in the two first books ' of his Prince. A little after, having said; I return ' to the same blemishes of Machiavel, that when ' we know the infection, we may avoid it; in the ' margin he refers to book the third; as though MA- ' CHIAVEL teaches in the third book, that the justice ' of war consists in what each man thinks to be the ne- ' cessity of it. Yet it is certain to a demonstration, that ' MACHIAVEL wrote but one book, and that a ' small one de Principe, and that it does not contain ' what Possevin, among other things, ascribes to it; ' namely, that Paganism is better than Christianity, and ' that the doctors of the Christian Religion are not to ' be regarded: there being nothing said in this book (as ' Possevin complains there is) that bears hard against ' the Romish church; on the contrary, it is said, ch. ' xi. that the Papal power subsists, not by human coun- ' sels and arts, but by some uncommon influence, and ' the sole favour of GOD; which scarce one of the ' zealot-tribe will affirm. Nor need we look far to dis- ' cover the foundation of this egregious error of Possevin; ' we need only look into the volume, which Innocent Gen- ' tillet published, without prefixing his name, under the ' title of the Anti-Machiavel, consisting of various sen- ' tences picked out of Machiavel's works. For this work ' is divided into three books, in the two first of which ' the author censures those things, which Possevin ridi- ' culously affirms to be contained in the two first books De ' Principe: the third book likewise animadverts upon ' those things, which Possevin in vain ascribes to the ' third book de Principe. So that it is plain, that Pos- ' sevin took his work from the Anti-Machiavel, not from ' MACHIAVEL himself.' Here is the remark of Conringius. ' Et vero illud Possevini facinus luculente ' ostendit, non deesse etiam eximiæ dignitatis atque ' existimationis viros, qui scripto publico ne inspectum ' quidem MACHIAVELLI Principem sævo calculo ab- ' jecerint (53). - - - - This behaviour of Possevin shews ' clearly, that men of rank and credit, have wrote ' against Machiavel's Prince, without having ever seen it.'

[G] He was so wise, that he never would venture to try his theory, no not so much as upon one squadron of horse.] He that knows the war only by reading, ought to keep to the theory; for if he should attempt to practise it upon one regiment, he would expose himself to the laughter of the meanest soldier. Machiavel is to be commended, for refusing to comply with the desire of the duke of Urbino (54). Perhaps we should have been ignorant of this particular, if Cardan had not mentioned it. ' Machiavel- ' lum seculi superioris Doctorem qui tot & tanta ' de militari Romanorum disciplina disertissimè ' scripserat, ne unam quidem cohortem, quan- ' tumvis eum id ut tentaret, Urbini Princeps hor- ' taretur, instruere ausum esse Cardanus testatur (55). ' Cardan useforms us, that Machiavel, a doctor of the ' last age, who wrote so much, and so well, on the ' military discipline of the Romans, would not venture ' to exercise a single regiment, tho' the duke of Urbino ' pressed him to attempt it.'

[H] They have lately published a new French translation of the greatest part of his works.] Henry Desbordes, a French Bookseller at Amsterdam, printed it in six volumes in 12mo. The first came out in the year 1691, and contains the two first books of the discourses upon Livy. The third book of these discourses made the second tome, and was published in the year 1692. The Art of War was printed in the year 1693. The History of Florence was printed in two volumes in 1694. And the Prince, and some other tracts, in 1696. This last book was translated a new tho' Mr Amelot de la Houssaie had published it in French a few years before, because it was believed, the public would be glad to have all the works of Machiavel from the same hand. They deserved

(46) Conringius, Præfat. Principis Machiav. apud Magirum, ubi supra, p. 548.

(47) Conring. ibid.

(48) Dated the 23d of August, 1531. It was before Machiavel's works.

(49) De libris à Christiano detestandis, & ex Christianismo penitus removendis.

(50) He wrote it by the order of Innocent IX, and published it at Rome, in the year 1592. He inserted part of it in his Biblioth. Selecta. Conring. in the same Magirus, ibid.

(51) It seems it should be Possevinus, and not Machiavellus.

(52) Conringius, ibid. apud eumdem, pag. 549.

(53) Conring. apud Magirum, ibid. pag. 550.

(54) He was son of Peter de Medicis, and nephew to Leo X.

(55) Cardan. lib. iii, de Utilit. ex adverf. capienda, citante Besoldo de Arte Jureq; Belli, cap. i, pag. 3, 4, apud Thomasium, Præfat. xxi, pag. 118.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by Mr le Fevre of Saumur, in the year 1664 (i). There is in the continuation of the Menagiana (k), a very curious particular, about the artifice that Machiavel uſed, in writing the life of Caſtrucio Caſtracani. This life was tranſlated into French, by Monſieur Guillet. They pretend, That it was written with a great deal of inſincerity [I]. And the ſame judgment is made of his hiſtory of Florence (l) [K]. You will find ſome ſtories below concerning his impiety [L]. Some authors ſay (m) he ſerved Cæſar Borgia as his favourite-counſellor (n); and perhaps he was employed for him in France, when he had at Nants that converſation with the cardinal of Rouen, which he mentions in the third chapter of his Prince.

Thoſe who ſay, that in that work he deſigned to repreſent Charles V, are groſsly miſtaken [M]. It has been ſaid, that it was the book which Catherine de Medicis made her peculiar ſtudy, and that ſhe put it into the hands of her children [N]. They who

(i) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the twelfth of January, 1665.

(k) Pag. 96. of the Dutch edition.

(l) Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 205.

(m) Boſius, de Compar. Prud. Civ. num. 42.

(n) Conring. Præfat. Principis Machiavelli.

(56) Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, July 1691, pag. 483.

(57) It is Mr Teard, a French Refugee and Phyſician at the Hague. He is of Blois, of the family of Mr Teard, minister of Blois, who is often mentioned in the ſynods of France, at the time of the Saumurian diſputes about Univerſal Grace.

(58) See Mr de Beauval, 1691, pag. 483, and the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Tom. xx, pag. 328. Mr Beughem, Bibliographiæ Conſp. ii, pag. 191, is miſtaken when he ſays, the tranſlation mentioned in Bibloth. Univerſ. ibid. is Mr Amelot's.

(59) William Cappel, eldeſt ſon of the king's advocate and Phyſician, tranſlated Machiavel's Prince, printed in 1553, La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 144.

(60) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Prince, and that of the Diſcourſes on Livy, tranſlated by Gohory.

(61) Sagredo, Hiſtorical Memoirs of the Ottoman Empire. This book was printed at Venice in 1673.

(62) Voſſius, de Arte Hiſtorica, cap. 2, pag. 56.

(63) Jovius, Elog. cap. cxii, pag. m. 283.

(64) In the remark [D].

(65) Cumpo excentrici ad alterum terminum motorum pervenisse, ſperamus adventurum Dominum noſtrum Jeſum Chriſtum, nam hoc loco circa creationem mundi fuit. - - - - - When the center of excentricity comes about to a water-mill: now we expect the coming of our Lord JESUS CHRIST; for it was in this ſituation about the creation of the world.

to be tranſlated anew into our language, becauſe the old verſion was grown obſolete. I have ſeen a Paris edition of it later than the year 1630, but it was a new edition, for in it are found ſome French verſes written by Des Eſſars the tranſlator of Amadis. Mr de Beauval (56) has told us the name of him (57), who made the new verſion of Machiavel, and who has prefixed to the firſt volume a preface which deſerves to be read (58); it is an apology for Machiavel, and it treats the Inquiſition as it deſerves. The verſion wherein are the verſes of Des Eſſars, is doubtleſs James Gohory's. It contains the treatiſe of the Prince, and the Diſcouſes upon Livy, and was printed at Paris in 1571, in 8vo. This was a ſecond edition, reviſed very carefully, and much better than the former. The author did not put his name to the firſt, but he put it to the ſecond to prevent his tranſlation of the Diſcourſes upon Livy from being ſtolen from him by one (59) of the other two tranſlators of the Prince (60). It is ſaid, that Machiavel's Prince was tranſlated into the Turkiſh tongue, and read by Sultan Amurath the fourth, in that language (61).

[I] They pretend that the Life of Caſtrucio Caſtracani was written with a great deal of inſincerity.] Voſſius ſays this in a few words: 'Machiavellus, ſays he (62), plane multa comminiſcitur in vita Caſtrucii: nempe quia is hoſtis fuiſſet Reipublicæ Florentinæ. - - - - Machiavel forges many things in the Life of Caſtrucio; and the reaſon is plain; he was an enemy of the Republic of Florence.' Paul Jovius highly complains of this fraud of Machiavel, in his elogium of Nicolas Tegrimus, a Lawyer and Hiſtorian of Lucca, who deſcribed very exactly the actions of Caſtracani. 'Sed Machiavellus Florentinus Hiſtoricus, 'patrii veteris odii memor, petulanti malignitate, non 'interiturum memorabilis Ducis famam fabulis involvit, quum vitam acerrimi hoſtis Etruſco ſermone 'ſcribere orſus, tam impudenti, quàm aſtuto illudendi 'genere, ſacroſanctam rerum geſtarum fidem corruperit (63). - - - But Machiavel, the Florentine Hiſtorian, full of his country-reſentment, invidiouſly wraps up the character of a famous general in fables, and, undertaking to write the Life of an inveterate enemy in the Tuſcan language, corrupts the reality of his actions by impudently, as well as artfully, impoſing upon his reader.'

[K] The ſame judgment is made of his Hiſtory of Florence.] I have already mentioned this work (64); and I add, that Jerom Turlerus, a German Civilian, printed the firſt book of it, in 1564. He had tranſlated it into Latin: and as Machiavel, in the firſt part of that work, explains the revolutions of the Roman empire, by the irruptions of the barbarous nations, the tranſlator takes an occaſion to write an epiſtle dedicatory, ſtuffed with aſtrological and numerical myſteries, which made the Mahometan religion to ceaſe at the end of an hundred years, and determined the time of the end of the world (65). Lazarus Zetznerus, a Bookſeller of Straſburg, ſeeing that the Latin verſion of the firſt book ſold well, and was often reprinted, cauſed the reſt to be tranſlated into the ſame language, and publiſhed the whole hiſtory, with the Life of Caſtracani. The edition that I uſe is printed in 1610 in 8vo.

'That hiſtory of Florence, (ſays James Gohory) was 'written in ſuch perfection, that the deceaſed Milles 'Perrot, Maſter of the Accounts, my near kinſman '(the moſt learned perſon of his time in this kingdom in divers languages and ſciences) having made 'ſome notes on it in the margin more carefully with 'his own hand, than on his Livy and C. Tacitus, told 'me, that it was ſo fitted to the humour of our times, 'that he eſteemed the reading of it more profitable, 'than of the great antient Hiſtorians, ſo different 'from our preſent manners, faſhions, and cuſtoms (66).'

[L] Some ſtories concerning his impiety.] If I ſhould relate all thoſe which are told about it, I ſhould have a large field. Here follows one of thoſe ſtories: 'One 'comes to that deteſtable point of honour, as Machiavel did when he drew near the time of his death; 'for he had this viſion a little before he gave up 'the ghoſt; he ſaw a parcel of poor people like beggars, tattered, half-ſtarved, deformed, who ſtood 'confuſedly, and were but few in number: and it was 'told him, that thoſe belonged to paradiſe, of 'whom it was written, Bleſſed are the poor, for theirs 'is the kingdom of heaven. When theſe retired, there 'appeared an innumerable company of perſons full 'of gravity and majeſty; they looked like a ſenate, 'where ſtate-affairs and very ſerious matters were, 'treated of: He ſaw there Plato, Seneca, Plutarch, 'Tacitus, and others of the ſame condition: He asked who theſe venerable gentlemen were? and he 'was told, that they were the damned, and the ſouls 'reprobated by Heaven; for, the wiſdom of the world 'is enmity with GOD. This viſion being ended, he 'was asked, which of theſe companies he would be 'of? He anſwered, that he would rather be in hell 'with theſe great wits, to conſult with them 'about ſtate-affairs, than be with this vermin of ſcoundrels that had been ſhewn him. And preſently he 'died, and went to ſee how the ſtate-affairs went 'in the other world (67).' Spizelius relates the ſame ſtory in ſubſtance (68). There are ſome who tell this ſtory another way: They pretend that Machiavel ſaid, in one of his works, that he had rather be ſent to hell after his death, than go to paradiſe; for, added he, I ſhall find none in paradiſe but beggars and poor Monks and Hermits, and Apoſtles; but in hell I ſhall live with Popes and Cardinals, and with kings and princes. Francis Hotman (69), affirms, that this may be read in the Commentaries of Wolfius, upon the Quæſtiones Tuſculanæ of Cicero, and he is very ſorry, that, notwithſtanding theſe blaſphemies, and ſeveral others, an impreſſion of Machiavel's works, tranſlated by a profeſſor called Stupanus, ſhould be allowed at Baſil. He obſerves, that Perna, who had been ſeveral times impriſoned by order of the magiſtrates, for having printed divers impious and execrable books, was printing this tranſlation. Hotman relates this, and ſome other curious things, in a letter dated December 25, 1580.

[M] Thoſe who ſay that in his prince, he deſigned to repreſent Charles V, are groſsly miſtaken.] I wonder that James Gohory has publiſhed this. 'Machiavel, ſays he '(70), wrote that book of the Prince . . . in which he 'deſcribes particularly all the qualities neceſſary to a lord 'who aſpires to monarchy, and ſecretly repreſents 'Charles V then reigning, as he declares in one paſſage of 'it.' How came he to be ignorant, that this book was written before it was known whether Charles V ſhould acquire a great reputation? Had he not read in the twenty firſt chapter, that Ferdinand king of Arragon was alive when Machiavel wrote this book? had he not read in another place (71), that the author ſpeaks of the emperor Maximilian, as of a prince then alive? Did he not know that that emperor died in January, 1519, three years after Ferdinand, and then his grandſon Charles V was not full nineteen years old?

[N] It has been ſaid that Catherine de Medicis made it her peculiar ſtudy, and put it into the hands of her children.] The author of the Alarm againſt Maſſacres, obſerves (72), that Charles IX had been very ill educated,

(66) Gohory, Epiſt. Dedicat. of the Diſcouſes upon Livy.

(67) Binet, of the Salvation of Origen, p. 359, &c.

(68) Spizelius in Scrutinio Atheiſmi Hiſtorico Ætiologico. pag. m. 132. He cites Jac. Marchant in Hort. Paſtor. Tract. i, Loc. vi, Propoſ. ii.

(69) Franciſc. Hotomannus, Epiſt. xcix, 123. 139.

(70) Gohory, in the Life of Machiavel, prefixed to his tranſlation of the treatiſe of a Prince.

(71) In chap. xxiii.

(72) Alarm againſt maſſacres, pag. 53.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google who make this obſervation, join to it many words of reproach both upon this queen and our Nicolas Machiavel. There are very few authors who ſpeak of him without curſing his memory (o). Some excuſe him, and undertake to defend him (p); and there are alſo ſome who look upon him as a writer very zealous for the public good [O], and think, that he repreſented the artifices of policy, for no other end but to inſpire men with horror againſt tyrants, and to excite the people to maintain their liberty. If any queſtion ſhould be made, what was his true motive; it ought at leaſt to be acknowledged, that he ſhewed himſelf, in his conduct, inſpired with a republican ſpirit [P]. Father Lucchefini cated, and that he was kept in ignorance of theſe precepts in ſcripture *, that a king, who is ſet over the people of God, ought not to lift up his heart above his brethren, but ſhould punctually obſerve the law of the Lord, and read and meditate on it all the days of his life . . (73). ‘ On the contrary, the queen cauſed her children to ‘ be inſtructed in thoſe precepts that were more pro- ‘ per for a tyrant than a virtuous king, and to be ‘ taught not only the fooliſh fancies of Perceforeſt, ‘ but chiefly to ſtudy the maxims of this atheiſt Ma- ‘ chiavel, whoſe deſign was rather to teach a prince ‘ how to make himſelf feared than beloved, and to ‘ reign in grandeur, rather than to reign well. And ‘ indeed this book may very well be called the goſpel ‘ of the queen-mother; for tho' ſhe covers herſelf with ‘ the religion commonly received, yet it appears by ‘ her actions, that ſhe cares for it no further than ‘ is neceſſary for her own defence. And ſo her chief ‘ counſellor Morviliers has always this fine and Chri- ‘ ſtian book in his hand, to read a leſſon out of it to ‘ his miſtreſs, and never abandoned it, no more than ‘ Alexander did his Homer. In ſhort, it is probable ‘ that this tyrannical Inſtitution was taken in part ‘ from thence; and that from thence the queen drew ‘ her principal artifices to perſuade the king, that, ‘ notwithſtanding all the promiſes of peace and friend- ‘ ſhip, and alſo the ties of conſanguinity, he might ‘ take a furious revenge of all thoſe whom he eſteemed ‘ his enemies, by laying hold of any ſlight ſuſpicion, ‘ (if that may be called ſuſpicion, which is a calum- ‘ ny forged at pleaſure) for a ſufficient proof.' Davila relates, that Corbinelli often read the Prince, and the Diſcourſes of Machiavel, to the duke of Anjou, who was afterwards king Henry III (74).

(o) See Claſen, in chap. ix, of his treatiſe de Religione politica, p. 162, edit. 1682.

(p) See the remark [D] and [E].

* Deut. xvii, 19, 20.

(73) Alarm, pag. 54.

(74) See, above, citat. (2) of the article CORBINELLI.

[O] Some look upon him as a writer very zealous for the public good.] This ſavours a little of a paradox; and therefore we muſt ſet down, a little at length, the very words of a famous Civilian, who judged ſo advantageouſly of Machiavel's deſign: to which I ſhall prefix a kind of preface, borrowed from another learned man; that ſo at once I may produce two conſiderable witneſſes, Albericus Gentilis, and Chriſtopher-Adam Rupert. ‘ Ego vero non poſſum hic præterire, qui ‘ cane pejus & angue odiſſe ſoleo conceptas de auc- ‘ toribus opiniones, accuratiſſimi Icti ac digniſſimi cen- ‘ ſoris judicium, lib. iii, de Legationib. cap. ix, ubi le- ‘ gatum ſuum ex Philoſophia inſtruens. Nec verò, ‘ inquit, in negotio iſto verebor omnium præſtantiſſi- ‘ mum dicere, & ad imitandum proponere Machiavel- ‘ lum, ejuſque plane aureas in Livium obſervationes. ‘ Quod namque hominem indoctiſſimum eſſe volunt & ‘ ſceleſtiſſimum, id nihil ad me, qui prudentiam ejus ‘ ſingularem laudo, nec impietatem ac improbitatem, ‘ ſi qua eſt, tueor. Quanquam ſi librum editum ad- ‘ verſus illum conſidero, ſi Machiavelli conditionem ‘ reſpicio, ſi propoſitum ſcribendi ſuum rectè cenſeo, ſi ‘ etiam meliori interpretatione volo dicta ipſius adju- ‘ vare, non equidem video cur & iis criminibus mor- ‘ tui hominis fama liberari non poſſit. Qui in illum ‘ ſcripſit (intelligit Innocentium Gentilletum Ictum Del- ‘ phinenſem) illum nec intellexit, nec non in multis ‘ calumniatus eſt, & talis omninò eſt qualis, qui miſe- ‘ ratione digniſſimus ſit. Machiavellus Democratiæ ‘ laudator & aſſertor acerrimus: natus, educatus, ho- ‘ noratus in eo Reip. ſtatu; Tyranndis ſummè inimi- ‘ cus. Itaque Tyranno non favet; ſui propoſiti non ‘ eſt Tyrannum inſtruere, ſed arcanis ejus palàm factis ‘ ipſum miſeris populis nudum & conſpicuum exhibere. ‘ An enim tales, quales ipſe deſcribit principes, fuiſſe ‘ plurimos ignoramus? Eccur iſtiuſmodi principibus ‘ moleſtum eſt, vivere hominis operâ, & in luce ha- ‘ beri. Hoc fuit viri omnium præſtantiſſimi conſilium ‘ ut ſub ſpecie principalis eruditionis populos rudiret. ‘ Hæc Albericus Gentilis (75). - - - Tho' I have a mortal ‘ averſion to conceived opinions concerning authors, I cannot ‘ omit here the judgment of a moſt accurate Civilian and ‘ worthy Critic, in the third book, de Legationibus, ‘ chap. ix, where, inſtructing his embaſſador from Phi- ‘ loſophy, he ſays; I will venture to prefer Machiavel ‘ to all others in a matter of this kind, and to propoſe ‘ him, and his truly golden obſervations on Livy, to your ‘ imitation. As to his being called an unlearned and a ‘ wicked man, that is nothing to me, who commend his ‘ extraordinary prudence, nor can diſcover that impiety ‘ and diſhoneſty in him. Though, if I conſider the book ‘ publiſhed againſt him, if I reflect on Machiavel's con- ‘ dition, if I rightly judge of the deſign of his writings, ‘ and if I would help out his meaning by a better inter- ‘ pretation, in truth I cannot ſee why the deceaſed au- ‘ thor's fame may not be clear'd from theſe accuſations. ‘ He who wrote againſt him (he means Innocent Gentillet, a Civilian of Dauphiné) did not underſtand him, ‘ and beſides ſlanders him in many things, and is a very ‘ wretched ſcribbler. Machiavel is a ſtrenuous defender ‘ of Democracy: he was born, educated, and reſpected, ‘ under that form of government, and was a great enemy ‘ to tyranny. Hence it is, that he does not favour a ty- ‘ rant: it is not his deſign to inſtruct a tyrant, but to de- ‘ tect his ſecret attempts, and expoſe him naked and con- ‘ ſpicuous to the poor people. Do we not know, there have ‘ been many princes ſuch as he deſcribes? Why are ſuch ‘ princes angry at being immortalized by his means? This ‘ excellent author's deſign was, under the ſhew of inſtruct- ‘ ing the prince, to inform the people. - - - - Thus far Al- ‘ bericus Gentilis.' Let us lengthen out the paſſage a little; for Rupert ſeems to me to have ſuppreſſed one part of it, which deſerves to be known: it is as follows: ‘ Et eam ſpeciem prætexuit, ut ſpes eſſet cur ‘ ferretur ab his qui rerum gubernacula tenent, quaſi ‘ ipſorum educator, ac pædagogus. Cæterùm hæc diſ- ‘ ceptatio ulterius haud ducitur. Si favere ſcriptoribus ‘ volumus, multa & in hoc vitia emendabimus: aut ‘ illa ſaltem feremus in eo, quæ in Platone ferimus, ‘ & Ariſtotele, aliiſque, qui non diſſimilia commiſere ‘ peccata. Feremus autem, quia meliora deterioribus ‘ longe plurima & is habet (76). - - - - And he put on ‘ that diſguiſe, in hopes to be tolerated by thoſe at the ‘ helm, as their tutor and ſchoolmaſter. But this diſ- ‘ quiſition is carried no farther. If we will favour ‘ writers, we ſhall correct many things even in this au- ‘ thor; or at leaſt we ſhall bear with thoſe things in him, ‘ which we allow of in Plato, Ariſtotle, and others, ‘ who have been guilty of the like faults. But we will ‘ bear with them, becauſe there are many more good, ‘ than bad things even in him.' There are two things to be conſidered in this laſt part of the paſſage of Albericus Gentilis. He affirms, I. that Machiavel took this method of inſtructing the people, that princes might permit his book to be ſold; which they would not have done, if they had conſidered him not as their own pedagogue, but as a lover of the liberty of the people. II. That we ought to excuſe in Machiavel, what we excuſe in Plato and Ariſtotle. Obſerve, that Leonclavius was very far from agreeing with Albericus Gentilis. See the epiſtle dedicatory (77) which he prefixed to the Education of Princes, written by Bellifarius Aquaviva.

(75) Chriſtoph. Adamus Rupertus, Differt. ad Valer. Maxim. lib. i, cap. ii, iii, pag. 50.

(76) Alberic. Gentilis de Legationibus, lib. iii, cap. ix.

[P] He ſhewed himſelf, in his conduct, inſpired with a republican ſpirit.] Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie ſhall be my commentator here. ‘ I muſt ſay, that Machia- ‘ vel, who paſſed every where for a teacher of tyran- ‘ ny, deteſted it more than any man of his time; as ‘ may eaſily appear by the tenth chapter of the firſt ‘ book of his Diſcourſes, in which he expreſſes him- ‘ ſelf very ſtrongly againſt tyrants. And Nardi †, ‘ his cotemporary, ſays, he made panegyrics upon ‘ liberty, and upon cardinal Julius de Medicis, who, ‘ after the death of Leo X, pretended, he would re- ‘ ſtore it to his own country; and that he was ſuſ- ‘ pected to be an accomplice in the conſpiracy of Ja- ‘ copo da Diacetto, Zanobi Buondelmonti, Luigi Ala- ‘ manus, and Coſimo Rucellai, againſt this cardinal, ‘ on

(77) Keckerman cites what is contained in it to the diſadvantage of Machiavel. See Mr Crenius, Metbod. Stud. Part. ii, p. 194.

† Hiſt. Flor. lib. iii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(f) See the Journal of Leipsic, 1693, pag. 352. which has given us an abstract of it.

Luccheſini an Italian Jeſuit, a conſultor to the Congregation of Rites, is one of the laſt authors who wrote againſt him. See his Saggio della Sciocchezza di Nicolo Macchiavelli, printed at Rome in 1697 (q). The author of the Appendix to the treatiſe de Literatorum Infelicitate, has placed Machiavel in his catalogue (r), and is not in the wrong, for this Florentine was perſecuted with ill fortune as well as others [Q].

(r) See Cornel. Tollius in Appendice ad Pierium Valerianum, pag. 20, 21.

‡ Ibid.

'on account of the cloſe correſpondence he had 'with them, and other libertines. (So the partizans 'of the Medicis ‡ called thoſe, who would maintain 'the liberty of Florence) And probably this ſuſpi- 'cion deprived him of a reward for his Hiſtory of 'Florence, though he had writ it by the command of 'the ſame cardinal, as he obſerves at the very begin- 'ning of his epiſtle dedicatory (78).'

(s) Amelot de la Houſſaye, in his preface to the tranſlation of the Prince, towards the end.

[Q] He was perſecuted with ill fortune, as well as others.] If I ſet down a longer paſſage of James Gohory, than my text ſeems to require, it is to obſerve in him a very groſs miſtake. 'Therefore he was neither 'greatly ſupported, nor enriched, by the princes and 'lords of his time, ſuch as Pope Clement VII, to 'whom he dedicated his Hiſtory of Florence; nor 'by the noble Laurence de Medicis, to whom he 'ſent his book of the Prince, who reſtored the 'golden age of learning in Italy, being the patron 'and defender of all learned men, ſuch as Marſilius 'Ficinus, who dedicated to him his tranſlations and 'commentaries upon Plato, Angelus Politianus, Hie- 'ronymus Donatus, and ſeveral others, whoſe epiſtles 'may be ſeen in the collection, intituled, Epiſtolæ 'Virorum Illuſtrium. Machiavel complains of it to 'him, imploring tacitly his aſſiſtance, in the dedica- 'tion of his Prince, in theſe terms: 'Et ſe voſtra 'magnificenza d'all'apice della ſua altezza, qualche 'volta volgera gli occhi in queſti luoghi baſſi, cog- 'noſcera quanto indignamente io ſopporti una grande '& continoua malignità di fortuna (79). - - - And if your 'magnificence will caſt your eyes down from the ſummit of 'your exalted ſtation to my humble rank, you will be 'ſenſible how little I deſerve the great and continual 'malice of fortune.' The groſs error of Gohory is this, that he believed Laurence de Medicis, the patron of Politian, &c. was the ſame Laurence to whom Machiavel dedicated his Prince; whereas this laſt Laurence was the grand-ſon of the other.

(79) Gohory, in the Life of Machiavel.

MACON, a city of France upon the Saone, in the duchy of Burgundy. Cæſar mentions it (a), and calls it Matiſco. The tables of Peutinger, and the Itinerary of Æthicus, mention it alſo; but Strabo and Ptolemy ſay nothing of it. About five hundred years ago, by an ordinary tranſpoſition of letters, Matiſco was changed into Maſtico, from whence came the name Maſcon, which is now pronounced Mâcon (b). This city was treated cruelly, during the diſorders, which the wars about religion produced in France, in the XVIth century. The reformed ſet up a church there in 1560 (c), and they multiplied there ſo faſt, that they eaſily made themſelves maſters of the city (d), when the maſſacre at Vaſſi obliged them to conſult their own ſafety. It was about the beginning of May, 1562, that they made themſelves maſters of it, without much violence, or effuſion of blood. Three days after, they heard, that the images were broken down in the city of Lyons; and it was impoſſible for the miniſters and elders of the city to hinder the common people of Macon from doing the like; and from that time the exerciſe of the Romiſh religion was ſuppreſſed there. Tavanes made ſeveral attempts to retake this city, but without ſucceſs: at laſt, by the help of ſecret intelligence, he ſurprized it, Auguſt 19, 1562 (e). He made himſelf maſter of it, after ſome hot ſkirmiſhes with the inhabitants in the ſtreets. All ſorts of plunderings and cruelties were committed [A], and then happened the Leaps of Macons [B] which I promiſed

(a) De Bel. Gal. lib. viii. fin.

(b) Hadr. Valeſius, Notit. Gall. pag. 322, 323.

(c) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. iii. pag. 214.

(d) Id. lib. xv, pag. 407.

(e) Ibid. p. 422.

[A] All ſorts of plunderings and cruelties were committed.] After the houſes of the Reformed had been 'ſo well gutted, that there ſeemed to be nothing left 'in them, Madam de Tavanes knew ſo well how to 'diſcover hidden treaſures in her cunning way, that, 'for her part of the ſpoil, ſhe had about 180 trunks 'full of moveables; beſides the yarn ſtuffs, all ſorts of 'linen, as bed-clothes, table-cloths, and napkins, 'wherewith Macon was reputed to be better furniſhed 'than any other city in France. As to the ranſoms, 'rings, utenſils, and other precious things, the value 'is not known; but only ſo far, that thoſe, who had 'the management of ſuch affairs, ſaid to their friends, 'that Tavanes got there as much as would have pur- 'chaſed 10000 livres a year (1).' After this it is not to be wondered, that the great lords fomented the diviſions, and increaſed, as much as they could, the flames of perſecution: it was a revenue to them, and a very gainful exaction.

(1) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. xv, pag. 429.

[B] Leaps of Macon.] I ſhall uſe the very words of the Hiſtorian, quoted in the preceding remark. '(2) The exerciſe of the Romiſh religion was pre- 'ſently reſtored there, and the prieſts and monks re- 'turned to their former ſtate, together with the bro- 'thel houſes (3). To compleat the misfortunes, 'St Poinct (4) (a man of a ſanguinary and cruel tem- 'whoſe mother had declared in open court, to clear 'her conſcience, that he was the ſon of a prieſt, whom 'ſhe named) was left by Tavanes, governor of the 'city; who, for his paſtime, after he had feaſted the 'ladies, was uſed to aſk whether the farce, which 'was from that time called The Farce of St Poinct, 'was ready to be acted. This was, as it were, the 'watch-word, upon which his people were wont to 'bring out of priſon one or two priſoners, and ſome- 'times more, whom they carried to the bridge of the 'Saone; and he being there with the ladies, after he 'had aſked them ſome pretty and pleaſant queſtions, 'he cauſed them to be thrown down headlong, 'and drowned in the river. It was alſo an uſual 'thing to give falſe alarms, and upon that pretence 'to drown or ſhoot ſome priſoner, or any other, 'whom he could catch, of the Reformed religion, 'charging them with a deſign to betray the city.' He was killed by one Achon, with whom he quarrelled, as he was returning from his houſe near the city, whither he had carried about 20000 crowns of plunder. It was a little after the pacification of the month of March, 1563. D'Aubigné (5) admirably deſcribes the barbarity of the man, under the picture of a ſchool, wherein, during the laſt ſervice at table, while the fruit and ſweat-meats are eating, the young men and maids were taught to ſee the Huguenots put to death without pity. He ſays elſewhere (6), That St Pont plaid the buffoon at the execution of his cruelties, and that, at the concluſion of his feaſts, he entertained the ladies with the pleaſure of ſeeing ſome perſons leap from the bridge into the water. The conduct of this governor was much more cruel than that of Lucius Flaminius, who gave order, during the time of dinner, that a criminal ſhould be put to death in his preſence, to pleaſe the object of his infamous amours, who had never ſeen any perſon killed (7). But, on the other ſide, the conduct of theſe ladies of Macon, was much more to be blamed than that of the veſtals, whom a Chriſtian Poet has ſo much cenſured for the pleaſure they took in ſeeing the Gladiators killed.

(2) He had ſaid, pag. 424, That the whores of the prieſts, who had been driven away before, returned, the ſame day it was taken, and ſerved thoſe cruel men to ſhew them the houſes of the Reformed, and chiefly of thoſe, who had driven them away.

(3) Ibid.

(4) D'Aubigné calls him St Pont.

(5) D'Aubig. Hiſt. Tom. i. pag. 216.

(6) Pag. 202.

(7) Plutarch. in Flamin. p. 379.

- - - - - - - - - - - - conſurgit ad ictus :
Et quoties victor ferrum jugulo inſerit, illa,
Delicias, ait eſſe ſuas, pectuſque jacentis
Virgo modeſta jubet converſo pollice rumpi (8).

(8) Prudentius, lib. II, in Symmach. ver. 1095.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

miſed elſewhere (f) to ſpeak of in this place. I will now perform my promiſe; and at the ſame time it will appear, why I mention theſe terrible barbarities in divers places of this work [C]. The memory of theſe Leaps have been rendered more immortal than thoſe

(f) In the remark [C], of the article BEAUMONT.

Nor turns the modeſt virgin from the ſight,
But, with ſtrange cruelty, enjoys the ſight,
And when at length ſhe ſees the proſtrate foe,
By ſignals bids the victor ſtrike the blow.

I doubt not but St Poinct alledged, in his excuſe, the leaps of the ſoldiers of Montbriſon by Des Adrets (9); as the latter pleaded in his excuſe the cruelties that were exerciſed at Orange. And thus you ſee how one bad example draws on another, almoſt without end: abyſſus abyſſum invocat. Wherefore they are moſt to blame, who ſet the example: and in juſtice they ſhould be puniſhed for all the crimes which follow theirs. D'Aubigné had not well conſulted the dates, when he ſays (10), that the baron Des Adret, being offended with the ſacking of Orange, and the throwing men headlong at Macon, marched to Pierrelate, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral towns, and at laſt came to Montbriſon. For it appears by Theodore Beza (11), that Pierrelate, and other towns, had been ſubdued by Des Adrets before the twenty ſixth of June, and that the ſoldiers of Montbriſon leaped the ſixteenth of July (12), and that Macon was taken by Tavanes the nineteenth of Auguſt (13).

(9) See the article BEAUMONT, remark [E].

(10) Tom. i. pag. 204.

(11) Lib. xii, pag. 265, 266.

(12) Pag. 224.

(13) Pag. 422.

[C] It will appear why I mention theſe terrible barbarities in divers parts of this work.] For the honour of the French name, and of the Chriſtian name, it were to be wiſhed, that the memory of theſe inhuman procedings had been utterly aboliſhed, and that all the books, which mention them, had been thrown into the fire. Thoſe who ſeem to find fault with hiſtories, becauſe, ſay they (14), they ſerve only to teach the readers all ſorts of crimes, have in ſome reſpects much reaſon to ſay ſo, with regard to the hiſtory of the religious wars: for it ſeems extreamly proper to nouriſh in the minds of men an irreconcilable hatred; and it aſtoniſhes me to ſee, that the French, of different religions, have lived, ſince the edicts, in ſo much brotherly love, though they had continually in their hands the hiſtories of our civil-wars, wherein they meet with nothing but ſacking of towns, profanation of holy things, maſſacres, overturning of altars, aſſaſſinations, perjuries, and outrageous actions. This good correſpondence had been leſs worthy of admiration, if all private perſons had been ignorant of the ſtories, which each party objects to the other. May it not therefore be ſaid to me, that I ſeem to have a deſign to revive the paſſions of men, and to add fewel to the fire of hatred, by ſpreading every where in my work the cruelleſt actions, that the hiſtory of the XVIth century mentions: an abominable century (15), and, in compariſon of which, the preſent generation might paſs for the golden age, as much a ſtranger as it is to true virtue. It is fit I ſhould clear up this difficulty. I ſay then, that I am ſo far from having any deſign to excite in the breaſts of my readers theſe ſtorms of wrath, that I ſhould willingly conſent, that this ſort of events might never be remembered, provided that by this means every one would learn better things, and do his duty better, without indulging his paſſions: but as theſe things are diſperſed in a great number of books, I would not lay myſelf under a reſtraint, in hopes the affectation of ſaying nothing of them in this might do any good; and I thought myſelf at liberty to make uſe of whatever lay in my way, and to follow the connexion there may be between ſubjects. But I ought not to forget, that, as every thing has two handles, ſo it were to be wiſhed, for very good reaſons, that the memory of theſe terrible barbarities were carefully preſerved: three ſorts of perſons ought to view them every day, and conſider them well. Thoſe, who govern, ſhould employ a page every morning, to ſay to them; Diſturb no perſon for his opinions in religion, and extend not the power of the ſword over conſcience. See what Charles IX, and his ſucceſſor, got by it: It is a miracle that the French monarchy was not deſtroyed by their zeal for the Catholic religion. Such miracles do not happen every day; depend not upon them. They would not ſuffer the edict of January to continue; and after more than thirty years deſolation, and a torrent of blood, and many thouſand perjuries and conflagrations, they were obliged to grant one more favourable. Thoſe, who conduct eccleſiaſtical affairs, are the ſecond ſort of people, who ought to remember well the XVIth century. When they hear any one ſpeak of Toleration, they fancy they hear a moſt frightful and monſtrous opinion; and, to intereſt the ſecular power on the ſide of their paſſions, they cry, that this is to deprive the magiſtrates of the beſt flower of their crown, if they are not allowed at leaſt to impriſon and baniſh Heretics. But if they would duly conſider what is to be feared from a religious war, they would be more moderate. You will not, may one ſay to them, allow this ſect to pray to GOD in it's own way, nor preach it's opinions; but take heed, if you come to an open war, leaſt, inſtead of ſpeaking or writing againſt your opinions, they overturn your temples, and endanger your own perſons. What have you gained, in France and Holland, by adviſing perſecution? Truſt not to your great numbers. Your ſovereigns have neighbours, and conſequently your ſectaries will not want protectors, and aſſiſtants, tho' they were Turks. In fine, let theſe turbulent Divines, who take ſo much pleaſure in innovations, continually have in view the religious wars of the XVIth century. The Reformers were the innocent cauſe of them; for, according to their principles, there was no medium. They muſt either ſuffer the Papiſts to be damned eternally, or convert them to Proteſtantiſm. But that people, who are perſuaded, that an error does not damn at all, ſhould have no regard to poſſeſſion, and had rather diſturb the public peace, than ſuppreſs their own private opinions, is a thing that cannot be too much deteſted. Let them conſider the conſequences of their novelties, and then, if they can, embark in them without an abſolute neceſſity, they muſt have the ſoul of a tyger, and a more brazen heart, than he who firſt ventured his life in a ſhip.

(14) See Maſcardi's Diſcourſe upon Hiſtory.

(15) Conſer quæ ſupra, at the end of the remark [F] of the article LOGNAC.

Illi robur & æs triplex
Circa pectus erat, qui fragilem truci
Commiſit pelago ratem
Primus, nec timuit præcipitem Africum
Decertantem Aquilonibus
Nec triſtis Hyadas, nec rabiem Noti.
. . . . . .
Quem mortis timuit gradum,
Qui rectis oculis monſtra natantia,
Quid vidit mare turbidum, &
Infamis ſcopulos Acroceraunia (16)?

(16) Horat. Od. III, lib. I, ver. 9.

Sure he, who firſt the paſſage try'd,
In harden'd oak his heart did hide,
And ribs of iron arm'd his ſide.
Or his at leaſt, in hollow wood,
Who tempted firſt the briny flood:
Nor fear'd the winds contending roar,
Nor billows beating on the ſhore,
Nor hyades portending rain,
Nor all the tyrants of the main.
What form of death cou'd him affright,
Who unconcern'd, with ſteadfaſt ſight,
Cou'd view the ſurges mounting ſteep,
And monſters rolling in the deep;
Cou'd thro' the ranks of ruin go,
With ſtorms above, and rocks below!

There is no probability, that any party ſhould ariſe among the Proteſtants, to reform their religion after the ſame manner as they reformed the Romiſh church; i. e. as a religion we muſt neceſſarily forſake except we will be damned: and ſo the diſorders, that might be feared from any innovating party, would be leſs terrible than thoſe of the laſt century; the animoſities would be leſs violent, than at that time; eſpecially ſince none of the parties could deſtroy any ſenſible object of ſuperſtition in the other; there would be no topical deities, nor tutelar ſaints, to be broken, or coined into money; no reliques to be

WHO thoſe are, that ought carefully to conſider the miſchiefs, which are produced by civil-wars, on account of religion.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

those of the isle of Caprea [D].

(17) It is probable, that the French and Spanish arts would not have shed so much Protestant blood, if they had not been engaged by the over throwing of their altars, images, relques, &c.

thrown away, no pixes or altars to be overturned (17). There might therefore be some differences between Protestant and Protestant, without fearing all the outrages, that appeared in the quarrels between Protestant and Catholic; but still the mischief would be fatal enough, to deserve our endeavours to prevent it, by representing to those, who are too much addicted to disputes, the horrible confusions they have produced, and that the most fatal non-toleration does not proceed from princes, who use the sword against sectaries, but from those private doctors, who, without a very urgent necessity, rise up against errors protected by prejudice and custom, and who obstinately oppose them, at the same time they see all actually in flames.

[D] The leaps of Macon have been more immortalized, than those of the isle of Caprea.] And yet a famous Historian has inserted them in his work; and the place was shown as one of the curiosities of the isle. 'Carnificinæ ejus (Tiberii) ostenditur locus Capreis, 'unde damnatos post longa & exquisita tormenta 'præcipitari coram se in mare jubebat, excipiente clas- 'siariorum manu & contis atque remis elidente cada- 'vera, ne cui relidui spiritus quidquam inesset (18) - - - In Caprea they shew the place, where Tiberius 'exercised his cruelties; when, after long and exquisite 'tortures, he ordered the condemned to be thrown head- 'long into the sea, a body of mariners receiving them in 'their falls, and dashing to pieces their bodies with poles 'and oars, to prevent their escaping alive.' But, in short, I do not believe, that the Antients are to be compared with the Moderns, in transferring the same things from one book to another, and so the leaps of Macon are to be read in more places, and have more monuments for pledges of their immortality, than those of the Emperor Tiberius. It was not for the credit of those, who made use of such a punishment in the XVIth century, that they followed the steps of such a tyrant. Some, perhaps, in reading this, may remember the remarks of the article LEUCAS.

(18) Suetonius in Tiberio. c. lxiij.

MACRIN (SALMON), one of the best Latin Poets of the XVIth century, was of Loudun. What Thuanus has said of him, and Mr Teissier in his Additions, is in every body's hands, since the edition of Utrecht: thither then I refer my reader, and shall only take notice of one thing, very singular, but a little doubtful, which Mr Varillas had learned of Mr Bouillaud [A]. It is said, that Macrin was not the family-name of our Poet [B].

[A] I shall mention a thing, very singular, but a little doubtful, which Mr Varillas had learned of Mr Bouillaud.] 'His (1) great friend of Loudun, who 'had changed his name from Mitron to Macrin, 'valet de chambre to the king, a Latin Poet, and 'great imitator of Catullus, as well as he, was no 'less unhappy. He was accused before the king of 'being of the new religion, and the king threatened 'to hang him, if he was convicted of it. It is 'not certain whether he was guilty or no; but 'this may be said, that almost all the finest wits 'inclined at that time to Calvinism. His majesty's 'menace did so terrify Macrin, that he going out 'of the Louvre, and seeing, at a distance, a crane, 'a machine which Wine-coopers make use of to 'let down hogsheads of wine into cellars, he took it 'for a gibbet, and so went mad, and drowned him- 'self in the next pond he met with (2).' The authority of Mr Bouillaud, a native of Loudun as well as Macrin, a man of an extraordinary memory, and the best acquainted with the history of learned men, gives a great weight to this story; especially if we suppose, that Mr Varillas writ down immediately what he had heard from him. On the other side, when I consider that Sammarthanus, a native of Loudun, and nearer to that time than Mr Bouillaud, affirms, that Salmon Macrin died of old age at Loudun, whither he retired a long while before (3); it is not easy to believe the account of Varillas; for who can believe, that so tragical an accident should remain unknown to all the authors, who have writ of Macrin, such as Sammarthanus, his countryman, who searched for memoirs in all parts; and Thuanus (4), who was no less curious in his enquiries, &c. Let us therefore place this among those things which demand a further enquiry, since the best authors are not only silent about it, but also give us a narrative inconsistent with it.

(1) That is, Marot's.

(2) Varillas, Hist. of Heresy, Tom. V, B. 21. pag. m. 503, 51. He puts in the margin, I had these particulars from the learned Mr Bouillaud.

(3) Vitæ cælibis parter & aulicæ præcipiis, uxorem duxit, civem Eam .... mortemque suis & amicorum versibus .... commendavit, susceptis ex ea utriusque sexus liberis .... domi suæ sexie plane confectus occidisset. .. Being weary both of a single and a married life, he married a woman of his own country .... and after he duely celebrated her by his own and her friends verses; .... having had by her children of both sexes .... he died at his own house in a good old age. Sammarth. in Elog. lib. 1, p. m. 21, 22.

(4) Thuan. lib. xix, sub fin. ad ann. 1557.

[B] Macrin was not the family-name of our Poet (§ a).] We have already seen, that, according to Mr Varillas, he changed his name Mitron into Macrin; but, according to Mr Baillet (5), he was called John Salmon, and on account of his leanness was often called in jest Macrinus by king Francis I; so that seeing that his name John did not please his wife, he laid it aside, and ever after called himself Salmonius Macrinus.

(5) Judgments on the Poets, Tom. iii, num. 1293, pag. 258.

This is found in the Bibliotheque of Vau-privas. and after such a manner as more plainly denotes the reason why our Macrin, having regard to his wife, changed his name: John Salmon, leaving off his proper name, which happened to be troublesome to him on account of his wife, took for a proper name, Salmon, &c (6).

(6) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 754.

[(§ a) The French name of this Poet was Maigret. From Macrinus, as he is called in his Latin Poems, was formed that of Macrin, which he retained. See Fauchet, book IV, ch. XIV, of his Antiquities. REM CRIT.]

MACRO (NAEVIUS SERTORIUS) acquired a great authority under the reign of Tiberius. He was one of the chief instruments of the ruin of Sejanus, and succeeded him in the office of captain of the guards (a). He surpassed him in contrivance, and chiefly when he designed to destroy an enemy [A]. He refused the honours, which were decreed

(a) Dio, lib. lviii, m. 718.

[A] He surpassed Sejanus in contrivance, and especially when he designed to destroy an enemy.] The hatred of Macro was very terrible: Mamercus Scaurus had a sad experience of it. He was a man of a bad life, but illustrious for his birth, and a great Orator. Macro attacked him, upon pretence, that he had written some verses in a Tragedy, which might relate to the conduct of Tiberius. Others accused him of magic and adultery. He prevented his condemnation by killing himself, and was encouraged to do it by his wife, who also killed herself. Read these words of Tacitus. Mamercus dein Scaurus rursum postulatur, insignis nobilitate & orandis caussis, vitâ fædatus, nihil hunc amicitia Sejani, sed labefecit haud minus validum ad exitia Macronis odium, qui easdem artes occultiùs exercebat: detuleratque argumentum Tragœdiæ à Scauro scriptæ, additis versibus qui in Tiberium flecterentur. Verùm ab Servilio & Cornelio accusatoribus, adulterium Liviæ, magorum sacra objectabantur. Scaurus, ut dignum veteribus Æmiliis, damnationem anteit; hortante Sextiâ uxore: quæ incitamentum mortis, & particeps fuit (1). Dion furnishes us with some circumstances, which give a light to what concerns the Tragedy, at which the Emperor was offended. The title of it was Atreus, and it contained the words of Euripides, which advised a subject to bear with the folly of his king (2). Tiberius imagined, that this Tragedy was intended against him, and that on account of the murders he had committed, he was pointed at under the name of Atreus. I shall make an Ajax of the author, said he. The threatning was put in execution; but, instead of using this pretence, he accused Scaurus of having lain with Livilla (3).

(1) Tacit. Annal. lib. vi, cap. xxix, ad ann. 787.

(2) Ἵνα τὴν τοῦ πράττοντος ἀβουλίαν φέρηι. Ut stultitiam imperantis ferret. Dio, lib. lviii, pag. m. 730.

(3) Ex Dion. ib.

Let

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

creed him by the ſenate, after the death of Sejanus (b), and I believe, policy had a greater ſhare in that refuſal, than modeſty. He took upon him an odious commiſſion, in the proceſſes, which the informers brought againſt the people; for he preſided, when they were put to the torture, in order to diſcover thoſe, that were guilty, and to procure witneſſes. After this, the proofs, which he had collected this way, were ſent to the ſenate, and the accuſations of the informers; ſo that the aſſembly had nothing left but the care of pronouncing the ſentence (c). It happened ſometimes, that none of the accuſed were acquitted; nay, ſome were even condemned, without knowing, either by the letters of Tiberius, or the certificates of Macro, in relation to the depoſitions of the tortured, wherein conſiſted their crime; and no other rule was obſerved, but what ſeemed to be agreeable to the deſires of the emperor, and of his captain of the guards (d). Every body may ſee, that Macro, by ſuch a conduct, ſtood in need of the life of the emperor Tiberius; for he had reaſon to fear the worſt from a change of government. This he was very ſenſible of; and hence it came to paſs, that, as ſoon as he reflected upon the age and infirmities of the emperor, he laboured all he could to gain the good graces of him, who was to ſucceed to the empire. He made his court to Caligula; and the better to inſinuate himſelf into his favour, he made uſe of the wheedling arts of his wife Ennia [B]. He managed the matter ſo, that the young prince fell in love with her, and

(b) Id. ib. p. 722.

(c) Id. ib. p. 727.

(d) Id. ib. p. 730.

Let us add another example of the power of Macro's hatred: He bore an ill-will to Lucius Arruntius, and ſeeing him involved in a proceſs for a ſtate-crime, he laid hold of the opportunity; he preſided at the examination of the witneſſes, and at the torture of the ſlaves (4), and ſhewed ſo plainly, that the effects of his hatred could not be avoided, that the accuſed put himſelf to death, without waiting for the deciſion of the cauſe. Let us ſee what he anſwered to thoſe, who adviſed him to diſpute the ground. I have lived, ſaid he to them, long enough, and I can promiſe myſelf no advantage from a longer life: the times will be more unhappy under the ſucceſſor of Tiberius; for every thing that is bad is to be feared from Caligula, governed by Macro. Tacitus deſcribes this more largely and nobly; let us therefore produce his words: they let us into the character of him who is the ſubject of this article. 'Arruntius cunctationem & moras ſuadentibus amicis: 'Non eadem omnibus decora, reſpondit, ſibi ſatis 'ætatis: neque aliud pœnitendum, quàm quòd inter 'ludibria & pericula anxiam ſenectam toleraviſſet, diu 'Sejano, nunc Macroni, ſemper alicui potentium 'inviſus; non culpâ, ſed ut flagitiorum impatiens. 'Sanè paucos & ſupremos Principis dies poſſe vitari; 'quemadmodum evaſurum imminentis juventam? An 'cùm Tiberius poſt tantam rerum experientiam, vi 'dominationis convulſus & mutatis ſit: C. Cæſarem 'vix finitâ pueritiâ, ignarum omnium, aut peſſimis in- 'nutritum, meliora capeſſiturum, Macrone duce? qui 'ut deterior ad opprimendum Sejanum delectus, plura 'per ſcelera Remp. conflictaviſſet. Proſpectare jam ſe 'acrius ſervitium, eoque fugere ſimul acta & inſtan- 'tia, Hæc vatis in modum dictitans, venas reſol- 'vit (5) - - - His friends adviſing delay, Arruntius anſwered, That all things did not equally become all perſons: that he had lived long enough: that he had nothing to repent of, but having expoſed his old age to ſcorn and danger, hated a long time by Sejanus, now by Macro, and always by ſome great man or other, not thro' his own fault, but becauſe he cenſured their vices: that the few remaining days of the Emperor's life might be avoided: but how to eſcape the youth of his ſucceſſor? Since Tiberius, after ſo much experience, was unſettled, and quite altered by power; was it likely, Caius Cæſar, ſcarce out of his childhood, and not at all, or very badly, educated, would take better meaſures, eſpecially under the government of Macro? who being choſen, for his ſuperior bad qualities, to effect the ruin of Sejanus, had adminiſtred affairs much more wickedly: that he foreſaw an harder ſervitude, and therefore fled both from paſt and approaching evils. 'With theſe prophetic words, he opened his veins.' Note, that Arruntius, and two others (6), were accuſed as accomplices of the conſpiracy of Albucilla, a woman, who was no leſs infamous for her debaucheries (7), than were the heroines of Buſſi about forty years ago (8). I believe the accuſation was founded upon this, That theſe three Romans were known to be the galants of Albucilla (9); from whence it was probably concluded, that they muſt know of the conſpiracy, ſince they kept company with her in a way of galantry. Generally ſpeaking, this way of reaſoning is very good: and if there are ſcarce any women to be found, in proceſſes for ſtate-crimes, who uſe not ſuch galantries, there are likewiſe few to be found, who do not communicate their plot to their galants. The reaſon of the connexion of theſe things may eaſily be gueſſed at, and ſo, without much pains, it will appear, why the women, who reſemble Hippolita of Arragon, baroneſs of Alby (10), are thoſe who engage moſt frequently in conſpiracies. We muſt not forget, that Albucilla would have killed herſelf, but ſhe had not ſtrength enough to give herſelf a mortal wound. 'Albucilla irrito ictu à ſemet 'vulnerata, juſſu Senatus in carcerem fertur (11) - - - 'Albucilla, having miſſed giving herſelf a mortal wound, 'is, by order of the ſenate, carried to priſon.' Tacitus, who informs us, that the ſenate cuſed her to be carried to priſon, does not tell us what became of her. He obſerves, that it was ſuppoſed, that almoſt all the proofs, which were ſent againſt the three perſons accuſed, were forged by Macro, who was known to be the declared enemy of Arruntius. Sed teſtium interrogationi, tormentis ſervorum Macronem præſedisſe, commentarii ad ſenatum miſſi ferebant: nullæque in eos Imperatoris litteræ, ſuſpicionem dabant, invalido ac fortaſſe ignaro, ficta pleraque ob inimicitias Macronis notas in Arruntium (12). It is probable, that Macro behaved himſelf very unjuſtly in this affair; but he could not, even by the exact obſervation of judicial proceedings, avoid the ſuſpicion of having oppreſſed the innocent; for when a prince, or his favourites, or miniſters, are hated by the people, it is ſcarce ever believed, that thoſe whom they puniſh are guilty. This was ſeen in France under the miniſtry of cardinal Richelieu (13).

[B] He made uſe of the wheedling arts of his wife Ennia.] This is the opinion of Tacitus. 'Supremi 'Tiberio Conſules, Cn. Acerronius, C. Pontius ma- 'giſtratum occepere, nimiâ jam potentiâ Macronis: 'qui gratiam C. Cæſaris nunquam ſibi neglectam, 'acriùs in dies fovebat, impuleratque poſt mortem 'Claudiæ, quam nuptam ei retuli, uxorem ſuam En- 'niam immittendo, amore juvenem inlicere, pactoque 'matrominii vincire, nihil abnuentem dum domina- 'tionis aſpiceretur (14). - - - The laſt conſuls under 'Tiberius, Cn. Acerronius and Caius Pontius, entered 'upon their office, the power of Macro being now too 'great: who every day courted more earneſtly the favour 'of Caius Cæſar, which he had never neglected: and, 'after the death of Claudia, whom he had married, as 'I have related, Macro, by means of his wife Ennia, 'had drawn the young prince into love, and bound him 'by a marriage contract, he readily complying with 'every thing, whilſt he aimed at the empire.' But Suetonius relates the matter differently: he would have it, that Caligula made his courtſhip to Macro's wife, and that he engaged her, by a promiſe of marriage, to procure him the good offices of her huſband. 'Quam (ſpem ſucceſſionis) quo magis confirmaret, 'amiſſa Junia ex partu, Enniam Næviam (15) Ma- 'cronis uxorem, qui tum prætorianis cohortibus præ- 'erat, ſollicitavit ad ſtuprum, pollicitus & matri- 'monium ſuum, ſi potitus Imperio fuiſſet: deque 'ea re & jurejurando & chirographo cavit. Per hanc

(4) Tacit. lib. vi, cap. xlvii.

(5) Id. ib. cap. xlviii. ad ann. 790.

(6) Cn. Domitius & Vibius Marſus.

(7) Multorum amoribus famoſa Albucilla. Tacit. ibid. lib. vi, cap. xlvii.

(8) I write this in the year 1700.

(9) Connectebantur ut conſcii & adulteri ejus. Tacit. id. ib.

(10) See in the collection of divers curious pieces to ſerve for Hiſtory, the conſpiracy of this lady againſt the city of Barcelona, in favour of the Catholic king, in the years 1645, 1646, 1647, and 1648, pag. 43, &c. of the Holland edition, 1664.

(11) Tacit. ibid. cap. xlviii.

(12) Id. ib. cap. 47.

(13) See, above, the remark [F] of the article LEWIS XIII.

(14) Tacit. ubi ſupra. cap. 45. ad an. 790.

(15) We muſt read, as Colaubon very well conjectured, Naevii Macronis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and ſhe aſſured him of the empire, provided he promiſed to marry her. Tiberius was not ignorant of the plot, and diſcovered his mind ſufficiently about it, by a reproach he made to Macro [C]; and indeed he intended to overturn the whole project, but found himſelf engaged in ſo many difficulties, that he was forced to leave it to take its chance (e). The Phyſician Charicles having told Macro, that Tiberius would not live above two days, he haſtened to get all things ready to ſerve the intereſt of Caligula (f). During theſe tranſactions, a report was ſpread abroad that the emperor was dead, and immediately Caligula marched to take poſſeſſion of the empire. He was ſurrounded by many courtiers, who came in crowds to congratulate him. But on a ſudden news came, that Tiberius was recovered from the ſwooning fit, which was taken for his death. This news ſtruck the courtiers of Caligula with a conſternation; ſo that ſome of them fled one way, and ſome another, and all of them diſſembled as well as they could. As for him, he looked upon himſelf as a dead man, and waited in profound ſilence for his laſt hour: But Macro was ſo far from being frighted at it, that he ordered Tiberius to be ſtifled, and all his attendants to withdraw from him (g). Yet neither he, nor his wife, enjoyed any long time the favour they had promiſed themſelves under the new emperor, who was ſo much obliged to them, but were both forced to make-away with themſelves [D]. The huſband had obtained a very good government (b); but he could not ſoften

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) Tacit. Annal. lib. vi, cap. 1.

(g) Ex Tacito, ibid.

(b) That of Egypt. See Dion, lib. lix, p. 743.

(16) Sueton. in Calig. cap. iii.

'hanc inſinuatus Macroni, veneno Tiberium aggreſſus eſt (16). - - - To confirm which hope (of the ſucceſſion) Junia being dead in child-birth, he addreſſed 'Ennia, wife of Macro, captain of the Prætorian 'guard, promiſing to marry her, if he came to the em- 'pire: to which he obliged himſelf both by oath and 'contract. By her means getting into the confidence of 'Macro, he attempted to poiſon Tiberius.' Dion chuſes rather to follow the narrative of Tacitus than that of Suetonius; for he ſays, that Caligula was enticed by the huſband himſelf to make love to his wife (17). Take which ſide you pleaſe, you will meet every where with probability: neither will it deſtroy probability, to ſay, that Macro, being more ambitious than jealous, perſuaded his wife to lay ſnares for Caligula, and to refuſe him nothing, which might be proper to captivate a young debauched prince. If Macro did this, he acted a part, which is very common among courtiers, and generally among thoſe, who have a mind to make their fortune. One of their maxims is that which Tireſias gave Ulyſſes:

(17) Ἐς ἔρωτα αὐτὸν τῆς ἑαυτοῦ γυναικὸς ἔννιας θηκαλίσας προσήγετο. Eum in amorem uxoris ſuæ Enniæ Thraſyllo pellexerat. Dio, lib. lviii, in fine.

Scortator erit, cave te roget.
Ultro Penelopen facilis potiori trade (18).

(18) Horat. Sat. V, lib. II, ver. 75.

Stay not till aſk'd; but, of thy own accord,
At all good-natur'd huſbands ought to do,
Conduct thy wife to her adulterer's bed.

In our days, they would not ſeem to ſleep, but would go into another chamber, if they ſaw their Mecenas diſpoſed to careſs their wives.

- - - - - - doctus ſpectare lacunar,
Doctus & ad calicem vigilanti ſtertere naſo (19).

(19) Juven. Sat. 3, ver. 36.

Who his taught eyes up to the cieling throws,
And ſleeps all over but his wakeful noſe.
DRYDEN.

This would be more decent, than what Galba did, who having invited Mecenas, the favourite of Auguſtus, to ſupper, and perceiving he began to ogle, and caſt amorous glances at his wife, gently reclined his head upon a cuſhion, and pretended to fall aſleep (20). Suppoſe, on the other ſide, that Caligula diſtruſting the intentions of Tiberius, and being not yet ſure to ſucceed that Emperor, endeavoured to debauch the wife of Macro, and imagined, that, if he could engage her in his intereſt, by a ſecret promiſe of marriage, ſhe would oblige her huſband to ſerve him; is it not a ſuppoſition very probable? The like conduct has been obſerved a thouſand times. Laſtly, ſuppoſe that Ennia, being perſuaded, that Caligula would ſucceed Tiberius, endeavoured to gain his love without the knowledge of her huſband, and ſpared for nothing, which might cheriſh the hopes of being one day an empreſs; ſtill we find a great probability. Nevertheleſs, I believe that the narrative of Tacitus is preferable to that of Suetonius, in ſpight of Philo, who affirms (21), that Macro was ignorant of the gallantries of his wife.

(20) Plut. in Antonio, pag. 729, 760.

(21) See the remark [D].

[C] Tiberius . . . . . diſcovered his mind ſufficiently about it, by a reproach he made to Macro.] You forſake the ſetting ſun, ſaid he to him, and ſhow reſpect to the riſing-ſun (22). This is the way of the world, and it is one of the greateſt troubles that attends the old age of princes. I will not deſcribe the particular meaſures, which Tiberius intended to take, when he knew the intrigues of Macro; it is ſufficient to relate the words of Tacitus. 'Gnarum hoc Principi; eoque 'dubitavit de tradenda Republica primum inter ne- 'potes. . . . . Mox incertus animi, feſſo corpore, con- 'ſilium, cui impar erat, fato permiſit: jactis tamen 'vocibus per quas intelligeretur providus futurorum: 'Namque Macroni non abdita ambage, Occidentem ab 'eo deſeri, Orientem ſpectari exprobravit, &c. (23) - - - - The emperor diſcovered this: which made him 'deliberate to which of his grandſons he ſhould leave 'the ſucceſſion to the empire. . . . . At length, doubtful in 'mind, and tired in body, he left, what he could not 'himſelf determine, to the deciſion of Fate: though he 'threw out expreſſions, which ſhewed he conſidered fu- 'turity. For he reproached Macro in the following man- 'ner, which diſcovered his meaning: that he forſook 'the ſetting, and looked to the riſing-ſun.'

(22) Dio, lib. lviii, in fine.

(23) Tacitus, ubi ſupra, cap. 46.

[D] They were both forced to make away with themſelves.] Dion Caſſius, relating thoſe things which were blamed in Caligula, does not forget the ingratitude of the emperor with reſpect to Macro and Ennia; which was ſo great that he reduced them to the hard neceſſity of killing themſelves. He neither remembred the love that Ennia had for him, nor the ſervices Macro had done him; which were of ſo great importance, that by them he was advanced to the throne without a colleague. And not content to take away his life, he defamed him, and made uſe of ſuch an accuſation, as reflected diſgrace chiefly upon his own perſon; for he declared, that Macro had ſerved him as a procurer: Καὶ ἐς αἰσχύνην ἧς αὐτὸς τὸ πλεῖστον μετεῖχε, κατέσηπε. προαγωγείας γὰρ ἐγκλημα αὐτῷ πρὸς τοῖς ἄλλοις ἐπήγαγε (24). Et ea infamia oneravit, cujus ipſe maxima in parte futurus eſſet, objecto nimirum eo crimine quod ſtuprorum conciliatores fuiſſent (25). This is in the fifty ninth book of Dion Caſſius: and take notice, that this Hiſtorian has obſerved, that it is much more cruel to force people to make away with themſelves, than to deliver them up to the executioner. This obſervation he makes againſt Tiberius, who, to conceal his being the death of the accuſed, obliged them by ſufficiently powerful motives (26) to prevent their condemnation, by putting themſelves to death. Προκαλυμένου διὰ τοῦτο τοὺς ἀνθρώπους τῷ Τιβερίῳ αὐτοκτόνους γενέσθαι ἵνα μὴ αὐτὸς σφᾶς ἀποκτείνειν δόκῃ. ὥσπερ ὃ πολλῷ δεινότερον ὂν αὐτοχειρία τινὰ ἀποθανεῖν ἀναγκάσαι, τῷ τῶν δημίῳ αὐτὸν παραδῶναι. Alliciente per hæc Tiberio homines ad conſciſcendam ſibi ipſis mortem ne ipſe eos neceſſe videretur: quaſi vero non longe gravius ſit adigere aliquem ad manus ſibi ipſi inferendas, quam ſpiculatori eum tradere (27). Suetonius alſo mentions the violent death of Macro and Ennia among the great crimes of this emperor. Et in primis ipſam Macronem, ipſam Enniam adjutores Imperii, quibus . . . . . pro meritorum gratia cruenta mors perſoluta eſt (28). If we knew nothing of Macro, but by the picture which a Jewiſh author has given of him, he would be more pitied; for one would take him for a very honeſt man, and none of thoſe

(24) Dio, lib. lix, pag. 743.

(25) Thus Xylander and Leonclavius have tranſlated it; but it had been better tranſlated, Objecto nimirum ei (Macroni) præter alia eo crimine, quod ſtuprorum conciliator fuiſſet.

(26) Thoſe who were condemned died moſt cruel deaths, and all their goods were confiſcated; but the goods of thoſe, who killed themſelves, before the end of their trials, were very ſeldom confiſcated. See Dio, ubi ſupra.

(27) Dio, lib. lviii, pag. 723.

(28) Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxxvi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

their hands, in the month of Auguſt, 1571, Magius became their ſlave, and was cruelly treated by them. His comfort, in this ſad condition, was, the remembrance of thoſe things he had formerly learned; and, as he had a great memory, he thought it was not impoſſible for him, though deſtitute of all ſorts of books, to compoſe ſome full of citations. In this work he employed the greateſt part of the night [B], being obliged to labour in the day-time as the vileſt ſlave. He conjured the embaſſadors of the Emperor, and of France, to endeavour his liberty: But whether it was, that they laid not his intereſt much to heart, or that their good intentions were fruſtrated by the barbarity of the Turks [C], it is certain, that Magius was ſo far from recovering his liberty, that he was ſtrangled in priſon, the twenty ſeventh of March 1572, or 1573 [D], as appears by the Journal of Arnold Manlius, Phyſician to the embaſſador of the Emperor. I give a catalogue of the books, which he publiſhed, before he went into Cyprus [E].

expreſs to this purpoſe, that Mr Teiſſier (2), who cites him, ought not, methinks, to leave his reader in ſuch uncertainty as he does by theſe words: Jerom Maggi was born at Anglaria in the duchy of Milan, or at Anghiari in Tuſcany according to ſome. One of the two paſſages, alledged by Mr Trichet du Freſne, is taken out of book i. chap. ii. de muniendis civitatibus; and the other out of book iv. ch. 9. of the Miſcellanies. He cites alſo the teſtimony of Gratiani, which he found in the third book de Bello Cyprio, p. 181. He might have cited the place of the Miſcellanies, where Magius calls Tuſcany, noſtram Heturiam. It is in the firſt book, chap. 20.

(2) Addition to the Elogies, taken from Thuanus, Tom. i, pag. 381.

[B] He ſpent a good part of the night in writing books.] He wrote, in priſon, a Treatiſe of Bells (3), de Tintinnabulis; and another of the Wooden-horſe, de Equuleo. What made him chuſe theſe ſubjects, was, partly, that he obſerved the Turks made no uſe of bells; and partly, that, in meditating on the different kinds of torments, to which his condition was expoſed, he remembred that no body had yet well explained the Equuleus. He dedicated the firſt of theſe two treatiſes to Charles Rym, a native of Ghent, embaſſador of the emperor at Conſtantinople; and the other to the embaſſador of France in the ſame place. Jungerman, in his notes upon the treatiſe de Equuleo, thinks, that this embaſſador of France was Francis de Noailles, biſhop of Acs. Mr Trichet du Freſne is of the ſame opinion. See his Elogium on Magius, at the beginning of the treatiſe de Equuleo, of the Amſterdam edition. Theſe two treatiſes of Magius were not printed till many years after his death. His manuſcript de Tintinnabulis was given by Philibert Rym, to the Jeſuits, who permitted it to be printed with the notes of Francis Swertius, at Hanaw, in the year 1608 (4). The next year, there was printed, with the notes of Jungerman, in the ſame place, the treatiſe de Equuleo, the manuſcript of which was left with Arnold Manlius by Magius himſelf (5). They were reprinted at Amſterdam, in the years 1664, and 1689.

(3) I have more reaſon to give the firſt place to this, than the Journal des Sçavans of Jan. 4, 1666, has to give it to the treatiſe de Equuleo.

(4) Swert. in Elogio Magii.

(5) Epiſt Segheti ad Jungerm. & Jungermannus Not. in Tractat. de Equuleo.

[C] Whether it was, that the embaſſadors, of the Emperor and France, laid not his intereſt much to heart, or that their good intentions were fruſtrated by the barbarity of the Turks.] I believe theſe two embaſſadors to be wronged, when ſome affirm, they had no regard to the prayers of Magius; and I cannot underſtand how Mr Trichet du Freſne can accuſe them of being deaf in this reſpect (6), ſince, immediately after, he cites the Journal of Manlius the Phyſician, from whom we learn, that the cauſe of Magius's ruin, was, that, by an imprudent oſtentation, he was brought to the embaſſador's lodging, and that he was unſeaſonably ſet at liberty. Imprudenti ambitione in noſtram Carvaſaram ductus . . . . Conſtantinopoli intempeſtivè liberatus, ſtrangulari à Mahomete Baſſa in carcere juſſus. After theſe words, there is no room to doubt, but that the price of his ranſom was agreed upon; but that which ſpoiled all, probably, was this: Mahomet Baſſa underſtood, that Magius had been with the emperor's embaſſador: he thought he made too much haſte: he remembered the miſchief occaſioned by this able Engineer; and this was to him a ſufficient motive for giving order, that he ſhould be ſtrangled the next night. Mr Gallois (7), is yet more poſitive in the matter, in an extract of the treatiſe of Bells. 'the embaſſadors (ſays he) treated of his ranſom; 'but while they thought to procure him liberty, 'they only promoted his death: for a baſſa, who 'had not forgot the miſchiefs, which Magius had 'done to the Turks at the ſiege of Famagoſta, having learned, that he was carried to the houſe of the 'emperor's embaſſador, ſent to retake him, and 'cauſed him to be ſtrangled the ſame night in priſon.'

(6) Fuit ea fati inclementia & atrocitas, ut Legati (dictu pudendum) ejus precibus ſurdi fuerint, barbarique immiſſo in collum laqueo eum in carcere ſtrangulaverint. - - - - Such was the inclemency and hardneſs of his fate, that the embaſſadors (I am aſhamed to ſay it) were deaf to his prayers, and the barbarous Turks ſtrangled him in priſon.

(7) Journal des Sçavans, of Jan. 4. 1666.

Thuanus was not ſufficiently informed about this matter: he had heard, that Magius wrote ſomething in priſon; but, I. he knew not what it was, and Moreri ſhould not make him ſay, that it was a treatiſe de Culeo (8), and another de Tintinnabulis. II. He knew not, that Magius had dedicated one of theſe two books to the emperor's embaſſador, and the other to the embaſſador of France, and had begged of them to uſe their endeavours for his liberty. III. He knew not, that they had uſed their endeavours for that end. IV. He was ignorant, that he who cauſed Magius to be ſtrangled, was not his maſter; the author of that cruelty being Mahomet Baſſa; whereas the maſter of Magius was only the captain of a ſhip (9). V. He knew not the reaſon, why this illuſtrious priſoner was put to death, ſince he thought it was done out of covetouſneſs: 'Quaſi bos, ſays he (10), vetulus ab 'ingrato aratro faſtiditus, ab immani hero ſumptibus 'parcente ſtrangulatus eſt. - - - - Like an old ox, hated 'by the ungrateful plow, who is killed by his barbarous 'maſter, to ſave expences.' IV In fine, he ought not to have ſaid, that Magius was carried into Aſia, (which many others have affirmed after him (11); for he was carryed to Conſtantinople, and remained there all the time of his ſlavery. From all this I may boldly conclude, that Moreri's Dictionary ſtood in great need of correction in this article, which was tranſcribed from the words of Thuanus.

(8) A new miſtake; for he ſhould have ſaid Equuleo, and not Culeo.

(9) Trichet du Freſne, ubi ſupra.

(10) Hiſt. lib. xlix, ad an. 1571.

(11) Swert. in Elog. Konig. Biblioth. pag. 494.

[D] He was ſtrangled the twenty ſeventh of March, 1572, or 1573.] The reaſon of my deſcribing the year of his death with ſuch uncertainty, is, becauſe on one ſide, Manlius wrote in his Journal, That Magius was killed in priſon on thurſday-night, March 27, 1572 (12); and on the other, he had written in the firſt page of the book de Equuleo, that Magius, having left him this book, was ſtrangled, a few days after, by that wicked wretch Mahomet Baſſa, at Conſtantinople, in 1573 (13). If Manlius were now alive, it would be incumbent on him to remove the ambiguity of this date. Jungerman thought he had light enough to incline him to believe, that the tragical end of poor Magius happened in 1573. Mr Teiſſier's Printer has put May 27, for March 27.

(12) 1572. 27 Martii, noctè dici Jovis necatur in carcere Hieronymus Magius.

(13) Hunc librum mihi reliquit D. Hieronymus Magius, paucis poſt diebus ab impio Mahomete Baſſa ſtrangulatus. Conſt. 1573, Ex Segheti, Epiſt. ad Jungerm.

[E] I give a catalogue of the books, he had publiſhed before he went into Cyprus.] Magius had printed, De Mundi exitio per exuſtionem libri quinque, Baſileæ, 1562. fol. Vitæ illuſtrium virorum, auctore Æmilio Probo, cum Commentariis, Baſileæ, fol. Lambinus was accuſed of having borrowed many things from thoſe commentaries, without naming Magius (14). Commentaria, in quatuor Inſtitutionum civilium libros, Lugduni, in 8vo. Miſcellanea (15), ſive variæ Lectiones, Venetiis, apud Jordanum Zilettum, 1564, in 8vo. He publiſhed alſo ſome books in Italian, as he ſays expreſsly in the epiſtle dedicatory before the book de Tintinnabulis; and yet one (16) of thoſe, who has given us his Elogium, ſets down only one Italian book, among thoſe which have been publiſhed, the impreſſion whereof, he ſays, was Ann. 1584. The title of it is, della Fortificatione delle Citta. Magius wrote ſeveral other books, which never appeared. Swertius (17) has given us a catalogue of them: and yet ſome of them are mentioned by Simler, as if they had been publiſhed, and particularly that, which was intituled Μισοπωγισία, Odium Pædiconum, a title far enough different from that, which ſome think, that John de la Caſa prefixed to one of his poems.

(14) Swert. ubi ſupra.

(15) They are divided into four books. Gruterus has inſerted them in the 2*d vol. of his* Theſaurus Criticus. The Epitome of the Bibliotheque of Geſner, 1583, improperly diſtinguiſhes the Miſcellanea from the Variæ lectiones.

(16) Trichet du Freſne.

(17) Ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MAGNI (VALERIAN) a Capuchin of Milan, became famous in the XVIIth century. He applied himſelf not only to controverſy [A], but alſo to phyſical experiments. It is ſaid, that he attributed to himſelf the invention of thoſe of Torricellius [B]; and that he was convicted of being a Plagiary. He wrote vehemently againſt Ariſtotle (a). But I know of nothing that made him ſo well known, as the uſe that was made of one of his thoughts in the Provincial Letters [C]. He had great quarrels with the Jeſuits [D], and thereby loſt his liberty. He was one of thoſe, who converted prince Erneſt, landgrave of Heſſe (b). I think he has ſtretched his character too far in calling himſelf Apoſtolical Miſſionary to the north countries.

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) He diſputed for that end, at Rheinfield, with Haberkorn, a Lutheran profeſſor of Divinity at Gieſſen, in the year 1651.

He

[A] He applied himſelf . . . . to controverſy.] His Judicium de Acatholicorum regula credendi, publiſhed in the year 1628, expoſed him to a long diſpute, becauſe he was obliged to reply to ſeveral writings of the Proteſtants. I give an account of it elſewhere (1).

(1) At the end of the diſſertation upon Junius Brutus, at the end of this Dictionary.

[B] It is pretended that he attributed to himſelf the invention . . . . of Torricellius.] Mr Baillet informs us of this matter: Father Valerian Magni . . . . did not 'think of making the experiment of Torricellius, 'till after he had publiſhed at Warſaw his treatiſe of 'the Atheiſm of Ariſtotle, which he had dedicated * 'to Father Merſennus; and the edition of this book 'was not only poſterior to the impreſſion of that of 'Mr Paſcal, but alſo to the death of Torricellius. 'Altho' the father Capuchin did nothing but repeat 'the experiment of Torricellius, without adding any 'thing new to it; yet he aſcribed it to himſelf, in 'the Narrative he cauſed to be printed the next year, 'as if he had been the inventer of it, without ac'knowledging, that it had been made in Italy, and 'France, before him. This writing of Father Vale'rian ſurprized thoſe, who were ſkilled in ſuch things: 'they diſcovered his uſurpation, and his pretenſion was 'preſently refuted by Roberval, who alledged the 'printed piece of Mr Paſcal as an undoubted proof a'gainſt him. He plainly proved, that Magni had 'made his experiment, from the account, he had ſeen 'of it, in the writing Mr Paſcal cauſed to be ſent into 'Poland, and other parts of Europe: and the Latin 'letter, which he wrote to him about it, being deliver'ed to him by means of Mr des Noyers, ſecretary of the 'orders of the queen of Poland, this good father made 'no anſwer to it, but, by his ſilence, deſiſted from 'his uſurpation (2).' I have a book of this Capuchin, printed at Warſaw 1648. It is a collection of philoſophical treatiſes, dedicated to the Holy Virgin, de Peripatu; de Logica; de per ſe Notis; de Syllogiſmo Demonſtrativo; Experimenta de Incorruptibilitate Aquæ; de Vitro Mirabiliter fracto. There is added to it a letter of a Jeſuit, proving, Experimenta vulgata non vacuum probare, ſed plenum & antiperiſtaſim ſtabilire. That the common experiments do not prove a vacuum, but confirm a Plenum and Antiperiſtaſis. He publiſhed, at Venice, 1639. Ocularis demonſtratio loci ſine locato, corporis ſucceſſive moti in vacuo, & luminis nulli corpori inhærentis; and, at Rome 1642, de luce mentium & ejus imagine.

* The date of the Epiſt. Dedicat. is Nov. 19, 1647.

(2) Baillet, in the Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 329, ed ann. 1647.

[C] The uſe that was made of one of his thoughts, in the Provincial Letters.] This thought is a certain method of ſilencing ſlanderers and calumniators, who have recourſe to general terms. 'Does it not ſeem impoſ'ſible ſays Mr Paſcal (3), to confute a ſlander ſo in'determinate? Nevertheleſs, an ingenious man has 'found out the ſecret of it. He is a Capuchin, called 'F. Valerian, of the houſe of the counts de Magnis. 'You may learn, by this little ſtory, how he anſwer'ed your calumnies. He had happily ſucceeded in 'the converſion of the landgrave of D'Armſtadt. But 'your fathers, as if they had been troubled to ſee a 'ſovereign prince converted without calling in their 'aid, preſently wrote a book againſt him, (for you 'perſecute honeſt men every-where) wherein, falſify'ing one of his paſſages, they impute to him an He'retical doctrine. They alſo diſperſed a letter againſt 'him, in which they ſaid to him; O! what things 'we have to diſcover, (without telling what) which will 'give you great uneaſineſs! For unleſs you take care of 'this matter, we ſhall be obliged to acquaint the Pope 'and cardinals with it. . . . . What ſhall I do, anſwered 'he (4), againſt theſe general and indeterminate re'proaches? How ſhall I convict them of theſe ſlan'ders which they do not explain? The only way is 'this, to declare openly and publickly to all thoſe, 'who threaten me, that they are infamous impoſtors, 'and impudent liars, unleſs they diſcover theſe crimes 'to all the world. Appear therefore, you my accuſers, 'and publiſh theſe things upon the houſe-tops, which 'you have falſly whiſpered in the ear, with great 'aſſurance.' The author of the Provincial Letters (5) obſerves, that the Jeſuits, having anſwered nothing to this challenge, did nevertheleſs, ſome years after, attack Father Valerian after the ſame manner, upon another ſubject. He defended himſelf again in the ſame way (6). 'There are few people, ſays he (7), who 'are capable of oppoſing ſo powerful a tyranny; 'which yet I have done. I have put a ſtop to 'their impudence, and ſhall put a ſtop to it again 'by the ſame means. I declare therefore, that 'they have lied moſt impudently, MENTIRIS IMPUDENTISSIME. If the things, which they object 'againſt me, are true, let them prove them, or elſe 'let them paſs for men convicted of an impudent lie. 'Their proceeding hereupon will diſcover who is in 'the right. In the mean time, I deſire all the world 'to obſerve, that this kind of men, who will not en'dure the leaſt reproach, which they can refute, ap'pear very patient under thoſe, they cannot defend, 'and diſguiſe their want of power with the cloak of 'a falſe virtue. Wherefore, I have boldly attacked 'them, and endeavoured to bring them to ſhame; 'that even the moſt inſenſible may perceive, that, if 'they hold their peace, their patience is not the ef'fect of their meekneſs, but of the trouble of their 'conſcience.' Mr Paſchal has no ſooner related this method of Father Valerian, but he makes uſe of it in behalf of the Janſeniſts. 'This father, ſays he (8), 'hath found the ſecret of ſtopping your mouths; and 'thus we muſt do, every time you accuſe people with'out proof. We need only anſwer to every one of 'you, as the father Capuchin did, Mentiris Impuden'tiſſime.' He renewed the imitation a fortnight after: 'You muſt ſpeak out, my fathers, you muſt name 'him, or elſe you muſt be looked on as ſhameful 'liars, unworthy of any credit. After this manner, 'the good Father Valerian has taught us, to put ſuch 'impoſtors to the torture, and ſtop their mouths. Your 'ſilence in this caſe, will be a full and entire convi'ction of this diabolical calumny. The blindeſt of 'your friends will be forced to confeſs, that it will 'not be the effect of your virtue, but of your inability (9).' Since that time, Mr Arnaud has more than once made uſe of this thought of the Capuchin; and at laſt it has paſſed into ſome books of the Proteſtants. It appeared in the Chimerical Cabal (10), and has not produced a better effect, than in the book of it's firſt inventor: for the accuſer of this Cabal did not anſwer the challenge, but continued obſtinately ſilent. However it be, the name of Father Valerian was every where famous, upon the account of this invention.

(3) Paſcal's 15th Provincial Letter, pag. m. 252.

(4) In a book printed at Prague, in 1655, p. 112.

(5) Paſcal, ibid. pag. 253.

(6) I think it was in his book de Homine infami perſonato ſub titulis M. Focoſi Severi medii. Dannhawer cites ſome paſſages out of it, in his Vale Triumphali, pag. 8, 9, 136, 188.

(7) Paſcal, ibid. pag. 254.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Idem, Paſcal, Letter xvi; pag. 279.

(10) Printed at Rotterdam, 1691, pag. 357, 358, of the 2d edition.

[D] He had great quarrels with the Jeſuits.] What I have quoted out of the Provincial Letters, will not ſuffer us to doubt of it; but we do not find, that this father reaped any advantage by this ſecret, he had found out, of ſilencing his ſlanderers; for though he diſcovered their inability to prove their accuſations, yet he was caſt into priſon. It was (ſay ſome) becauſe he granted to the Proteſtants, that the primacy, and infallibility of the Pope are not founded upon ſcripture, but only upon tradition (11). In æſtu diſputationis eò ſe abripi paſſus homo eſt, ut ſua vineta graviter cædens, quod res eſt, ſcriberet, Primatum & Infallibilitatem Romani Pontificis ex Scripturis probari non poſſe, ſed ſola traditione conſtare. Quod majeſtati Pontificiæ violatæ nefas interpretati Jeſuitæ λεγόμενοι, effecerunt, ut Valerianus in vincula raptus, ex iiſdem cauſam dicere coactus fuerit (12). His quarrels with the Jeſuits did not always turn upon heterodox opinions; pecuniary matters were alſo intermixed with them.

(11) See the paſſage of his book de Homine infami perſonato, quoted by Dannhawerus, in Vale Triumphali, pag. 288.

(12) Heidggerus Hiſtoria Papatus, pag. 319. Note, that by a paſſage in Memorabilia Eccleſiaſtica, lib. vi, cap. xii, ad ann. 1651. I find Mr Heidegger has not rightly related this fact.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He was of a noble, illuſtrious, and numerous family in the Milaneſe, and was born about the year 1587 (c). " When he took upon him the habit of a Capuchin, he " aſſumed the name of Valerian. He was a long time maſter of the Novices, and " was often guardian of the houſes of his order. He profeſſed alſo Philoſophy and " Theology; and, becauſe he had great experience in controverſy, Pope Urban VIII, " who had much eſteem and conſideration for him, made him apoſtolical miſſionary " of all Germany, Poland, Bohemia, and Hungary, and declared him head of the " miſſions to the north. It was believed, that he was no leſs ſkilled in Politics than " Theology, which induced the princes of Europe to ſend him on ſeveral embaſſies. " By theſe advances, he came very near to the honour of a cardinal's cap [E]. But his " generous contempt of the pomps of this world made him contented with the fatigues " of the miſſion, " which were very great and dangerous (d). He ſuffered alſo much from the Peripatetics, who looked upon him as an enemy to their Ariſtotle. He was thrown into a frightful priſon, under ſome pretence of a new enterprize; but came out of it to his honour, by the aſſiſtance of the emperor Ferdinand III. Towards the later end of his life, he retired to Saltzburg, where he died (e) at the age of ſeventy five years, ſixty of which he had lived in the order of the Capuchins. The hiſtory of his death is found in a little book printed in 1662, in 12°, under this title; Relatio veridica de pio obitu R. P. Valeriani (f). I ſhall give ſome account of an anſwer he made to a book of Comenius [F].

(c) Baillet, in Tom. I, of his Anti, pag. 257, 59.

(d) Id. ib. pag. 259.

(e) In the year 1661.

(f) Baillet, ib. pag. 260.

This Capuchin complains very much of the ſnares that were laid for a widow, his kinſwoman, to the prejudice of a fatherleſs child. ' Eſt quoddam genus hominum grave, ſays he (13), & intolerabile Orbi ' Chriſtiano, viduis vero piis ſpecialiter exitiale. . . . ' Neminem nomino, ſed do in argumentum veritatis, ' ſi nemo omnium ſit, qui non intelligat quos deſigno: ' ſi nemo eorum ſit, qui me poſtulet reum detractionis ' apud Judicem competentem. Huic genti, eorumque ' mancipiis imputo, quæ ſub nomine meæ chariſſimæ ' cognatæ fiunt. Hos enim nec poſtulante, Vir omni ' exceptione major, ex meo ſcripto monuit, fruſtra ' tamen, de omnibus, quæ iniquiſſimè perpetrantur, ' velut ex ſententia viduæ, in quam pravis artibus co- ' nantur devolvere jura hæredis minorennis, futuri ' hæredes ipſius viduæ, in præmium quòd eam irre- ' tierint iis artibus. . . . . There is a certain race of ' men, intolerable to the Chriſtian world, but eſpecially ' fatal to pious widows. . . . . I name no body, ' but appeal for the truth of my aſſertion, if every one ' underſtands who I mean; if none of them accuſes me ' of detraction before a competent judge. To this ſet of ' people, and their followers, I impute what is done un- ' der the name of my deareſt kinſwoman. An unex- ' ceptionable perſon adviſed theſe men out of my letters, ' but in vain, concerning all their iniquitous proceedings, ' as it were by virtue of the widow's will, upon whom ' by wicked arts, they endeavour to ſettle the rights of ' the young heir, being themſelves the widow's heirs, as ' a reward for enſnaring her by thoſe arts.'

(13) In Comment. de Homine infami Perſonato, apud Dannhaw, ubi ſupra. pag. 136.

[E] He came very near the honour of a cardinal's cap.] I ſhall cite the words of a German writer, who relates, I. That this Capuchin made an oration at Rome, in the congregation de propaganda fide, to prove, by ſtrong reaſons, that the ſociety of certain women and maids, who took the name of Jeſuiteſſes, ought to be aboliſhed. It was aboliſhed by the bull of Urban VIII, publiſhed in the month of May, 1631. II. That the Jeſuits hindered him from being promoted to the dignity of a cardinal; though Uladiſlaus, king of Poland, had written in his behalf, upon this ſubject, to Pope Urban VIII. Ille (Kortholtus ait) coram ſacra Congregatione de propaganda fide, graviſſimam & nervoſis rationum momentis inſtructam orationem Romæ habuit, qua movit & pervicit, ut nova, & ad morum virtutumque confuſionem Viennæ ac Pragæ propagata Jeſuitiſſarum Societas, Pontificia autoritate diſſolveretur, & everteretur. Sed eidem deinceps Lojolitæ, ne Cardinalitiam dignitatem impetraret, obicem poſuere. Quæ Uladiſlao, Poloniæ Regi, de Valeriano ſteterit ſententia, teſtatum fecit vel una Epiſtola ad Urbanum VIII perſcripta, qua prædictus Rex Valeriano Cardinalatûs dignitatem acquirere contendit; ac præter difficultatem acquiſita fuiſſet, niſi jam tum Societas, quam vocant, JESU, invidia & odio adverſus Monachum flagrans, impetrandæ dignitati obſtitiſſet; veluti nominatus autor, Chriſtianus Kortholtus, D. & Prof. Kilonienſis refert, in Valeriano Confeſſore, lit. a. 4. 5 (14). Note, that Mr Kortholt, quoted in theſe Latin words, was one of the authors, who wrote againſt Father Valerian; an infinite number of others have done the ſame, particularly Dannhawerus, profeſſor of Divinity at Straſburg. See his treatiſe de Gorgia Leontino in Valeriano magno redivivo.

(14) Andreas Carolus, Memorabil. Eccleſ. Sæculi XVII. lib. iv, cap. ix, pag. 766.

[F] I ſhall give ſome account of an anſwer he made to a book of Comenius.] This book, as I have elſewhere ſaid (15), is intituled Abſurditatum Echo, and appeared under the falſe name of Huldricus Newfeldius. Valerian Magni intituled his anſwer, Echo Abſurditatum Ulrici de Newfeld blæſa, demonſtrante Valeriano Magno Capucino, and he publiſhed it at Cracow, in 1646, in 12mo.

(15) Citat (16) and (17) of the article COMENIUS.

MAHOMET, the founder of a religion, which ſoon had, and has ſtill a vaſt extent [A], was born at Mecca in Arabia, in the VIth century. The year of his birth [B], and the condition of his family [C], are not agreed upon; but no one denies, that

(3) Freherus, in Chronologia ad Jus Græco-Romanum Leunclavii.

(4) Pfeiffer, ubi infra, citat. (28). pag. 267.

(5) Erpenius, Orat. II, de Ling. Arabica. pag. 42. apud Hotting. Hiſtor. Oriental. pag. 145.

(6) Schindlerus Lexico, apud Hoornbeek, Summa Controverſ. pag. m. 76.

(7) Vide Genebr. Chronolog.

(8) Joh. Andreas, in confuſione ſectæ Muhammedicæ, apud Hotting. ibid.

[A] His religion ſoon had, and ſtill has, a vaſt extent.] We muſt not believe thoſe who ſay, that it poſſeſſes one half of the world or more (1); it is ſufficient to ſay, ' That, if we divide the known countries ' of the earth into thirty equal parts, five of them are ' Chriſtian, ſix Mahometan, and nineteen Pagan (2).' Thus the Mahometan religion is of much larger extent than the Chriſtian; for it exceeds it by one thirtieth part of the known world, which is a very conſiderable part.

(1) Poſtel. in Præfat. Grammat. Arabicæ. Ludovicus Regius de Viciſſitud. Rerum. lib. viii, in fine, cited by Brerewood in his Enquiries into the diverſity of Languages, chap. xiv. pag. 203.

(2) Brerewood, ibid.

[B] The year of his birth is not agreed upon.] He was born, according to ſome, in 560 (3), or in 577 (4); according to others in 580 (5), or 593 (6), or in 600 (7), or in 620 (8): but the moſt probable opinion is, that he was born in 571, or 572. This is the opinion of Elmacin: thus you ſee, that, though we adhere to one author only, there is no avoiding a diverſity of opinions. Elmacin, if we believe Hottinger (9), places the birth of Mahomet in 571; but, if we believe Reiſkius, he places it in 572. ' Cum na- ' tivitas Muhammedis inter Arabes & Chriſtianos ' hiſtoricos valde ſit controverſa, ex omnibus ſe El- ' macinum ſequi profitetur Reiſkius, tanquam antiquum ' in hiſtoria Saracenica ſcriptorem, & ex ſæculo poſt ' N. C. ſeptimo ſuperſtitem. Emergit vero ſic annus ' nativitatis poſt N. C. 572, dieſque 22. menſi Niſan, ' h. e. Aprilis. - - - - - The time of Mahomet's birth ' being controverted by the Arabian and Chriſtian Hiſto- ' rians, Reiſkius profeſſes to follow Elmacin, as being an ' ancient writer in the Saracen hiſtory, and who lived ' in the VIIth century. Thus the year of his birth falls ' in the year of Chriſt 572, and the day is the twenty ' ſecond of the month Niſan, i. e. April.' Thus the Journaliſts of Leipſic (10) expreſs themſelves, in the extract of the Chronicon Saracenicum & Turcicum Wolfgangi Drechſleri, printed the firſt time in 1550, and in the laſt place at Leipſic, in 1689. Is it not a ſhame, that

(9) Hiſtor. Orientat. p. 145.

(10) Acta Eruditor. Lipſ. 1689, pag. 377.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that Abdalla, his father, and Emina, his mother were poor. Abdalla died two months before the birth of Mahomet (a), Emina followed him six years after; and Abdolmutleb, the father of Abdalla, died two years after her; so that this infant must have been educated by Abutaleb his uncle. Abutaleb, and his wife, were well satisfied with the behaviour of their nephew (b), but, not having sufficient means to marry him, they thought fit to place him in the service of a woman, who traded into Syria. This woman, called Chadigha, fell in love with Mahomet, driver of her camels, and married him [D]. He was then twenty five years old. He had by this woman three sons, who died very young, and four daughters, which were well married (c). Being subject to the falling-sickness, and having a mind to conceal this infirmity from his wife, he made her believe, that he fell into these convulsions upon sight of the angel Gabriel, which he was not able to bear, who came to reveal to him many things, in the name of God, concerning religion [E]. Chadigha, being either deceived, or feigning to be so, went about, and told from house to house, that her husband was a prophet, and by that means endeavoured to procure him followers (d). His servant, and some others, whom he suborned, laboured in the same design, and that with so much success, that the magistrates of Mecca feared an insurrection; and therefore, to prevent the disorders, which the rise of a new sect usually produces, they resolved to rid themselves of Mahomet. He was apprized of it, and fled. The time of this flight is the Epocha of the Mahometans [F], from whence they reckon the years of the Hegira. He retired to Medina,

(a) Elmacin. apud Hotting. Hist. Orient. lib. ii, cap. i, pag. 205.

(b) Abunazarus, pag. 161, apud Hotting. ibid.

(c) Id. apud eund. dem Hotting. ib. pag. 210.

(d) See the remark [E].

that so little notice should be taken of the year, wherein a false prophet was born, who made so great a noise during his life, and is become the idol of so many nations after his death.

[C] . . . nor the condition of his family.] An infinite number of authors have written, that this false prophet was of mean extraction; and that his father was a Pagan, and his mother a Jewess. Mahometis Arabis vitum qui descripserunt multi fuerunt, qui etsi non uno modo illius res tradunt, in eo tamen conveniunt omnes quod eum è plebeio vilique genere ortum, pauperibus parentibus, patre Ethnico, matre Judæa affirmant (11). Mr Moreri has followed this opinion, which does not agree with the Arabian authors: they do not pretend, that Mahomet's father was rich; but they maintain, that he was of great extraction, and that the tribe of the Coreischites, to which he belonged, excelled in rank and dignity all the other tribes of the Arabians (12). Ibn Calican, an Arabian author, says expressly, that Emina was of that tribe; and it is very probable, since the Arabians to this day continue exactly to observe the custom of marrying with the women of their own tribe (13).

(11) Ludovicus Cœrnensis in Archontol. Cosmogr. apud Hottinger, ubi supra, pag. 136.

(12) Hottinger, ubi supra, pag. 137.

(13) Ib. p. 136.

[D] Chadigha fell in love with Mahomet . . . . and married him.] Some say, that he made use of enchantments, to make this woman fall in love with him; but others pretend, that his youth (14) and natural vigour, which were very surprising, as we shall shew hereafter, were sufficient for that end. Mr Chevreau says one thing, which none of the rest affirm, viz. That this woman was married, when Mahomet was a domestic servant to her. 'He was sold to, or 'entrusted with, Abdimonephi, the richest Merchant 'of the Ismaelites, to whom he did very great ser'vices; and whose wife Chadigha fell in love with 'him; the factor perhaps having some qualities, which 'the master wanted. If we believe some authors, he 'was thick set, of moderate stature, had a large head, 'a dark visage, a lively colour, a modest look, a 'noble air, a nimble and active body, a civil address, 'an insinuating conversation, a fine and pliant wit: 'was eloquent and strong, and commonly despised the 'dangers, which others fear (15).' Here follows a passage, which testifies, that he made use of charms. 'Tum verò animi æquè ac corporis dotibus . . . . 'ornatus, Chadigam heram suam in sui primum convertit amorem (præstigiis illud factum scribit Zonaras *, habitum eum pro mago testantur Richardus 'in Confusione Alcorani, & non paucæ Alcorani 'Azoaræ) cujus potitus matrimonio †, & cum eâ divitiis amplissimis ‡, ingentia moliri cœpit, & amplarum regionum Imperium tantùm non deglutire (16). - - - - Being adorned with the gifts both of mind and body, he first inclined his mistress Chadiga to love him (Zonaras says, it was by magical arts; Richardus, in his overthrow of the Alcoran, and not a few Azoaræ of the Alcoran, testifis, that he was esteemed a Magician) to whom being married, and attaining by her to great riches, he began to form great designs, and aimed at usurping large kingdoms.'

(14) Compare what has been said of Aphobius, in the remark [I] of his article.

(15) Chevreau's History of the World, book 9, ch. 1, pag. 10, of the 3d tome, of the Dutch edition, 1687.

* Tom. iii, pag. 127, b.

† Zonaras, lib. de Cohort. pag. 54, ad ann. 21. Heracl.

‡ Eutrop. comtin. rerum R. lib. xviii, pag. 255.

(16) Samuel Schultetus in Ecclesia Mahumetana, p. 13, 14. This is a thesis maintained at Strasburg in 1660, under Dannhauerus.

[E] He made his wife believe, that he fell into these convulsions . . . . by reason of the angel Gabriel, who came to reveal to him . . . . things concerning religion.] He was forty years old, when he began to set up for a Prophet, and he would have his wife to be his first proselyte. 'Uxori suæ primum ‡ adjutus Monachi 'illius Byzantini opera, suas persuasit revelationes, 'Gabrielem Angelum à DEO missum secum colloqui 'fingens, & de diversis ad religionem spectantibus re'bus monere ac instruere, cujus aspectum quod ferre 'nequiret, se oborta ex metu vertigine, collabi, & 'humi procumbere; hâc autem ratione comitialem 'morbum quo vexabatur, callide excusabat . Illa 'verò Chadiga circum cursitare, maritum suum ceu 'Prophetam deprædicare, in eundemque errorem alias 'gentiles suas pertrahere, pari †† etiam munere fun'gente servo Zeido, aliisque ‡‡, quos auro corruperat 'Muhammed (17). - - - - By the help of that Constantinopolitan Monk, he began with persuading his wife into a belief of his revelations, pretending that the angel Gabriel was sent from GOD to converse with him, and instruct him in several things concerning religion; whose appearance not being able to bear, and fear making him giddy, he fell upon the ground: by which pretence he artfully concealed the falling-sickness, to which he was subject. As for Chadiga, she ran up and down, told every body that her husband was a Prophet, and drew others of her country-women into the same error; his servant Zeid, and others, whom Mahomet had corrupted with gold, carrying on the same cheat.' If he began with seducing his wife, he did it not with a view of using the common artifice of almost all innovators, who affect to have women among their devotees, and to employ their intrigues and zeal, to promote the success of their undertaking. Mahomet, as we shall see hereafter (18), slighted this stratagem. He had wives and concubines in a very great number; but it was for a natural use, for the cure of his incontinence; in a word, for venereal pleasure, and not for the propagation of his faith. He did not gain the affection of his wives; for it is said, they were the persons, who took away his life (19). He was unfaithful to them, and beat them; and he even made a law, which permitted husbands to beat their wives, when it was necessary; he alledged that edict, when he had beaten one of his own, and saw, that the others murmured at it; and, for fear this reason should not satisfy them, he joined to it a pleasant sophism, a ridiculous distinction. I have not, said he, beaten her, as she is my spouse, but as she is a cursed old woman. Licentiam verberandarum uxorum, ex proprio dabat exemplo, nam quum aliquando durius excepisset mulierum suarum aliquam, & cæteræ indignarentur, ipse tum legis patrocinio usus fuit tum tali distinctione: quod illam verberasset, non quatenus uxor ejus, sed quod execranda esset vetula (20).

‡ Zonaras, Tom. iii, in Heraclio, pag. m. 127. b. Cedren. p. 347.

 Cedren. anno 21. Heracl. pag. m. 347. It. Anastasius Bibliothecarius & alii ap. Baron. ad ann. 630. num. 20

†† Cedr. cap. i, Eutrop. comtin. rerum Rom. lib. xviii, pag. 255.

‡‡ Elmac. Hist. Sar. lib. i, cap. i, apud Hotting. lib. i, pag. 257.

(17) Schultet. ubi supra, pag. 14.

(18) In the remark [Q].

(19) Mahumedes . . . . dolo suarum uxorum periit anno Heraclii 22. Christi 632. Joannes Cluverus, Historiæ totius mundi Epitome, in Heraclio, pag. m. 346. He cites Paulus Diac. lib. xviii, Eldroph.

(20) Hoornb. Summa Controvers. pag. 162.

[F] the time of this flight is the Epocha of the Mahometans.] They call it Hegira; which word signifies flight; but, that the epocha might bear an honourable name, they affected to use this word in a peculiar sense; I mean, for an act of religion, which makes

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Medina, accompanied by a few people; but was afterwards joined by ſeveral of his diſciples. It was not long before he diſcovered his deſign of planting his religion by arms. He gave his great ſtandard to his uncle Hamza, and ſent him on a party, with thirty men (e): this firſt attempt had no ſucceſs; but the ſecond was very fortunate; for he attacked, with 319 men, a caravan of about 1000 Koreiſchites, and beat them. The booty was conſiderable, and he loſt but fourteen men, who have been honourably placed in the Mahometan Martyrology [G]. After ſeveral conſiderable battels, he made himſelf maſter of Mecca, in the eighth year of the Hegira (f). He died three years after at Medina, at ſixty three years of age, according to ſome hiſtorians (g). It is not eaſy to know the true detail of his actions; for if the writers of his own ſect have invented a thouſand fables in honour of him, it is no ways probable, that his adverſaries made any ſcruple of publiſhing lies againſt him. It is very remarkable, that he himſelf ſays, that he wrought no miracles, and yet his followers attribute many to him [H]. They makes a man quit his country, to avoid the violence of thoſe who perſecuted people for their faith (21). The Koreiſchites looked upon Mahomet as a ſeditious perſon, and an impious wretch, who fled to avoid the juſt puniſhment that was prepared, for him. He, on the contrary, and his companions in baniſhment pretended, that they were holy pilgrims, who fled for the cauſe of religion, and of the true GOD. Mahomet had ſet up for a prophet, a long time before he abandoned his country, and had ſpent many days in a cave to prepare his prophecies. 'Quod 'autem ſeditionem hinc metuerent Mecchani, præve-'niendum his cenſuere motibus novis Muhammedem-'que ſeditionis, ſub religionis prætexu motæ, accuſa-'tum, convictum & condemnatum è medio tollere 'conſtituerant, niſi Muhammed de periculo admoni-'tus ſolum ac civitatem vertiſſet, quod anno ætatis 'ipſius quinquageſimo quarto contigit, cum jam 15 'per annos Pſeudoprophetiam in ſpeluncâ Garhera '(uti Numa cum Egeria) prope Meccham, in quâ 'multos ad crepuſculum uſque delituerat ſoles ‡‡, par-'tim conflaſſet, partim in vulgus ſparſiſſet (22). - - - - 'The magiſtrates of Mecca, fearing this might occaſion a 'ſedition, thought it proper to put a ſtop to theſe commo-'tions, and had determined to get rid of Mahomet, by 'convicting, and condemning him, of raiſing ſedition un-'der the pretence of religion; but Mahomet, apprized of 'the danger, fled his country; which happened in the fifty 'fourth year of his age, after having, for fifteen years, 'partly hatched his falſe-prophecy in the cave Garhera, 'near Mecca (in like manner as Numa with Egeria) 'and partly ſpread it among the vulgar.' This flight 'happened on the ſixteenth of July 622 (23).

(e) Hotting. ubi ſupra. pag. 269. ex Elmacino.

(f) Idem, pag. 271.

(g) Ib. id. pag. 273. ex Elmacino & Patricide.

(21) Hotting. ubi ſupra, pag. 261.

‡‡ Joh. Andreæ, lib. i, pag. 15.

(22) Schultet. ubi ſupra.

(23) Hotting. ubi ſupra, pag. 262.

[G] He loſt fourteen men, who have been placed in the Mahometan Martyrology.] Theſe are a pleaſant ſort of Martyrs, who are killed as they were robbing a rich caravan, and practiſing the trade of a robber and a Banditto. Elmacin ſays that Mahomet made this incurſion, only to rob the caravan. 'Audiverat autem 'Abuſophianum filium Harethi in Syriam cum mag-'na caravana Koreiſchitarum OPIBUS onuſta conten-'dere. EGRESSUS EST IGITUR EAS DIREP-'TUM. . . . . Vicerunt Muſlimini occidentes in-'fidelium 70 totidemque capientes. Ex Muſliminis 'vero tanquam Martyres occubuerunt 14 (24). - - - - 'He had heard, that Abuſophianus, the ſon of Hareth, 'was going into Syria, with a large caravan of Ko-'reiſchites, loaden with riches. He went out therefore 'with a deſign to plunder it. . . . . 'The muſſlemen got 'the better, killing ſeventy of the infidels, and taking 'as many priſoners. Only fourteen of the muſſlemen 'died as it were martyrs.' The Arabian authors have very much extolled this fight; the Alcoran itſelf makes mention of it more than once (25) as an affair, wherein GOD and his Angels wonderfully protected the good cauſe.

(24) Elmacin. pag. 5. apud Hotting. p. 269.

(25) See Hotting. ibid. pag. 269, 270.

[H] He ſays himſelf, that he wrought no miracles, and yet his followers attribute many to him.] Grotius makes uſe of this confeſſion, to refute Mahometaniſm, after having obſerved, that Mahomet does not deny the miracles of JESUS CHRIST. 'Jeſus viſum cœcis, clau-'dis greſſum, ægrotis ſanitatem dedit, imo fatente 'Mahumete, etiam vitam mortuis. Mahumetes * ſe 'miſſum ait non cum miraculis, ſed cum armis. Se-'cuti tamen ſunt, qui ei & miracula attribuerent, at 'qualia? Nempe quæ aut arte humana facilè poſſunt 'effecta reddi, ut de columba ad aurem advolante: 'aut quorum nulli ſunt teſtes, ut de camelo noctu ei 'locuto: aut quæ ſua abſurditate refelluntur †, ut de 'magna Lunæ parte in manicam ipſius delapſa, & 'ab ipſo remiſſa ad reddendam ſideri rotunditatem '(26). - - - - 'Jeſus, by the confeſſion of Mahomet him-'ſelf, gave ſight to the blind, feet to the lame, health 'to the ſick, and even life to the dead. Mahomet ſays, 'he was ſent, not with miracles, but with arms. Yet 'ſome, in after times, aſcribed miracles, to him: but 'of what ſort? Either ſuch as could eaſily be effected 'by human art, as that of a pigeon flying to his ear; 'or ſuch, as there are no witneſſes of, as that of a 'camel which ſpoke to him by night; or ſuch, as are 'refuted by their own abſurdity, as that of a great 'part of the moon dropping into his ſleeve, and ſent back 'again by him, in order to reſtore to that planet it's ro-'tundity.' I wonder, Mr Simon forgot this fine miracle, mentioned by Grotius, viz. that a part of the moon fell into Mahomet's ſleeve, which he ſent back again into heaven, leſt that planet ſhould loſe it's roundneſs. The words of Mr Simon are theſe (27). 'The Mamometans attribute ſome miracles to their 'legiſlator. They affirm, that he made water come 'out of his fingers, and that, by pointing at the 'moon with his finger, he clave it aſunder. They 'ſay alſo, that the ſtones, trees, and beaſts, owned him 'for a true prophet of GOD, and ſaluted him in theſe 'words: You are the true embaſſador of GOD. They 'affirm moreover, that Mahomet went one night from 'Mecca to Jeruſalem, from whence he aſcended in-'to Heaven; that he ſaw Paradiſe, and Hell; that he 'converſed with GOD, tho' this is reſerved for the 'bleſſed after their death; and laſtly that he deſcend-'ed from Heaven the ſame night, and was in Mecca 'before day.' But we muſt not leave this ſubject, before we ſet down the remark of a learned German: he ſays. that ſome Chriſtians, prompted by a falſe zeal againſt Mahomet, accuſe him of boaſting of certain miracles, which the Arabian writers never attributed to him. 'There are ſome Arabian authors, 'who attribute miracles to Mahomet; but others de-'ny them. For inſtance, the former ſay, That the 'moon drawing near to Mahomet, he clave it aſunder. 'Mr Pfeiffer obſerves, after Beidavi, that Mahomet 'never ſaid this, but only that, before the laſt day, 'that prodigy will be ſeen in heaven. They make 'him ſay, that, at the taking of the city of Chaibar, 'a Jewiſh women having preſented him with a poiſoned 'lamb, the lamb, tho' quite roaſted, warned him 'not to eat it. But Abulfeda, relating the ſtory, 'ſays only, that Mahomet, having taſted a bit of it, 'and perceiving that it was poiſoned, and ſpitting it 'out upon the ground, ſaid, this lamb tells me, that 'it is poiſoned; meaning, I find that it is poiſoned. 'In effect, he confeſſes often in the Alcoran, that 'he could not work miracles. Wherefore I conſider 'as a fable, what ſome tell us of a pigeon, that 'came to eat in his ear, and of a bull, that would 'eat nothing but what he gave him with his own 'hand. Mr Pfeiffer ‡ acknowledges, that theſe ſtories 'are the effects of the diſtempered zeal of ſome 'Chriſtians againſt this impoſtor (28).

(26) Grotius de veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ, lib. vi, p. m. 202. He cites Azoara, 5, 13.

(27) Simon's Critical Hiſtory of the belief of the Eaſtern Nations, chap. xv, pag. 167.

Might we not repreſent to Mr Pfeiffer, that the Chriſtians have uſed the Mahometans in this reſpect as the reformed have uſed the Catholics. For there are in ſome legendary writers, many miracles, which are not mentioned by grave authors of the Romiſh communion, and which they even laugh at. Does it follow therefore, that the Proteſtant writers are calumniators, or tranſported with too much zeal, becauſe they object to Catholics ſuch kind of miracles? And why may we not ſay, that the Chriſtians, who have ridiculed the Mahometans for ſuch miracles, as are not now

‡ Pag. 272, 273.

(28) Auguſtus Pfeiffer, in vol. VII, of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, pag. 257. The book, an extract whereof is to be found in that volume, is intituled, Theologiæ . . . . Judaicæ atque Muhammedicæ principia ſubſecta & fructus pejimi lenies.

* Azoara, 3, 14, 17, 30, 71.

† Azoara 64. Vide latius hanc fabulam ex capite Ceramur, apud Cantacuzenum Oratione in Mahumetem. num. 23.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

They pretend, that even his birth was attended with circumſtances ſo miraculous, that they cannot be ſufficiently admired [I]. There are ſome who imagine, that he might believe what he ſaid [K], and who diſapprove, what is given out by others, That he drew to be found in Arabian authors, had read them in ſome obſcure writers, who took the liberty to tell them, in honour of that falſe prophet, as the legendary writers have done in honour of the ſaints. If all that Mr Chevreau is going to tell us is not to be found in grave authors, perhaps it may be found in writers of a mean ſtamp, who reſemble thoſe who publiſh pamphlets, which the hawkers ſell about the ſtreets. Let us hear what Mr Chevreau ſays (29). 'When 'the Koreiſchites of Mecca deſired him (30), to work 'a miracle, that they might know who he was, he 'divided the moon into two pieces, between which they 'perceived a mountain. Having called two trees, 'they joined together to come to him, and parted again 'as they went back, by virtue of his command. In all 'places where he went, the trees and ſtones ſaluted him 'with great reſpect and ſaid, peace be upon you, the A-'poſtle of GOD. He made fountains ſpring forth from be-'tween his two fingers, which in the greateſt drought 'furniſhed water to all his ſoldiers, and to all the beaſts 'of burden in his army, which was numerous. With a 'kid, and four little meaſures of barley, he ſatisfied the 'hunger of eighty men; he fed a great many more with 'a few loaves, and at another time all his troops with 'a few dates, which a young maid brought him in her 'hand. The trunk of a palm-tree, before which he was 'wont to pray unto GOD, had ſo great a love for him 'that in his abſence it was heard to cry louder than a 'camel, and it ceaſed crying the moment he came near 'it. . . . . If we ſhould reckon up all his miracles, 'they would amount to a thouſand, according to ſome 'and to three thouſand, according to others.'

I will not deny, but, in ſome reſpects, the zeal of our diſputants is unjuſt; for if they make uſe of the extravagances of a Mahometan legendary, to make Mahomet himſelf odious or to ridicule him, they violate the equity, which is due to all the world, to wicked, as well as good men. We muſt not impute to any body what they never did, and conſequently we muſt not argue againſt Mahomet from theſe idle fancies, which ſome of his followers have fabled of him, if he himſelf never publiſhed them. We have ſufficient matter againſt him, tho' we charge him only with his own faults, and do not make him anſwerable for the follies, which the indiſcreet and romantic zeal of ſome of his diſciples has prompted them to write.

[I] They pretend, that his birth was attended with circumſtances ſo miraculous, that they cannot be ſufficiently admired.] 'If we believe ſome Arabians, there were 'miracles, that preceded or accompanied the birth of 'Mahomet, which aſtoniſhed the whole world. E-'mina, without any uneaſineſs, carried this new prophet 'in her womb: ſhe brought him forth without pain; and 'he fell, when he came into the world, with his face 'againſt the ground, to do honour to GOD. When he 'raiſed his head up again, he cryed out, that there 'was only one GOD, who had choſen him for his 'embaſſador. He was born circumciſed, as the greateſt 'part of the Jews believe of Adam, Moſes, Joſeph, and 'David; and then the devils were all driven out 'of heaven. His nurſe Halima, or the debonair lady, 'who had no milk in her breaſts, found it in them, 'when ſhe offered herſelf to this new-born infant. Four 'voices were heard at the four corners of the Caabah, 'and publiſhed theſe wonders. The fire of the Perſians, 'which had always burnt, was extinguiſhed. A bar-'ren palm-tree put forth leaves, and bore fruit. Mid-'wives, of an extraordinary beauty, were found preſent, 'without being ſent for: and there were even birds, 'which had for their bills precious-ſtones, whoſe ſplendor 'ſtrook from the eaſt to the weſt (31).' There is nothing more ridiculous, than what they make the guardian-angels of Mahomet do. They tranſported him to the top of a mountain; they ripped open his belly, and then waſhed his entrails ſo well, that they made them whiter than ſnow; they opened his breaſt, and took out of his heart the black kernel, or drop, which is the diabolical ſeed, that torments all other men: and all this they did to him, without putting him to any pain; and, having thus waſhed and cleanſed his entrails, he returned of himſelf to his houſe. Note, that he was then but four years old (32).

[K] Some imagine, that he might believe what he ſaid.] They reaſon after this manner: all Chriſtians are agreed, that the devil is the true author of Mahometiſm, and that he only made uſe of Mahomet as an inſtrument to eſtabliſh in the world a falſe religion. We muſt therefore ſay, that Mahomet was delivered up to the devil, by the providence of GOD; and that the power, GOD gave the devil over this wretch, was much leſs limited, than that he had over Job; for GOD did not permit the devil to pervert the ſoul of Job, as he permitted him to make uſe of the ſoul of Mahomet to deceive mankind. The devil having ſo great a power over him, by the confeſſion of all Chriſtians, as to inſtigate him to ſpread his new opinions; could he not perſuade him, that GOD had eſtabliſhed him a prophet? he could inſpire him with that vaſt deſign, of planting a new religion; he could make him willing to undergo a thouſand troubles, in order to deceive the world: and could he not ſeduce him? What reaſon can any one have, to admit the one, and deny the other? is it more difficult to move the will to great deſigns, in ſpite of all the light of reaſon, that oppoſes them, than to deceive the underſtanding, by a falſe perſuaſion, or to incline the will to embrace a falſe light, ſo as to acquieſce in it as a true revelation? I muſt confeſs, that one of theſe things does not appear to me more difficult than the other: But if the devil could ſeduce Mahomet, is it not very probable, that he did effectually ſeduce him? This man would be the fitter to execute the devil's deſigns, if he were ſo perſuaded, than if he were not. This cannot be denied me; for all things being otherwiſe equal, it is plain, that a man, who believes he does well, will always be more active and in earneſt, than he who believes he does ill. We muſt therefore ſay, that the devil, managing very dexterouſly the execution of his projects, did not forget the wheel, that was moſt neceſſary to his engine, and which would beſt increaſe the motion of it: that is to ſay, he ſeduced this falſe prophet. If he could, he would; and if he would, he did it; and we have already proved, that he could do it. Moreover, ſay theſe gentlemen, the Alcoran is the work of a fanatic: every thing in it favours of diſorder and confuſion; it is a chaos of diſjointed thoughts.

- - - - rudis indigeſtaque moles:
Nec quicquam niſi pondus iners, congeſtaque eôdem
Non bene junctarum diſcordia ſemina rerum (33).

An indigeſted maſs, an unform'd world,
And ill-join'd ſeeds of things in wild confuſion hurl'd.

A deceiver would have ranged his doctrines better; a Comedian would have been more polite. And let none ſay, that the devil would never have perſuaded him to oppoſe idolatry, nor to recommend ſo much the love of the true GOD, and of virtue; for this proves too much; ſince from thence we might conclude, that Mahomet was not his inſtrument. Beſides this, we may anſwer, I. that it was ſufficient for him to oppoſe a falſe religion to Chriſtianity, tho' it tended to the ruin of Paganiſm. II. That it is not poſſible to make any one believe, that a religion comes from GOD, if it does not teach good moral doctrines (34). It would be to no purpoſe to alledge, that this falſe prophet boaſted of converſing with the angel Gabriel: for ſince the ſcripture tells us, that the devil tranſforms himſelf into an angel of light; cannot we ſay, that he preſented himſelf to Mahomet under that name, and in the figure of the angel Gabriel? But Mahomet would make people believe, that this angel came and whiſpered in his ear, in the ſhape of a pigeon; tho' it was a real pigeon, which Mahomet taught to come and peck at his ear. We ſhall preſently ſee (35), that this is a fable, of which the Arabians make no mention. The famous Giſbert Voëtius does not at all doubt but that Mahomet was an enthuſiaſt, and poſſeſſed with a devil: Theſe are his words; which will ſhew, that there have been others of the ſame opinion. 'Non video cur hoc negan-'dum

(29) Chevreau's Hiſtory of the World, Tom. iii, Book v, pag. 2.

(30) i. e. Mahomet.

(31) Chevreau, ubi ſup. pag. 7. See alſo Hottinger, ubi ſupra, pag. 149, & ſeq. & Hoornbeek, Summa Controverſ. p. 77, 78.

(32) Hoornbeek, ubi ſup. pag. 78. He cites Joannes Andreas, in Confut. Sectæ Mahumed, cap. 1, & Alkoranum Germanicum, cap. 19.

(33) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. I. ver. 7.

(34) See Miſcellaneous Thoughts upon Comets, num. 190.

(35) In the remark [U].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

drew after him so many followers, only by accommodating his morals to the corruption of mens hearts [L], and by promising them a sensual paradise [M]. Without doubt, the principal

' dum sit [epilepsiæ, & maniacis deliriis aut enthusiasmis diabolicis Mahammedi adfuisse energema], si vitam & actiones ejus intueamur. Et exertè de illo probat Johannes Andreas Maurus in Confusione sectæ Mahometicæ, cap. 1. eum à Meccanis civibus pro fatuo & obsesso, & à propriâ uxore pro Phrenetico & à Satanæ tentationibus deluso fuisse habitum. Idem ibid. & Philippus Guadagnolo in apologiâ contra Achmedum Alabadin, c. 10. sect. 1. ex libris Saracenicis Agar & Assisa probant eum ex vita eremitica, & nimio jejunio factum fuisse insomnem & furiosum, & in spelunca commorantem audiisse voces & sermones, loquentem autem neminem vidisse. Ita cum furiosis & dæmoniacis Enthusiastis, ac prophetis Monasterienſibus quos patrum nostrorum ætas vidit, in eo comparari posse (36). - - - I do not see, why this is to be denied, (that Mahomet was an enthusiast, and possessed) if we look into his life and actions. John Andreas Maurus, in his Confusio Sectæ Mahometicæ, ch. 1. proves concerning him, that the citizens of Mecca took him for an enthusiast and demoniac, and his own wife for one mad, and deluded by the temptations of the devil. The same author, in the same book, as also Philip Guadagnolo, in his Apology against Achmed Alabadin, ch. 10. §. 1, prove, out of the Saracen books Agar and Assisa, that solitude, and too much fasting, had made him mad, and that, during his stay in the cave, he had heard voices, but seen no body speaking. Thus he may be compared to the mad and demoniacal enthusiasts, and monkish prophets, of former ages.'

(36) Voët. Disputat. Tom. i, pag. 1057, 1058.

How specious soever these reasons may appear, I chuse rather to concur with the common opinion, That Mahomet was an impostor: for, besides what I shall say elsewhere (37) his insinuating behaviour, and dexterous address, in procuring friends, do plainly shew, that he made use of religion only as an expedient to aggrandize himself. ' Facetus moribus, voce suavi, visitandi & excipiendi vices talionis lege suis reddens, pauperes munerans, magnates honorans, conversans cum junioribus, petentem à se, aliquid repulsa nunquam abigens, aut sermone facili non excipiens (38) - - - He was of a pleasant disposition, a sweet voice, receiving, and paying visits regularly, bestowing gifts on the poor, honouring the great, conversing with young men, never sending away a petitioner repulsed, but always receiving him courteously.' Had a true fanatic ever such a character? Did he ever understand his business so well? Tho' a man should, for some time, fancy that God has sent an angel to reveal to him the true religion, yet, might not he perceive the delusion, when he found, that he could not confirm his mission by any miracle? Now this was the case of Mahomet: the Koreischites offered to embrace his new religion, provided he wrought miracles; but he never had the boldness to promise them any: He cunningly evaded their proposal, sometimes telling them, that miracles were not necessary, and sometimes by referring them to the excellency of the Alcoran (39). Was not this sufficient to convince him, that he was not extraordinarily called by God to found a new religion? See remark [N], at the end.

(37) In the remarks [T], and [NN].

(38) Elmacin. apud Hotting. Hist. Oriental. pag. 241.

(39) See Hotting. ubi supra, p. 302, & 303.

[L] - - - and who disapprove what is pretended, that he drew after him so many followers, only by accommodating his morals to the corruption of mens hearts.] And as to this point, I doubt not, but the persons, mentioned in the preceding remark, have better grounds than they had, as to the pretended sincerity of Mahomet. I do not see, that this false prophet has derogated from the morality of the Gospel (40); on the contrary, I find, that as to ceremonies, he has considerably increased the yoke of Christians. He ordains circumcision, which is a thing very harsh to adult persons: he requires them to abstain from certain meats, which is a slavery that does not well agree with worldly men: he forbids the use of wine, which is a precept indeed, that is not so very harsh to the Asiatic people, as to the northern nations, and which would certainly have made Willibrod and Boniface miscarry in their design: but yet it is convenient in all countries, where wine grows; and we know, by antient and modern History, that this liquor does not displease the eastern people. Besides, Mahomet imposed fastings and washings, which are very troublesome, and such a frequent use of prayers, as is tedious and uneasy. He enjoins also pilgrimages: and, in a word, you need only consider the forty aphorisms of his morals (41), and there you will find every thing the most opposite to the corruption of man's heart; the precept of patience in adversity, of not speaking evil of our neighbours, of being charitable, of renouncing vanity, of doing no injury to any man, and lastly, that, which is the epitome of the law and the prophets (42), Do to your neighbour, what you would that he should do unto you (43).

(40) See Hotting. Histor. Oriental. p. 247, & seq.

(41) You will find them in Hotting. ibid. pag. 248, & seq.

(42) Saint Matthew's Gospel, chap. vii, ver. 12.

(43) Si tandem feceris alii quicquid gratum esset, si tibi fieret. Hotting. ibid. pag. 250.

It is therefore an illusion, to pretend, that the only reason why the law of Mahomet was propagated so readily, and spread so wide, was, because it eased men of the yoke of good works, and troublesome observances, and tolerated a corruption of manners. If I mistake not, the only things, wherein it opened the gap, which the Gospel had shut, are marriage, and revenge; for it permits Polygamy, and to return evil for evil: but the Jews and Pagans gained scarce any thing by this, for they were already in possession of a custom, which did not give them much trouble in this respect. Hottinger (44) has given us a long catalogue of the moral aphorisms, or apophthegms, of the Mahometans. We may say, without flattering this religion, that the most excellent precepts, that can be given to man, for the practice of virtue, and avoiding of vice, are contained in these aphorisms. Hottinger makes no scruple to exalt this morality above that of many monks. ' Ipsi judicent ' adversarii ex illis que ex Arabum nunc monumentis ' afferemus. Nonne majus sæpe & virtutum studium ' & vitiorum odium præ se ferant Muhammedani, ' quam Pontificiorum plerique religiosi (45). - - - Let the adversaries themselves judge from what we shall now produce out of the Arabian monuments. Do not the Mahometans often seem to practise virtue, and shun vice, better than most Popish monks.' Mr Simon has spoken no less advantageously of the Mahometan religion, with respect to morality: ' It consists, ' says he (46), in doing good, and avoiding evil; ' and therefore they examine carefully virtues and ' vices, and their Casuists are no less subtile in these ' points, than ours.' After he has mentioned some of their principles concerning the necessity of faith, and trust in God, and humility, and repentance, &c. he adds (47), ' I pass over in silence the rest of their ' morals, because what has been said is sufficient to ' shew what they are; and I can assure you, ' that they are not so loose as some Casuists in ' our age. I shall only add, that they have many ' good precepts about the duties of private persons to ' their neighbours, wherein they also prescribe rules ' of civility. They have also written of the behaviour ' that is due to a prince; and one of their maxims is, ' That it is never lawful to kill him, nor even speak ' evil of him, under pretence that he is a tyrant.'

(44) Hotting. ubi supra, pag. 315, & seq.

(45) Id. p. 314.

(46) Critical History of the Levant, p. 173.

(47) Ibid. pag. 175, 176.

[M] . . . and by promising them a sensual paradise.] It must be granted, that this promise might be a bait to allure the Pagans, who had only confused notions of the happiness of another life; but I know not whether it was calculated to entice the Jews; neither do I think that it could have any influence upon Christians: and yet how many Christians have been drawn into apostacy by this false prophet? Understand what he says of the pleasures of his paradise in a literal sense, That each person there shall have the strength of 100 men, to enjoy full satisfaction with women, as well as to drink, and eat (48). Yet this would not balance the idea, the Scripture has given us of the happiness of another life; for it speaks of it (49) as a state which surpasses all that eyes have seen, or ears heard, or hath entered into the heart of man to conceive. So that, if we believe the Scripture, the happiness of paradise is something that surpasses imagination, and has no bounds set to it. Endeavour to have a fixed idea of it; you can never compass it, but your hopes still carry you higher, and launch out farther beyond all bounds. Mahomet did not allow you this liberty, but confined you within certain bounds; he multiplied a hundred times the pleasures you have already tried, and there he left you: but what is a hundred times, in comparison of a number which is infinite?

(48) Chevreau, ubi supra. pag. 14. See the remarks [Q], and [II].

(49) 1 Cor. chap. ii, ver. 9.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google principal cauſe of the great progreſs he made, was the method he took to force thoſe, by arms, to ſubmit to his religion [N], who would not embrace it readily. This preſerves to the chriſtian religion one of the proofs of its Divinity [O], viz. that which is

But ſome may ſay, the Scripture ſpeaks only of pleaſure in general; and if it makes uſe of corporeal images, as when it promiſes, that we ſhall be ſatisfied with the plenteouſneſs of the houſe of GOD, and that we ſhall drink of the rivers of his pleaſures (50), you are preſently warned, that theſe are metaphors, under which ſpiritual pleaſures are veiled: but this does not affect worldly minds like ſenſible pleaſures. I anſwer, That ſouls, which are moſt immerſed in matter, will always prefer the paradiſe of the Goſpel before that of Mahomet, provided they give an hiſtorical faith to the deſcription of the beatific viſion, tho' they ſhould give the ſame faith to the Alcoran (51). I ſhall explain my meaning by this ſuppoſition: let us repreſent to ourſelves two preachers, the one a Chriſtian, and the other a Mahometan, preaching before Pagans; each of them endeavouring to allure them to his party, by laying open the joys of paradiſe. The Mahometan promiſes feaſts, and fine women; and, the better to move his auditors, he tells them, that in the other world the pleaſures of ſenſe will be a hundred times more delicious than in this. The Chriſtian declares, That the pleaſures of paradiſe will neither conſiſt in eating, nor drinking, nor in the conjunction of the two ſexes, but that they ſhall be ſo lively, that no man's imagination is able to reach them; and that all that can be conceived, by multiplying the pleaſures of this world a hundred times, a thouſand times, a hundred thouſand times, &c. is nothing in compariſon of the happineſs, which GOD imparts to the ſoul, by it's ſeeing him face to face, &c. Is it not certain, that the moſt unchaſte and luxurious hearers would rather follow the Chriſtian preacher, than the other, tho' we ſhould ſuppoſe, that they gave as much credit to the promiſes of the Mahometan, as to thoſe of the Chriſtian? They would doubtleſs do the ſame thing, which a ſoldier would do, who knows the offers of two captains, each of which would inliſt him: for tho' he was perſuaded, that they were both of them ſincere, and would give all that they promiſed, he would certainly liſt himſelf with him that offered moſt. So likewiſe theſe Pagans would prefer the paradiſe of the Goſpel before that of Mahomet, tho' they ſhould be ſuaded, that both of theſe preachers would make good to their diſciples the reward they had promiſed (52). For it muſt not be imagined, that a voluptuous man loves ſenſual pleaſures, merely becauſe they flow from that ſource; he would equally love them, if they came from any other: make him feel more pleaſure by ſucking in the air of a cave, than by eating the moſt dainty meat; he will quit, with all his heart, the beſt meals, to go into the cave (53). Make him feel more pleaſure in examining a Geometrical problem, than in enjoying a fine woman, he will readily quit the fine woman for this problem; and conſequently it would be unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that a Mahometan ſhould draw after him all the hearers that are lovers of pleaſure: for ſince they love ſenſual pleaſures, only becauſe they can find no better, it is plain they would renounce them with eaſe, to enjoy a greater happineſs. What care I, would they ſay, if the paradiſe of Chriſtians does not furniſh me with the pleaſures of good eating, the enjoyment of fine women, &c. ſince it provides me with other pleaſures, that infinitely exceed all the ſenſible pleaſures of this world. I think therefore, we muſt not imagine, that the hopes, which Mahomet has given, of the happineſs of another life, was what allured to his ſect the Chriſtians that engaged in it. We may almoſt ſay the ſame thing with reſpect to the Jews; for it appears by ſeveral pſalms of David, that they had a wonderful idea of the happineſs of another life. The Pagans were more likely to be enticed, becauſe their religion left them in thick darkneſs, as to the particulars of the joys of paradiſe: but is it enough to tell people, that, after this life, they ſhall enjoy ſenſual pleaſures with much more ſatisfaction than in this world? And who are you, might they ſay, that promiſe us this? Who told you ſo? Or how do you know it? We muſt therefore ſuppoſe, in the firſt place, that Mahomet, antecedently to his promiſes of paradiſe, ſet up for a great prophet; and that, before they were allured by theſe pleaſures, they were perſuaded of his miſſion from heaven, for planting the true faith. And ſo the great progreſs, this ſect made, is not owing to the promiſes of a ſenſual paradiſe: for thoſe, who did not believe him ſent from GOD, paid no regard to his promiſes; and thoſe who believed him a true prophet, would nevertheleſs have followed him, tho' he had promiſed them only a ſpiritual happineſs in the other world. Let us not give any occaſion to the Libertines to retort this objection upon the Goſpel, as tho' it had never been ſo effectual to convert the Pagans, but upon the account of promiſing a paradiſe, or an happineſs, which infinitely ſurpaſſes all the pleaſures that can be imagined. And particularly let us abſtain from raillery upon the gold and precious ſtones, and ſuch like other ornaments of Mahomet's paradiſe; for you will find ſuch things, and all the kind of precious ſtones that the moſt famous jeweller has in his ſhop, in the deſcription, which the Revelation (54) gives us of paradiſe. And let no man tell me, that a carnal and brutiſh ſoul will ſooner believe pleaſures that are groſs, than thoſe that are ſpiritual; for if any thing appears incredible to ſuch an one, it is chiefly the reſurrection; wherefore, if Mahomet could perſuade him to believe the reſurrection, a Chriſtian might have convinced him of the ſpiritual joys of another world. See the margin (55).

(50) Pſalm xxxvi. ver. 9. See Gaſſendus, Ethice, lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 679, who, keeping cloſe to the Hebrew, renders the paſſage thus: Inebriabuntur ab ubertate domus tuæ, & de torrente voluptatis tuæ potabis eos.

(51) Take notice of the following marginal note.

[N] He made proſelytes by force of arms.] We need not ſearch elſewhere for the cauſe of his progreſs; for this was the ſole and entire cauſe of it. I do not deny, but the diviſions of the Greek church, whoſe ſects were unhappily multiplied, the bad ſtate of the oriental empire, and the corruption of manners, were a favourable conjuncture for the deſigns of this impoſtor. But after all, what reſiſtance can be made to conquering arms, forcing ſubſcriptions? Aſk the dragoons of France, who made uſe of this method in 1685; they will tell you, that they will undertake to make the world ſign the whole Alcoran, provided they have time to enforce that maxim, Compelle intrare, compel them to come in. It is very probable, that, if Mahomet had foreſeen, he ſhould have had ſuch good troops at his command, he would not have taken ſo much pains to have forged new revelations, and to have put on an air of devotion in his writings, and to tack together ſeveral pieces of Judaiſm and Chriſtianity. Without engaging in this troubleſome buſineſs, he might have been ſure of planting his religion, where-ever his arms were victorious: and if any thing were capable of perſuading me, that there was a good deal of Fanaticiſm in the caſe, I ſhould encline to believe it, from the infinite number of things in the Alcoran, which appear no wiſe neceſſary, but in caſe he had no mind to uſe force. Now there are many things in that book, which are poſterior to the firſt ſucceſs of Mahomet's arms.

(52) This is to be underſtood without regard to the doctrine of Grace, according to which, we muſt ſay, that it is by the gift of God, and the ſtrour of the holy ſpirit, that a man chuſes the true church. We ſpeak here upon a ſuppoſition, wherein we conſider only the motives of intereſt or ſelf-love, which would determine men to the choice of a religion.

(53) Trahit ſua quemque voluptas. Virgil. Ecleg. ii, ver. 65.

(54) In ch. xxi.

(55) I deny not but Mahomet propoſed a ſtrong allurement to the Saracens, by allowing them Polygamy; for they were very much inclined to the venereal act. Incredibile eſt quo ardore apud eos in Venerem utrque ſolvitur ſexus. Amm. Marcellin. lib. xiv, cap. iv, p. m. 24.

[O] This preſerves to the Chriſtian religion one of the proofs of it's Divinity.] The Goſpel, preached by obſcure perſons, deſtitute of learning and eloquence, and of all human ſupports, and cruelly perſecuted, yet in a little time prevailed over the whole world. This is matter of fact, which no one can deny, and which plainly proves, it was the work of GOD. But this proof will be of no force, after it can be made appear, that a falſe church ſpread as far by the like means; and it is certain, that this argument would be ſpoiled, if it could be proved, that the Mahometan religion owed not the ſuddenneſs of it's great progreſs to the violence of it's arms. Since therefore there are two things equally clear in the monuments of hiſtory; one of which is, that the Chriſtan religion was eſtabliſhed without the uſe of the ſecular arm; the other, that the Mahometan religion was eſtabliſhed by the way of conqueſt: no reaſonable objection can be made againſt our proof, upon pretence, that this infamous impoſtor ſuddenly overſpread an infinite number of provinces with his falſe doctrines. It is well for us, that we have the three firſt centuries of Chriſtianity ſecure from this parallel; otherwiſe it would be folly in us, to object to the Mahometans the violence they uſed for the propagation

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is drawn from its ſpeedy propagation over the whole world; but we loſe the proof, which is taken from its large extent [P]. We muſt not wonder, that this falſe-prophet never tion of the Alcoran: they would quickly put us to ſilence, for they need only cite to us theſe words of Mr Jurieu (56): Can any one deny, that Paganiſm was deſtroyed by the authority of the Roman Emperors? We may venture to affirm, that Paganiſm would be ſtill in being, and that three-fourths of Europe would ſtill be Pagan, if Conſtantine, and his ſucceſſors had not employed their authority to aboliſh that religion . . . (57). The Chriſtian Emperors have extirpated Paganiſm, by pulling down it's temples, deſtroying it's images, forbidding the worſhip of it's falſe gods; by appointing preachers of the Goſpel, in the place of falſe prophets and teachers, by ſuppreſſing their books, and ſpreading ſound doctrine. See the 8th Letter of the Picture of Socinianiſm, at page 501, where the ſame author affirms, That doubtleſs, had it not been for the authority of the Emperors, the temples of Jupiter and Mars would ſtill be kept up, and the falſe gods of the heathens would have a great number of adorers.

We muſt freely declare the truth: the kings of France have planted Chriſtianity in the country of the Friſons and Saxons by Mahometan ways; and the ſame force was made uſe of to plant it in the north. This appears horrible to moderate men, when they read it in the book of Mr Ornhialms (58). The ſame ways were made uſe of againſt the ſects, that durſt condemn the Pope, and will be uſed in the Indies, whenever it can be done (59). And from all this conduct it plainly appears, that we can no longer reproach Mahomet for having propagated his religion by force, I mean, by denying Toleration to any other. For he might argue thus ad hominem: If force be wrong in it's own nature, it can never be lawfully made uſe of: But you have made uſe of it from the IVth century unto this preſent time; and yet you pretend, you have done nothing in all this, but what is very commendable. You muſt therefore confeſs, that this way is not wrong in it's own nature; and conſequently, I might lawfully make uſe it in the firſt years of my vocation; For it would be abſurd to pretend, that a thing, which was very criminal in the firſt century, ſhould become juſt in the fourth; or that a thing, which was juſt in the fourth, ſhould not be ſo in the firſt. This might have been pretended, if GOD had made new laws in the IVth century; but do you not found the juſtice of your conduct, ſince Conſtantine till this preſent time, upon theſe words of the Goſpel, compel them to come in (60), and upon the duty of ſovereigns? You ſhould therefore have uſed force, if you could have done it, from the very day after the Aſcenſion. Bellarmin, and many other writers of the Romiſh party, would grant him this; for they ſay (61), 'That if the Chriſtians 'did not depoſe Nero and Dioclefian, it was becauſe 'they had not ſufficient temporal force to do it, but 'that of right they might have done it, being no 'ways obliged to endure a king over them, who is 'not a Chriſtian, if he endeavours to pervert them 'from the faith (62).' They were therefore obliged to ſet up a ſovereign over them, who ſhould eſtabliſh the Goſpel, and extirpate Paganiſm, by the means of authority. Mr Jurieu does not differ much from the opinion of Bellarmin; for he tells us, that the greateſt part of the Chriſtians were patient, only through their weakneſs, and want of power (63). And, though he does not blame their conduct, in not taking arms againſt their princes, yet he thinks they had a right to do it; and if they had done it, they could not have been blamed. Doubtleſs he believes, that, if they had had power, they might have placed upon the throne a Conſtantine, or a Theodoſius, from the time of Nero. Obſerve, I pray you, that he does not relate the manner of aboliſhing Paganiſm, meerly as a matter of fact, but as a thing that was juſt; for he compares it with the conduct of the Proteſtants, and with that, which the Catholic princes will obſerve in a little time, as he pretends, to ruin the church of Rome. The three examples he gives, of the way, in which authority may be lawfully employed, are, that of the kings of Iſrael, that of the Chriſtian emperors, and that of the Reformed princes (64): 'Theſe laſt, ſays 'he (65), have aboliſhed Popery in their ſtates, by 'removing it's profeſſors, by appointing teachers of 'ſound doctrine and pure morals, by burning the 'images, by burying the relics in the earth, by forbidding all idolatrous worſhip. In this, they were ſo far from doing any thing againſt the law of GOD, 'that they exactly obſerved his commands: for it is 'his will, that the kings of the earth ſhould ſtrip the beaſt, and break her image. Never did any Proteſtant, to this day, blame this conduct, and never 'will any judicious man apprehend the thing otherwiſe. Things have always been thus, and, if it 'pleaſe GOD, will always be ſo, in ſpight of our libertines and inconſiderate men.' Conſult the 284th page of his book, and you will find there theſe memorable words: 'For the little profit, which you 'might draw from thence now (66), the church would 'ſuffer great loſs, and perhaps you would be obliged 'to retract in a few years, and doubtleſs you would 'do it. For if the kings of France, and Spain, 'ſhould uſe their authority, to drive Popery out of 'their dominions, as the kings of England, and 'Sweden have done, you would be ſo far from blaming 'them, that you would think it very well done. But 'you may be aſſured, that this is to come to paſs; 'for the holy Spirit ſays, That the kings of the earth, 'who have given their power to the beaſt, ſhall take 'it from her, and that they ſhall make her deſolate, 'and eat her fleſh. The ſame authority of the weſtern 'kings, who erected the empire of Popery, ſhall deſtroy it. And this will be perfectly agreeable to 'the deſign of GOD, and to his will; wherefore we 'ſhall find nothing in it to gainſay. And therefore, 'that you may be uniform in your judgment, follow 'the truth, which never changes; and do not govern your opinions according to intereſts, which are 'changing every day.' You ſee therefore, that he lays it down as an immutable principle, which will hold in all times, That it is lawful to make uſe of authority for the propagation of the faith. If therefore he enters into diſpute with the Mahometans, he muſt renounce thoſe arguments, which have been always uſed againſt them from the manner of propagating their religion: for it was not, ſays he (67), by putting 'a ſword to the throat of Chriſtians, to make 'them abjure Chriſtianity, and embrace Mahometaniſm; 'but by the poverty, meanneſs, miſery, and ignorance, 'to which they reduced Chriſtians;' which are ways much leſs harſh, and more gentle, than thoſe which, he ſays, may be very juſtly made uſe of to extirpate Popery. See the remark [AA], at the end.

[P] . . . . but we loſe the proof, which is taken from it's large extent.] I cannot leave this ſubject, till I have made one obſervation of ſome importance. The fathers have uſed an argument, which is improperly alledged againſt the reformers of the XVIth century. The extent of the Goſpel furniſhed the fathers with an argument againſt the Jews, and the ſects, which were bred in the boſom of Chriſtianity; becauſe this plainly ſhewed the completion of the prophecies of Scripture, which foretold, that the knowledge and ſervice of the true GOD, under the Meſſias, ſhould not be confined, as before to one little corner of Paleſtine, but that all nations ſhould become the people of GOD (68). This reaſoning confounded the Jews and Heretics, and continued in full force till the time of Mahomet. Since that time we muſt forſake it; for, conſidering only the extent, the religion of this falſe Prophet might claim to itſelf the antient prophecies, as well as the Chriſtian. We cannot therefore ſufficiently wonder, when we find the Bellarmines, and ſuch famous writers of controverſy, affirm in general, that extent is a mark of the true church, and pretend, by this method, to gain their cauſe againſt the Proteſtants. Nay, they are even ſo imprudent, as to put proſperity among the marks of the true church. 'Elmacini Hiſtoria Saracenica luculentiſſime quos brevi 'tempore Muhammedica peſtis habuerit progreſſus, 'quos contra Chriſtianos ſucceſſus. Adeo ut mirari 'lubeat quid animi fuerit Bellarmino, cum ad ejuſmodi lapſus eſt nugas (69). - - - - Elmacin's Saracen 'Hiſtory very clearly deſcribes the ſpeedy progreſs of Ma- 'hometiſm, and it's ſucceſs againſt the Chriſtians; ſo 'that I cannot but wonder, how Bellarmin ſtumbled 'upon ſo trifling and inconcluſive an argument.' It was eaſy

(56) Jurieu's Rights of two Sovereigns, pag. 280. He ſays, pag. 297, 298, That Popery will never be aboliſhed but by the authority of the princes, that eſtabliſhed it, and that Paganiſm would be ſtill kept up, and reign under the cover of the doctrine of Toleration.

(57) Ib. p. 289.

(58) Intituled, Hiſtoriæ Succorum Gothorumque Eccleſiaſticæ lib. iv. See the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for the month of November, 1690, pag. 109, &c.

(59) See, in the remark [AA], the words of the Jeſuit Frois.

(60) See upon all this, the Philoſophical Commentary upon Compel them to come in. Part i, chap. vii.

(61) Bellarm. de Rom. Pontif. lib. v, cap. vii, § quod ſi, cited by Daillé, Reply to Adam, Part. ii, chap. xxi, pag. 125.

(62) Bellarm. ib. § probatur hujus, cited by Daillé, ibid.

(63) The ninth Paſtoral Letter, of the year 1688. pag. 202, Edit. in 12mo.

(64) The Rights of two Sovereigns, pag. 289.

(65) Ibid.

(66) That is to ſay, from the court of France being perſuaded, that it muſt tolerate falſe religions.

(67) The ninth Paſtoral Letter, of the year 1688, p. 196.

(68) See Father Thomaſin, Of the Unity of the Church, Tom. ii.

(69) Hotting. ubi ſupra, pag. 339.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

never had recourse to the artifice used by all the heads of parties, in the case of heresies and sects (b): He was not supported by the intrigues of women (i); nor did at all engage the fair easy to foresee, that, as to these two marks, they would be answered, that the Mahometan may more justly pass for the true church, than the Christian. The religion of Mahomet is unquestionably of much larger extent than the Christian; it's victories, it's conquests, it's triumphs, are incomparably more illustrious, than any thing the Christians can boast of, in this kind of prosperity. The exploits of the Mahometans are without doubt the most glorious things that History affords. What can we find more wonderful than the empire of the Saracens, which extended from the Straits of Gibraltar as far as the Indies? Has it fallen? See the Turks on one side, and the Tartars on the other, who preserve the grandeur and renown of Mahomet. Find, if you can, among the conquering Christian princes, any that can be put in the balance with the Saladines, the Gingis-Chams, the Tamerlanes, the Amuraths, the Bajazets, the Mahomets II, the Solymans. Did not the Saracens confine Christianity within the bounds of the Pyrenean mountains? Did they not commit an hundred outrages in Italy, and proceed as far as the heart of France (70)? Did not the Turks extend their conquests to the confines of Germany, and the gulf of Venice? The leagues, the croisades, of Christian princes, those grand expeditions, which drained the Latin church of men and money, can they not be compared to a sea, whose waves flow from the west to the east, to be broken, when they encounter the Mahometan forces, like one that splits against a steep rock? At last the Christians have been forced to yield to Mahomet's star, and instead of following him into Asia, they reckon it a great happiness, when they are able to maintain a running fight in the center of Europe. See, below (71), the eternal monuments, which Christianity has erected to the superiority of the fortune of the Mahometans. We may apply to the Mahometans and Christians, what Sallust has observed of the Athenians and Romans. 'Athenienſium res gestæ, 'ſicut ego existimo, satis amplæ, magnificæque fuere, 'verum aliquanto minores tamen, quam fama ferun-'tur: sed, quia provenere ibi magna scriptorum in-'genia, per terrarum orbem Athenienſium facta pro 'maximis celebrantur. Ita eorum qui ea fecere, vir-'tus tanta habetur, quantum verbis ea potuere ex-'tollere præclara ingenia. At populo R. nunquam 'ea copia fuit; quia prudentiſſimus quiſque negotio-'ſus maxime erat. Ingenium nemo ſine corpore exer-'cebat. Optimus quiſque facere, quam dicere; ſua 'ab aliis benefacta laudari, quam ipſe aliorum nar-'rare, mallebat (72). - - - The actions of the Athenians 'were, I think, great and magnificent enough, tho' not 'ſo great as they are reported to have been: but, as 'they abounded with excellent writers, hence the actions 'of the Athenians are celebrated as the moſt glorious all 'over the world. Thus the merit of thoſe, who per- 'formed them, is thought to have been as great, as the 'words of the Hiſtorian repreſent it to be. The Romans 'never had this advantage, becauſe the moſt ſenſible 'perſons among them were taken up with buſineſs; and 'no one exerciſed his mind without his body. They pre- 'ferred actions to words, and choſe rather that their 'goods deeds ſhould be praiſed by others, than that them- 'ſelves ſhould relate thoſe of others.' The Mahometans, being more addicted to war than ſtudy, have not written hiſtories equal to their actions; but the Chriſtians having many great wits, have wrote hiſtories which excel all that they have done. But notwithſtanding this want of Hiſtorians, theſe Infidels can tell us, that Heaven has at all times given teſtimony to the holineſs of their religion, by the victories they have obtained (73). The Chriſtians ought not to uſe that ſophiſm, and imitate them improperly, as a father of the oratory did (74). His book is ſcandalous, and of pernicious conſequence; for it is founded upon this falſe ſuppoſition, that the true church is that, which God has moſt enriched with temporal bleſſings. If we were to determine religious diſputes by this rule, Chriſtianity would quickly loſe the cauſe: But prudence will not permit, that they ſhould be decided in that manner; they muſt be fortified by confeſſions of faith, and no regard muſt be had either to extent, or the greater number of victories. I know not whether we may venture to be tried by our morals; but if the Infidels ſhould agree to allow the preference to wit, learning, and military virtue, we muſt take them at their word; for they would infallibly loſe the cauſe at this time; ſince they are much inferior to the Chriſtians in theſe three things. A fine advantage indeed, that we know better, than they, the art of killing, of bombarding, and deſtroying mankind (75)! Obſerve, I pray you, that the Mahometan religion had formerly a large ſhare in that temporal glory, which conſiſts in cultivating ſciences; for they flouriſhed under the empire of the Saracens with great luſtre (76); who then had fine Wits, good Poets, great Philoſophers, famous Aſtronomers, and renowned Phyſicians; to ſay nothing of ſeveral califs, who acquired a very great reputation by their moral qualities, and thoſe peaceable virtues, which are no leſs valuable than the military virtues. There is therefore no kind of temporal proſperity, wherewith that ſect has not been favoured in a very diſtinguiſhing manner.

(b) Confer quæ supra, remark [D] of the article GREGORY I. (i) Except, if you will, the good offices which Chadigha did him, at the beginning, as I have noted above.

I have ſaid, That it would not be very ſafe to leave it to be tried by our morals, whether the Chriſtian be the true religion. This requires ſome explanation. I do not pretend, that Chriſtians are more irregular, as to their morals, than the Infidels; but I dare not affirm that they are leſs. The relations of travellers do not agree in this; for ſome of them very much commend the probity, charity, and devotion, of the Turks. and repreſent the Turkiſh women as patterns of modeſty. There are alſo ſome, who ſpeak very ill of the morals of that nation. Hottinger quotes an author, who admires the virtue of the Turkiſh women, and oppoſes it to the behaviour of the Chriſtian. 'Certe 'mihi magna admiratio oritur quando honeſtatem 'quam vidi in fœmineo ſexu inter Turcos conſidero, '& impudiciſſimos, improbos & damnatos mores fœ-'minarum inter Chriſtianos conſpicio (77). - - - I 'cannot help being greatly ſurprized, when I conſider the 'modeſt behaviour of the women in Turkey, and the im- 'pudent and ſcandalous conduct of the Chriſtian women.' The Turkiſh women never ſhew their face, go abroad but little, and account it a diſgrace to ride on horſeback. The diſcourſe, which a huſband holds with his wife, in his own houſe, is ſo modeſt, that nothing of ſenſuality is to be obſerved in it, no more than in her countenance. Etiam in domibus propriis viri cum uxore nunquam in actibus & motibus vel collocutione minimum indicium laſciviæ vel inhoneſtatis deprehendi poteſt (78). Sir John Chardin informs us, that, in Perſia, they marry without ſeeing one another; 'and that a man does 'not not ſee his wife, till he has conſummated the 'marriage, which he many times does not till ſome 'days after he has brought her home; for the woman 'ſhuns him, and hides herſelf among the women, 'being unwilling to let her huſband do it. Theſe 'things happen often among perſons of quality; be-'cauſe, in their opinion, it favours of leudneſs in a 'woman to grant the man ſo ſoon the laſt favour. 'The maids of the blood-royal more eſpecially behave 'thus, and ſome months paſs before they can be 'brought to ſubmit (79).' He ſpeaks quite otherwiſe of the Georgians, who make profeſſion of Chriſtianity; for after he has ſaid that the men of that country have all the faults imaginable; he adds, 'The women 'are no leſs vicious, nor leſs wicked; they are eaſily 'overcome by the men, and have certainly a larger 'ſhare, than they, in this torment of impurity, which 'overflows all their country (80).' The author, quoted by Hottinger, no leſs extols the morals of the Turks above thoſe of the Chriſtians, than the behaviour of the Turkiſh women above that of the Chriſtian women (81). Other relations accuſe the Turks of extream leudneſs, and do not forget the multitude of their concubines, which they buy in the market, and whom they ſearch, and feel all over their bodies, before they agree upon the price (82), juſt as the Butchers do, when they buy beaſts. 'Vere ut Pius II. (lib. i, 'Epiſt. cxxxi, & Boſkhierus ex eodem Philip. X, 'pag. 362.) de Turcis ſcripſerit, eſſe populum lam- 'bentem, fellatorem Leſbiatorem, fœminarum omnium 'concubitum

(70) See the article ABDERAME.

(71) See the following article, remark [D].

(72) Sallust. in Bell. Catilin. pag. m. 14.

(73) See the following article, remark [D].

(74) Thomas Burnet, de ruinis Germaniæ.

(75) See the Thoughts upon Comets, num. 141.

(76) See the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Hottinger.

(77) Septem-Caſtrenſis, cap. xii. apud Hotting. Hiſt. Oriental. pag. 311. Septem-Caſtrenſis, is a Monk, who was a long time priſoner among the Turks.

(78) Id. ib.

(79) News from the Republic of Letters, October 1686. p. 1139. in the extract of the voyages of Sir John Chardin.

(80) Ibid. pag. 1129.

(81) Septem-Caſtrenſis de Turcarum moribus, cap. viii, pag. 38. apud Hotting. ibid. pag. 304.

(82) Compare the citation from Suetonius, in citation (64) of the article FULVIA.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

fair ſex in his intereſts (2). He believed, that the valour of his troops would be ſufficient ‘ concubitum guſtantem & delibantem, addimus & verè ‘ fornicatorium, utpote, qui non tantum Virginis vio- ‘ lant (ſcribente Bartholomæo Georgieviz) (cap. vi, ‘ & vii.) etiam ante ora patrum, ſed etiam maſculos ‘ captivos, indomitæ libidinis hi homines ſibi ſub- ‘ ſternunt (Boſkhier. pag. 61, & 89.) In foro vena- ‘ les, nudoſque exponunt viros fœminaſque, videndos ‘ & coram omnibus contrectandos, etiam quà pudor ‘ naturæ debetur, nudos currere, ſaltare jubent, quò ‘ vitia, ſexus, ætas, corruptio vel integritas appa- ‘ reant (83). - - - - - It is true, what Pius II (and ‘ Boſkhierus) has written concerning the Turks, that they ‘ are a people addicted to ſodomitical practices, and ‘ that they lie with every woman they meet: to which ‘ may be added, that they not only deflower virgins (as ‘ Bartholomew Georgieviz writes), even in the ſight of ‘ their fathers, but theſe men of ourageous luſt abuſe the ‘ male captives they take. They expoſe to ſale in the ‘ markets men and women naked, to be ſeen and handled ‘ publickly, even where nature requires modeſty: beſides, ‘ they command them to run naked, and leap, to ſhew ‘ their faults, their ſex, their age, their perfections and ‘ defects.’ Thus a Pope accuſes the Turks of many leud actions: but what the Catholic writers have writ- ten of the court of Rome, and what may be writ- ten of many Chriſtian nations, is no better; inſomuch that one may affirm in general, that Chriſtians and Infidels cannot juſtly reproach each other; and, if there be any difference between them, as to their bad morals, that the difference of the climate is rather the cauſe of it, than the diverſity of religion.

(83) Cornelius Uythagius, in Anti-chriſto Ma- homete, p. 276.

[2] He did not engage the fair ſex in his intereſts.] The permiſſion he granted to men to have many wives, and to whip them, when they were not obedient (84), and to divorce them upon any diſlike (85), was a law very prejudicial to the female ſex. He took care to deny women the liberty of having many men, neither would he allow them to quit their huſbands, though troubleſome, without their conſent (86). He ordained, that a woman divorced ſhould marry again but twice; and that, if ſhe was divorced from the third huſband, and the firſt would not take her again, ſhe ſhould never marry all her life-time (87). He was ſo far from permitting them to ſhow their breaſts, or even their neck, that he would not ſuffer their feet to be ſeen, but only by their huſband. Mulieres itaque bonæ ſe curent, ne lunaticum aſpiciant, ſuoque peplo tegentes col- lum & pectus, omnemque ſuam pulchritudinem, niſi quan- tum apparere neceſſitas coget, celent omnibus, ſpeciemque pe- dum etiam eundo, niſi maritis ſuis (88). But it is true, that in this, he only retained the cuſtom obſerved in Arabia; for we learn from Tertullian, that the women of that country did thus cover their faces, ſo that they could make uſe of but one eye. ‘ Judicabunt vos ‘ Arabiæ fœminæ Ethnicæ, quæ non caput, ſed faciem ‘ quoque ita totam tegunt, ut uno oculo liberato con- ‘ tente ſint dimidiam frui lucem quàm totam faciem ‘ proſtituere (89). - - - - - The Pagan women of Arabia ‘ ſhall judge you; for they cover, not their head only, ‘ but their whole face, in ſuch a manner, that, with ‘ one eye only at liberty, they chuſe rather to enjoy but ‘ half the light, than expoſe their whole face to view.’ I believe it is a miſtake (90) to ſay, that Mahomet permitted men to marry as many women as they would; for he does ſo moderate and limit his permiſſion, that it plainly appears he had no mind they ſhould marry above four, and that he allowed them ſo many provided they thought themſelves capable of keeping them peaceable. Quotcunque placuerit, duas ſcilicet, aut tres vel quatuor uxores ducite, niſi timueritis eas pacificare poſſe (91). But it is no miſtake to affirm, that he ſet no bounds to the number of their concu- bines. And indeed the Turks may have as many as they are capable of maintaining. Is not the condi- tion of the four wives deplorable, under a law which gives the huſband power to divert what is their due to as many handſome ſlaves as he can buy. Doth not this diverſion of the matrimonial ſtock reduce them to the greateſt want, and to an extreme indigence. Let no one tell me of the proviſion the law has made for them, by appointing the four wives to lie once every week with their huſband. ‘ So that if any one has not enjoyed this privilege ‘ for a whole week ſhe has a right to demand it on ‘ thurſday night in the following week, and ſhe may ‘ proſecute her huſband, in the courts of juſtice, in ‘ caſe of a refuſal (92).’ For notwithſtanding this privilege, the law is very harſh, a law, I ſay, which reduces that to a ſmall proportion, which would ſcarce ſuffice, if it were entire, and which may ſo eaſily be broke through. A fine ſatisfaction indeed for the party offended; to obtain one ſingle night in return for a week loſt, beſides the trouble of citing him before the judges, and engaging in a proſecution ſo nice, and ſo contra- ry to modeſty. And what pleaſure can any one take in a matter of this nature, when it is obtained only by the execution of a ſentence from the magiſtrate? This ought not to be a work that is commanded, nihil hæc ad edictum Prætoris: when it is done only by way of duty, perfunctoriè, & dicis cauſa, there can be no great ſatisfaction in it. We muſt therefore confeſs, that Mahomet did not uſe the ſex well.

(84) Quæ ſi forte præcepta non obſervaverint, à vobis correctæ & caſtigatæ, in domibus lectiſve detentæ verbe- rentur, uſque quo veſtris nutibus & præceptis pareant. Alcor. Surat. 9.

(85) Quando il- læ non amplius tibi placent, com- mutare eas licet. Ib. Surat. 8.

(86) Mulier ad fugam ſe præpa- rans invito mari- to recuperetur ab eo. Ib. Surat. 3.

(87) Ibid.

(88) Ibid. Surat. 34.

(89) Tertul. de Virginibus velan- dis.

(90) See Ricaut's State of the Otto- man Empire, lib. ii, chap. xxi, and the notes of Beſnier.

(91) Alcor. Su- rat. 3.

(92) Ricaut. ib. pag. 457.

But, here follow more ſtrange things: for he did not only make women miſerable in this world, but deprived them of the joys of paradiſe. He did not only exclude them from that place, but he turned that joy into an occaſion of ſorrow to them: for it is pre- tended, he taught, that the pleaſures of marriage, which men ſhall enjoy after this life, ſhall be furniſhed them by Virgins of a raviſhing beauty, which God has created in heaven, and which are deſtined for them from eternity: and as to women, that they ſhall not enter into paradiſe, nor approach nearer to it, than is neceſſary to diſcover, a-croſs the paliſades, what ſhall be done there. Thus their eyes ſhall be witneſſes of the happineſs of men, and of the pleaſure they ſhall take with theſe celeſtial maids. What can be ima- gined more grievous? Is not this to be ingenious in mortifying our neighbour: Lucretius tells us, that it is pleaſant to ſee a ſhipwreck, which we are not in fear of.

Suave mari magno turbantibus æquora ventis,
E terra, magnum alterius ſpectare laborem.
Non quia vexari quemquam eſt jucunda voluptas;
Sed quibus ipſe malis careas, quia cernere ſuave eſt (93).

(93) Lucret. lib. II, init.

'Tis pleaſant, when the ſeas are rough, to ſtand,
And view another's danger, ſafe at land,
Not that it gives us joy his pains to ſee,
But to behold thoſe ills, from which our ſelves are free (94).

(94) See Sentimens de Cleanthe, pag. m. 36.

It is quite the reverſe, in Mahomet's ſyſtem, for the wo- men; the ſight of a happineſs, of which they are depriv- ed muſt needs afflict them, and it will be ſo much the more grievous to them, as well becauſe it will diſco- ver the pleaſures, which another enjoys, as becauſe they will ſee the happineſs, which they themſelves want; for the torment of jealouſy proceeds not ſo much from the want of a thing, as from knowing that others enjoy it. I have heard many people ſay, and I think I have even read it, that the damned ſhall have a very exact idea of the happineſs of paradiſe, that ſo the knowledge of the great joys, which they have miſſed, may augment their deſpair, and that the devil ſhall make uſe of this artifice, to render them more miſerable. Here we may apply theſe verſes of Perſius,

Magne pater Divûm, ſævos punire Tyrannos
Haud aliâ ratione velis, cùm dira libido
Moverit ingenium, ferventi tincta veneno:
Virtutem videant, intabeſcantque relictâ (95).

(95) Perſius, Sat. III, ver. 36.

Great father of the gods, when, for our crimes,
Thou ſend'ſt ſome heavy judgment on the times;
Some tyrant king, the terror of his age,
The type and true vicegerent of thy rage;
Thus puniſh him: ſet virtue in his ſight,
With all her charms adorn'd with all her graces bright:
But ſet her diſtant, make him pale to ſee
His gains outweigh'd by loſt felicity!

DRYDEN.

This is to underſtand very well the way of heightning the pains of the miſerable: and therefore we may ſay

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sufficient to his purpose. Perhaps he feared the Persian women [R], because he intended to establish a Code full of severity towards the women. Nevertheless, he had a most violent desire to enjoy them, and some very notable things are related of his vigour in this respect [S]. His lewdness was doubtless the cause why he permitted Polygamy under some say in a word, that Mahomet could not have discovered his cruelty more maliciously; for he would have women see, at a distance, that which can only create unprofitable temptations, and insupportable grief.

But, to represent the matter as it really is, I must acquaint you, that the learned Mahometans do not say, that the women are excluded from paradise (96); yet I thought I might relate what I had read in many authors. I shall cite one of them. 'Hasce mu-

(96) See the article HALIBEG, remark [C].

'lieres statuunt non humanas atque ex hominibus genitas, sed ab æterno in hunc finem à Deo creatas, '& cœlestes esse; suas enim quas hic habuerunt Mu-'hammedani mulieres statuunt exsortes fore Paradisi, 'atque extra eum foris constitutas, per cancellos e-'minus virorum gaudia, & cum aliis sc. uxoribus 'congressus conspecturas. Longe plures ibi credunt 'fore mulieres, quam viros, singulisque viris plures vel 'pauciores pro merito addendas, quibus non ad pro-'lem, sed unice ad lubitum & satietatem voluptatis 'usuri sint; quin & vires iis submINistrandas majores 'eum in finem, ut sæpius coire possint, easque eun-'dem in finem fore mundas à menstruis (97). - - - - -

(97) Hoornbeek, Summa Controver. pag. 175.

'They pretend, that these women are not human, or born 'of men, but that they are of celestial race, and created 'from eternity for this purpose: for the Mahometans 'say, that the wives, which they had in this world, 'will not be admitted into paradise, but, being 'placed without, will see at a distance, thro' the pali-'sades, the pleasures their husbands take in the embraces 'of other wives. They believe, there will be many 'more women there than men; and that each man will 'have more or fewer in proportion to his merit; whom 'they will enjoy, not for the propagation of the species, 'but only for pleasure, and to satisfy their lust; and 'that their strength will be greater, for the sake of more 'frequent coition, and that the women for that end will 'be free from disorders.' This author quotes no body and had just before cited some passages of the Alcoran, which teach us only that the ladies of paradise shall have very sparkling eyes, of the bigness of an egg, and that they shall be so modest, that they shall never look upon any man but their own husbands (98). It is not therefore in the Alcoran, that we find what this author relates concerning these women; viz. that they shall be more numerous than men, that every man may have two or three, or more, proportionably to his merit; that they shall be given only for pleasure, and not for bearing of children; that they shall always be in a condition to satisfy their husbands, being never subject to the menstrual flux, as the Physicians call it; that they shall be so beautiful and bright, that one of them would be sufficient to illuminate the whole earth in the night-time, that if they were to spit into the sea, they would quite take away it's saltness. Tanta istarum puellarum deprædicatur pulchritudo & gratia, ut si istarum modo una aliquando noctu in terrâ appareret, totam eam facile esset collustratura; vel si in mare forte dispueret, totam ejus salsedinem extingueret, inque mel dulcissimum commutaret (99). I have met with part of these things in a letter of Clenard; but this is only the opinion of a private person, and so this cannot be justly charged upon the whole body of Mahometism. 'Audi quæso, they are the words of Clenard, quod 'hic mihi narravit præceptor dum legeremus locum 'Alcorani de Paradiso, ubi sic scriptum est, & eo ux-'ores habituri sunt mundas. Mundas inquit, id est, 'liberas à menstruis, scilicet ut quovis tempore liceat 'coire. Quid inquam, an in paradiso celebrabuntur 'nuptialia? Quid ni? Attamen non est futura proles, 'inquit. Nam voluptatis causa illic erunt uxores 'non propagandis liberis, quin & singulis viris complu-'res illic futuræ sunt uxores, pro meritorum ratione. 'Deusque huic plus, illi minus virium largiturus est, 'ut vel paucis vel multis reddat debitum (100). - - - 'Hear, I pray you, what my tutor told me, whilst we 'were reading the part of the Alcoran, relating to Pa-'radise, where it is written; and there they will have 'wives that are clean. Clean, said he, that is free 'from the menses, for the sake of coition at any 'time. What, said I, will they marry in Paradise? 'Why not? But no off-spring will follow it; said 'he. For wives there will be intended for pleasure, 'not for propagation; and every man will have ma-'ny wives, in proportion to his merit. And God 'will give this man more, and that less, strength, 'for the satisfying of more or fewer women.' Let us make the same remark as to what I am going to say. We ought not to impute it to Mahomet, as Peter Belonius does. They are fables, or false glosses, of some visionary or burlesquing doctors. 'After 'the Turks have eaten and drunk their fill in this 'Paradise, then the pages, being adorned with gold 'and precious stones, and rings upon their arms, hands, 'legs and ears, shall come to the Turks, each of them 'holding a handsome dish in his hand, with a great 'citron or lemon in it, which the Turks shall take, 'to smell to; and, on a sudden, when each Turk 'shall put it to his nose, there shall come forth a 'beautiful virgin, well accoutred and adorned, who 'shall embrace the Turk, as the Turk shall do her; 'and thus they shall remain fifty years in mutual em-'braces, without stirring, or parting from each other 'taking all sorts of pleasure, that a man can enjoy 'with a woman. And after fifty years, God will 'say unto them, (oh my servants) since you have 'had great feasting in my Paradise, I will now show 'you my face. Then he shall take away the veil from 'his face; but the Turks shall be struck to the ground 'by the brightness that shall proceed from it; and 'God shall say unto them: arise, you my servants, 'and enjoy my glory? for you shall never die, nor 'be sad, or displeased any more. And lifting up their 'heads, they shall see God face to face; and then 'every one, taking his virgin again, shall lead her 'into a chamber in the palace, where he shall find 'meat and drink; and having feasted, and taken his 'pleasure with his virgin, he shall pass away his time 'merrily, without any fear of death. This is what 'Mahomet has related of his Paradise, with several 'other such like fooleries; which makes us think, 'that the original of the Turkish seraglio's is de-'rived from what Mahomet says of the pages and vir-'gins of Paradise: for he says, that the chast virgins 'were thus created by God in Paradise, and are 'well guarded, and shut up within walls. And Ma-'homet says, that if one of them should go forth 'out of the seraglio of Paradise at midnight, she would 'enlighten the whole world like the sun, and if one 'of them should spit into the sea, the water of it 'would become as sweet as honey (101).

(98) Fruentur feminis quibus orbi clarissimi gratulabitur ova, quæ non ad alios eam maritos ferre queant. Sura. 48. Decori virgines decentissimas cum oculis immensis ædificandis nisquam nisi tantum ad maritos suos deflendis. Sura. 62.

(99) Hoornbeek, ubi supra.

(100) Clenard, Epistol. lib. i, pag. 42.

(101) Peter Belonius, ubi infra, book iii, ch. ix, pag. 392.

[R] He feared the Persian women.] A modern author (102), without quoting any body, informs me, that this seducer confessed, 'that the sole apprehen-'sion of the women of Persia was the cause that he 'did not go into that country, since they were so 'full of charms, that the angels themselves might 'fall in love with, and be overcome by them.' Probably he feared, lest they should regulate his pen, and his pretended revelations, and make him publish laws too effeminate (103), which would have very much decried him; for he was very sensible, that his unchast actions gave great scandal. See the margin (104).

(102) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter cxiv, Tom. xii, pag. 11, 12.

(103) That is, too favourable to the female sex, as it is said of some laws of Justinian, whose wife had very great credit.

(104) These words are to be found in Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. i, pag. 304. The Moors have an antient and common proverb, that their prophet Mahomet would never go to Seiras, lest, if he should see one of the beautiful women there, his soul should not enter into Paradise after his death.

[S] Some very notable things are related of his vigour in respect to women.] Authors do not agree as to the number of his wives; but it is pretty generally agreed, that he had several at a time, and that he performed his conjugal duty with great vigour (105). 'You may 'see in Abul-faragius, that he had, according to some, 'to the number of seventeen wives, besides mistresses 'which he kept . . . . (106) It will not be very dif-'ficult to believe him (107) a saint in their way, when 'you know, that he married but fourteen wives; and 'that this great devotion was little more than three 'degrees below that of Mahomet, who had seventeen 'wives, besides mistresses, who were overjoyed to con-'tribute to the diversion of their great Prophet. It 'is true, that Ali was less vigorous than his father-'in-law, who boasted, that he performed marriage-'duties every night, and that he had received, by 'special privilege, the strength of forty men, on that 'occasion.' Let us see Mr Bespier's note upon what Sir Paul Ricaut has said (108), that Mahomet had nine wives,

(105) Chevreau's History of the World, lib. v, pag. m. 14.

(106) Ibid. pag. 19.

(107) That is, Ali.

(108) The Present State of the Ottoman Empire, Tom. ii, p. 456.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google some reſtraints, and concubinage without any bounds (k). He durſt not be the only perſon, who ſhould enjoy that privilege, though, as to Inceſt, he had the boldneſs to forbid it to his followers, and to allow it to himſelf by a ſpecial privilege [T]. Mr Moreri relates wives, and Ali fourteen. 'John Andreas, in the ſame 'page, at the beginning of chap. vii, of the confu- 'ſion of the ſect of Mahomet, ſays, that Mahomet 'had nine wives at once, beſides ſlaves; and in the ſame 'place he ſays, that he had eleven wives, and proves 'it by a book, which he calls Aſſameil, which is, ſays 'he, the book of the good cuſtoms of Mahomet (109).' The words, which John Andreas cites out of this book, ſignify, that Mahomet was a man of ſo great vigour, that in an hour's time he could know his eleven wives. Robur ejus, ſuper eum pax, tantum erat ut viſitaret (circumiret) uxores ſuas unius horæ ſpatio, licèt undecim forent. Baudier (110) has given Mahomet fifteen wives, beſides ſlaves. Elmacin ſpeaks only of three wives of Mahomet; but he omits the firſt, who was dead before he married the other three. 'I believe, there is no 'certainty, ſays Beſpier, as to the number of Maho- 'met's wives, and much leſs as to Ali's, of whom I 'have not read to this day, that he married any other 'wife beſides the only daughter of Mahomet, called 'Fatima (111).' Mr Pfeiffer relates, that this falſe Prophet took ſeventeen wives according to ſome, and twenty one according to others (112). This would not be very ſtrange; but what Belon relates, and I have already mentioned, is extraordinary. 'It is written 'in an Arabian book, ſays he (113), intituled, The 'Good Cuſtoms of Mahomet, which praiſes his vir- 'tues and his bodily ſtrength, that he boaſted of lying 'with eleven women, one after another, in one and 'the ſame hour (114).' Many here will call to mind Brother Fredon of Rabelais (115). I know not what to think of the tale, that Mahomet had to do with his aſs. 'Turcarum Legiſlator Mahumetes aſellam 'qua vehebatur ex indomito libidinis ardore com- 'preſſit (116). - - - Mahomet, the legiſlator of the Turks, through an immoderate luſt, lay with a ſhe-aſs, which he rode on.'

(k) See the remark [Q].

(109) Beſpier's Curious Remarks, Tom. ii, pag. 681.

(110) Of the religion of the Turks, book i, ch. ii, apud Beſpier, ibid. pag. 682.

(111) Beſpier, ib.

(112) Pfeiffer, in Theologiæ Mohammedicæ principiis ſubleſtis, in the Bibliotheque Univerſelle. Tom. vii, pag. 257.

(113) Belon's Obſervations of many Rarities; book iii, ch. x, pag. m. 404, and not in ch. ix, as la Mothe le Vayer cites him, Letter xc, pag. 272, of Tom. xi.

(114) See the remark [II].

(115) By the oath you have taken, how many times do you commonly do it in a day? Fr. Six. Pan. and how oft by night? Fr. 10. Says brother John, this whore-maſter counts it ſhameful to exceed ſixteen times. Rabelais lib. v, cap. xxviii.

(116) Balthaſar Bonifacius, Hiſt. Ludicra lib. ii, cap. vii, pag. 39. He cites Bonfinius deciſ. (probably he means decad.) i, lib. viii.

[T] He durſt not be the only perſon, who ſhould enjoy that privilege; though as to inceſt, he had the boldneſs . . . . to allow it to himſelf by a ſpecial privilege.] To colour his incontinence, which moved him to marry ſeveral wives, he forged a revelation from God, that this was allowed. He muſt therefore inſert this article in his Alcoran; but becauſe his ſervant-maids pleaſed him, and he lay with them, therefore he ſtood in need of a new revelation in favour of adultery; and ſo it was neceſſary he ſhould make a diſtinct article of the concubinage of huſbands. He had but two wives, when Marina, his ſervant-maid, a very pretty laſs, pleaſed him ſo well, that he lay with her, before ſhe came to a marriageable age. His wives ſurpriſed him in the very fact, and were tranſported with rage againſt him. He ſwore to them, that he would never return to her any more if they would keep it ſecret; but, becauſe he broke his oath, they made a great noiſe, and went away from his houſe. To remove this great ſcandal, he feigned a voice from heaven, which informed him that it was lawful for him to have to do with his ſervant-maids. Thus this impoſtor begun with committing a crime, and finiſhed with converting it into a general law. This does not at all ſavour of Fanaticiſm. A good touch-ſtone to diſcover whether thoſe who boaſt of inſpiration, either to give out new prophecies, or to explain the old, ſuch as the Apocalypſe, act ſincerely, is, to examine whether their doctrine changes proportionably as the times change, and as their own peculiar intereſt becomes different from what it was before (117). Id quoque notandum (I make uſe of the authority of a famous Divine (118), leges iſtas in ſuorum facinorum patrocinium excogitatas ab ipſo ſemper fuiſſe poſt commiſſa illa, non ante; ut ita manifeſtiſſimè ſequeatur, iſta in criminum ſuorum excuſationem vel defenſionem ab eo commenta dolo peſſimo fuiſſe. (119) Tale iſtud quod de Muhammede narrant, eum cum puellâ formoſâ, ſed infra ætatem, Marinâ in adulterio deprehenſum fuiſſe, à conjugibus ſuis Aaſâ & Chadighâ juramento adactum promiſiſſe, modo tacerent, ab iſthac puellâ poſthac abſtenturum; verum quod non ſervarit: quare illæ eum deſeruerint, & ad patrias reverſæ ſint ædes. Quem tumultum ut ſedaret iterum, more ſolito, divinum commentus hoc reſponſum fuit, quod eſt capi de prohibitione, quo datur viris cum ancillis congrediendi poteſtas (ancilla quippe Muhammedis erat etiam illa Marina), quandò & quouſque libuerit, nequidquam recidmantibus & æmulantibus uxoribus. Sed jam ante hanc confictam legem id facinus commiſerat, & fidem de non committendo interpoſuerat, perjurus adulter & ſtuprator (120). With an impudence, that cannot be ſufficiently admired, he forged, that God forbid inceſt to other men, but allowed it him by a peculiar grace. 'Aliis ſe- 'vere ipſe interdicit, cap. de mulieribus, ne quaſcunque '& conſanguineas ducant; ne commiſceamini cum mu- 'lieribus, quæ cognitæ fuerunt à Patribus veſtris, quo- 'niam turpe eſt & malum, & iniquum: prohibitæ ſunt 'vobis matres veſtræ, & filiæ veſtræ, & amitæ veſtræ, '& patrueles veſtræ, & filiæ fratris veſtri, & filiæ ſo- 'roris veſtræ, &c. Sibi vero licentiam tribuit quaſi ex 'oraculo divino, quam libet potiundi, cap. de hæreſibus, 'vel ſectis. O Propheta, nos certe concedimus tibi, in- 'quit ei Deus, poteſtatem in uxores tuas omnes quibus de- 'deriſ mercedes ſuas, & quaſcunque acceperit manus tua, '& filias patrui tui, & filias amitæ tuæ, & filias fratris 'matris tuæ, & filias materteræ tuæ, quæ peregrinatæ 'ſunt tecum, & quamcunque mulierem credentem, quæ ſe 'tibi Prophetæ proſtituere voluerit, idque tibi ſpeciatim, '& ſingulariter conceditur; non verò aliis quibuſcunque. Dignum certe Prophetâ privilegium! Et poſt: copu- 'lare cum quacunque ex illis tibi libuerit, & tecum 'fac inhabitare quamcunque voluerit; & non erit tibi 'crimini, vel ad hanc accedere, vel ab illa recedere. 'Hoc autem parum eſt: verum etiam gratum habeant 'ipſæ quicquid tibi libuerit, & non contriſtentur, & 'complaceant ſibi de quacunque re quam illis dederis. Propudium hominis! ſibi primas in promiſcuâ & tur- piſſimâ libidine explendâ concedens partes (121). '- - - He forbids others, under ſevere penalties, in his chapter of women, to marry within the degrees of conſanguinity: mix not with women, which have been 'known by your fathers, becauſe it is baſe, evil, and 'unjuſt: your mothers, your daughters, your aunts, 'and couſins, are forbidden you, &c. But he in- 'dulges himſelf in the enjoyment of any one, as it were by 'authority from heaven, in his chapter of hereſies or 'ſects. O Prophet, ſays God, to him, we give thee 'power over all thy wives, to whom thou ſhalt pay 'their hire, and whomſoever thou ſhalt take unto 'thee, whether they be the daughters of thy uncle, 'or the daughters of thy aunt, or the daughters of 'thy mother's brother, or the daughters of thy 'mother-in-law, which have journied with thee, and 'every woman, that is a believer, and is willing to 'proſtitute herſelf to thee a prophet: and this privi- 'lege is granted to thee in a ſpecial and peculiar 'manner; but not to other men. A privilege wor- 'thy the prophet! And after: you may lie with what 'woman you pleaſe, and make whom you pleaſe co- 'habit with you; and it ſhall be no crime in you, 'to approach this woman, or depart from that; and 'let them not lay it to heart, but be contented with 'what you ſhall give them. Incontinent, ſhameleſs, 'wretch! to indulge himſelf principally in ſatisfying a 'promiſcuous and moſt ſcandalous luſt!' He durſt not always ſtretch his prerogative, for he ſaid, he was forbid, for the future, to take away his neighbour's wife. He was contented to tell the world, that God approved what was paſt, provided he did not relapſe into it again. For the better underſtanding of this, we muſt know, that Mahomet had already married nine wives, and then eſpouſed a tenth, which he took from his ſervant. They murmured at it. The ſervant exclaimed againſt the injury. The falſe prophet, to put a ſtop to the ſcandal, made a ſhew of deſiring to reſtore what he had taken; but, becauſe he had not really a mind to it, he quickly found out a way to diſpenſe with it. He feigned, that God had cenſured this reſolution, and had ordered him to keep his tenth wife, without paying any deference to human ſcandal, to the prejudice of a celeſtial approbation. 'Illam (uxorem ſervi ſui Zaidis) conſtupratam 'mox quaſi ex divino iterum oraculo deſponſavit in 'uxorem, quamvis novem aliis ſtipatus. Quare ut, 'tum aliis hoc indignantibus factum, tum ſervo Zaidi 'ſatisfaceret, introducit in Alkorano, capite citato, 'Deum ſe reprehendentem, quod cogitaſſet uxorem

(117) See the remark [NN].

(118) Hoornbeck, ubi ſupra, pag. 117.

(119) Id. ib. pag. 118.

(120) The author refers us to John Andreas, Confuſ. Muham. cap. vii, to Philip Guadagnol, contra Abmedum Perſam, cap. v, ſect. iii, & cap. x, ſect. ii, & iii, and to Vincentius Lirinenſis, Specul. Hiſtor. lib. xxiv. He ſhould have ſaid Vincentius Bellovacenſis.

(121) Hoornbeck, ubi ſupra, pag. 116.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

relates a ſtory, to which he forgot to add an eſſential circumſtance, which is, concerning the man that was ſmothered with ſtones in a dry well [U]. One of the moſt impertinent lyes, that have been publiſhed concerning Mahomet, is, that he was a cardinal [X]. There are ſome Doctors, even in the communion of the Proteſtants, who have taken him for Anti-chriſt [Y]. I cannot believe, that his dead body was eaten by dogs

'Zaido reddere, ob offenſam, quam hinc nempe homines capiebant: Et cum diceres illi, cui Deus beneficia contulit, & tu quoque contuliſti: accipe tibi uxorem tuam, & time Deum, & abſcondebas in corde tuo quod Deus operebatur, & timebas homines, & Deus dignior eſt ut timeas eum. Cum ergo Zaidus illam cognoverit, ſeu deſtraverit eam, nos copulavimus eam tibi, ne ſit fidelibus peccatum in uxoribus deſideriorum eorum, cum cognoverint eas, & imperium Dei completum eſt: non eſt imputandum ad culpam prophetæ illud, quod Deus illi ſpeciatim permiſit (122). - - Having debauched the wife of his man Zaid, he afterwards married her, pretending a divine command, tho' he had already nine wives. Wherefore, to ſatisfy others, who murmured at the action, as well as his ſervant Zaid, he introduces God, in the ſame chapter of the Alcoran, reproving him for intending to reſtore to Zaid his wife, becauſe of the ſcandal it gave the world. And when you ſay to him, on whom God hath beſtowed favours, you have alſo beſtowed them: take unto you your wife, and fear God; and you hid in your heart what God wrought, and you had reſpect unto men, and God is more worthy to be reſpected. Since therefore Zaid has known, or deflowered her, we have joined her unto you, leſt the faithful ſhould ſin in the wives of their deſires, when they ſhall know them, and the will of God is fulfilled: what God has eſpecially granted to the prophet, is not to be imputed to him as a crime.' He was very ſenſible, this would alarm all huſbands againſt him; and therefore, to ſatisfy every body, he publiſhed, that, for the future, by the order of God, he would let huſbands enjoy their own wives, tho' he ſhould fall in love with them (123).

(122) M. Ib. pag. 117.

(123) Not for the future, O Muſſulmans, ut ſuperiùs notatum eſt, edicimus vobis, etiamſi eorum pulchritudo excæcatus fuerit. Apud eundem, ib.

[U] A man . . . was ſmothered with ſtones in a dry well.] This ſtory is found at the end of a long paſſage of the Coups d'Etat, which I ſhall now cite, and which contains ſeveral things concerning our falſe prophet (124). 'Finding himſelf very ſubject to the 'Falling-ſickneſs, he made his friends believe, that 'the moſt violent paroxyſms of his Epilepſy were ſo 'many ecſtaſies, and ſigns of the ſpirit of God, that 'deſcended on him: he perſuaded them alſo, that a 'white pigeon, which came to pick grains of corn 'in his ear, was the angel Gabriel, who came to 'declare to him, in the name of the ſame God, 'what he was to do. After this, he made uſe of the 'monk Sergius, to compoſe an Alcoran, which he feigned 'to be dictated to him by the very mouth of God. 'Laſtly, he ſent for a famous Aſtrologer, to diſpoſe the 'people, by his predictions, to the change of affairs, that was to happen, and the new law, that 'a great prophet was to eſtabliſh, the more eaſily to 'receive his, when he came to publiſh it. But perceiving once, that his ſecretary, Abdala Ben-Salon, 'againſt whom he had a groundleſs pique, began to 'diſcover, and publiſh ſuch impoſtures, he cut his 'throat one night in his own houſe, and ſet fire to 'the four corners of it, with a deſign to perſuade 'the people, next morning, that this happened by a 'fire from heaven, to chaſtiſe the ſaid ſecretary, 'who had attempted to change and corrupt ſome 'paſſages of the Alcoran. Nevertheleſs, this contrivance was not thought ſufficient to his purpoſe, 'he wanted ſtill one to perfect the myſtery; which 'he did, by perſuading one of his faithfulleſt domeſtics, to deſcend to the bottom of a pit, which was 'near a great high-way, and to cry aloud, when he 'ſhould paſs by in company of the great multitude 'which commonly followed him, Mahomet is the 'well-beloved of God! Mahomet is the well-beloved 'of God! And this being done in the manner he 'had propoſed, he preſently thanked the Divine 'Goodneſs for a teſtimony ſo remarkable, and 'prayed all the people, that followed him, inſtantly to fill up the pit, and build over it a little 'moſque, in memory of ſuch a miracle; by which 'means this poor domeſtic was preſently killed, and 'buried under a ſhower of ſtones; and ſo there was 'no poſſible way left of diſcovering the falſhood of 'this miracle, Excepit ſed terra ſonum, calamique lo-'quaces (125).' Naudé forgot to tell us, how the public was informed, that Mahomet had ſuborned this man. Why had he not the wit to ſuppoſe, that this wretch had revealed the whole ſecret to his wife, who did not fail to tell her neighbours, and paſſengers, after ſhe was made acquainted with the tragical end of her huſband. The Latin words, which Naudé cites, are only an ingenious application of a circumſtance of the fable of Midas; but it no ways clears this matter, nay rather it inſinuates, that he was not able to find out how this contrivance came to be diſcovered. As to the pigeon, mentioned by Naudé, I muſt inform you, that Dr Pocock, having read the ſtory in the 6th book of Grotius, de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ (126), deſired Grotius to acquaint him from whence he had taken that particular, which is not be found in any Arabian author. He anſwered, that he had related it only upon the credit of the Chriſtian authors. Grotius nonnulla recenſens columbæ ad Mohammedis aurem advolare ſolitæ meminit; cujus cum nullam apud eos mentionem repererim, ac clariſ. virum ea de re conſulerem, ſe in hoc narrando non Mohammediſtarum, ſed noſtrorum hominum fide nixum, dixit, ac præcipuè Scaligeri, in cujus ad Manilium notis idem narratur (127). See the remark [DD].

(124) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, cap. iii, pag. m. 32.

(125) The Hiſtory of this man, who was ſmothered with ſtones in a well, is to be found in another book of Naudé, viz. in the Apology of the Great Men accuſed of Magic, pag. 232, 233.

(126) Pag. m. 202.

(127) Edw. Pocockius, Not. in Specim. Hiſtor. Arabum, pag. 186, 187.

[X] It has been ſaid, that he was a cardinal.] 'Benevenuto of Imola has ſaid it expreſsly, in his 'commentaries upon Dante (128).' Which is no leſs abſurd than what was ſaid by him, who wrote the gloſs upon the canon-law, that Mahomet was the head of the Nicolaitans. Gloſſatorem autem Corporis Canonici qui Nicolaum Mahometum fuiſſe dicit æque abſurdum eſſe notat ac Benevenutum Imolenſem, qui Mahometum Sanctæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ Cardinalem fuiſſe aſſerit (129).

(128) Naudé, Dial. de Maſcurat. pag. 45.

[Y] Some doctors have taken him for Antichriſt.] See a diſſertation, intituled, Anti-Chriſtus Mahometes, ubi non ſolum per S. Scripturam, ac Reformatorum teſtimonia, verum etiam per omnes alios probandi modos & genera, plenè, fusè, invictè, ſolidèque demonſtratur MAHOMETEM eſſe Unum illum verum, Magnum, de quo in ſacris fit mentio, Anti-Chriſtum. It was printed (130) in the year 1666. Cornelius Uythagius, a doctor of Divinity, who is the author of it, and diſcovers a great zeal againſt Popery, affirms, in his preface, that he only unfolds and confirms the opinion of ſome reformers. 'Sunt, ſemperque fuerunt, ſays he, qui Mahometem 'pro Anti-Chriſto illo magno agnoverunt, & per Babylonem civitatem illam magnam Apoc. cap. xvii. 'nobis deſcriptam, Conſtantinopolim, Romam Novam intellexerunt, inter quos ſunt, antiquiſſimus 'Theologorum Arethas Cæſareæ Cappadociæ Epiſcopus: Angelus Græcus, qui Conſtantinopli vixit: 'Cœlius Secundus Curio: Wenceſlaus Budowez Cæſaris conciliarius, qui aliquandiù Conſtantinopli degit: Boſkhierus; & inter noſtros Reformatus magnus ille Melanthon, Bucerus, Muſculus, Zanchius: '& ſi qui cum recentiores, tum antiqui cum illis. '- - - There are, and ever have been, thoſe, who have 'acknowledged Mahomet to be the Anti-Chriſt, and by 'Babylon, that great city deſcribed to us in the Revelation, 'ch. 17, have underſtood Conſtantinople, the New Rome: 'among whom are, the moſt antient of Divines Arethas 'biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, Angelus Græcus, who 'lived at Conſtantinople; Cœlius Secundus Curio, Wenceſlaus Budowez, counſellor of the Emperor, who 'lived ſome time at Conſtantinople; Boſkhierus; and 'among our reformed the great Melanchthon, Bucer, 'Muſculus, Zanchius; and other Divines, both antient 'and modern.' The biſhop of Meaux names other writers, who are of that opinion: his words are theſe: 'If every thing muſt be referred to the end of the 'world, and to the time of Antichriſt, would ſo many 'learned men of the laſt age, as Annius Viterbienſis, 'John Hantenius of Mechlen, and our doctors Jodocus 'Clitoveus, Genebrard, and Feuardentius, who praiſes and follows thoſe grave authors, have been permitted to diſcover the beaſt and Antichriſt in Ma-'homet, and Enoch and Elias to be the two witneſſes of St John (131)?'

(129) Thomas Ittigius, de Hæreſiarchis ævi Apoſtolici, apud Acta Erudit. Lipſ. ann. 1690, pag. 307, 308.

(130) At Amſterdam, apud Joannem Raveſteynium, in 12mo.

(131) Biſhop of Meaux, Preface upon the Apocalypſe, num. xiii, pag. m. 32, 33.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dogs [Z], as ſeveral have affirmed; and Father Loüis Maracci had juſt occaſion to obſerve, That the Chriſtians throw out ſome reproaches againſt the ſect of Mahomet, which proceed from ſo great an ignorance of matters of fact, that the infidels laugh at them, and grow more obſtinate in their infidelity (l). There has been publiſhed a Teſtament, under the name of Mahomet [AA], which has very much the air of a forgery:

(l) Eſſe etiam in illis dicit qui ex rerum Turcicarum ignorantia in medium proferant quæ riſum potius Mahumetanis excitent, ac in errore eos obſtinatiores reddant. Lud. Maraccius à congregatione Clericorum Regularium Matris Dei, in prodromo ad refutationem Alcorani, apud Acta Erudit. Lipſ. 1692, pag. 329.

[Z] I cannot believe that his dead body was eaten by dogs.] Camerarius has inſerted this ſtory in his Hiſtorical Meditations (132). He quotes his author. Mahomet had foretold to his diſciples, that he ſhould depart out of this world in the tenth year of his reign, but that on the third day he ſhould riſe again. Whereupon, one of his diſciples, having amind to try whether he ſpoke truth, poiſoned his drink; and he having drunk it off, and finding himſelf near his end, ſaid to thoſe that were about him, By water ye ſhall receive remiſſion of ſins; and then on a ſudden he died. His diſciples guarded the body, expecting the iſſue of his prediction; but it ſtunk ſo, that they could not endure the ſmell of it, and ſo they went away, and returning after ten days, they found it had been eaten by dogs. I was willing to tranſcribe this ſtory from the Spaniſh chronicle, written by John Vaſæus, who ſays, that he had it from an author called Lucas Tudenſis: becauſe I do not remember that I had read it elſewhere. I find in Vaſæus, that he relates this under the year 628, and cites Lucas Tudenſis, with ſome limitation; hæc fere Lucas Tudenſis, ſays he. Baronius has inſerted in his annals (133) a fragment of the apology of Eulogius, an author of the VIIIth century. There are in this fragment many little tales, and, among the reſt, that which I have juſt now related; but it is there, with a circumſtance that deſerves to be known; which is, that Mahomet had aſſured his diſciples, that the angel Gabriel would come to raiſe him on the third day. They continued about the body all that time, and then they retired, imagining that their preſence frighted the angels; but, when no body guarded the body, the dogs came and eat it, and left but very little of it, which was buried by the diſciples of this impoſtor; and, in revenge for this affront, they put to death every year a great number of dogs. Baronius refers us to ſeveral volumes, that have been written concerning the life of Mahomet; and he confeſſes, that he the more eaſily refrained from making uſe of them, becauſe he found many lies in them. Abſtinuimus libentius quod multa fabuloſa in eis poſita invenerimus (134). A Lutheran author (135), whom I have cited twice or thrice, and who relates this ſtory, without believing it, has named ſeveral authors, who make mention of it. Take notice of his citations. † ‘ Cadaver aliquot ‘ diebus manſiſſe inſepultum, quod tertio die ſe re- ‘ ſurrecturum dixiſſet, poſteà verò à canibus arroſum ‘ ſcribunt Eulogius & Vincentius ‡. Sed cum parcum ‘ ſemper fuiſſe Muhammedem in jactandis miraculis, ‘ & ferro, non prodigioſâ virtute ſuam propagandam ‘ eſſe ſcripſerit ſectam, hanc narrationem ſuis potiùs ‘ relinquimus autoribus. - - - Eulogius and Vincentius ‘ write, that the dead body lay ſome days unburied, be- ‘ cauſe he had ſaid he would riſe again the third day, ‘ but that afterwards he was torn by dogs. But, as ‘ Mahomet ſeldom boaſted of miracles, and declared that ‘ his ſect was to be propagated by force, not by ſigns and ‘ wonders, we chuſe to leave this ſtory with it's au- ‘ thors.’ Father Maracci was not ſo incredulous; for he did not reject thoſe, who ſaid, that the diſciples of Mahomet, on account of the difference among them about the primacy, ſo neglected his body, that the dogs tore it in pieces. He builds upon this, that there are ſome relations, which ſay, that the ſepulchre of this falſe prophet contains but a ſmall portion of his body. Exiguam corporis portionem in illo inveniri, colligit Auctor noſter non abſimile vero eſſe, quod graves ſcriptores prodiderunt, quum poſt mortem Mahumeti de imperio proceres certarent, cadaver ejus, nemine in tumultu cuſtodiente, à canibus dilaceratum fuiſſe (136).

[AA] There has been publiſhed a Teſtament under the name of Mahomet.] There was printed at Paris, in Latin and Arabic, in 1630, a book intituled, Teſtamentum & Pactiones initæ inter Muhammedum & Chriſtianæ fidei cultores. Father Pacific Scaliger, a Capuchin, had brought the M. S. of it from the Eaſt. Gabriel Sionita is the author of the Latin tranſlation. John Fabricius publiſhed this Teſtament in Latin at Roſtock, in 1638. Mr Hinkelman, Miniſter of Hamburgh, publiſhed it in Latin and Arabic, in 1690 (137). The critics are of different opinions as to the queſtion, Whether this be a genuine piece? Grotius believes it to be a forgery. ‘ Edidit Ga- ‘ briel Sionita, ſays he (138), his dictus teſtamentum ‘ Muhammedis τῦ ψευδοπροφήτȣ, aut indultum ‘ potius ejus in gratiam Chriſtianorum, haud dubie ‘ à Chriſtianis ſuppoſitum, ut ſub obtentu tanti nomi- ‘ nis Muſulmanis æquioribus uterentur. Ille tamen ‘ genuinum eſſe affirmat, & perſuadet iis qui naſum ‘ non habent. - - - - Gabriel Sionita, in theſe days, ‘ publiſhed a Teſtament of Mahomet the falſe prophet, or ‘ rather an indulgence of his in favour of the Chriſtians, ‘ forged, no doubt, by the Chriſtians, to obtain better ‘ treatment from the Muſſulmen, under the ſhelter of ‘ ſo great a name. Yet he affirms it to be genuine, ‘ and impoſes upon the unſkillful.’ Voëtius (139), Hoornbeek (140), Beſpier (141), and many other miniſters, embrace this opinion. Hottinger (142), who had not ſeen the Arabic, durſt not determine the queſtion. Salmaſius affirms, that it is a genuine piece. ‘ Vidi ‘ nuper teſtamentum Muhammedis. De veritate ejus ‘ nullus dubito. Sed nollem ita reddidiſſet interpres; ‘ nihil enim minus quam teſtamentum. Fœdus eſt ‘ & pactio qua ſecuritatem Chriſtianis dedit, cujus & ‘ mentionem facere videtur Almachinus in vita Mu- ‘ hammedis: ubi narrat ex hiſtoriis Chriſtianorum, ‘ addictum fuiſſe Chriſtianis illum Impoſtorem & be- ‘ nevolum; & cum ad ipſum quidam Chriſtiani venif- ‘ ſent petentes ſecuritatem, impoſuiſſe eis tributum, ‘ atque in fidem eos ſuſcepiſſe (143). - - - I lately ‘ ſaw Mahomet's Teſtament: I have no doubt of it's be- ‘ ing genuine. But I wiſh the tranſlator had not given ‘ it that name; for it is nothing like a Teſtament. It ‘ is a league and covenant, by which he made the Chri- ‘ ſtians ſecure; of which Elmacin, in the Life of Ma- ‘ homet, ſeems to make mention; where he relates out of ‘ the Chriſtian hiſtories, that that impoſtor favoured the ‘ Chriſtians, and, when ſome Chriſtians came to him, ‘ deſiring ſafe-guards, impoſed a tax on them, and entered ‘ into covenant with them.’ Mr Hinkelman (144), is of the ſame opinion with Salmaſius; and ſo was alſo Sir Paul Ricaut; for, endeavouring to prove, that Mahomet uſed craft at the beginning, by making a falſe ſhew of a ſincere intention, to live peaceably with the Chriſtians, he ſays (145), That this falſe prophet ‘ made a treaty with them, the original whereof ‘ was found in the monaſtery of Mount Carmel:’ and then he adds theſe words (146); ‘ It is ſaid, that ‘ this original (147) was carried from that place into ‘ France, and put in the king's library. Since it is ‘ antient and curious, I think it will not be impro- ‘ per here to give you the interpretation of it.’ Having related the tenor of it, he goes on after this manner (148): ‘ Altho' the Turks deny, that this treaty ‘ is Mahomet's, yet there are very good authors, who ‘ believe it to be genuine, and that it was made at ‘ the time ſet down at the end of it, viz. when the ‘ empire of Mahomet was yet very weak, and in it's ‘ infancy; for at that time he was at war with the ‘ Arabians, and feared leſt the Chriſtians ſhould de- ‘ clare againſt him: wherefore, to prevent his being ‘ attacked by two enemies at once, he made this ‘ treaty with them in the monaſtery of the monks of ‘ Mount Carmel (149), from whence theſe auſtere ‘ friars derive their name.’ That which is certain, is, that at the time (150), when it is ſuppoſed, that Mahomet made this agreement with the Chriſtians, it was good policy in him not to provoke them. There is a paſſage in the Alcoran, which promiſes Infidels liberty of conſcience: Sir Paul Ricaut cites it (151). He might have cited a paſſage of Elmacin, which informs us, that Mahomet treated very

(132) Tom. i, book iii, chap. i.

(133) Ad. ann. 630. num. ix, & ſeq.

(134) Ibid. num. xii.

(135) Samuel Schultetus, in Eccleſ. Mahumed. pag. 17.

† Hotting. Hiſt. Orient. lib. ii, cap. iv, p. 273.

‡ Apud Baron. ann. 630, num. ix. lib. xxiii, cap. xlvii, apud Magd. Cent vii. ver. 5, fo. m. 364. Confer. Acta Mahometis Francofurti cum iconibus Edita ann. 1597. pag. 261.

(136) Ludov. Maraccius in Prodromo ad Refutat. Alcorani apud Acta Erudit. Lipſ. 1692, pag. 331.

(137) See the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, Octob. 1690, pag. 80.

(138) Grotius, Epiſt. ad Gallos, pag. 329. apud Hotting. Hiſt. Orient. lib. ii, cap. ii, p. 237.

(139) Voëtius, Diſput. Theol. Tom. ii, p. 668.

(140) Hoornbeek, ubi ſupra, pag. 88.

(141) Beſpier's Remarks upon Ricaut, Tom. ii, pag. 623.

(142) Hotting, ubi ſupra.

(143) Salmaſ. Epiſt. xx, lib. i, pag. 44.

(144) See the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, ubi ſupra.

(145) Ricaut's State of the Ottoman Empire, lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. 307.

(146) Ib. p. 308.

(147) He did not know, that this book was publiſhed at Paris, in 1630, and at Roſtoch in 1638.

(148) Ibid. pag. 316, 317.

(149) Beſpier makes here this remark. This is not at all probable; nay the treaty is ſigned at Medina, as the piece ſays, and therefore could not be made in the monaſtery of mount Carmel, which is more than 200 leagues diſtant from Medina.

(150) Viz. In the fourth year of the Hegira.

(151) Ib. p. 307. See the Thoughts upon Comets, num. 244.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gery: It is a treaty of mutual toleration, which, they say, was concluded between him and the Christians. Proofs of the forgery may be drawn from the piece itself [BB]. But however this be, it is certain, that, at the beginning, he had more humanity for them, than for the Jews; which is something strange; for, appearing with the splendor of a conqueror, he was the more likely to get himself followed by the Jewish nation, as the Messias, very civilly a troop of Christians, who came to desire of him a safe-guard (152); for, upon this occasion, he dispatched such orders, as assured them of his protection. Sir Paul Ricaut therefore had good reason to say, that Mahomet, at the beginning, offered peace to the Christians: but his reasons are not so strong, by which he pretends to prove, that they appeared formidable to this false prophet. 'The Christians, says 'he (153), recommended themselves by their zeal, their 'devotion, and the practice of all sorts of virtues. All 'this concurred with the purity of their doctrine, and 'a holy and firm union in the profession of the faith: 'and because the emperors were then Christians, 'Christianity was not maintained only by patience, 'sufferings, and hope, as it had been in the first ages, 'but was also supported by the arms and protection 'of the emperors.' This is contrary to the general opinion. It is generally agreed, that the divisions among the Christians, their vices, and those of the Imperial court (154), did extreamly facilitate the progress of Mahometism.

I cannot proceed to another thing, till I have made a reflexion upon this. The Mahometans, according to the principles of their faith, are obliged to employ violence, to destroy other religions, and yet they tolerate them now, and have done so for many ages. The Christians have no order, but to preach, and instruct; and yet, time out of mind, they destroy, with fire and sword, those who are not of their religion. 'When you meet with Infidels, says Mahomet (155), 'kill them, cut off their heads, or take them prisoners, and put them in chains, till they have paid 'their ransom, or you find it convenient to set them 'at liberty. Be not afraid to persecute them, till they 'have laid down their arms, and submitted to you.' Nevertheless, it is true, that the Saracens quickly left off the ways of violence; and that the Greek churches, as well the orthodox as the schismatical, have continued to this day under the yoke of Mahomet. They have their Patriachs, their Metropolitans, their Synods, their Discipline, their Monks. I know very well, that they suffer much under such a master; but, after all, they have more reason to complain of the covetousness and extortions of the Turks, than of their sword. The Saracens were still more gentle, than the Turks (156). See the proofs of it given by Mr Jurieu (157); which are taken out of Elmacin, and Eutychius. It may be affirmed for a certain truth, That if the western princes had been lords of Asia, instead of the Saracens and Turks, there would be now no remnant of the Greek church, and they would not have tolerated Mahometism, as these Infidels have tolerated Christianity. Let us hear Mr Jurieu himself (158). 'It may be truly said, that there is no 'comparison between the cruelty of the Saracens against 'the Christians, and that of Popery again the True 'Believers. In the wars against the Vaudois, or in the 'massacres alone on St Bartholomew's day, there was 'more blood spilt upon account of religion, than was 'spilt by the Saracens in all their prosecutions of the 'Christians. It is expedient to cure men of this pre'judice, that Mahometism is a cruel sect, which was 'propagated, by putting men to their choice, of death, 'or the abjuration of Christianity. This is in no wise 'true; and the conduct of the Saracens was an evan'gelical meekness, in comparison of that of Popery, 'which exceeded the cruelty of the Cannibals. It is 'not therefore the cruelty of the Mahometans, which 'has destroyed Christianity in the East and South, 'but their avarice. They made the Christians pay 'dear for their liberty of conscience; they imposed 'upon them heavy taxes; they made them often re'deem their churches, which they sometimes sold to 'the Jews, and then the Christians must redeem them 'again: poverty destroys wit, and debases courage. 'But, above all, Mahometism has destroyed Christia'nity by ignorance.' He repeats the same thing, in fewer words, in one of his Pastoral Letters (159), supposing always, that Christianity was destroyed under the empire of the Mahometans. But he is mistaken, and would have said otherwise, had he better consulted the Historians: but that is not the point. Let us proceed, and observe, that he tells us plainly, that the Saracens and Turks treated the Christian church with more moderation, than the Christians shewed either to the Pagans, or to one another: for he observes, that the Christian emperors ruined Paganism, by demolishing it's temples, destroying it's images, and forbidding the worship of it's false-gods; and that the Reformed princes abolished Popery, by burning the images, burying the relics in the ground, and forbidding all idolatrous worship (160). It is is plain, that princes, who prohibit on a sudden a religion, use more violence, than princes, who permit the public exercise of it, and only keep it under, as the Turks do by the Christians.

The conclusion, which I would draw from all this, is, that men are little governed by their principles. The Turks, we see, tolerate all sorts of religions, tho' the Alcoran enjoins them to persecute the Infidels: and the Christians, we see, do nothing but persecute, tho' the Gospel forbids them to do it. They would make fine work in the Indies, and in China, if ever the secular power there should favour them: assure yourself they would apply the maxims of Mr Jurieu. They have already done it in some places. Read what follows, and you will find, that arguments not being sufficient to convert the Infidels, the viceroy of Goa was desired to assist the Gospel, by decrees of confiscation, &c. 'Cum necessarium esset, ut præter autho'ritatem Ecclesiæ potestas Principum Virorum ad co'piosam hanc frugem accederet, quæ obstacula omnia 'amoliretur, Deus Dominus noster Pro-rege tanquam 'instrumento in multis usus est. Itaque ubi Brach'manni rationibus se destitui viderant, ad defensionem 'satis esse putabant, ut quoquo modo de cassibus effu'gerent, quod se more Majorum vivere profiterentur. 'Sed cum pro innata animi pertinacia neque unquam se 'victos agnoscerent, neque rationibus quantumlibet 'efficacibus crederent; pro-rex in compendium misso 'negotio malo huic nodo malum cuneum opponit, le'gem promulgat, ut intra quadragesimum diem à de'creti promulgatione Brachmanes cum suis omnibus, 'qui Christiani fieri nollent, suppellectili omni, quæ'que in ratis & censis haberent, intra id tempus distra'ctis, in exilium abirent; qui non parerent, jacturam 'ejus facturos, & ad triremes abreptum iri comina'tus est (161). - - - - It being necessary, that, besides 'the authority of the church, the power of the great 'should concur in producing this plentiful fruit, our Lord 'God has in many things made use of the vice-roy as his 'instrument. Therefore where the Brachmans found they 'wanted arguments, they thought it sufficient for their 'defence, any how to escape the nets, professing to live 'after the manner of their ancestors. But when, through 'their innate obstinacy of mind, they would neither ac'knowledge themselves vanquished, nor submit to argu'ments however strong; the vice-roy, to cut the matter 'short, published a law, that those Brachmans, with 'their whole families, who should refuse to turn Chri'stians within forty days after the publication of the 'decree, should forfeit their goods and estates, and go 'into banishment, and threatning the disobedisnt with 'being sent to the gallies.' See in the margin (162).

[BB] Proofs of the forgery may be drawn from the piece itself.] Consider a little the words of Dean Prideaux: 'Grotius rejects this capitulation as a forgery, and not 'without reason. For this piece is dated in the fourth 'year of the hegira, at a time when Mahomet was not 'in a condition to speak in such a manner, as he is 'made to speak in that writing; his power at that 'time being not so formidable, as to move any per'sons to pray him to grant them his protection; since 'he had been defeated a little before at the battle of 'Ohud, where he was so cruelly beaten, that at the 'time when this capitulation is dated, viz. on the 'fourth month of this year, he had not perfectly reco'vered his loss, and found himself much lower, than 'ever he had been, from the time he took the sword 'in hand, for the propagation of his imposture. Besides 'this, there is another particular, which most plainly discovers (152) Securitatem petituri . . . securitatis instrumentum scripsit. See Hotting. ubi supra, pag. 236. Georg. Elmacin. Hist. Saracen. pag. 21.

(153) Pag. 305.

(154) See Hotting. ubi supra, pag. 239.

A COMPARISON between the Toleration of the Mahometans, and that of the Christians.

(155) In the ninth chapter of the Alcoran. See Ricaut, lib. 2, cap. ii, pag. 318.

(156) See Ricaut, ibid. & cap. iii.

(157) Jurieu's Apology for the Reformation, Tom. ii, pag. 55. & seq. Edit. in 4to. See also the Thoughts upon Comets, p. 738.

(158) Jurieu, ib.

(159) The ninth of the year 1688, pag. 196. I have cited his words above, remark [O], citation (65).

(160) See what I have cited before out of the Rights of the two Sovereigns, remark [O], citation (65).

(161) Ludovicus Frois, in Epistola ad Fratres in Europa degentes scripta Goæ primo die Decembris, 1560. apud Dannhawerum in Vale Triumphali, pag. 104.

(162) The barbarities, which the Spaniards exercised in America, are horrible.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Meſſias, whom they expected [CC]. The Mahometans have a very great veneration for him [DD], as it appears by ſeveral inſtances: they make very devout pilgrimages

' diſcovers the forgery of this piece; for, according to ' it, Moawias, the ſon of Abu-Sophian, was then ſecre- ' tary to Mahomet, and drew up this writing; and ' yet it is certain, that Moawias, with his father Abu- ' Sophian, did then bear arms againſt the impoſtor; and ' it was not till the time of the taking Mecca, which ' four years after, that they joined him, and em- ' braced his impoſture, to ſave their lives (163).'

(163) Prideaux, in the Life of Mahomet, pag. m. 158, 159.

[CC] He was likely to have been followed, as the Meſſias whom the Jews expected.] There are ſome authors who ſay, that Mahomet, for ſome time, pretended to be the Meſſias, and that he applied to himſelf the oracles of the Old Teſtament, which had been accompliſhed in JESUS CHRIST (164). By this artifice, he drew a great many Jews after him: the bad condition of that nation in Arabia diſpoſed them ſo much the more to be ſeduced. It is ſaid, that they did not break with him, till he fled from Mecca; and there are hardly any good reaſons given of this rupture: for, to tell us, as ſome do, that they were diſguſted with him, becauſe they ſaw him eat of a camel, is to put us off with fables. Neither can I underſtand, that they at any time took him for the Meſſias; ſince, on the one hand, the Scripture ſays expreſsly, that the Meſſias, was to ſpring from the family of David; and, on the other hand, it was notorious, that Mahomet was not deſcended from that family, but was of a Pagan race. However, let us cite the authors, that have ſaid what I have related. ' Et quidem primis temporibus ' Muhammed ſe ipſum apud Chadigam uxorem, ' Arabes, Judæoſque venditabat pro Meſſia, quem Ju- ' dæi expectarent, ut eſt apud Enuſtinum in Geneal. ' Mahom. pag. 10. Abbas Urſpergenſis in Chronico, ' pag. m. 150. Hic erat Pſeudo-Propheta, ſed apud illos ' magnus æſtimabatur, ita ut etiam in principio adventus ' ejus æſtimarent hunc eſſe illum, qui ab eis expectatur ' Chriſtus (165) . . . . . Secuti hunc ſunt complures ' Judæi, qui Muhammedum illico pro vero agnovere ' Meſſia. Theophanes aliique iſtius temporis ſcriptores ' ſcribunt, Judæos adhæſiſſe Muhammedo uſque ad ' cædem illius; μεχρι τῆς σφαγῆς αὐτȣ̃. Pro ' σφαγῆς rectius legi σφυγῆς uſque ad fugam illius, ' monet vir literarum Græcarum peritiſſimus Iſaacus ' Voſſius in allegatis ſibyllinis oraculis, pag. 24. aſſe- ' rens Theophanem alioſque pravam ſecutos fuiſſe ' lectionem. Itidem tradunt receſſiſſe Judæos à Mu- ' hammedo, cum eum cameli carnibus veſcentem con- ' ſpexiſſent. Alias alii afferunt ſeparationis cauſas (166). ' - - - - - And indeed at firſt Mahomet pretended, to his ' wife Chadigha, the Arabians, and the Jews, that ' he was the Meſſias, whom the Jews expected; ' as we find in Enuſtinus, Geneal. Mahom. pag. 10. ' The abbot of Urſperg, Chronic. pag. m. 150, ſays, ' This man was a falſe prophet, but was eſteemed a ' great man by them, inſomuch that at his firſt ap- ' pearance, they took him for the CHRIST, whom they ' expected. . . . . He was followed by ſeveral Jews, ' who preſently acknowledged Mahomet for the true Meſ- ' ſias. Theophanes, and other writers of that time, in- ' form us, that the Jews adhered to Mahomet till he ' fled to Mecca. . . . . The ſame authors tell us, that ' the Jews abandoned Mahomet, having ſeen him ' feed upon Camel's fleſh. Others aſſign other cauſes of ' their ſeparation.' It is certain the Jews did not follow Mahomet to his death, for he perſecuted them outrageouſly both with his ſword and pen; he deteſts them in many places of his Alcoran; and the war he waged againſt them, was very bloody, and fatal to them (167). The Turks, in this, do wonderfully follow the genius of their prophet; for they have a greater averſion to the Jews, than to any people in the world, and they will not permit a Jew, who turns Mahometan to be buried in their burying-places (168). But what ſome ſay, that they will not ſuffer a Jew, who deſires to embrace Mahometiſm, to come over immediately to the profeſſion of their faith, but that he muſt firſt turn Chriſtian, before he becomes a Mahometan, is falſe (169).

(164) Pleraque Veteris Inſtrumenti loca ad Meſſiam pertinentia impleverit, uti olim jam obſervatum Petro Cluniacenſi apud Iſaacum Voſſium in ſcripto de Sibyllinis Oraculis, pag. 25. Joh. à Lent. de Judæorum, Pſeudo-Meſſiis, pag. 28, 29.

(165) Ib. p. 29.

(166) Ib. p. 30.

(167) See Hotting. ubi ſupra, p. 214, &c. Joh. à Lent, ubi ſupra, pag. 30. ex Elmacino, pag. 6.

(168) Ricaut, ubi ſupra, lib. ii, cap. iii, pag. 325.

(169) Idem, ibid.

[DD] The Mahometans have a very great veneration for Mahomet.] I might ſet down a great many circumſtances to this purpoſe; but I ſhall mention only a few. The Grand-Seignior (170) ſends every year into Arabia, Five hundred chequins, an Alcoran covered with gold, carried upon a camel, and as much black ſtuff, as will ſerve the moſque of Mecca for a tent. When this new cover is put on, that of the preceding year is taken away, and the pilgrims preſently cut it in pieces, and every one carries off what he can of it, ſome more, ſome leſs. They keep this rag in their houſes, as a relic, and as a token of their pilgrimage. . . . . When the camel, which carries the Alcoran returns, he is adorned with flowers, and other ornaments; and after he has made this holy journey, he is exempt, for the reſt of his life, from any other labour, or ſervice (171). The Turks (172) have a great veneration for a camel; and they reckon it one of the greateſt ſins to lay too much burden upon him, and to make him labour more than a horſe. The reaſon of this is, becauſe this beaſt is very common in the holy places of Arabia, and it has the honour to carry the Alcoran, when they go a pilgrimage to Mecca. I have obſerved, that thoſe, who take care of this animal, take the froth, which comes out of his mouth, after he has drank in a trough, and rub it upon their beards with great devotion, as if it were a balſam of great value, and, while they do it, they repeat often, in a religious tone, Hadgi Baba! Hadgi Baba! O Father Pilgrim! O Father Pilgrim! Here follows a paſſage from La Mothe le Vayer (173): ' Wherever the falſe religion of Mahomet prevails, ' thoſe of his line, which are called Cherifs *, are held ' in ſo great veneration, that they alone dare wear a ' green turbant (174), and they are even unexception- ' able in courts of judicature. And it is no wonder ' the Turks, and other Muſſulmen, ſhould reſpect the ' poſterity of this impoſtor; ſince they ſo far eſteem ' the horſes that come from the mare he rode upon, ' that none dare beat them, or uſe them ill, as we ' learn from the relation of the Sieur de Breves.' Many pilgrims, after having ſeen the ſepulchre of Mahomet, put out their eyes, as if all the reſt of the world were unworthy to be ſeen, after they have ſeen ſuch an object. I have read this in Brantome: the reader will not be diſpleaſed to know upon what occaſion he mentions it. ' The day being come, ſays he (175), ' that the embaſſadors of Poland (176), waited upon ' the queen of Navarre, ſhe appeared to them ſo beau- ' tiful, ſo magnificently adorned, and richly dreſſed, ' with ſo great majeſty and grace, that they were all ' confounded with the ſight of ſo great a beauty; and, ' among others, there was one Laſki, one of the chief ' of the embaſſy, whom I ſaw, at his withdrawing, ' ſo dazzled with the ſplendor of this beauty, that he ' ſaid, I will ſee nothing after it: I could willingly do, ' as ſome Turkiſh pilgrims, when they come from Mecca, ' where the ſepulchre of their prophet Mahomet is, who ' are ſo glad, ſo tranſported, and raviſhed with the ſight ' of ſo fine and ſo ſtately a moſque, that they will never ſee ' any thing after it; and therefore they burn out their ' eyes with hot braſs plates, which deſtroy their ' ſight, ſaying, that, after this, there is nothing finer to ' be ſeen, and they will never ſee any thing more: So ' ſaid this Polander of the admirable beauty of this ' princeſs.' Since the authority of Brantome may not be ſufficient, I ſhall cite two Maronites, who tell us (177): ' Hinc factum eſt ut multi hujus loci deſide- ' rio patriam conſanguineoſque reliquerint: plerique ' etiam tali inſania dementiaque capti fuerint, ut ſibi ' ſponte oculos eruerint, ne ſcilicet quicquam munda- ' num, ut inquiunt, viderent: reliquum vitæ curricu- ' lum ibi peregerint. - - - - Hence it was, that many ' left their country and kindred for the ſake of this place; ' many alſo were ſo infatuated, that they pulled out their ' own eyes, that they might not, as they ſaid, behold any ' wordly object; and ſpent the reſt of their life there.' This puts me in mind of a thought of Mr Ogier. In compoſing a funeral oration upon Philip IV, king of Spain (178), he employed all the knowledge, that he had acquired by the exerciſe and ſtudy of many years, in the art of Rhetoric, and then reſolved, that after this work, he would never concern himſelf with eloquence, but follow the example of a lord in the Low-Countries, who, after he had entertained Charles V in one of his houſes, blew it up with gun-powder the next day, as judging that no man was worthy to be received into it after that incomparable prince (179). I have not yet related all the honours that are paid to beaſts, out of reſpect to Mahomet. There are in the territory of Mecca an infinite number of pigeons: for becauſe they are thought to be the offſpring of that which came to the falſe prophet's ear, therefore it is accounted a great crime, not only

(170) Ricaut, ib. lib. ii, cap. xxiii. pag. m. 482.

(171) I have read, in the relation of the entry of Clement VIII into Ferrara, that the horſe, or mule, which ſerved for ſuch ceremonies was never put to work afterwards.

(172) Id. ib. cap. xxvi.

(173) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. viii, pag. 364.

* Leo Africanus.

(174) Spon, Voyage, Tom. ii, pag. 16, affirms, That thoſe, who are born, when their mother was making a pilgrimage to Mecca, have the ſame privilege, of wearing the Green Turbant.

(175) Lives of Illuſtrious Ladies, in the diſcourſe of queen Margaret, pag. 205.

(176) Thoſe, who offered the crown to the duke of Anjou, brother to Charles IX.

(177) Gabriel Sionita, & Joha Heſronita, ubi infra, pag. 26.

(178) Journal des Sçavans, Febr. 22, 1666. p. m. 160, 161.

(179) Compare with this the paſſage of Terence, quoted in citation (11) of the article DIAGORAS, the wreſtler, and that of Pliny, quoted in citation (67), of the article HERCULES.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

grimages to the place of his nativity, and to that where his tomb is. It is not true, that this tomb hangs in the air [EE], as several writers, who transcribe one from another, only to kill them, but even to take them, or put them to flight. Summa columbarum copia invenitur, quæ quia sunt de genere atque stirpe ejus, quæ ad Mohammedis aures (ut Mosleman nuncupatur) accedebat, eo pollent privilegio atque authoritate, ut non solum eas occidere, sed aut capere aut fugare nefas esse existiment (180). I have transcribed this passage, to shew, that there are famous writers, who affirm, that the Mussulmen mention this pigeon, which came to Mahomet's ear, of which the Arabic authors have said nothing, if we believe Dr Pocock (181). We must not forget the camel, which carried Mahomet from Mecca, as far as Medina, to the door of the house of Jul, a famous Turkish captain, whom this Prophet had a mind to visit, without knowing the house, where this valiant man lived (182). The Mahometans pretend, that this camel will rise again, and enjoy the happiness of Paradise (183). What shall we say of Mahomet's shirt? It is kept at Cairo in Egypt and carried in procession, on certain days with great ceremony (184).

But it is false, that the Mussulmen ever testified their veneration for Mahomet, by erecting statues to him; and therefore, what we read in the history of the Holy War, published by Father Mabillon, is an untruth (185). The author there speaks of a statue of Mahomet, found in a mosque, which he calls the temple of Solomon. He says (186), 'That Tancred 'found it seated on a very high throne, and that it 'was so heavy, that six of the strongest men could 'hardly carry it, and that there must be ten at least to 'raise it up. Tancred made a very pathetical harangue to this statue, and finding it to be Mahomet's, cries out, It is this wicked Mahomet, who 'was the first Antichrist. If the Antichrist, that is to 'come, were now here with this, truly, I would quickly 'have crushed him under my feet. Those who know 'any thing of the Mahometan sentiments, know very 'well, that they do not keep any images, neither 'in their mosques, nor in their houses.' It is a question, whether the Mussulmen invoke this false prophet, and believe that he is in Heaven: many ascribe such a belief to them (187). 'But there are none 'of their solemn prayers, which they do not directly 'address to GOD, to whom they pray even for Mahomet; and they maintain, that all souls, that of 'the prophet, as well as others, remain, till the 'day of judgment, in the tombs, where their bodies 'are buried . . . . (188). The soul of Mahomet is 'also shut up in his sepulchre; for he refused to go 'to Heaven, when GOD offered to receive him there, 'because he would not be without his faithful. This 'soul shall conduct, at the last day, all the Mahometan souls to heavenly glory. . . . . That you may 'see they pray to GOD for Mahomet, here follows 'the conclusion of one of their prayers: O my GOD, 'be propitious to Mahomet, and to the Mahometan people, as thou wast propitious to Abraham and his people, 'because they praise and glorify thee.' If there be no better proofs, that Mahomet is not invoked by his followers, I would not deny but that he is; for I have mentioned (189) a form of prayer, which shews, that they invoke GOD for the same saints whom they invoke. As to their veneration for the Alcoran, see what Mr Pfeiffer says in the seventh volume of the Bibliotheque (190). They are so strongly attached to Mahometism, that scarce any can be converted from it to the Christian religion (191), and without doubt, there are many more Christians, that turn Mahometans, than Mahometans, who embrace the Gospel. The Pagans are more easy to be converted (192). The distinction, which Richardus the monk uses, appears to me to be vain; he says, That a Mahometan would more easily turn Christian at the point of death, than when he is in good health; and that a Christian would by no means embrace Mahometism at the hour of death; that therefore both of them are agreed, That the Mahometan religion is more convenient for living, and the Christian more safe for dying. Christianus quidem nunquam in morte fieret Saracenus, sed in vita; Saracenus autem patius in morte fit Christianus, quam in vita: uterque igitur horum potius eligit Christianus mori, quam Saracenus (193). This distinction is an advantage, of which the Roman-catholics and the Reformed equally boast. See the remark [E] of the article ABULPHARAGIUS.

But the truth is, excepting a few persons, every body wishes to die in that religion, in which he was educated. If any one quits it for some temporal advantage, that advantage is of no use to him, when he comes to die, and therefore he wishes to die in his first communion. A Mahometan is in the same case with others, if he abjures his faith for worldly considerations: for ignorance does the same thing in the heart of these Infidels, that knowledge does in the heart of an orthodox honest man; I mean, it makes them adhere invincibly to their opinions. But I must observe, by the way, that the Mahometan religion is not so destitute of apologists as is commonly believed: there are some Arabians, who have written in favour of the Alcoran, and against the Bible, with a skill sufficient to foment prejudices. Hottinger speaks of an author (194), who has laid open the apparent contradictions of the Bible, and pretends to prove the mission of Mahomet even from that book. We should be very simple, to think that a Turk, who examines this, finds it as groundless, as we do. He perceives no force in the objections against the Alcoran, but he sees much strength in the objections against the Christians: so great is the power of prejudice!

[EE] It is not true, that his tomb hangs in the air.] An infinite number of persons say, and believe, that Mahomet's tomb, being of iron, under a vault of load-stones, hangs in the air, and that this passes for a great miracle in the opinion of his followers: but it is a fable, which they laugh at, when they know, that the Christians relate it as a certain matter of fact (195). And if they had used any such trick, it is no more than what a king of Egypt formerly attempted to do; who had a design to procure the same advantage to the statue of his wife; but his own death, and that of the Architect, hindered him from putting it in execution. 'Magnete lapide 'Dinochares architectus Alexandriæ Arsinoës tem-'plum concamerare inchoaverat, ut in eo simulacrum 'ejus è ferro pendere in aëre videretur. Interceßit 'mors & ipsius & Ptolemæi, qui id sorori suæ jusserat 'fieri (196). - - - - Dinochares the Architect, had begun to roof the temple of Arsinoe, at Alexandria, with 'load-stone, that her image made of iron might seem to 'hang there in the air. But the design was interrupted 'by his own death, and that of Ptolemy, who had or-'dered it to be done in honour of his sister.' But if we believe Ausonius, this design was executed; for he speaks of it as of a thing that did actually exist; but because the Poets do not so narrowly consider things, let us rather believe what Pliny says.

Conditor hic forsan fuerit Ptolemaïdos aulæ
Dinochares: quadro cui in fastigia cono
Surgit, & ipsa suas consumit Pyramis umbras,
Jussus ob incesti qui quondam fœdus amoris
Arsinoen Pharii suspendit in aëre templi.
Spirat enim tecti testudine vera Magnetis,
Afflictamque trahit ferrato crine puellam (197).

He was, perhaps, Dinochares, by whose skill
The sumptuous court of Ptolemaïs rose;
To whom a pyramid erected stands,
And shoots aloft it's conic form in air:
Who, to immortalize a monarch's incest,
Suspended high in air, by wonderous art,
Arsinoe's statue, in the Pharian temple.
The force magnetic, acting from above,
Attracts the dam'sel by her iron hair.

St Augustin did not at all doubt, but that by human skill and industry such a thing had been produced. He does not name the place (198), but says only, that in a certain temple there was to be seen a statue hanging in the air, equally distant from the pavement and the roof, because the load-stone, which draws it upwards, and that which draws it downwards, have the same virtue. Quamobrem si tot & tanta tamque mirifica, says he, quæ μεχανήματα appellant, Dei creatura utentibus humanis artibus fiunt, ut ea qui nesciunt, opinentur esse divina, unde factum est, ut in quodam templo lapidibus Magnetibus in solo & in camera proportione magnitudinis

(182) Gabriel Sionita, & Joannes Hesronita, in Tractatu de nonnullis Orientalium urbibus, cap. xxi, pag. 21.

(181) See, above, remark [U].

(182) Chevreau, ubi supra, p. 14.

(183) Id. ibi.

(184) See la Mothe le Vayer, Lettre xxvi, Tom. xii, pag. 33. He cites the Voyage of le Gouz.

(185) In the second Tome of the Museum Italicum.

(186) Cap. cxxxv. See the Bibliotheque Universelle, Tom. vii, pag. 177.

(187) Bibliotheque Universelle, Tom. x, pag. 98, in an abstract of a book published by Dr Barrow, intituled, An Abridgment of the Faith and Religion of the Turks.

(188) Ib. pag. 100.

(189) In the article FATIMA, remark [D].

(190) Pag. 264.

(191) Experientia hactenus docuit, & quotidie etiam-num nostrates docet, in Indiæ Orientalis Moribus, regno Tumatano, &c. ab Ethnicismo plures posse converti, à Muhammetismo fere nullos aut paucissimos. Gisb. Voet. Disp. Tom. . pag. 668.

(192) See the words of Voetius, which I have just now cited.

(193) Richardus, Confut. Legis Saracen. cap. x, apud Eberhardum, ubi supra, pag. 218.

(194) He is called, Ahmed Abulabbas, Ben Edris, Sanhaghius, Melkita. See Hotting. ubi supra, pag. 337

(195) Unde igitur nobis Mohammedes ciftæ ferreæ inclusus & magnetum vi in aëre pendulus? Hæc cum Mohammedistis recitantur, risu explodantur, ut nostrorum in ipsorum rebus inscitiæ argumentum. Pocockius, Specimen. Histor. Arabum, pag. 180.

(196) Plin. lib. xxxiv, cap. xiv, in fin. pag. m. 150.

(197) Ausonius, Edyllio X, de Mosella, ver. 311.

(198) Father Hardouin, in Plin. ubi supra, ought not to have affirmed, that St Augustin said this of a statue, which was in the temple of Serapis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ther, have affirmed; neither is it very certain, that any Architect is capable of such a contrivance [FF]. There are several predictions extant, which have threatened Mahometism a long magnitudinis positis, simulachrum ferreum aëris illius medio inter utrumque lapidem, ignorantibus quid sursum esset ac deorsum, quasi numinis potestate penderet . . . . . Quanto magis Deus potens est facere, &c (199)? He observes, that the people, who did not know the cause of this effect, attributed it to the power of GOD. It is probable that the temple, which St Augustin does not name, was that of Serapis at Alexandria; for Ruffinus gives us the following account of the cheats, which were discovered in that temple, when the Christians were masters of it: 'Erat aliud fraudis genus 'hujusmodi, natura lapidis magnetis hujus virtutis 'esse perhibetur, ut ad se rapiat & attrahat ferrum. 'Signum solis ad hoc ipsum ex ferro subtilissima manu 'artificis fuerat fabricatum, ut lapis, cujus naturam 'ferrum ad se trahere diximus, desuper, in laquearibus fixus cum temperate sub ipso radio ad libram 'fuisset positum simulacrum, & vi naturali ad se raperet ferrum, assurrexisse populo simulacrum, & in 'aëre pendere videretur (200). - - - - There was 'another cheat of this kind: the load-stone is said to 'attract iron. An image of the sun was curiously wrought 'in iron, for this purpose, that the stone, whose nature, 'as we observed, it is to attract iron, being fixed in the 'roof, might draw the iron towards it, and so the 'image might seem to the people to rise up, and hang in 'the air.' Prosper relates the same thing with a circumstance, which Ruffinus does not mention: he says, that a good servant of GOD, having learned by inspiration wherein the artifice consisted, took away the load-stone from the roof, and immediately the statue fell, and was broken in a thousand pieces. 'Apud Alexandriam in templo Serapidis hoc argu'mentum dæmonis fuit, quadriga ferrea nulla basi 'fussulta, nullis uncis infixis parietibus colligata, in 'aëre pendens cunctis stuporem ac velut divinum subsidium oculis mortalium exhibebat, quum tamen 'lapis magnes, qui ferrum sibimet attributum suspendit, eo loco cameræ affixus totam illam machinam 'sustentabat. Itaque cum quidam Dei servus inspiratus id intellexisset, magnetem lapidem è camera 'subtraxit, statimque omne illud ostentum cadens confractum comminutumque ostendit divinum non esse, 'quod mortalis homo firmaverit (201). - - - - At 'Alexandria, in the temple of Serapis, the devil made 'use of this argument: an iron chariot, supported by no 'pedestal, nor fixed to the wall by any hooks, hung in 'the air, exhibiting to the spectators a miraculous and 'astonishing appearance; whereas a load-stone, which 'attracts iron, being fixed in that part of the roof, supported the whole machine. But a certain servant of 'GOD, discovering it by inspiration, privately took 'away the load-stone; and immediately the whole prodigy 'falling down, and being broken to pieces, shewed that 'it was not divine, but the contrivance of a meer 'man.' If we may believe Cassiodorus (202), there was in the temple of Diana a Cupid of iron thus suspended. The anonymous author of the Annals of Triers, cites a letter of Galba Victor, written to the sophist Licinius, wherein this Galba acquaints him, That he saw at Triers a statue of Mercury, made of iron, and very heavy, which continued hanging between heaven and earth, by reason of the equal forces which drew it upward and downward (203). There was a piece of a load-stone in the floor, and another in the roof, and this statue was placed just in the middle above and below these two pieces of load-stone. I can scarce believe these things, both on account of the considerable distance, which, they say, was between the statues of iron, and the stones, which attracted them; and, on account of the insuperable difficulties, they must meet with, to balance so exactly the attractions (204). I should rather believe what was said of a statue of Mars, which joined itself to a Venus of load-stone:

. . . . . ferrea Martis
Forma nitet, Venerem magnetica gemma figurat (205).
. . . . . .
. . . . . Cytherea maritum
Sponte rapit, cœlique toros imitata priores,
Pectora lasciva flatu Mavortia nectit,
Et tantum suspendit onus, galeæque lacertos
Implicat, & vivis totum complexibus ambit.
Ille lacessitus longo spiraminis actu
Arcanis trahitur gemmâ de conjuge nodis (206).

The god of war in burnish'd iron stone;
A magnet put the form of Venus on.
. . . . . .
The Cyprian goddess, by magnetic laws,
Her consort of obsequious metal draws.
The mimic statues counterfeit embrace,
And twine, and kiss, like those of heav'nly race.

But this at least is very certain, that the sepulchre of Mahomet ought not to be reckoned amongst these wonders. This false prophet was buried at Medina, where he died. Some authors say, that he was laid in the tomb of Aaisca (207), one of his wives, who loved him best, whom the Mussulmen call the mother of the believers, or, the mother of the faithful, one who understood the languages, and studied history with great application (208). This tomb is an urn of stone, placed in a chapel, which no one can enter, because it is compassed about with bars of iron. The pilgrims of Mecca go thither with extream devotion, and kiss these bars religiously. This is what you will find in a little book de nonnullis Orientalium Urbibus, written by Gabriel Sionita and John Hesronita, and placed at the end of the Geographia Nubiensis, of which they published a Latin translation at Paris in 1619. See also the dissertation of Samuel Andreas, de Sepulchro Muhammedis. We shall see, in the following remark, what Mr Bernier says of this false story of the suspension of the tomb.

I cannot leave this subject, without relating a very ridiculous story, which I have read in the Travels of Monconys. 'The Oia of the embassador said, that 'there was a stone at Mecca, hanging in the air, 'since Mahomet stept upon it to mount the Bouraque, 'which, according to the Alcoran, is an animal less 'than a mule, and larger than an ass, that GOD had 'sent to carry him up to Heaven. When the stone 'saw him going up, it followed him; but he perceiving it, caused it to stop, and it continued in that 'place of the air, where it then was. Others say, 'that some women, big with child, having since passed 'under it, did miscarry, out of fear it should fall upon 'them, and that some stones are put under it to support it; but that they are of no use, and that without them it would nevertheless continue suspended in 'the air (209).'

[FF] It is not very certain, that any Architect is capable of such a contrivance.] I can cite, upon this head, an authority, which is not to be despised, and that is the opinion of one of the best disciples of the famous Gassendus, which he makes in these words (210): 'I shall say nothing of the pretended suspension of the 'iron sepulchre of Mahomet at Mecca, between load'stones of equal force, and disposed, as it were, in a 'kind of vault; which has been formerly said of the 'iron horse of Bellerophon; for it is a thing that exceeds all human skill, either that several loadstones 'should be of the same force, or applied in such a manner, that the iron in the middle shall not feel more 'virtue on one side than on the other; or that the iron 'should in all it's parts be of that shape, thickness, and 'temperature, which is necessary, that it may be equally 'attracted throughout: and yet it is evident, that the 'least difference, whether in the loadstone or the iron, 'or in the situation of them, would make the force 'of one prevail above that of the other. I might add, 'as having been more than a month at Gidda upon 'the Red-Sea, a small day's journey from Mecca, that 'Mahomet's sepulchre was never at Mecca, but that 'it is at Medina, which is about six or seven days 'journey from thence, and in those parts they never 'heard any thing of this vault of loadstones, or of 'this suspension.' Mr Vallemont maintains the possibility of the suspension of a tomb of iron. Let us see

(199) Augustin. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxi, cap. vi.

(200) Ruffin. lib. ii, Histor. Eccles. cap. xxiii, apud Coquæum, Notis in August. de Civ. Dei, ubi supra, pag. m. 961.

(201) Prosper, de Prædict. Part. iii, cap. xxxviii, apud eundem Coquæum, ibid.

(202) Cassiodor. Var. lib. i, Ep. xlv. p. m. 45.

(203) See Ausonius, Variorum published by Tollius, pag. 403.

(204) See Gassendus, Oper. Tom. ii, pag. 334, who mentions the horse of Bellerophon, of which they told the same story, as of the sepulchre of Mahomet; but he rejects it all.

(205) Claudian. de Magnete, ver. 25.

(206) Id. ib. ver. 31.

(207) Gabr. Sionita, & Jo. Esronita, ubi infra, pag. 25. See the remark [00], where we criticise this place.

(208) Gabr. Sionita & Jo. Esronita, de Nonnullis Orient. Urbibus, pag. 23.

(209) The travels of Monconys, Part i, in 4to, pag. 464, 465, ad ann. 1648.

(210) Bernier's Abridgment of the Philosophy of Gassendus, Tom. v, p. 322, 323.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a long while [GG]: and it is said, That Mahomet, being asked, how long his religion see his proofs (211): 'Father Cabeus says, that 'he placed one day two loadstones above one another, and distant about four fingers, then taking a 'needle by the middle with his two fingers, he gently 'carried it between the loadstones, endeavouring to 'find out the middle, where the needle not being more 'attracted by the one loadstone than by the other, 'should remain suspended in the air without being supported by any thing. It requires some time, and a 'great deal of skill, to find out exactly this point, 'and to place the needle there without falling, which 'will happen by the least agitation of the air. At 'last, Cabeus was successful in this experiment: the 'needle remained in the air, between the two loadstones, without touching any thing; and this pleasing spectacle continued as long as one might repeat 'four long verses: but upon his rising to call some 'of his friends, the motion of the air broke, as we 'may say this innocent charm. Wherefore this philosopher does not scruple to assert, that by this 'means an iron coffin may be suspended in the middle 'of the air, in a chamber, whose walls are inlaid 'with loadstones. Testor me id feciſſe. Potuiſſet etiam 'arca ferrea fieri, & in cubiculo Magnete lapide pa'rietato ita diſponi in medio aëre, ut penderet. Cabeus 'lib. iv, cap. xviii, pag. 334, & 335. This Jesuit 'says this, upon occasion of what is so often said, 'that the followers of the impious Mahomet have 'placed his body in a coffin of iron, which is suspend'ed in the air by loadstones: but he does not at all 'doubt, but that it is a fable, as indeed it is.' Mr Vallemont relates afterwards the last words of the passage of Mr Bernier, which has been quoted above; and he blames him for affirming, that it is a thing that surpasses all humane skill. 'Reason, continues he (212), 'might evidently prove the contrary; and the expe'riment of Father Cabeus decides the matter against 'Mr Bernier.' I will venture to say, that this experiment decides it rather in his favour; for it requires much patience and skill, and produces nothing that is lasting, and yet it is only about a small needle. By this you may judge of the difficulties, that must be overcome, to suspend an iron coffin between two loadstones. Dr Prideaux is of the same opinion with Mr Vallemont; for after he has said, that the body of Mahomet was buried at Medina (213), and remains there to this day, without an iron coffin, and without any loadstones, he adds these words: 'I do not pretend to 'deny the possibility of the thing; I know, that Di'nocrates *, a famous Architect, built formerly of 'loadstones the dome of the temple of Arsinoe at 'Alexandria; and by this means, the image of the 'princess, made wholly of iron, was suspended in the 'middle of her temple, without any thing to support 'it: But nothing like it was ever attempted in favour 'of Mahomet's dead body.' See above (214) what concerns the statue of Arsinoe.

(211) Vallemont's Description of the Loadstone, found at Chartres, pag. 167.

(212) Id. ib. pag. 170.

(213) Prideaux, in the Life of Mahomet, pag. 134.

* Plin. lib. xxxiv, cap. xiv.

(214) Citation (196).

[GG] There are several predictions extant, which have threatened Mahometism a long while.] Bibliander (215) affirms, that there is a famous prophecy among the Mahometans, which strikes a great terror both into men and women, and which says, That the empire shall be destroyed by the sword of the Christians. The prophecy is expressed in the following words, which are translated out of Persian into Latin by Georgievitz (216). 'Imperator noster veniet, Gentilium Regnum capiet, 'rubrum malum capiet, subjugabit septem usque ad 'annos; Ethnicorum gladius si non resurrexerit, duo'decim usque ad annos in eos dominabitur, domum 'ædificabit, vineam plantabit, hortos sepe muniet, 'filium & filiam habebit: duodecim post annos Chri'stianorum gladius insurget, qui & Turcam retrorsùm 'profligabit. - - - - Our emperor shall come, shall take the kingdom of the Gentiles, shall take the red apple, shall subdue it even unto seven years; if the sword of the Gentiles shall not rise again, he shall reign over them twelve years, shall build a house, shall plant a vineyard, shall enclose gardens with a hedge, shall have a son and a daughter: after twelve years the sword of the Christians shall rise up, which shall beat back the Turk. Sanſovin (217) published a book in 1570, wherein he affirms, That there is a prediction, That the laws of Mahomet shall last no longer than a thousand years, and that the empire of the Turks shall fall under the fifteenth sultan (218). He adds, That Leo the Philosopher, emperor of Constantinople, has said, in one of his books, 'That a light-haired family, with its 'competitors, shall put all Mahometism to flight, and 'shall seize him, who is possessed of the seven moun'tains': Familia flava cum competitoribus totum Iſmaelem in fugam conjiciet, ſeptemque colles poſſidentem cum ejus poſſeſſionibus capiet. The same emperor makes mention of a column, which was at Constantinople, whose inscriptions the patriarch of the place explained, and said, that they signified, That the Venetians and Muscovites shall take the city of Constantinople; and, after some disputes, they shall chuse, with one consent, and crown a Christian emperor (219). This light-haired family, so fatal to the Mussulmen, puts me in mind of a passage of Dr Spon, which I shall set down. 'Of all the Christian princes, there is none, whom 'the Turk fears so much as the great Czar of 'Moscovy. . . . . And I have heard some Greeks say, 'and, among the rest, the Sieur Manno-Mannea, a 'merchant of the city of Arta, a man of wit and 'learning for that country, that there was a pro'phecy among them, which imported, That the em'pire of the Turks was to be destroyed by a nation 'Chryſogenos, that is, light-haired; which cannot be 'attributed to any but the Muscovites, who are almost 'all light-haired (220).' There is mention made of this, in the Miscellaneous Thoughts upon Comets (221), on occasion of I know not what tradition, which is current, That the Fates have promised the French the glory of destroying the Turks (222). See the remark [F] of the article MARESTS (JOHN DES). The prophecy of the Abyssines mentions only a Christian king, who shall be born in the north. Mentionem facit (Duret. Hist. des Langues, fol. 575, cujusdam Prophetiæ, quam magni æstimant Abyssini; 'quòd nempè, aliquando Mecha, Medina, aliæque 'fælicis Arabiæ urbes, deſtruentur, Mahometique & 'ejus ſimmyſtarum cineres diſſipabuntur; hæcque omnia 'facturus ſit Rex aliquis Chriſtianus, in regionibus ſep'tentrionalibus natus; qui pariter Ægyptum & Palæſti'nam ſit occupaturus (223). - - - - - Duret, in his history 'of Languages, fol. 575, mentions a certain prophecy, 'which the Abyſſins greatly eſteem; namely, That Mecca, 'Medina, and the other cities of Arabia Felix, shall 'hereafter be destroyed, and the ashes of Mahomet, 'and his priests be dissipated; and that some Chri'stian prince, born in the northern regions, shall per'form all this, who shall also seize on Egypt and 'Palestine'. It is pretended, that a book was written in Arabic concerning this prophecy, before the taking of Damieta, and that this book was found by the Christians (224). Wallichius (225) relates, That the Turks find in their annals, That the reign of Mahomet shall continue until the arrival of the light-haired boys; donec veniant figlivoli biondi, i. e. flavi & albi filii, vel filii ex Septentrione flavis & albis capillis. Some think, that this denotes the Swedes; but Antony Torquato, a famous Astrologer, applies it to the king of Hungary (226). I shall say nothing of the prophecy, which was current in the time of the empress Theodora, That the destruction of the Saracens should be the work of the Macedonians; which was the cause, why the emperor Monomachus raised some troops in Macedonia, and sent them into the Levant (227). The event did not confirm this prophecy, nor the commentary upon the predictions of the emperor Severus, and upon those of the emperor Leo, printed at Francfort, with figures, in 1597. This commentary promised, That the Ottoman empire should be destroyed under the sultan Mahomet III (228). The commentary of Philip Nicolai upon the Apocalypse was not more successful; this Lutheran minister had foretold by virtue of some words of St John, That the Turkish empire should fall in 1670 (229). Wolfius has inserted, in his Lectiones Memorabiles (230), a piece which is intituled, Diſcurſus de futura & ſperata victoria contra Turcam, è ſacris prophetiis, aliiſque vaticiniis, prodigiis, & prognoſticis depromptus, ac nuviter in lucem datus per Joannem Baptiſtam Nazarum Brixienſem. It was printed in 1570. The author examines several prophetical passages of Scripture; and he finds, by the manner in which he applies them, and by calculating the numeral letters, that they signify the ruin of the Turks, and by that means an universal peace in the year 1572, or 1575. The other oracles, which he consults,

(215) De Ratione communi omnium linguarum, apud Beſoldum conſider. lepis & fœdus Saracenorum, pag. 47.

(216) Apud Beſoldum, pag. 47.

(217) See Wolfius, Lect. Memorab. Tom. ii, pag. 803.

(218) Selim II, who reigned at that time.

(219) Wolfius, ibid.

(220) Spon's Travels, Tom. i, pag. 270, of the Holland edition.

(221) Pag. 783.

(222) See ſeveral authorities as to this matter, in the Thoughts upon Comets, pag. 781.

(223) Beſoldus, ubi ſupra, pag. 48.

(224) See Hotting. in Theſauro Philologico.

(225) In Vita Mahometis, pag. 158. apud Schulteturn, ubi ſupra, pag. 22.

(226) Apud Leunclavium, in ſuo Epiſt. fol. 844, citante Schulteto, ibid. See the article TORQUATO (ANTONY).

(227) Cedrenus, pag. 9515, apud Schultet. ibid.

(228) Schultet. ibid.

(229) Schultet. pag. 21.

(230) Tom. ii, p. 884, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gion would continue? ſhewed his fingers extended; which, as is thought, ſignified, That it would laſt a thouſand years, and ſo would have an end in 1639 (m). I do not enquire, whether the calculation is exact, neither do I concern my ſelf to refute ſuch things: but I ought to ſay, in behalf of Chriſtian authors, That the followers of this impoſtor, conſults, are certain prophetic authors, the ſigns that have appeared in Heaven, and the conſtellations; from all theſe he concludes, that the Turkiſh empire, and all Mahometiſm, draws near its final period; that they cannot eſcape; and that the Golden Age is juſt at hand, which ſhall eſtabliſh an univerſal peace upon earth. Beſoldus is admirable (231), he mentions both this treatiſe of Nazarus, and another (232), which was written in 1480, and printed at Paris about the year 1520. In it the Chriſtians were promiſed an hundred noble triumphs, which have proved meer chimera's; and yet he avers, that the final period of Mahometiſm draws near, which he founds upon this obſervation, That the Sciences do not now flouriſh there as they have done formerly. Hæcque omnia, licet vana & fanatica multis videantur, ac etiam ratione temporis vel loci falli poſſint; certum tamen multi habent, adpropinquare quoque Saracenicæ legis ruinam. Nam ſanè jam diù eſt, quod diſciplina & eruditio ab eadem receſſit (233). The Sieur Konig informs us, that Mr Baſire, chaplain to Charles I, king of England, declared, as he paſſed by Leipſic, when he was going to London, after the reſtauration of Charles II, that, according to the Apocalypſe, there would quickly be a war againſt the Turks: that we were now in the time of the ſixth vial: That the Turks would be very ſucceſsful in this war, and that they would attack the city of Rome; and that, after this victory, their empire would decline, and fall away; and that the wiſe men of that nation were of that opinion (234). There was a book printed at Paris in 1686, in which are inſerted many prophecies of things fatal to the oriental nations (235), which were given out by the abbot Joachim, by St Nerſes patriarch of the Armenians, by St Catalius biſhop of Trent (236), by St Angelus a carmelite, and by Berobius (237) of Patras. The author, pretending, that theſe oracles concern the moſt Chriſtian king, and exhort him to make war with the Ottomans. I ſhall not here repeat what I have ſaid in another place (238), to which the reader may have recourſe: I ſhall only ſay, that, among ſo many prophets, who have all pronounced wo, wo, againſt the Mohometan empire, there are ſome who have promiſed it great bleſſings. The Aſtronomers of Toledo publiſhed, in the XIIIth century, a prediction, that, within ſeven years, there ſhould ariſe diſputes among the Saracens, and that they would abandon their religion, and embrace the Goſpel. A Divine of Franeker (239) repreſented to Comenius, the falſhood of that oracle, by citing to him a Theſis, wherein Samuel Mareſius had ſaid, That it would be eaſy to prove by Scripture, that the Turks and Tartars ſhall not be converted, but that they ſhall join with the remains of Anti-chriſt, and endeavour to deſtroy Chriſtianity: that God, by his miracles, ſhall hinder them, and that they ſhall all be intirely ruined, at the ſecond coming of JESUS CHRIST. Mareſius was not to oppoſe the account of the Millennaries; they pretend, that the Turks ſhall be converted. Let us relate what concerns the Aſtronomers of Toledo. ‘ Ac ‘ prout eventu caruit illa Aſtronomorum Toletanorum ‘ prædictio ante 400 annos edita, quæ ex Wendovero ‘ refertur in Additamentis Matthæi Pariſienſis, ex edit. Londinenſi anni 1632. & juxta quam intra ſeptennium ‘ ab edito illo Oraculo oritura erat dubietas inter Saracenos, & erant reliqui Mahumerias ſuas, & futuri ‘ unum cum Chriſtianis; ita non debemus nos facile ‘ lactare novâ ſpe converſionis Turcarum, quæ nuſquam ‘ in Dei Verbo promiſſa eſt (240). ---- And, as that ‘ prediction of the Aſtronomers of Toledo has not been fulfilled, which was publiſhed four hundred years ago, as ‘ cited from Wendover, in the ſupplement of Matthew ‘ Paris, edit. Lond. 1632, and, according to which, ‘ within ſeven years after the publication to that pro- ‘ phecy, there were to ariſe among the Saracens doubts ‘ concerning their religion, and they were to quit their ‘ Mahometiſm, and become one with the Chriſtians; ſo ‘ we ought not to deceive our ſelves with a new hope of ‘ converting the Turks, which is no where promiſed in ‘ the word of GOD’. There are alſo ſome, who foretel, That the Turks ſhall make great conqueſts; that they ſhall make inrodes as far as Flanders and Picardy. Read what I am going to tranſcribe. I have put in the margin the quotations of the author, without altering any thing in them. ‘ Quam (ſenectutem imperii Turcici) etiamſi nondum agnoſcant plurimi ‘ Gogiticam priùs expectantes irruptionem, vel militiæ ‘ Turcicæ Coloniam uſque † deductionem, tùm Picardiæ, Flandriæ & Brabantiæ ‡, imò omnium ‘ omninò regionum ‡ per Turcas, præceſſuras incurſiones; nos tamen de Turcicâ ſenectute præſenti non ‘ vaticinia tantùm, ſed alia etiam indicia reddunt certiſſimos (241). ---- Though many do not acknowledge ‘ this decline of the Turkiſh empire, expecting firſt an ‘ irruption, or rather leading of the Turkiſh forces as far ‘ as Cologn, and their over-running Picardy, Flanders, ‘ Brabant, and almoſt all countries; yet not only pro- ‘ phecies, but manifeſt tokens, confirm me in the opinion ‘ of the preſent decay of the Turkiſh power.’ You will find a ſupplement to all this in the remark [B] of the article TORQUATO (ANTONY).

(m) See Andreas Carolus, at pag. 953, of the Memorabilia Eccleſ. ſeculi XVII.

If we ſhould aſcribe all theſe prophetical threatnings to one cauſe only, we ſhould be miſtaken. The deſire ſome have to comfort themſelves with the hopes of the deſtruction of a furious perſecutor, makes them eaſily find this deſtruction in the predictions of Scripture, or in ſome other things. Thus, there are ſome who foretel through credulity and illuſion. The deſire of comforting people, and diſſipating their fears, obliges ſome to ſuppoſe, that the Scripture, prodigies, and many other prognoſtics, promiſe the approaching ruin of the power, which they fear. Thus there are ſome, who foretel things out of policy. Thoſe, who do it in order to render their troops more courageous, are prophets of the ſame kind. There are ſome, who prophecy, in order to ſtir up ſedition in an enemy's country; for inſtance, to encourage the Greeks, who acknowledge the Grand-Seignor for their prince, to take arms againſt their maſter. Theſe belong to another claſs, and may be called prophets of ſedition. You may place in what claſs you pleaſe, I care not which, the Pagans mentioned by St Auguſtin, who vented a prophecy, according to which Chriſtianity was to be deſtroyed, after it had laſted 365 years. ‘ Excogitaverunt neſcio quos verſus Græcos, ‘ tanquam conſulenti cuidam divino oraculo effuſos, ‘ ubi Chriſtum quidem ab hujus tanquam ſacrilegii crimine faciunt innocentem: Petrum autem maleficia ‘ feciſſe ſubjungunt, ut coleretur Chriſti nomen per ‘ 365 annos: deinde completo memorato numero annorum, ſine mora ſumeret finem (242). ----- They ‘ invented I know not what Greek verſes, in the manner ‘ of an oracle, or prophecy, in which they clear CHRIST ‘ from this crime of ſacrilege as it were: but they ſub- ‘ join, that Peter procured by wicked arts, that the name ‘ of CHRIST ſhould be worſhiped 365 years; which ‘ term of years being completed, it was immediately to ‘ have an end.’ St Auguſtin found, that, reckoning theſe 365 years from the reſurrection of JESUS CHRIST, they expired a year before Paganiſm received as it were its mortal blow, by the deſtruction of its temples. ‘ Sequenti anno, conſule Manlio Theodoro, quando jam ſecundùm illud oraculum dæmonum aut figmentum hominum, nulla eſſe debuit ‘ religio Chriſtiana, quid per alias terrarum partes ‘ forſitan factum ſit, non fuit neceſſe perquirere. Interim quod ſcimus, in civitate notiſſima & eminentiſſima Carthagine Africæ Gaudentius & Jovius ‘ comites Imperatoris Honorii, quarto decimo calendas ‘ Aprilis Falſorum Deorum templa everterunt, & ſimulachra fregerunt (243). ---- In the following year, ‘ Manlius Theodorus being conſul, when, according to ‘ that oracle of devils, or forgery of men, the Chriſtian ‘ religion was to be no more, what perhaps was done in ‘ other parts of the world, it was not neceſſary to enquire. ‘ In Carthage, the moſt famous city of Afric, we are ‘ aſſured, that Gaudentius and Jovius, under the em- ‘ peror Honorius, overthrew the temples of the falſe ‘ gods, and broke down the images.’ St Auguſtin obſerves, that ſeveral Pagans were converted, by the reflexions they made upon the falſhood of this oracle. As to the motives of thoſe, who publiſhed it, ſee what I quote out of Baronius. ‘ Tanta gloria ejus (Chriſti) Eccleſia † Methodus apud Wolf. Rer. Memor. Tom. ii, ann. 1571.

‡ Claromontamus, apud. Wolf. lib. i.

‡ Secundùm Prophetiam Hebræam à Bemebo Patarenſi Epiſcopo in Latinum tranſlatam. Note, that in Wolfius, pag. m. 886, this author is called Bemechobus.

(231) Ubi ſupra, pag. 48.

(232) De futuris Chriſtianorum triumphis in Saracenos. The author is called Magiſter Joannes Viterbienſis.

(233) Beſoldus, ubi ſupra.

(234) Konig, Bibliotb. Vet. & Nov. pag. 90. ex Epiſtola Lipſiæ ſcripta die, 24 Aug. 1661.

(235) See the Journal of Leipſic for the month of February, 1688, pag. 81. in the abſtract of the Theatre de la Turquie, par le Sieur Michel le Fevre.

(236) S. Catalii Epiſcopi Tridentini, Act. Lipſ. ibid. He ſhould have ſaid, S. Cataldi Epiſcopi Tarentini.

(237) I believe it is the ſame with Bemechobus, in one of the following citations.

(238) In the article HERLICIUS, remark [F].

(239) Nicolaus Arnoldus, in Diſcurſ. Theolog. contra Comenium, printed at Franeker, in 1660.

(240) Mareſius, Diſp. iii, Th. 28, apud Arnoldum, ubi ſupra, pag. 91, 92.

(241) Schultetus, ubi ſupra, p. 21.

THE origin of the prophetical threatenings againſt the Turks.

(242) Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. xviii, cap. liii. See the biſhop of Meaux's Explication of the Apocalypſe, cap. xix, pag. 231, of the Dutch edition.

(243) Item, Auguſt. ibid. cap. liv.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

impoſtor, have publiſhed the moſt ridiculous fables about him; for they are the perſons, who inform us, that rice and roſes ſprung out of his ſweat [HH]; and that the angel Gabriel taught him the compoſition of a ragoo, which gave him great vigour for the enjoyment of women [II]. For the reſt, the religion of this falſe teacher was ſubject

(244) Baronius, ad ann. 313, num. xvii, pag. m. 130.

' Eccleſia auctа . . . . accidit ut Gentiles, qui viderent ' Eccleſiam Chriſtianam tanta gloria auctam, adeoque ' immenſa claritudine illuſtratam, invidia tabeſcentes, ' quo ſolatio aliquo lenirent de Chriſtianorum gaudio ' & incrementis conceptum mœrorem & amicorum acer- ' bitatem, novum oraculum confinxerunt, atque ore ' omnium diffamarunt Græcis quibuſdam verſibus præ- ' cinentes Chriſtianam religionem 365 annis duratu- ' ram, quorum 313 jam prope elapſi eſſent (244). --- ' The glory of CHRIST's church being ſo greatly in- ' creaſed, it happened that the Gentiles, who were wit- ' neſſes of the flouriſhing ſtate of the Chriſtian church, to ' comfort themſelves in ſome meaſure for its proſperity, ' which they beheld with grief and envy, forged a new ' prophecy, ſpreading it abroad in certain Greek verſes, ' which foretold, that the Chriſtian religion ſhould con- ' tinue 365 years, of which 313 were then almoſt ' elapſed.'

Some of thoſe, who have promiſed great conqueſts to the Turks, have been gradually determined to it by the hatred they conceived againſt the houſe of Auſtria; whether it be that that hatred rendered them really fanatics, or that they only pretended to viſions. But others have only followed the ſyſtem, which they had made upon the prophecies of the Apocalyſe, Gog and Magog, &c. Two things were lately told me: I. That a famous miniſter in Amſterdam had preached, during the ſiege of Vienna in 1683, That the Turks would take that city; which prediction he grounded upon ſome paſſages of Scripture. II. That the raiſing of this ſiege did ſo affect him with grief, that he died of it: not that he wiſhed, as Drabicius did, that the Turks ſhould make great progreſs in Germany; but he was vexed to be miſtaken. However, we may conclude, That thoſe, who attempt to reveal future things concerning the Great Turk, have miſtaken the times; for when they threatned him with ruin, he triumphed; when they promiſed him conqueſts, he loſt battles and provinces, as he has done ſince the year 1683 (245). But we may obſerve, that, even in the time of Drabicius, there were ſome people in Holland, who promiſed, that the Turk ſhould be deſtroyed. There were two pieces of a very different nature publiſhed at Leyden in 1664. The title of the firſt was, de Tartarorum irruptione ſuccincta Diſſertatio (246); the other, Paræneſis ad Chriſtianos, ſuggerens conſilium ad eos liberandos, & opprimendos Turcas. In the firſt, Holland is threatned with irruptions of the Tartars, unleſs it furniſhed great ſums of money for levying the troops, that were neceſſary to the war againſt the Turks. In the other, the conqueſt of the Turkiſh empire is promiſed, provided great levies were made of men and money; and the manner of dividing this conqueſt is deſcribed.

(245) See the article KOPTE-BUS, remarks [A] and [G].

(246) The Dutch verſion is in the oppoſite page.

[HH] That rice and roſes ſprung out of his ſweat.] Here are the words of two learned Maronites (247). Ineptè Mohamedis ſequaces confabulantur, ortam eſſe (orizam) ex ipſius Mohamedis ſudore antequam mundo ſe manifeſtaret, mundum infeſtaret penè dixerim, cùm thronum Dei circuibat in paradiſo: Deus enim converſus reſpexit eum, Mohamedes præ pudore ſudavit, tergenſque digito ſudorem, ſex extra paradiſum guttas miſit, ex quarum una roſa, ex altera oriza productæ ſunt, ex reliquis quatuor, quatuor Mohamedis ſocii nati ſunt. This ſurpaſſes the abſurdeſt viſions of legendary Chriſtians. Mahomet, ſay they, walked round the throne of GOD in paradiſe, before he ſhewed himſelf to men. GOD turned towards him, and looked upon him: Mahomet was ſo aſhamed, that he ſweat; and having wiped off the ſweat with his fingers, he let fall ſix drops out of paradiſe, one of which produced a roſe, and another a grain of rice; from the other four drops ſprung the four companions of Mahomet. ' What think you, ' Sir, of the idle fancy of the Arabians, (theſe are ' the words of Balzac) who took the roſe away from ' the goddeſs Venus, to give it to the prophet Maho- ' met; and who maintain, (as Buſbequius ſays in his ' relations), That the firſt roſes did ſpring out of the ' ſweat of this great prophet? Do you not admire ' their Chronology, that will not allow there were ' any roſes in the world, before the reign of Hera- ' clius?' (248)

(247) Gabriel Sionita, & Jo. Hefronita, de Nemmalis Oriental. Urbibus, pag. 5.

[II] [The angel Gabriel taught him the compoſition of a ragoo, which gave him great vigour for the enjoyment of women.] He boaſted, That he had learned from the angel Gabriel, that the virtue of this ragoo (249) was to fortify the reins. Having eat once of it, by the order of the angel, he had ſufficient ſtrength to fight againſt forty men: Upon another occaſion, he had to do with women forty times, without being fatigued (250). Mohamedes . . . . . affirmabat . . . . . hoc pulmentum à Gabriele Angelo ſe ediſtum fuiſſe, & utilitatem ejus, eodem Angelo teſte, in eo conſiſtere, ut renes corroboret. Quandoque Angeli juſſu Mohamedes ex eo edens una nocte pugnavit adverſus quadraginta viros, aliaſque quadragies indefatigatus rem cum fœminis habuit. Sanè hæc, annum delirantium fabellas aut alicujus Moſlemanicæ ſectæ oſoris calumnias eſſe opinaremur, niſi præfatum authorem (251) juris peritiſſimum eumdemque obſequentiſſimum Mohamedis ſectatorem ea omnia diſertè Arabico ſtylo, capite de quorundam ciborum delectu & utilitate, videremus referentem. We have here a grave author among the Mahometans, who relates theſe infamous things of his Prophet; and therefore we muſt not ſuſpect, that the Chriſtians or Jews have invented theſe tales, on purpoſe to blacken this impoſtor; and ſo, though we do not read in the Alcoran, that the pleaſures of the conjunction between the two ſexes, ſhall laſt each time ſixty entire years, we for all that may believe, that this is a Mahometan tradition. But that every one may the better judge of this, we muſt produce a paſſage, which informs us, that Dr Pocock, ſo well verſed in Mahometan authors, ſays nothing of this tradition. Here is a note of Beſpier upon what Sir Paul Ricaut ſays (252), that the falſe prophet promiſed a Paradiſe, wherein there ſhould be fine women, the enjoyment of whom would give exceſſive pleaſures, ... and which would laſt ſixty entire years without diſcontinuance. ' (253) The Alcoran no where ' ſpeaks of the duration of theſe pleaſures. Baudier ' makes no ſcruple to extend it to fifty years, pag. 661 ' of his Hiſtory of the Religion of the Turks. This ' is what he has taken out of Vigenere, pag. 208, ' of his Illuſtrations upon Chalcondylas, and what ' both of them have taken out of John Andreas, pag. ' 72, where he ſays the ſame thing. I do not com- ' plain, that they have tranſcribed him in an infinite ' number of places, as they have done chiefly as to ' the pleaſures of Paradiſe, concerning which they ' have taken, almoſt word for word, four or five pages: ' but I blame them, becauſe neither of them names ' him in the places, which they have tranſcribed. For ' the reſt, I do not know whether the Zuna ſpeaks ' of theſe fifty years, as John Andreas affirms; but ' Pocock, who was very exact in deſcribing all that ' the Mahometans ſay of the pleaſures of Paradiſe, ſays ' nothing either of the fifty years of John Andreas, ' Baudier, and Vigenere, or of the ſixty years of our ' author: he only ſays, that theſe Infidels affirm, there ' ſhall be a hundred different degrees of pleaſure in ' Paradiſe, the leaſt of which ſhall be ſo great, that ' to the end the faithful may reliſh it without being ' over-whelmed, GOD ſhall give to each of them the ' ſtrength of a hundred men. Kowat miat ragiol.'

(248) Balzac, Entret. v, cap. ii, pag. m. 87. Compare the remark [DD], of the article JUNO.

(249) Here follows the compoſition of it, Solent (Arabes) frequenter nutriri pulmento quodam Heriſe dicto, quod ex tritico prius decocto conficiunt, poſt ſoli exſiccandum exponitur, tum in urna contunditur, donec emundetur, poſtremò pingui carne ſimul coquitur, donec carо conſumatur, quod ſane palato non eſt ingratum. - - - - The Arabians are wont to feed upon a certain pottage called Heriſe, which they make of boiled wheat; it is afterwards laid out to dry in the ſun; then it is beat in a mortar, till it is cleanſed; laſtly, it is boiled up with fat fleſh, till the fleſh be conſumed; which certainly is not diſagreeable to the palate. Gabriel Sionita, & Jo. Eſronita, ubi ſupra.

(250) Gabriel Sion. & Jo. Eſron. ibid.

(251) That is, If I be not miſtaken, Mohamedes Ben. Caſem, of whom they cite, pag. 2. Hortus rerum deleſtabilium.

(252) Ricaut, ubi ſupra, pag. 322.

(253) Beſpier's Curious Remarks, pag. 625.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ject to the same inconvenience, which was observed at the birth of Christianity, and the beginning of Luther's reformation; for, as soon as he had prophesied, there arose several false prophets [KK], and his followers were quickly divided. I am less astonished at his boldness, with respect to the promise of the Paraclet, than at that of some Arabian authors, who boast of having read copies of the Gospel, that contained some things concerning Mahomet, which they pretend the Christians have blotted out [LL]. I know not,

'scientiâ præditorum, multo magis prophetarum) imprimis 'vero sensum illum qui juxta Aristotelem opprobrio nobis 'est, ac turpitudinem rei Venereæ; idcoque hoc indicio 'detexit DEUS omnes falso de affiatu prophetico glo- 'riabundos, ut ita patefieret veritas eam indagantibus, & 'ne in errorem inducantur (254). - - - - Let me here cite 'the words of Maimonides, in Moreh lib. ii, cap. xl, 'where he teaches how to distinguish false prophets, as 'follows. Now the way to distinguish such an one, 'is, to observe his personal excellence, and to inquire 'into his life and conversation: but the principal mark 'of distinction is, if he has renounced and despises 'corporeal pleasures (for this is the first advance of 'learned men, and much more of prophets) and espe-'cially that sense, which, according to Aristotle, is a 'reproach to us, together with the filth of venereal 'matters: therefore by this mark GOD has detected 'all who have falsely pretended to inspiration, that 'the enquirers after truth may not be led into er-'ror.' It cannot be said, that no body was deceived in this case, and that those who adhered to Mahomet, did it only through self-love, knowing his impostures. This is an assertion that cannot be maintained. The greatest part of his disciples rejected the news of his death, as a falshood, which was inconsistent with his heavenly mission; and, to undeceive them, it was necessary to prove to them by the Alcoran, that he was to die (255). They were therefore seduced by his words. Now when we are once prepossessed with an opinion, that a certain man is a prophet, or a great servant of GOD, we are apt to believe rather, that the crimes which he commits, are no crimes, than to think that he commits any crime. This is the effect of the foolish prejudices of many narrow souls. Did not Seneca himself say, that it would be more easy to prove drunkenness to be a commendable thing, than that Cato committed a sin in being drunk (256)? In like manner the followers of Mahomet said in their hearts, it is better to believe, that leudness is not a vice, since our great prophet is subject to it, than to believe, that, since he is subject to it, he is not a great prophet. We see every day some instances of the same prejudices. If a man has once acquired the reputation of a great zealot for orthodox opinions, and signalized himself in disputes against Heresy, most people are so prejudiced in his favour, that you cannot bring them to confess, that he has done amiss, in doing those things, which they would condemn, if any other should do them. St Paul says only, that the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the believing husband (257); but, if he had spoke according to the humour of these people, he should have said, that all that belongs to an orthodox man, and all that he does, is sanctified by him.

(254) Edwardus Pocockius, Notis in Specimen. Historiæ Arabum, pag. 181.

(255) See Pocock. ibid. pag. 178, 180.

THE strange effects of prejudice.

(256) Catoni ebrietas objecta est: at facilius efficiet quisquis objecerit, hoc crimen honestum, quam turpem Catonem. Seneca de Tranquillitate Animi, cap. xv. pag. m. 674.

(257) 1 Cor. ch. vii, ver. 14.

[KK] There arose many other false prophets.] I remember the exordium of a sermon of Mr Daillé, which turned upon this thought, that as soon as GOD sends men to declare the truth, the devil raises up false teachers, to broach Heresies. He raised, in the times of the apostles, Cerinthus, Ebion, &c. and at the time of the reformation, John of Leyden, David George, Servetus, and Socinus. The design of the devil is to cross the progress of the truth; for it was natural to believe, that the Jews and Pagans would despise the Gospel, when they should see a variety of sects among those that preach it. So likewise it was probable, that the Catholics would despise and insult the Reformation, when they should see Luther, Zuinglius, Muncer, and Calvin, take different ways, and maintain disputes against several party-leaders, who, after their example, would forsake the Romish communion. Two objections naturally occur: I. If these people were inspired by GOD, they would be unanimous. II. Supposing that we must forsake the ancient doctrine, which party must we chuse among so many new sects? It is better for us to continue where we are, than to discuss, whether one of them is true, and which it is. The event did not confirm these conjectures in their full extent; for, though it cannot be denied, that the multitude of false teachers, who arose in the first century, and formed so many parties in the bosom of the infant church, did a great deal of mischief to the good cause; yet it must be confessed, that it did not all the mischief the devil might hope for. Scepticism gained but little; I have already given the reasons of it (258). This observation may be applied to the times of Luther and Calvin. These two great Reformers did not make all the progress they might have done, had they been united in the same sentiments, and if all those, who opposed the Romish church, had spoken the same language. Their divisions were a prejudice, which kept many persons in the Romish communion; nevertheless the Protestant religion increased in a short time, and gained a durable footing. However, every one may be sensible, that the devil pursues very well his own interest, if he crosses the progress of a new orthodoxy, as Mr Daillé supposes; but it is not easy to conceive, that, having raised up Mahomet, to plant a false religion, he should oppose against him the same obstacles, he did against the apostles of Jesus Christ. How came it then to pass, that false prophets, the emissaries of Satan, attempted to destroy Mahometism at it's first appearance? Whence was it, that Mahomet had his rivals, who boasted of heavenly inspiration as well as he (259)? How happened it, that Museilema, his disciple, abandoned him, to form a separate sect (260)? How came it, that an Aswad, a Taliha, an Almotenabbi, set up for prophets, and drew after them as many followers as they could (261)? It is not easy to account for these phænomena, unless we suppose, that there is as great a division among the bad angels, as among men, or that men, without the instigation of the devil, will attempt to found sects. The heads of the parties, that I have named, called Mahomet a false prophet. But there arose others, after his death, who, without calling in question his authority, pretended to excel one another in the understanding of the Alcoran. The two great sects, which arose at first, of Ali and Omar, still continue. Was not the permission of this prejudicial to Mahometism? Was this the interest of the devil?

(258) In the article LUTHER, remark [CC].

(259) See Hottinger. Hist. Orientat. lib. ii, cap. iii, p. 258.

(260) Id. ib.

(261) Ib. p. 259.

How great soever this difficulty may appear, several answers may be made to it. It may be said, that the devil is not much concerned, if a false prophet be crossed by other false prophets, and if each of those impostors debauches the followers of his rivals: the devil can lose nothing by that means; for it is equal to him, whether they follow Mahomet, or Museilema, or Almotenabbi. The fights, the wars, the confusions of all sorts, which these divisions produce, are a more diverting spectacle to the enemy of mankind, than the calm and successful progress of but one false sect. Besides, it flatters the pride of an ambitious spirit, to shew, that he can settle Mahometism in spight of a hundred obstacles. Might he not hope, that, if this sect did wonderfully increase, notwithstanding it was opposed in it's infancy by other sects, this would be looked upon as a character of it's divinity, and he should thereby mimic GOD, who never displayed his power, in protecting the Gospel more sensibly, than by preventing the bad effects of the Heresies and Schisms of the first century.

[LL] Some Arabian authors . . . . boast of having read copies of the Gospel, that contained some things concerning Mahomet, which they pretend the Christians have blotted out.] The most incredulous men stagger, when they see grave authors affirm certain things with a great pomp of circumstances, as having seen them with their own eyes. It is therefore necessary to make it appear, by some notable examples, that such affirmations are sometimes deceitful. What greater example can we alledge, than that, which I am going to mention; wherein we see, that a Mahometan affirms, that a Christian shewed him a copy of the Gospel, in which there are many things clearly and expressly said concerning Mahomet, and that there is but one more copy in the world like this. 'Inter nomina seu titulos 'blasphemi impostoris Paracletum numerant, teste Al 'Jannabio: quin & aliàs in loco non uno, antè Evan'gelia

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

not, whether we may believe what ſome ſay, that Mahomet declared, that only a third part of the Alcoran was true [MM].

He who would ſee a Chronological account of the actions and adventures of this falſe prophet ſupported by very good citations, and a fine detail of circumſtances, need only read Dr. Prideaux's book (n). It has been tranſlated out of Engliſh into French (o), ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary. In it, among other things, there are many proofs, that Mahomet was an impoſtor, and that he made his impoſture ſubſervient to his luſt (p). One of theſe proofs is taken from hence, that the variations of his prophetic ſpirit were ſuited to the change of his private intereſt [NN]. What is related of his amours, is very ſtrange. He was jealous to the higheſt degree, and yet he bore with patience the galantries of that wife, which was the deareſt to him [OO]. He could never

(n) Intituled, The Life of Mahomet.

(o) The French tranſlation was publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1698.

(p) Prideaux, Life of Mahomet, pag. m. 155.

' gelia à Chriſtianis corrupta expreſſam ejus factam ' mentionem ſibi facile perſuadent, idque ab ipſis Chri- ' ſtianis edocti, ut refert Author modo laudatus; Mo- ' hammodem ſcil. Al Selencium, neſcio quem, à Sa- ' cerdote quodam magni inter Chriſtianos nominis didi- ' ciſſe nullibi extare Evangelii exemplar incorruptum, ' quàm apud ſe unum; ac Pariſiis alterum, atque è ' ſuo multa coram ipſis legiſſe, in quibus multa & per- ' ſpicua de Mohammede narrarentur (262). - - - - -

(262) Pocockius, ubi ſupra, pag. 185, 186.

' Among the names of this blaſphemous impoſtor, they ' reckon the Comforter, upon the authority of Al Jan- ' nabius: beſides which, they eaſily perſuade themſelves, ' that, before the Goſpels were corrupted by the Chriſtians, ' expreſs mention was made of him; and that upon the ' teſtimony of the Chriſtians themſelves, as the above-cited ' author relates; to wit, that one Mohammed Al Selen- ' cius had learned from a prieſt of great reputation among ' the Chriſtians, that there were but two uncorrupted ' copies of the Goſpel, the one in his own poſſeſſion, the other ' at Paris; and that he had read to them many things ' out of his copy, which were evidently ſpoken of Ma- ' homet.'

[MM] Some ſay, that Mahomet declared, that only a third part of the Alcoran was true.] Father Joſeph de Santa Maria, a bare footed Carmelite, apoſtolical miſſionary in the kingdom of Malabar, affirms (263), that the inhabitants of Maſcati pretend to be the moſt faithful obſervers of Mahomet's law, and that Mahomet declared, that of 12000 words, that are in the Alcoran, only 4000 are true. When they are confuted in any point, and know not how to defend themſelves, they place it in the number of the 8000 falſities. This is a very convenient way to come off in a diſpute.

(263) In the book intitled, Prima Speditione all' Indie Orientali, printed at Rome. The Journal of Italy, March 31, 1668, makes mention of it.

[NN] The variations of his prophetic ſpirit were ſuited to the change of his private intereſt.] We ſhall keep to the words of Dr Prideaux (264). ' Almoſt ' all his Alcoran was framed * after this manner, ' to anſwer ſome private deſign he had, according as ' occaſion required. If he had any new thing to ſet ' on foot; or ſome objection againſt himſelf, or his ' religion, to anſwer; ſome difficulty to reſolve; or ' ſome diſcontent among the people to pacify; ſome ' ſcandal to remove, or ſomething elſe to be done for ' carrying on his deſigns, he had commonly recourſe ' to the angel Gabriel for ſome new revelation; and ' preſently he inſerted in the Alcoran ſome addition, ' proper to anſwer the ends he then propoſed to him- ' ſelf. So that the whole almoſt was compoſed upon ' occaſions of this nature, to produce in his own party ' the effect which he propoſed to himſelf. And all his ' commentators plainly enough confeſs it, by ſhewing ' exactly the reaſons, for which each chapter had ' been ſent them from heaven. But this was the ' cauſe of the many contradictions, that are to be ' found in this book. For as this impoſtor's affairs ' and deſigns varied, he was obliged to vary his pre- ' tended revelations; which is ſo well known among ' thoſe of his ſect, that they all confeſs this to be ' true; upon which account, when theſe contradi- ' ctions are ſuch, that they cannot be reconciled, they ' revoke one of the contradictory places. And they ' reckon in the whole Alcoran  more than one ' hundred and fifty verſes thus revoked, which is the ' beſt expedient they can take for ſaving the contra- ' dictions and inconſiſtencies that are in it. But herein ' they diſcover very much the levity and inconſtancy ' of him, who was the author of it.' This proof of impoſture is of great force: I have mentioned it already (265); but here I ought to add, that it would be too far extended, if it ſhould be made uſe of without exception againſt all the expounders of the Apocalypſe, who change their hypotheſes as the general affairs take a different turn (266). It may ſometimes happen, that there is nothing but Fanaticiſm in the inconſtancy of thoſe men, and that not being ſenſible of the diſorder of their brain, they are no leſs ſincere, when they vary, than when they do not. Let us therefore make uſe of a diſtinction, and ſay only, that thoſe, who change their Apocalyptic ſyſtem, according to the news in the Gazette, and always agreeably to the general deſign of their writings, publiſh falſities, either without knowing it, or knowingly. Their conduct is very often an impoſture, but not always.

(264) Prideaux, Life of Mahomet, pag. 155.

* Richardi Confutatis, cap. xii.

 Johannes Andreas, Guadagnol. Tract. ii, cap. vii, fect. iii.

(265) In the remark [T].

[OO] He was jealous to the higheſt degree, and yet he bore with patience the galantries of that wife, which was deareſt to him.] ' As he became a brutiſh ſlave ' to the love of women, ſo he was extreamly jealous ' of thoſe he had married. Thus to diſſuade them ' from what he feared †, he threatened them once ' with a ſeverer chaſtiſement, than is given to other ' women, not only in this world, but in that which ' is to come, ſuppoſing that they ſhould be unfaithful ' to him. And when ſome of his followers frequented ' his houſe too much, and converſed there with ſome ' of his wives, he was ſo incenſed at it, that, to ' prevent it for the future, he declared, as in the ' name of God, thoſe verſes in the Alcoran ‡, ' wherein he tells them, that they ought not to enter ' into the houſe of the prophet without leave, and ' that if they were invited to dine at his houſe, they ' ought to go away immediately after dinner, with- ' out entering into any converſation with his wives; ' and that, altho' the prophet was aſhamed to bid ' them go, yet God was not aſhamed to tell them ' the truth. And, in the ſame chapter, he forbids ' his wives to ſpeak to any man, unleſs their face ' was covered with a veil. Laſtly, he carried his ' jealouſy even beyond the grave; for, not being ' able to endure, that any ſhould have to do with his ' wives, tho' after his death ‡; he ſeverely forbad ' all his followers to come near them, as long they ' lived. So that, tho' all other women, when they ' were divorced, or became widows, had the liberty ' to marry again, yet all his wives were excluded ' from this privilege. Upon which account, all thoſe, ' whom he left behind him at his death ‡‡, remained ' always widows, tho' ſome of them were very young, ' as particularly Ayeſha, who was not then full twenty ' years old, and who lived forty eight years after, ' which was looked upon, in that hot country, as a ' very ſevere reſtraint (267).'

† Alcoran, cap. xxxiii.

‡ Alcoran, cap. xxxiii.

‡‡ Johannes Andreas, cap. vii.

You ſee, in theſe words of Dr Prideaux, that the ſame wife, whom we called above Aaiſca (268), is here called Ayeſha. The two authors, whom I have cited in that place, do not well expreſs themſelves; they ſay, that Mahomet was buried in the tomb of Aaiſca; but, ſince ſhe ſurvived him, it had been better to ſay, that he was buried in the chamber of this wife. Thus Dr Prideaux expreſſes himſelf (269). He tells us (270), that Ayeſha, the daughter of Abubeker, was ſhe of all his wives, whom Mahomet loved moſt tenderly . . . .; and tho' ſhe was a woman †† that loved galantry, and was always buſied in ſome intrigue, yet Mahomet could never reſolve to put her away. He wrote therefore the twenty fourth chapter of the Alcoran, to declare her innocent, and at the ſame time to juſtify himſelf for keeping her. Therefore he declares there to his Muſſulmen, in the name of God, that all thoſe reports, that were ſpread to the diſadvantage of Ayeſha, were impoſtures, and black calumnies; forbids them to ſpeak any more of them, and threatens, at the ſame time, with terrible puniſhments, both in this life and the other, thoſe who ſhould dare to defame good women. Mahomet having married her young ††, took care to inſtruct her in all the

(267) Prideaux, Life of Mahomet, pag. 153, &c.

(268) In the remark [EE], citation (207).

(269) Prideaux, pag. 134.

(270) Id. ib. pag. 139.

†† Diſputatio Chriſtiani, cap. vi, Commentat. in Alcoran. cap. xxiv.

†† Appendix ad Geograph. Nubienſ. cap. viii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

never reſolve to put her away; and he brought in the great machines of his revelations, to put a ſtop to the ſcandalous reports concerning her, and the offence his tenderneſs for a wife of bad fame gave the people. His followers thought at laſt, that ſhe was virtuous; for they received as oracles the interpretation ſhe put upon the words of their law [PP]. Some Chriſtian authors have publiſhed a very ridiculous tale concerning the credulity the ſciences that were uſually taught in Arabia, and chiefly in the elegance and politeneſs of language, and the knowledge of their antiquities: ſhe profited extreamly by her huſband's care, and became very polite and learned *. She hated Ali furiouſly, becauſe he diſcovered her incontinence and immoralities to Mahomet. Here follows another proof of the tenderneſs wherewith ſhe was beloved by her huſband. Sewda was ſhe of all Mahomet's wives †, whom he loved leaſt; he had even reſolved to put her away; but he was diverted from it by her earneſtly begging of him, that ſhe might ſtill continue to enjoy the name of Mahomet's wife, and promiſed him, that ſhe would require nothing more; that when her turn ſhould come to lie with him, ſhe would reſign it to Ayeſha. The love he had for Ayeſha made him willingly conſent to this bargain, and ſo Sewda continued in his houſe during her life, upon the conditions propoſed (271).

Some perhaps may think, that I ſpeak improperly, when I affirm, that Mahomet bore with patience the galantries of that wife, whom he loved moſt tenderly; for one may imagine, that he believed her very innocent; and in that caſe we muſt not conſider him as a huſband tender and jealous, and at the ſame time inſenſible to her conjugal unfaithfulneſs. Where will then be the ſingularity of that character I have ſpoken of? I anſwer, that there is no probability that he doubted of the galantries of Ayeſha. He was informed of them by the relation of Ali his ſon-in-law; and he continued to have as great a friendſhip for, and confidence in him, as he had before; and doubtleſs he would not have treated him after this manner, if he had taken him for a ſlanderer in a matter of ſo nice a nature as this was. Let us therefore believe, that he was convinced of the truth of the report; and alſo conſider, that if the amorous intrigues of his wife had not been real, ſuch tales and calumnies had never been forged of her, as obliged the falſe prophet to have recourſe to the authority of heaven, to put a ſtop to them. His followers, being once perſuaded that he ſpoke to them in the name of GOD, had a reſpect not only for his perſon, but alſo for his wives and children. They were therefore incapable of forging ſuch a bitter calumny againſt Ayeſha; but, being well acquainted with the real diſorders of her conduct, they murmured, and complained of them, as an intolerable ſcandal, which diſhonoured the man of GOD. And we muſt obſerve, that jealouſy is not always uniform in it's cauſes and effects; it deviates from it's own rules, and from the common road, oftener than is thought. There are ſome perſons, that would be jealous, if they were leſs amorous: the higheſt degree of tenderneſs produces in their heart a confidence, which a leſſer degree would not produce. There are ſome jealous perſons, who ceaſe to love, when they think themſelves betrayed. There are others, whom even a known unfaithfulneſs does not cure (272). Mahomet might very well be of this laſt ſort, with reſpect to his deareſt wife. We muſt remember that he always loved her; and this is chiefly what is to be conſidered; for if his only care had been to avoid the ridicule, to which he might have been expoſed by a divorce, we muſt aſcribe to him only a political patience, which is common enough in mankind. The number of thoſe, who prefer living with an hated object, to the noiſe of a rupture, is not inconſiderable.

[PP] His followers received as oracles the interpretation ſhe put upon their law.] Her credit, after the death of this falſe prophet, was great enough to hinder Ali from becoming Caliph. She hated him for the reaſon given in the preceding remark. Her hatred laſted long; for altho' Ali (273) had a right to the vacant throne, being ſon-in-law to the impoſtor, he was three ſeveral times ſucceſſively excluded. The throne was vacant the fourth time, and Ali at laſt came to it; but Ayeſha appeared in arms againſt him; and tho' ſhe ſucceed not this way, yet ſhe deſtroyed him, by ſtirring up and fomenting that revolt, which at length ruined Ali and his family †. Ayeſha ſurvived Mahomet full forty eight years, and enjoyed a great reputation in his ſect, who called her the propheteſs, and the mother of the faithful. She was the living oracle of his ſect, who conſulted her in all difficult points of the law, to learn of her what was the ſenſe of the law-giver. Whatever her anſwers were, they ‡ were received as oracles, and have always ſince paſſed among them for authentic traditions. All the traditions, which compoſe the Sunnah, according to them, came from Ayeſha, or from ſome one of the ten companions of Mahomet; ſo they call thoſe ten men who firſt joined that ſeducer. But the teſtimony of Ayeſha renders a tradition very authentic. Abdorrahman Ebn Auf holds the ſecond rank. Note, that Mahomet (274) did not entruſt her with the ſtrong-box of his apoſtleſhip, but Haphſa, the daughter of Omar. This is a little ſtrange; for this daughter of Omar held but the ſecond ‡ rank in the heart of her huſband Mahomet. In this box were all the originals of his pretended revelations, which ſerved for materials to compoſe the Alcoran. After this book was finiſhed, Abubcker  gave the original of it to Haphſa, to be kept in the ſame box. Which may ſerve to diſcover the error of John Andreas, who pretends †† that it was Ayeſha who kept it. For this being ſo conſiderable a truſt among the Mahometans, what probability is there, that if Ayeſha had been once put in poſſeſſion of it by the impoſtor himſelf, Abubeker ſhould have endeavoured to diſpoſſeſs her of it, eſpecially ſhe being his own daughter. But Haphſa was much older than Ayeſha, and for that reaſon probably was preferred before her, to have the charge of that precious depoſite (275).

There is ſome reaſon to wonder, that the Mahometan religion ſhould be ſo little advantageous to the female ſex (276), ſince it was founded by a man ſo exceſſively laſcivious, and ſince his laws were depoſited in the hands of one woman, and another could give what interpretation of them ſhe pleaſed. We have ſeen, that Ayeſha was looked upon as a propheteſs, and as an oracle, and ſhe was a true ſhe-Pope among the Mahometans. Mr Herbelot ſays (277), That ſhe had among them a very great authority, even in matters of doctrine and religion, and that they often had recourſe to her, to learn ſome tradition of Mahomet, and that ſhe undertook to condemn the Caliph Othman for impiety. She might then have ſettled matters upon a foot very favourable to her ſex. How then came it to paſs, that ſhe did not do it? Was ſhe of the humour of certain women, who are the firſt and moſt zealous in defaming their own ſex? May ſhe not be conſidered as a proof of what is ſometimes ſaid, That the authority of men is never greater, than when a woman is ſeated on the throne; and that the authority of women is never greater, than when the ſceptre is in the hands of a man? I cannot determine the point: let ſpeculative men exerciſe their wit as much as they pleaſe upon this queſtion. But conſider, I pray you, the influence of the fair ſex upon the foundation of Muſulmaniſm, and how the paſſions of a woman quickly ſpread in it the ſeeds of diſcord. Trace Ali's ſchiſm, and you will find the leudneſs of Ayeſha, whom he accuſed, to be the ſource of it. This woman never forgave him: ſhe hindered him three times ſucceſſively from arriving at the dignity of Caliph; and, after he had obtained it, ſhe made a league againſt him (278), and put herſelf at the head of 30000 men. She loſt the battle, and was taken, and ſent back to Medina, where ſhe died, and was buried near Mahomet: but the league, ſhe had made, to revenge the death of Othman, died not with her. Ali was at laſt killed, upon this pretence, and from thence aroſe a great ſchiſm, which ſtill continues.

I cannot conclude without obſerving a ſmall want of exactneſs in the Bibliotheque Orientale of Mr Herbelot. He ſays in the article Aiſchah, that this widow of Mahomet undertook to condemn Othman for impiety. But in another place (279), he relates, that being conſulted by the faction, who brought complaints againſt this Caliph, ſhe made anſwer, That he ought to be admitted to penance; and that ſhe maintained it afterwards to Ali. I do not object this as a contradiction,

* Diſput. Chriſtiani, cap. vi, Elmacin. lib. i, cap. iv, Abul-Faraghius, Abul-Feda, &c.

† Gentius in notis ad Muſladin. Sadum. p. 568.

(271) Prideaux, ibid. pag. 143.

(272) Every one remembers the ſong, which begins with this complaint of a lover. Une infidélité cruelle n'efface point les traits d'une infidele, &c. Tho' ſhe be cruel, ſtill ſhe's fair, &c.

(273) Prideaux, ibid. pag. 140.

† For ſhe died in the 58d year of the Hegira. Elmacin. lib. i, cap. vii.

‡ Johannes Andreas, cap. iii.

(274) Prideaux, pag. 142.

‡ Joh. Andreas, cap. vii.

 Abul-Feda. Hottingeri Bibl. Orient. cap. ii. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 362.

†† Joh. Andreas, de Confuſione Sectæ Mahometanæ, c. ii.

(275) Prideaux, ibid.

(276) See the remark [Q].

(277) Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. at the word Aiſchah, pag. 80.

(278) Herbelot, ubi ſupra; and at the word Ali, pag. 89, 90.

Mr HERBELOT criticiſed.

(279) In the article OTHMAN, pag. 696.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google credulity of the Mahometans as to miracles [QQ]. Mr. Simon is blamed for certain things he has publiſhed, which tend to extenuate the infamy of Mahometiſm (q). See the laſt chapter of his Critical Hiſtory of the belief and cuſtoms of the nations of the Levant. But if what he ſays is true at the bottom; he deſerves to be commended; for we muſt not foment the hatred of evil, by making it appear more black and hateful than it really is.

(q) See the difficulties propoſed to Mr Steyaert, part vi, from pag. 303, to pag. 316.

diction, but as an imperfect account. We muſt believe, I. That this woman judged the cauſe of Othman, and condemned him for impiety. II. That ſhe pronounced, that they ought to be ſatisfied with his penance. Mr Herbelot ſhould have united theſe two facts in the article of Aiſchah, and in the article of Othman, and not have ſeparated the one from the other, by placing the firſt in one place without the ſecond, and the ſecond in another place without the firſt. This advice is of great importance to all writers of Dictionaries; for they find it very difficult to avoid this fault. I am afraid I have been guilty of it more than once.

(280) Intitled, Prognoſticon Antichriſti.

[QQ] A very ridiculous tale concerning the credulity of the Mahometans as to miracles.] A Benedictin of the Low-Countries publiſhed a book (280) in Latin and Flemiſh, at Deventer, in 1524; in which he relates a great many idle tales, among the reſt this which follows. A Genoeſe had ſo great a curioſity to ſee what the Moors or Saracens practiſed in their moſques, that he entered it by ſtealth, tho' he knew very well the cuſtom of putting all Chriſtians to death who enter there, or forcing them to abjure Chriſtianity. He was encompaſſed with ſo great a croud, that he could not get out, when an accident happened to him, which required him to go out immediately, being very much preſſed by a natural neceſſity; he could not get the better of it, and in a little time ſaw himſelf in danger of death, the bad ſmell he ſpread around him having diſcovered the miſchance. He freed himſelf from this danger, by giving them to underſtand, that he had been for a long time coſtive, and that now being come to recommend himſelf to Mahomet, he found immediate eaſe. Whereupon they took his breeches, and hung them up in the moſque, crying out, a miracle! a miracle! The words of this monk are theſe: Cum ibi eſſet in medio maximæ multitudinis, & non poſſet exire, neceſſitaſque ei veniſſet ſuperfluum pondus corporis deponendi, ſtercoriza vit in femoralibus. Cum autem fœtor eſſet in illa Moſchæa, omnes circumſpiciebant qui hujus fœtoris cauſa fuiſſet. Invenerunteque ipſum Januenſem, quem volentes occidere, ille, qui forte linguam eorum ſciebat, eis dixit, vel per interpretem mendacium hoc ſignificavit, ſcilicet, Quod cum ipſe non poſſet per longum tempus habere beneficium ventris, intravit templum, ut Mahumeto ſe commendaret, & ſtatim habuit beneficium ventris. Hoc autem audientes & credentes illi homines beſtiales, acceperunt femoralia illa ſtercore infecta, & ſuſpenderunt in Moſchæa, clamantes, miraculum! miraculum (281)! Thus one half of the world laughs at the other; for doubtleſs the Mahometans are not ignorant of the ridiculous ſtories, that are told of the monks; and if it were true, that they know nothing of them, yet it might reaſonably be believed, that they ſpread lies and impertinent fables againſt the Chriſtian ſects. If they knew this ſtory of the Flemiſh Benedictin, they would ſay, perhaps, theſe honeſt forgers of miracles frame very groſs ones for us; not but that they know how to invent much finer; but thoſe they keep for themſelves; they drink off the wine, and ſend us the dregs.

(281) Prognoſticon Antichriſti, pag. 38. apud Revium, in Hiſtoria Daventrienſi, pag. 228, 229.

MAHOMET II, the eleventh ſultan of the Turks, born at Adrianople the twenty fourth of March, 1430, was one of the greateſt men that is mentioned in hiſtory, if we conſider only the qualifications neceſſary for a conqueror; for as to thoſe of a good man, we muſt not look for them in his life. It is not true that his mother was a Chriſtian (a). He very well deſerved, the title of GREAT, which he ambitiouſly aſpired to, and which the Turks do not fail to give him [A]; for 'he ſignalized his 'reign by the conqueſt of two empires, twelve kingdoms, and two hundred conſiderable 'towns. But the progreſs he made was not the effect of a ſudden revolution, or of 'blind fortune, which led him on from victory to victory, without the aſſiſtance of 'prudent conduct. The blood, which he ſhed upon great occaſions, proves, that the 'advantages he gained were diſputed with him. He raiſed ſome ſieges, made haſty 'retreats, and loſt ſome battles; but thoſe diſgraces, which blunt the edge of common 'ſpirits, encouraged his, or rather inſtructed him how to behave himſelf for the future, 'and his judgment helped him to repair, by patience, what he had loſt by impetuoſity. 'He was indefatigable beyond imagination; for more than once he began a campaign 'glorioufly in Europe, and finiſhed it ſtill more glorioufly in Aſia (b).' It was his good fortune to be born in an age, in which the valour of his enemies infinitely contributed to raiſe the glory of his triumphs [B]. We need not have recourſe to the Turks, in order to form

(a) See the remark [F].

(b) Guillet, Hiſtory of Mahomet II, pag. 1. He cites Phrantzes, lib. i, cap. xxxiii. Barlet. de Expug. Scodr. lib. i. Bapt. Egnat. de Orig. Turc. Phil. Lonicer. lib. i.

[A] He very well deſerved the title of GREAT . . ., which the Turks do not fail to give him.] They confeſs 'That all the conqueſts of his ſucceſſors had his 'for their foundation and pattern, and that it was 'eaſy for them to follow the way he had opened unto 'them, after he had removed all impediments. And 'therefore, when they ſpeak of him, they commonly 'ſuppreſs his name of Mahomet, altho' in their lan'guage it has the glorious ſignification of praiſed, or 'loved *, and they diſtinguiſh him from the other 'Sultans, by the magnificent titles of Boiuc and Aboulfetch, whereof one ſignifies great, and the other the 'father of victory. It is objected to him, that during 'his life, he was ambitious of the firſt of theſe titles; 'but did he not take pains enough to deſerve it? The 'Chriſtians themſelves have not denied it to him, 'and it is agreed on all hands, that he was the 'firſt of the Ottoman emperors, to whom our 'weſtern nations gave the title of Grand-Seignior, 'or Great Turk, which poſterity has continued to 'his ſucceſſors (1).'

* Anton. Gorfrea in Nomenclat. Vocabul. Barbar.

(1) Guillet, Hiſtory of Mahomet II, lib. i, pag. 1.

[B] The valour of his enemies . . . contributed to raiſe the glory of his triumphs]. This is a happineſs, which the great Alexander wanted; for he found only weak enemies in Aſia, though they were innumerable. It ſeems therefore, that he was not the favourite of Fortune to the ſame degree as Mahomet was, who had almoſt always brave nations to contend with, and overcome, which diſtinguiſhes him from all other great conquerors, very much to his advantage. Let us prove this by the words of a modern author, who has given us a fine Hiſtory of this Sultan. 'It cannot be 'ſaid, that he had to do with obſcure enemies, and 'nations that were not war-like, ſince among the il'luſtrious captains, who checked his ſucceſſes, are 'reckoned Huniades, and Matthias Corvinus, with 'the forces of Hungary; Scanderbeg, with thoſe of 'the fierce Albanians; the Valachian Uladus, as in'trepid as they, although in truth not ſo honeſt a 'man; the emperors of Greece, and Trebiſonde, the 'kings of Perſia, of Naples, and Boſnia; the princes 'of Greece, of Servia, of Sinope, and Caramania; 'the republics of Venice and Genoa, the knights of 'Rhodes, and the armies of the Cruſade, that is, the 'choiceſt ſoldiers of our weſtern nations. There was 'not one of ſo many enemies, whom he did not meet 'deſignedly

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

form a juſt Idea of his merits. The Chriſtians have raiſed monuments to him [C], which exalt his victories above what the Ottoman annals do, and above all that the Turks could invent to immortalize the grandeur of his actions. It is therefore very ſtrange, that, in Chriſtendom, there ſhould be ſome eminent writers, who maintain, that proſperity is a ſign of a good cauſe [D], and that none but virtuous princes have a ſhare in the favours of ' deſignedly, with extraordinary bravery, and who did ' not at laſt yield to his valour, or his conduct. Chri- ' ſtians, or Mahometans, they were alike the aim of ' his ambition; and the intereſt of his religion was ' never admitted among the maxims of his policy. ' Among ſo many Sultans, not one of them to this ' day, but he only, durſt ſend regular troops into Ita- ' ly, where they gained a pitched battle, and took a ' ſtrong town, not by a ſudden aſſault, as pirates do, ' but by the regular attacks of a formal ſiege (2).

(2) Guillet, ibid. pag. 6, 7.

[C] The Chriſtians have raiſed monuments to him.] The ſame Hiſtorian has furniſhed us with the proof of this. ' I do not think it any fault to revive the ' memory of this conqueror; for, beſides that it is ' impoſſible his name ſhould periſh †, there never was ' any infidel prince, who left among us the like mo- ' numents. The Catholic church ‡ takes care to put ' us in mind of him every day of the year, by a re- ' markable and perpetual ſignal; for the ringing of ' the bell every day for prayers, at noon, was en- ' joined by one of our Popes, only to advertiſe the ' people to recommend to God the faithful that fought ' againſt this Sultan ‡. For one battle that he loſt, ' we do ſtill, every year, return thanks to heaven, ' by ſolemnizing the feſtival of the transfiguration of ' our Saviour, which was inſtituted in memory of ' this victory. But, what deſerves our conſideration ' no leſs, he alone gave occaſion to the calling of a ' general council, and to the project of ſeveral others. ' His  armies alone forced the Chriſtians to oppoſe ' againſt him thoſe of a Cruſade, which was plainly ' diſtinguiſhed from all other holy wars, becauſe a ' Pope marched with it in perſon, accompanied by ' the college of cardinals. Laſtly, he alone obliged ' the weſtern emperors to inſtitute the order †† of ' the knights of Auſtria, who, under this great name, ' taken from the houſe of their founder, and under ' the protection of St George, engaged themſelves by ' ſolemn vows to put a ſtop to his aſtoniſhing pro- ' greſs. An ‡‡ archbiſhop, a cardinal, and even a ' Pope publiſhed, during his Life, his victories in their ' writings, to raiſe up enemies againſt him in favour ' of our altars (3).' The confeſſion, our Hiſtorians make, bears no leſs a teſtimony to his glory, than the preparations, which the Pope made to retire to Avignon, in caſe Italy was attacked by Mahomet in perſon. Achmet, who commanded in Otranto, went from thence, to wait upon his maſter, ' and confer ' with him about the progreſs of his arms in Italy, ' whither alſo he promiſed to carry him. The threats ' he uſed at his embarking, threw the Italians into ' a terrible conſternation, and made them fear a cam- ' paign, ſo much the more fatal, becauſe the Ottoman ' garriſon continued every day to make excurſions, and ' gained new advantages; ſo that Otranto was filled ' with Chriſtian ſlaves and booty. Italy has ſuffered ' greater miſchiefs; but it never was put into ſuch ' frights, and it ſeemed as if the people there were al- ' ready condemned, to wear the turban. It is cer- ' tain, that the ſovereign pontif ‡‡ Sixtus IV, fancy- ' ing that Rome was already involved in the frightful ' deſtiny of Conſtantinople, deſigned to have truſted it ' to the protection of the apoſtles, and thought of no- ' thing but equipping his gallies, to ſail to Provence, ' and to tranſlate a ſecond time the holy ſee to Avig- ' non. The Hiſtorians of that time have written, that ' there was no hopes of ſafety for Italy; becauſe in ' effect there was not one place ſtrong enough to hold ' out againſt a hundred thouſand Mahometans, en- ' couraged, as it was ſuppoſed, by the preſence of the ' Sultan. Among all the teſtimonies of that conſter- ' nation, I ſhall only relate that of Sabellicus, who ' was of that country, and lived at that time *. There ' is no doubt but Italy had been ruined, had not the Pro- ' vidence of God put a ſtop to ſo horrible a miſchief by ' the death of Mahomet (4).' I ſhall preſently (5) cite a paſſage of Platina which may be added to the preceding.

† Platina, Vit. Caliſt. Girolamo.

‡ Briani. lib. xvii.

‡ Pandect. Leunclav. cap. cxxxiii. Turco-Græc. pag. 62. Petav. Ration. Temp. pars i, lib. ix. Briani. lib. xvii.

 P. Juſtinian. lib. viii, Platina Vit. di Pio II.

†† Laxius, lib. iii, rerum Vien- nenſium.

‡‡ Leon. Chienſ. Arch. Mityl. Iſid. Ruthen. Card. SS. Pet. & Mart. Pius II.

(3) Guillet, ib. pag. 4, 5.

‡‡ Cuſpinian. in Vit. Mahomet.

* Sabellic. Enn- nead. x, lib. vii.

(4) Guillet, ib. lib. vii, pag. 374, 375, ad ann. 1480.

(5) In the remark [E].

Here is another monument, raiſed by the Chriſtians to the glory of this Turkiſh prince. The exceſſive joy, they teſtified at his death, was equivalent to the fineſt panegyrics of Greece. Let us again hear Mr Guillet. The news of the death of Mahomet was received in Chriſtendom with the greateſt tranſports of joy that ever were ſeen. At Rhodes, where the news was brought ſooner than to other places, they made ſolemn rejoicings; but they were not equal to thoſe of Rome. Pope Sixtus cauſed all the churches to be opened, and forbad all artificers to work at their trades; he appointed feſtivals, which laſted three days, with public prayers and general proceſſions; he commanded, that, during this time, the whole artillery of the caſtle of St Angelo ſhould be continually diſcharged; and, which is moſt remarkable, he put a ſtop to the preparations for his voyage to Avignon, whither he intended to fly, as to a place of refuge from the Ottoman arms (6). The Hiſtorian, being ſenſible, that ſo many demonſtrations of joy might be prejudicial to the Chriſtian name, becauſe they are not agreeable to that noble greatneſs of ſoul, which ancient Rome affected, endeavours to elude or refute this objection by a pious remark. It muſt be confeſſed, ſays he (7), that the Chriſtian religion has put a great difference between the manners of the ancient Romans and of the modern, and that it hath done it with ſuch juſtice as cannot be too much admired. For ancient Rome, being prepoſſeſſed with it's proud maxims, and a policy, wherein pride had a larger ſhare than generoſity, would ſhew no ſigns of joy at the death of it's enemies, leſt it ſhould be ſuſpected ſhe was ſhamefully afraid of their power. Thus Cæſar affected to lament the death of Pompey; and Pagan Hiſtory is full of inſtances of ſuch like oſtentation. But, in the age of Mahomet, the deſtruction of ſacred altars, and the profanation of our moſt holy myſteries, juſtly required an exceeding great joy for the death of this famous, ſacrilegious robber, as a pious acknowledgement, that Rome was indebted to Heaven for the welfare of Chriſtianity. I have already ſaid (8), that the Chriſtians gave this terrible enemy the ſirname of Grand-Seignior.

(6) Guillet, ibid. pag. 384.

(7) Ibid.

(8) In the remark [A].

[D] Some eminent Chriſtian writers maintain that proſperity is a ſign of a good cauſe.] I have already ſhewn the impertinence of theſe writers in the article of MAHOMET the falſe prophet (9). I have ſhewn, that, with regard to triumphs, the ſtar of Mahometiſm has prevailed over the ſtar of Chriſtianity, and that, if we were to judge of the goodneſs of theſe religions by the glory of temporal ſucceſs, the Mahometan would appear to be the better of the two. The Mahometans are ſo certain of this, that they alledge no ſtronger proof of the goodneſs of their cauſe, than the glorious ſucceſſes, wherewith God has favoured it. See what a Monk, who continued long in Turkey, has taught us, as to the motives, which retain theſe infidels in their religion. ' Secundum motivum eſt ' victoria eorum continua contra Chriſtianos: quod a- ' liquos multum movet. Unde victores ſe nominant, ' & gloriantur quaſi victores totius mundi. Orant ' etiam pro victoribus ſpecialiter in omnibus congrega- ' tionibus ſuis, præſertim in continuis poſt comeſtio- ' nem gratiarum actionibus. Superbiunt inſuper, & ' Chriſtianos fœminas deſpiciendo nominant, & ſe vi- ' ros eorum. Et ut ad hoc magis ac magis inciten- ' tur, anteceſſorum victorias deſcribunt, decantant, ' laudant ac præconizant (10). - - - The ſecond motive ' is their continual victory over the Chriſtians; which ' is of great weight with ſome. From whence they ſtyle ' themſelves the conquerors, and boaſt as if they had ' conquered the whole world. For they put up prayers in ' particular for the conquerors in all their congregations, ' and eſpecially in their grace after meat. They pride ' themſelves moreover, and call the Chriſtians women, ' out of contempt, and themſelves men. And to incite ' themſelves ſtill the more to this, they deſcribe, ſing, ' extol, and cry up, the victories of their anceſtors.' Let us add another witneſs. ' The happy ſucceſs of ' the arms of theſe infidels is another argument, which ' they make uſe of, to maintain the truth of their ' religion. For, ſince they believe, that God is the ' author of all good events, they conclude, that the ' more they have ſucceeded in their wars, the more ' God makes it appear, that he approves their zeal and

(9) Remark [P].

(10) Septem-Ca- ſtrenſis de mori- bus Turcarum, cap. xi, pag. 40. apud Hottinger. Hiſtor. Oriental. pag. 338.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of fortune (c). It is to no purpoſe to alledge, that, if the Chriſtian princes had not been divided, they would have beaten the Mahometans [E]. Some have written, that this Sultan

(c) See what Bonfius has written againſt Machiavel.

' and religion. This perſuaſion makes the Turks ' hate and deteſt the Jews above all other people ' in the world. They call them a people abandoned ' by GOD, becauſe they have no fixed habitation up- ' on earth, and no prince of their own nation to pro- ' tect and defend them (11).'

P. J. Bruys, Hiſtorical Account of the Ottoman Empire, book ii, chap. iii, pag. m. 334.

The Monk, whom I juſt now cited, tells us a particular that deſerves our attention; which is, that the Turks look upon themſelves as men, and the Chriſtians as women. How does this agree with our Hiſtories, which inform us, that the Turks never conquered the Chriſtians without being ten or twelve to one, and without loſing twenty times as many men as the Chriſtians did? If this were true, would they ſay, that the Chriſtians are women? I know not what to ſay, upon this ſubject; but I am perſuaded on the one ſide, that our weſtern Chriſtians have always been as good ſoldiers at leaſt as the Ottomans; and, on the other ſide, that our Hiſtories are full of fables, as to the number of the ſoldiers ſlain, and of the ſoldiers that fought: they increaſe it prodigiouſly on the ſide of the Infidels, and leſſen it as much on the other ſide. They do what we have ſeen done by the Gazetteers of each party in theſe laſt campaigns, at the two ſieges of Namur (12). By turns the Gazettes of the beſieged ſpoke of ſeveral imaginary aſſaults, wherein the enemy loſt an infinite number of men; By turns they ſo increaſed their loſſes in real aſſaults, that he, who ſhould add together the ſlain, the wounded, the deſerters, and the ſick, mentioned in theſe relations, would not find one man left in the army of the beſiegers, who could hear the beſieged beat a parley. However things are changed for the better; the Turks have ſhewn, both in Hungary and Greece, ſince the year 1683, that they are but poor ſoldiers, and are not able to reſiſt the Chriſtian troops inferior to them in number. If they had always been ſo unſucceſsful, they would never have taken proſperity for the mark of a true religion. They have met with great loſſes in Europe, and our news-writers pretend, that they have had fatal loſſes in Aſia; for how often have we read in the Gazettes, that Mecca (13), Grand Cairo, and the neighbouring provinces, have been ſacked, and that there was a great conſternation at Conſtantinople, upon occaſion of theſe irruptions and inſurrections (14). They were political frauds, deſigned to perſuade the people, that all the imperial troops would quickly be upon the Rhine. Two or three ſmall conſequences, very eaſy to be drawn, lead the reader preſently thither.

(12) The firſt in 1692, the ſecond in 1695.

(13) Note, that Mecca does not belong to the Turks, as the Gazettes ſuppoſed.

(14) Compare the words of Juvenal, Sat. VI, ver. 402.

Quidam ſacit iſte Neptunum, Inpopulos, magnoque illic cuncta arva teneri Diluvio, nutare urbes, ſubſidere terras. Wrecks, floods, and fires, whatever ſhe can meet, She ſpreads, and in the ſame of every ſheet.

How men ſport with different principles about proſperity and adverſity.

One would think the Turks, after theſe diſgraces, ſhould doubt whether their religion be good, and yet they do not: they are no more capable than other men of arguing conſequentially, and of following their own principles. They do as the orthodox would do; for they attribute their misfortunes, not to any fault in their religion, but to the little care they take to practiſe it. Give me leave to ſay one word about the inconſtancy of mens reaſonings with reſpect to adverſity and proſperity. Their maxims upon this ſubject are quite oppoſite: for you will be told, that they, who will live godly, muſt ſuffer perſecution (15), and that godlineſs has the promiſe of this life, and of that which is to come (16). You will be told, that GOD ſuffers the wicked to proſper in this life, and that, if we obſerve it narrowly, we ſhall find the maxim of Livy true, that thoſe, who fear GOD, ſucceed in their deſigns, and that fortune is an enemy to the ungodly (17). This is not all: as to the general theſis, it is agreed that we ſhould not judge of things by the event, and that thoſe, who do ſo, deſerve to be unhappy.

(15) 2 Tim. iii, 12.

(16) 1 Tim. iv, 8.

(17) Iaveniet is omnia proſpera eventiſſe ſequentibus Deos, adverſa ſequentibus, T. Livius, lib. v.

(18) Ovid. Epiſt. Phyll. ad Demophoont.

- - - - - careat ſucceſſibus opto,
Quiſquis ab eventu facta notanda putat (18).

May he ſtill want ſucceſs in all his deeds,
Who thinks no action good, but what ſucceeds.

But let us repreſent to ourſelves two great oppoſite parties, one of which has formed an important enterprize: if it ſucceeds, they do not fail to infer from thence, that it is juſt; they maintain, that this good ſucceſs is a mark of GOD's approbation; the other party, on the contrary, maintains, that we muſt keep to the general theſis, and to the careat ſucceſſibus opto, &c. and that GOD, for the puniſhment of men, very often permits the wicked to ſucceed in their pernicious deſigns. But if the party, who gives ſuch leſſons of morality, ſoon after forms an enterprize of conſequence, and ſees it ſucceſsful, you ſhall no more hear them ſpeak of the general theſis; but they ſay in their turn, that good ſucceſs is a mark of the juſtice of that affair, and that it is plain, GOD has approved it, ſince he has ſo viſibly accompanied it with his holy benediction. Then the other party will not be aſhamed to ſay, that we muſt not judge of things by the event, careat ſucceſſibus opto, &c. and to vent a hundred fine common places. Is any thing more convenient than this? Is not this to be furniſhed with principles, as we are with cloaths, theſe for ſummer, and thoſe for winter (19)?

[E] It is to no purpoſe to alledge, that, if the Chriſtian princes had not been divided, they would have beaten the Mahometans.] An infinite number of books are full of complaints, that the Chriſtian princes, by devouring one another, have loſt Conſtantinople, the iſle of Rhodes, Hungary, &c. which they might eaſily have prevented, if they had united their forces againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendom. We have reaſon to believe this, and to complain of a diſagreement, which has proved ſo beneficial to the Turks. But it would be very ridiculous, if this remark ſhould be made uſe of, to ſhew, that the falſe church has not been more favoured with temporal proſperities than the true one; for this diſagreement of the Chriſtian princes is, in itſelf, a great unhappineſs: and, ſuppoſe the Infidels had not taken advantage of it, it had nevertheleſs been a great affliction to Chriſtendom. Obſerve well, that, in the queſtion, whether Chriſtianity has had a larger ſhare of proſperity, than the falſe religions, we are not to enquire, whether the Sultans obtained victories by the valour of their troops, or by the weakneſs of their enemies; but whether they conquered kingdoms, and gained battles over the Chriſtians. Whether they did ſo by good fortune, or by bravery, it is ſtill a temporal proſperity: and ſo we get nothing by leſſening the glory of their triumphs, under pretence of their taking advantage of the diviſions of the Chriſtians: this rather affords a new proof of the ill ſucceſs of the Chriſtians. Let us therefore eſteem it as a monument erected by the Chriſtians to the good fortune and glory of the Turks, that ſo many harangues have been publiſhed, exhorting Chriſtian princes to unite their forces againſt the Infidels. There was a time, when our profeſſors of eloquence would not have been thought worthy of their penſions, unleſs they had made an harangue of this nature, and thoſe harangues were not ſallies of wit, or ſchool-boys exerciſes, like the declamations, that were made at Rome upon Annibal (20) and Sylla (21); but they were ſerious and grave diſcourſes, deſigned to perſuade princes to enter into a ſtrict league, and undertake a famous expedition. Jerome Reuſnerus has collected ſeveral volumes of theſe harangues. Neither did princes alone ſtand in need of an exhortation to concord; there was another kind of diviſion, which did no ſmall miſchief to Chriſtianity. The eccleſiaſtics depended upon the laity, and theſe hoped the eccleſiaſtics would furniſh the expences of the war. Platina has very naturally deſcribed the ill effects, which followed from that reciprocal expectation. ' Mahome- ' tus Arabs, ſays he (22), magnum in Chriſtiano po- ' pulo excitavit incendium: & ita magnum, ut verear ' ne ejus ſecta noſtra potiſſimum ætate reliquias Chri- ' ſtiani nominis penitus extinguat: adeo tepeſcimus, ' & animo ac corpore languidi interitum noſtrum ex- ' pectantes concidimus. Invaleſcit ejus ſecta nunc ' multo magis quam antea. Nam tota Aſia & Africa, ' magnaque pars Europæ Mahometanus principibus ' ſubjecta eſt. Inſtant nunc Thurci terra ac mari: ' ut nos tanquam cuniculos, ex his Europæ latebris ' eruant. Sedemus otioſi: alter alterum expectantes, ' quaſi hoc malum univerſæ reipublicæ Chriſtianæ non ' immineat. Expectant ſacerdotes ut à ſæcularibus hoc ' tantum bellum & tam neceſſarium ſumatur. Expectant ' item ſæculares ut Preſbyteri tuendæ religionis cauſa pe- ' cunias in ſumptus bellicos polliceantur & ſubminiſtrent, ' ne in pejores uſus effundant, quemadmodum facere ple- ' rique conſuevere, pecunias eleemoſynis & ſanguine mar- ' rum comparatas, in aurea & argentea vaſa & pergran- ' dia

(19) Apply here what St Hilary ſays, lib. ii. ad Conſtant. againſt the annuas atque menſtruas de Deo fides, which were rather fides temporum quam Evangeliorum. See alſo the Advice to the Refugees, pag. 85. and the end of the remark [G] of the article ARIUS.

(20) I demens & lævas curre per Alpes,
Ut pueris placeas & declamatio fias.
Juven. Sat. X. ver. 166.
Go, climb the rugged Alps, ambitious fool,
To pleaſe the boys, and be a theme, at ſchool.
DRYDEN.

(21) Et nos ergo manum ferulæ ſubduximus, & nos
Conſilium dedimus Syllæ privatus ut altum
Dormiret . . . . .
Idem, Sat. I, ver. 13.
Provok'd by theſe incorrigible fools,
I left declaiming in pedantic ſchools;
Where, with men-boys, I ſtrove to get renown,
Adviſing Sylla to a private gown.
Idem.

(22) Platina, in Bonifacio V.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Sultan was an Atheiſt [F]. This may be true; at leaſt it is certain, that he made war, to ſatisfy his ambition, and not to aggrandize Mahometiſm. He preferred his own intereſt to that of the religion he profeſſed, and hence it came to paſs, that he granted a toleration

'dia quidem fundentes: parum de futuro ſolliciti: 'Dei quem tantum utilitatis gratia colunt, & homi-'num contemptores. - - - - Mahomet the Arabian blew 'up a great flame among the Chriſtians; ſo great a one, 'that I fear, leſt, in this our age, eſpecially, his ſect 'ſhould quite extinguiſh the remains of the Chriſtian 'name: we are ſo luke-warm, and ſit down in an in-'dolent expectation of our ruin. His ſect prevails at 'preſent more than ever: for all Aſia and Africa, and 'a great part of Europe, is ſubject to Mahometan princes. 'The Turks now preſs us by ſea and land, to drive us 'out of Europe, like rabbets out of their burrows. We 'ſit ſtill, each expecting the other to ſtir, as if this evil 'did not hang over the whole Chriſtian world. The 'clergy expect the laity ſhould undertake this ſo great and 'neceſſary war. The laity in their turns expect the 'clergy ſhould engage to ſupply money to carry on the war, 'and not ſquander away, as moſt of them do, the money 'raiſed by charities and the blood of martyrs, in the pur-'chaſe of large gold and ſilver veſſels, regardleſs of the 'future, and in contempt of GOD, whom they worſhip 'only for gain, as well as of men.'

Bellarmin therefore is very juſtly laughed at for placing proſperity among the marks of the true church. 'Quas ultimo ponit loco notas Bellarminus IX & X 'infelicem exitum Eccleſiam oppugnantium, felicitatem 'vero Eccleſiam defendentium, nomen notarum adeo non 'merentur, ut mirum ſit non cogitaſſe Cardinalem fu-'rioſis hac ratione Muhammedanis contra nos ſuppe-'ditari arma (23). - - - - - The ninth and tenth marks, 'which Bellarmin places laſt, to wit, The ill ſucceſs 'of thoſe, who oppoſe the church, and the good for-'tune of thoſe who defend it, are ſo far from deſerving 'the name of marks, that it is ſurpriſing the cardinal 'was not aware, that this was to furniſh the furious 'Mahometans with arms.' It belongs to the Mahometans to teach ſuch a doctrine, as Hottinger makes it appear, who, beſides ſhews, that the name of Catholic, antiquity, long and uninterrupted duration, large extent, ſucceſſion of biſhops, miracles, auſterity of manners, teſtimony of adverſaries, and ſuch other marks, whereby Bellarmin pretends to diſcern the true church, are the ſame, which the followers of Mahomet alledge to the advantage of their religion.

(23) Hotting. Hiſtor. Orient. pag. 338.

[F] Some have written, that this Sultan was an Atheiſt.] Paul Jovius makes the following remark upon this occaſion (24): 'Natus erat ex Deſpoti Ser-'viæ filia, quæ puerum Chriſtianis præceptis & mo-'ribus imbuerat, quorum mox oblitus adoleſcendo, 'ita ad Mahometis ſacra ſe contulit, ut neque hos, 'neque illos ritus teneret, & in arcano prorſus Atheos 'haberetur; utpote qui unum tantum bonæ fortunæ 'numen coleret, quod præclarè conciliari vivida effi-'cacique animi virtute prædicabat. Itaque nulli ad-'dictus religioni, cunctorum hominum accuratas de 'Diis, tanquam humana nihil curantibus, cogitationes 'irridebat; eo animi decreto, ut nullum unquam jus 'amicitiæ aut fœderis, niſi ex commodo, exceptaque 'ad proferendum imperium occaſione, colendum at-'que ſervandum arbitraretur. - - - - He was born of a 'daughter of the governor of Servia, who had inſtructed 'him during his childhood in the Chriſtian precepts and 'manners; which forgetting as he grew up, he embraced 'the Mahometan religion, but in ſuch a manner as not 'to ſtick to any particular rites, and was thought to be 'an Atheiſt in his heart; for he worſhipped only the 'deity of fortune, which he pretended might clearly be 'reconciled with a lively and efficacious virtue of the 'mind. Being therefore attached to no religion, he laughed 'at all mens notions about the gods, as not concerning 'themſelves with human affairs; and reſolved to obſerve 'no faith or compact farther than it ſerved to pro-'mote the ends of his ambition.' There are two obſervations to be made upon this paſſage: I. Paul Jovius is miſtaken when he affirms that the mother of Mahomet was a Chriſtian (25). 'Neither the name, 'nor the quality of his mother, are known, though 'all the weſtern Hiſtorians, being prepoſſeſſed with a 'common error, have deſcribed her to us under names 'differently forged, ſometimes of Meliſſa, and Irene; 'ſometimes of Mary the daughter of the Deſpotes of 'Servia, and called Deſpœne, a title of honour 'which the Greeks gave to the eaſtern Chriſtian 'princeſſes. But though this Deſpœne was married to 'Sultan Amurat, yet ſhe was no more than ſtep-mother 'to Mahomet, and never had any children, as is plainly 'proved by the embaſſy of the Hiſtorian Phranza †, 'who was ſent to ſollicit her to marry the emperor 'Conſtantine, when ſhe was the widow of Amurat. 'The Turks, and the reſt of the Greeks are agreed 'in this (26). . . . . There is a great probability, that 'Deſpœne Mary, who, by a peculiar privilege, 'lived there (27) in the exerciſe of the Chriſtian reli-'gion, took ſome care of him; for ſhe taught him 'the Lord's Prayer, and the Angelical Salutation, not 'as a leſſon of piety, which Amurat, being jealous 'of his worſhip, would have rigorouſly condemned, 'but as a meer amuſement to a child, whoſe curioſity 'already inclined him to all things.' My ſecond reflexion is, that Paul Jovius groſsly contradicts himſelf; for if Mahomet II acknowledged and ſerved the deity of fortune, and if he believed, that he could gain her favour by application, and by virtue of his courage, he was not at all an Atheiſt, and did not wholly reject Providence. It is plain, that this fortune, whom he ſerved, could not appear to his mind, but under the idea of a Being, which diſpoſes of events, and favours certain perſons. This cannot be attributed to a blind Being, which is moved by a natural force. But this Being muſt direct it's power according to it's deſires, muſt know what men do, and diſtinguiſh them one from another. Every one may ſee, that the Atheiſt's ſyſtem is inconſiſtent with the ſuppoſition of ſuch a Being (28). Father Maimbourg, who here tranſcribes Paul Jovius, has fallen into the ſame contradiction. There never was, ſays he (29), a greater Atheiſt than this prince, who adored only his own good fortune, which he acknowledged as the only Deity, to which he was always ready to ſacrifice all things; who laughed at all religions; at the Chriſtian, in which he was inſtructed from his infancy by the Sultaneſs, his mother-in-law, daughter of the Deſpotes of Servia; and at the religion of Mahomet, whom he ſtiled the ring-leader of the banditti among his confidents; and at all thoſe, who believed there was any other Providence but that, which every one ought to have for himſelf. From hence it came to paſs, that his intereſt, grandeur, and pleaſure, were the only rule of his actions, and that he neither kept faith, nor word, nor oath, nor treaty, but only ſo far as he found it convenient, or uſeful, for attaining one of theſe three ends, which he aimed at in every thing that he undertook.

(24) Jovius, in Elog. virorum bellica virtute illuſtrium, lib. iii, pag. m. 262.

(25) Guillet, ubi ſupra, lib. i, pag. 10.

† Phranz. lib. iii, cap. ii. Chalcond. lib. vii, Turco-Græc. pag. 22. Annal. Sultan. cap. xciii. xcvi.

(26) Guillet, ib. pag. 11.

† Turco-Græc. pag. 194. Informat. di Paolo Giovio, pag. 75. Annal. Sultan. cap. xcix.

(27) That is, in the Seraglio.

(28) See the article CÆSAR, remark [H].

(29) Maimbourg, Hiſtory of the Schiſm of the Greeks, lib. vi, pag. 291. of the Dutch edition. He cites Ducas, cap. xxxiii.

A REFLEXION on the common opinion, that there are fortunate perſons.

It is a very common opinion, that ſome perſons are fortunate; and others unfortunate; and we can hardly refrain from believing it, when we conſider public events. There are ſome admirals, who are almoſt always croſſed by contrary winds, in the moſt important deſigns. There are others, for whom a fair wind ſeems to riſe, every time they have any great deſigns to execute. This good and bad fortune does not appear ſo manifeſtly in land-armies; but it cannot be denied that rain or fair weather, and many other accidents, which do not at all depend upon our wiſdom, oftener croſs or hinder the deſigns of certain generals, than they do thoſe of others. It may be obſerved likewiſe, that there are ſome generals, who are never ſeconded with what they call lucky hits, but when they fight againſt captains, who are accounted unlucky. If we were to trace the adventures of private perſons, we ſhould find proportionably as many marks of theſe lucky or unlucky hits. No Atheiſt, no Epicurean, can admit of this diſtinction of good and bad fortune: it is inconſiſtent with their ſyſtem. Will they alledge the influences of the ſtars? This is fit only to be ſaid in a ſonnet: for the ſtars can do nothing, in this caſe, unleſs they are directed by an intelligent principle; and this is what they do not admit. They will ſay, that he is an unlucky man, who purchaſes two hundred lottery tickets out of three thouſand, and draws no prize at all; and that he is a lucky man, who buys only three tickets out of a hundred thouſand, and draws the higheſt prize: but they will maintain, that this is done without the direction of any intelligent Being, and is a neceſſary conſequence

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

toleration to the Greek church, and alſo ſhewed great civility to the patriarch of Conſtantinople [G]. There is no probability, that he made the vow which is attributed to him [H]. It is ſaid, that to let his ſoldiers ſee, that pleaſure was not capable to effeminate ſequence of the mixture of the tickets. In effect, if there were no Providence, ſomebody muſt neceſſarily have the greateſt prize, and one perſon rather than a hundred others: but they cannot maintain, according to their ſyſtem, that certain men ſhall always have the great prizes, who buy only a few tickets, and that thoſe, who buy a great number, ſhall never draw any prize; for this would plainly evince the direction of ſome genius, that is either a friend, or an enemy. And thus it appears, why they cannot admit the diſtinction, properly ſpeaking of fortunate and unfortunate perſons (30). In a word, to return to Mahomet, if he acknowledged the deity of fortune, he was neither an Atheiſt, nor an Epicurean.

(30) See upon all this the remarks of the article TIMOLEON.

[G] He granted a toleration to the Greek church, and ſhewed great civility to the patriarch of Conſtantinople.] I perſuade myſelf, that my readers will be glad to find here a ſhort account of a matter ſo curious as this. I ſhall make uſe of the words of Father Maimbourg, who, having deſcribed the taking of Conſtantinople, and Mahomet's triumphal entry into that city, continues thus: '(31) After this, as he was very 'dextrous, being unwilling to loſe the Chriſtians, who 'were the chief ſtrength, and afforded the greateſt 'revenue of his new empire, he applied himſelf, by a 'maſter-piece of Policy, to gain their good will, by 'ſhewing them, that he would treat them very favourably, like a good maſter, and allow them the 'free exerciſe of their religion. For, underſtanding †, 'that the patriarchical ſee was vacant by the voluntary 'reſignation of Gregory Protoſyncellus, who had retired to Rome, he reſolved to fill it up: and that he 'might immediately act as emperor, he ordered that 'it ſhould be done after the ſame manner, as was 'practiſed under the laſt princes. . . . He cauſed ſome 'biſhops to aſſemble, who were then near Conſtantinople, with the few eccleſiaſtics, who remained there, 'and the chief citizens; and theſe choſe, according to 'his order, the famous ſenator ‡ George Scholarius, 'the ſame who had declared ſo ſtrongly for the Catholic faith at the council of Florence, and whom 'Mahomet, who loved able men, had ſpared, when 'he put to death ſo many perſons of quality, knowing that he was the moſt learned man, and the moſt 'eloquent of all the Greeks. He was then choſen under the name of Gennadius; and the Sultan would 'have the ſame ceremonies obſerved on this occaſion, 'which the emperors of Conſtantinople had uſed at 'the inſtalling of the patriarchs, after this manner '. . . . . (32). Immediately after Gennadius had been 'choſen, he was conducted, by his order, with great 'pomp to the palace, where he received him with all 'ſorts of honours, and teſtimonies of good-will, 'making him even eat at his table, and holding long 'conferences with him, as if he had been one of 'his moſt intimate confidents. After which, having 'carried him into the great hall, the ceremony was 'performed of giving the paſtoral ſtaff into his hand, 'in the preſence of the Turks and Chriſtians, who 'flocked thither to ſee ſo ſurprizing a ſight; where 'the Sultan of the Turks, the mortal enemy of Chriſtendom, was ſeen to give the inveſtiture of the patriarchate of Conſtantinople, by the croſier. He did 'more than all this; for, tho' the new patriarch did 'all that he could to hinder him, alledging the example of other emperors, who had never carried 'goodneſs and civility ſo far; yet he would conduct 'him to the gate of the palace, and there he deſired 'him to mount on the fineſt horſe of his ſtables, 'richly harneſſed with white ſattin, embroidered with 'gold, and ordered all his viſiers and baſhaws to accompany him, as they did, marching in good order 'on foot, ſome before, and ſome behind him, in a 'long and magnificent train, a-croſs the ‡ whole city, 'as far as the famous church of the Twelve Apoſtles, 'which he had aſſigned to be his patriarchal church, 'inſtead of St Sophia, of which he had made a great 'moſque. He went alſo to viſit him ſome days after 'in the new patriarchal palace of the church of 'Our Lady, which he had obtained of the Sultan 'inſtead of that of the Twelve Apoſtles; and there 'he deſired him to explain to him the chief points of 'the Chriſtian religion: which that great man did 'with ſo much judgment, ſtrength, and clearneſs, and 'ſo much with the approbation of the Sultan, that he 'deſired to have that expoſition in writing, which is 'to be ſeen to this day in Greek, Latin, and Arabic 'half Turkiſh. Thus that able prince, by this counterfeited ſweetneſs at the beginning of his empire, 'endeavoured to oblige the Chriſtian Greeks to bear 'the yoke more patiently, which they were not to 'find ſo hard, as they have ſince found it to this 'day.' Conſult Mr Guillet (33), who relates all this largely and exactly, and mentions ſeveral other things, which were done by Mahomet in favour of the Greeks. The abſtract of which is ſeen in the following remark.

(31) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 358, &c.

† Phranza, lib. iii, cap. ix.

‡ Phranza, lib. et. Leo Allat. de perp. conſenſ. lib. iii, cap. v, vi.

(32) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 361, 362.

‡ Turco-Grac. lib. ii. Panmachiæ.

(33) Ubi ſupra, lib. iii, pag. 259, &c.

[H] There is no probability, that he made the vow, which is attributed to him.] The Supplement to the 'Annals of Baronius (34) in 1469, affirms, that Ma-'homet, tranſported with zeal for his religion, made 'the following ſolemn vow againſt ours. I ſwear and 'proteſt by a vow, which I make to the only GOD, 'creator of all things, that I will neither taſte the 'ſweetneſs of ſleep, nor of good chear, that I will renounce even the deſires of pleaſure, and ſenſual delights, 'and that I will not turn my face from the eaſt to the 'weſt, till I have trampled under my horſe's feet all the 'gods, which the adorers of CHRIST ſhall make of 'wood, braſs, and gold, and all the paintings: in a 'word, till I have purged the whole face of the earth 'from their impieties, from the eaſt to the weſt, that I 'may cauſe the praiſes of the true GOD, and of Ma-'homet, his prophet, to be eternally ſounded forth every 'where. The Greek Hiſtorians of that time, who 'could write with certainty about the affairs of their 'own country, and who did not ſpare this Sultan in 'any thing, ſay nothing of this vow. Is it poſſible, 'that the Latin Hiſtorians, without citing any authority, ſhould make Mahomet ſo zealous for his religion, who maintain, that he profeſſed none? Will 'they ſay, that this prince plaid the hypocrite, to 'flatter his ſubjects with a falſe appearance of piety, 'who was always ſo fierce, and ſo well perſuaded of 'his mighty power, that he never uſed any caution, 'nor was ever known to be reduced to ſuch a condeſcention by any ſedition of the army, or people, 'nor by any formality in the ceremonies of his law? 'It had been eaſy for him to have begun the performance of this vow in Turkey, where his ſacrilegious country-men would have been very well pleaſed 'to have ſeconded this falſe zeal. It is evident, that, 'contrary to the deſign of this pretended Policy, he 'would have made himſelf ridiculous there, by doing 'every day before their eyes the contrary to what he 'had promiſed: for we have deſcribed his care to reſtore the patriarchal dignity, to hold a kind of familiar converſation with the patriarchs Gennadius and 'Maximus, to authorize, from time to time, the exerciſe of their religion by letters-patents, or by the 'orders of his Cadies, and to people Conſtantinople 'with Chriſtian families, which he drew out of every 'city of Greece, as faſt as by his arms he conquered 'them. We need only conſider the preſent ſtate of 'Greece, where his ſucceſſors have permitted the exerciſe of Chriſtianity, according to the liberty he 'gave them, when they were firſt conquered. In the 'moſt famous monaſteries in that country, there are to 'be ſeen, to this day, the ſafe conducts and titles of 'exemption, which he generouſly granted to their 'prieſts. He did not forbid the Greeks the veneration of uncarved images, which is ſtill continued to 'them againſt the expreſs words of this vow; and he 'granted the ſame toleration for carved images, which 'were reverenced by the Genoeſe of the Romiſh 'church, ſettled at Galata, and by the Albanians of 'the ſame principle, who had been ſubject to Scanderbeg. The Latin Hiſtorians have alſo written, 'that, as often as Mahomet met a Chriſtian, he * be-'lieved himſelf defiled with a ſpiritual taint, and ran 'preſently to the waſhings of the Alcoran, and cleanſed 'his eyes and his mouth: but if this had been ſo, he 'muſt have uſed a great many purifications of this 'kind, when at the head of his army, he met fifty 'or ſixty thouſand Chriſtians (35).'

(34) That is, Spondanus, in the continuation of the Annals. He cites Letter cclxxx, of the cardinal of Pavia, and ſays, that a certain perſon having carried a copy of that vow to Raguſa, it was tranſlated into Italian, and ſent to the Venetians, who communicated it to the Pope. Probably this piece was forged, either by ſome idle man, or ſome politician, to excite the weſtern princes to a war.

* Iſidor. Rhuten.

(35) Guillet, ubi ſupra, lib. vi, pag. 164, &c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

minate his warlike virtue, he cut off the head of a miſtreſs, with whom he was deſperately in love [I]. This ſtory, methinks, is a little apocryphal. Moſt of the Chriſtian hiſtorians, in ſpeaking of him, have ſacrificed their candor to their paſſion and reſentment [K]. He died on the third of May, 1481, in a town of Bithynia, as he entered into the fifty ſecond year of his age (d). He was the firſt of the Sultans, who prepared for himſelf a particular monument (e). I think he was alſo the firſt Sultan who loved the arts and ſciences [L]. His epitaph deſerves to be conſidered [M]. I ſhall have ſome faults to object to Mr Moreri [N], and will not paſs by the inconſiderateneſs of F. Maimbourg, who

(d) Guillet, ib. book vii, pag. 378, 379.

(e) Id. ib. p. 381.

[I] He cut off the head of a miſtreſs, with whom he was deſperately in love.] She was called Irene, and was but ſeventeen years old (36). A Baſhaw had made her a ſlave at the taking of Conſtantinople, and given her to the Sultan (37). You may find in Mr Guillet the circumſtances of this adventure; but ſince he obſerves (38) that all thoſe, who mention it, tranſcribe it from Bandelli (39), an Italian monk, who ſeems to deſerve no credit, by the faults he has committed, contrary to the order of time, and to the names and ranks of the perſons he introduces there; I give no great credit to it. Mr Scuderi, who made ſo many harangues under the names of illuſtrious ladies, made ſome political diſcourſes under the names of kings. One of theſe diſcourſes is a pretended anſwer of our Sultan to the complaints of his army, on the ſame day that he beheaded this fine woman.

(36) Guillet, ib. lib. iii, pag. 293, ad ann. 1455.

(37) Id. ib.

(38) Ib. p. 299.

(39) This is BANDEL (MATTHEW), of whom I have made an article.

[K] Moſt of the Chriſtian Hiſtorians . . . have ſacrificed their candor to their paſſion.] Mr Guillet, having obſerved, that the weſtern nations gave this Sultan the title of Grand-Seignior, or Great Turk, adds immediately (40); 'It is true, that this favourable teſtimony of our people was contradicted by the greateſt part of the weſtern Hiſtorians of his time; for there was no reproach, nor outrageous term, wherewith they did not, by their pen, blacken this prince. Indeed their zeal for the Chriſtian religion is to be commended, when, as occaſion offered, they were tranſported with indignation againſt the impieties of Mahomet; but then they ought alſo, as occaſion ſerved, to have publiſhed what commendable qualities he had. This is the juſt moderation, which was obſerved by Philip de Comines, and Chalcondylas, and in the letter of Pope Pius II, who, ſpeaking of this prince during his life, laid aſide vulgar prejudices, and obſerved ſuch wiſe reſerves, as we ought always to have for crowned heads. For, in ſhort, in all times, an unſeemly cuſtom has baniſhed that moderation, which ought to be uſed among writers of a different religion, and of different parties, and hath put them upon invective and bitterneſs; as if juſtice and reaſon ſtood in need of ſuch mean and ſhameful helps. And indeed it muſt be confeſſed, that if, among all the reproaches publiſhed at that time againſt Mahomet, you except a few, which were indeed warranted by modeſty and piety, the reſt appear to be diſguiſed praiſe, and the vain threatenings of thoſe, whom he made to tremble.' This author gives us here a good picture of many people, who have appeared in all ages and all nations.

(40) Guillet, ubi ſupra, lib. i, pag. 9.

(41) Id. ib. pag. 15.

[L] I think he was the firſt Sultan, who loved the arts and ſciences.] He often read the hiſtory of Auguſtus, and of the other Cæſars, and with ſtill greater pleaſure that of Alexander, of Conſtantine, and Theodoſius; becauſe all three reigned in the countries under his dominion (41). . . . . The love he had for hiſtory made him at length eſteem the Hiſtorians, of which he gave them ſome marks. . . . . He paſſionately loved Painting and Muſic, and applied himſelf to Carving and Agriculture . . . . (42). He was ſo fond of foreign languages, that, contrary to the genius of his nation, he ſpake not only the Arabic, in which the Ottoman laws, and the religion of Mahomet the law-giver are written, but alſo the Perſian, the Greek, and the French, that is the Italian corrupted; thus facilitating to himſelf a communication with thoſe people, whom he threatened with his arms. But chiefly he excelled in Aſtrology; and, to encourage his own troops, and terrify his enemies, he gave out, that the motions and influences of the heavenly bodies promiſed him the empire of the world (43). To know how well he was ſkilled in Painting, we need only read in Mr Guillet, what Vaſari relates of Gentile Belino, a famous Venetian Painter, who was for ſome time at Mahomet's court, and returned from thence loaded with preſents (44). He brought home the picture of that emperor, and ſo it was not difficult for Hiſtorians to deſcribe to us his aſpect, and yet they repreſent him very differently. F. Maimbourg has a little abuſed F. Bouhours upon this ſubject. See the Critique Générale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme (45). I ſhall end this remark with theſe words of Paul Jovius (46): 'Cæterum Mahomet qui impietatis apud ſuos, apud noſtros verò perfidiæ, & inhumanæ crudelitatis notam ſubiit, hanc ſaltem confeſſione omnium certam laudem à Barbaris repudiatam, non inſulſe tuliſſe exiſtimatur, quòd ei literarum, & præcellentium artium decus cordi fuerit; quando cunctas clariſſimarum gentium Hiſtorias, ſibi verti in Turcicam linguam juberet; ut inde hauſtis militiæ præceptis, actionum ſuarum diſciplinam, exemplorum varietate confirmaret, & præclaros artifices pictoreſque præſertim inſigni liberalitate complecteretur. Nam & commentaria rerum ab ipſo geſtarum à Liberto ejus Vicentino (47) conſcripta legimus; veraque ejus imagine ſumus potiti, quam Gentilis Bellinus, è Venetiis Byzantium evocatus pinxerat; quum ibi regiam multis tabulis rerum novarum ad oblectationem jucundiſſimam referſiſſet. - - - - But Mahomet, whom thoſe of his own religion accuſed of impiety, but the Chriſtians of treachery and inhuman cruelty, muſt, by the confeſſion of all parties, receive this praiſe, that he had at heart the encouragement of learning and uſeful ſciences; having ordered the hiſtories of the moſt famous nations to be tranſlated into the Turkiſh language, that, by military precepts drawn from thence, he might confirm his own actions by a variety of examples: he was likewiſe very liberal to artificers that excelled in their way, and eſpecially to Painters. For there are extant Commentaries of his actions, written by his freed-man, a Vicentine; and we have an authentic picture of him, done by Gentilis Bellinus, who was ſent for from Venice to Conſtantinople, where he adorned the palace with many beautiful and excellent paintings.'

(42) Id. ib. pag. 16.

(43) Ibid. pag. 17. See upon all this Father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of the Schiſm of the Greeks, lib. vi, p. 289, who cites Phranz. lib. i, cap. xxxiii. Leuncl. lib. xv.

(44) Ibid. lib. iv, pag. 505, &c. See alſo Florent le Comte, in Tom. i, of the Cabinet of Singularities, pag. 29, 30, of the Paris Edit. 1699; and the Journ. de Trevoux, May 1702, pag. 122, French edition.

(45) Letter xxx, pag. 333, 334, of the third edition.

(46) Paul. Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 265.

(47) He is doubtleſs the ANGIOLELLO, of whom I have made an article.

[M] His epitaph deſerves to be conſidered.] 'His body was carried into the moſque, founded by himſelf, where his turbant and his ſcymitar are to be ſeen to this day: but the ſingularity of his epitaph is this, that it ſays nothing of his great actions, and ſeems to value them but little, in compariſon of his laſt thoughts, which are only expreſſed in it as the greateſt elogium, and moſt faithful picture of his courage. The inſcription conſiſted only of nine or ten Turkiſh words, which may be expounded by theſe; I intended to conquer Rhodes, and proud Italy (48).' This very plainly informs us, I. That Mahomet's epitaph did not mention any of the deſigns he had executed, but only the deſigns he had intended to have executed. II. That theſe future actions were ſet down in the Turkiſh language. This is very different from the account of Madam Scuderi. As ambition was the predominant paſſion of Mahomet, ſo it followed him to his death, and he ordered this inſcription to be put on his monument in the Latin tongue, after a long narrative of all his victories in the Turkiſh tongue. HE INTENDED TO HAVE RUINED RHODES, AND PROUD ITALY (49). Spandiginus agrees (50) with this account, except that he does not ſay, the laſt words were in Latin. I find it probable enough, that Selim I, to go beyond this epitah, cauſed one to be made, in which he ſaid, that he ſtill made war after his death (51).

(48) Guillet, ubi ſupra, lib. vii, pag. 381.

(49) Scuderi, Illuſtre Baſſa, Tom. i, pag. 320, 321.

(50) Apud Spondanum, ad ann. 1481, num. ii.

(51) Here follows the ſubſtance of the epitaph, recited by du Verdier in his Hiſtory of the Turks; I am the great Selim, who conquered the earth, who ſeek for fights ſtill after my death. Fortune did always bend under my efforts: my body is in this tomb, but my ſpirit is at war.

[N] I ſhall have ſome faults to object to Mr Moreri.] I. It is not true, that Mahomet ſubdued Carinthia and Stiria. His troops only made excurſions, and ravaged the country there, after the victory of Liſoncio, which they gained over the Venetians in 1476 (52). II. It is falſe that he made his own epitaph in Latin. III. And that he died at Nicomedia: for he died in a town of Bithynia, known to the antients by the name of Aſtacus, between Conſtantinople and Nicomedia, which are diſtant from each other a day's journey

(52) See Paul Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 265, & Guillet, lib. vii, pag. 290, 291.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google who attributes to the Schism of the Greeks the miſchiefs they ſuffered under this Turkiſh prince [O].

Landinus, a knight of Rhodes, has collected divers letters, which this Sultan had written in Syriac, in Greek, and in Turkiſh, and tranſlated them into Latin. This tranſlation has been publiſhed. I ſhall ſpeak of it below [P]; but it is not known, where the originals may be found (f). I ſhall take notice likewiſe of a letter, which Pope Pius II wrote to the ſame Sultan. It has employed the pens of the controverſial writers [Q]. It may not only ſtand a ſuperficial examination, but alſo dazzle the eyes of ney (53). This town is called by ſome Teggiur Tzair, and by others Geiviſe. IV. He lived not fifty three years, but a little more than fifty one years. V. One cannot ſufficiently wonder, that Mr Moreri ſhould ſay, that Mahomet did not want courage. It is thus we uſually to ſpeak of a man ſuſpected of cowardice, when we endeavour to vindicate him. It is thus we ſpeak of a very peaceable prince, who never gave any public proofs of his valour, but made it appear in private, that he neither feared death nor dangers: but it is abſurd to expreſs one's ſelf after this manner, ſpeaking of a thunder-bolt of war, and of ſuch a conqueror as our Mahomet was, who, to uſe the words of an Hiſtorian, whom Moreri ſhould have known (54), had by nature a body extreamly ſtrong, that could endure all the fatigues of war, which he made his continual buſineſs during his whole life; had a very fiery temper, was vehement, bold, enterprizing, and inſatiable of glory, and had a heart even greater than his birth and fortune, together with an undaunted courage. VI. Mr Moreri expreſſes himſelf very ill a little after, when he affirms, that, to ſpeak ingenuouſly, one cannot bear of Mahomet's debaucheries without contempt: and preſently after he ſays, that this infamous wretch would have forced the princeſs of Walachia. Is it not with horror, and not with contempt, that we hear of ſuch a leudneſs? VII. Mahomet did not cut off the head of a woman, with his own hands, becauſe ſhe appeared to him too beautiful: it was becauſe his ſoldiers murmured to ſee him loſe his reputation, and the fair opportunities of action, in the arms of a woman: Beſides, the fact is not certain (55). VIII. It is falſe, that this Sultan, after the taking of Conſtantinople, vented his rage againſt the dead body of the emperor Conſtantine. The chancellor (56) of that emperor, who was at Conſtantinople, and wrote nothing but what he ſaw himſelf (57) ſays the contrary: 'He aſſures us, that the Sultan, having cauſed ſtrict 'ſearch to be made every where, to find out the 'truth of what was yet doubtful, viz. whether he 'was alive or dead, his body was at laſt found among 'the bodies of ſeveral Turks and Chriſtians, heaped 'one upon another; doubtleſs in the ſame place, 'where this brave prince had been killed, with thoſe 'valiant men who periſhed with him, after they had 'deſtroyed a great number of the enemy; for in 'the gates there were none but the bodies of Chriſti-'ans, either ſtifled in the croud, or killed, while they 'were endeavouring to get out. He adds, that the 'body, tho' all diſfigured, was known by the 'purple buſkins enriched with eagles embroidered 'in gold, which the emperors only wore; and that 'Mahomet, being deſirous to do honour to the virtue 'and courage of ſo great a prince, commanded all 'the funeral honours to be paid to him, that were 'due to the emperors (58).'

(f) See Huet. de Interpret. pag. m. 183.

[O] Father Maimbourg inconſiderately attributes to the ſchiſm of the Greeks the miſchiefs they ſuffered under this Turkiſh prince.] He perpetually repeats (59), that the taking of Conſtantinople, and the ruin of their empire, were the juſt puniſhment of their obſtinacy, in refuſing the ſubmiſſion they owed to the ſee of Rome. He was little the better for the cenſures he received for writing in the ſame dogmatical manner, in the hiſtory of the Iconoclaſts. It was then proved to him that this doctrine was ſeditious. He had ſaid (60) that God took away the weſtern empire from the Greeks, as a puniſhment of the revolt they had ſo often renewed againſt the church; which a critic thus cenſured (61). God alone knows the cauſe of the change of empires and kingdoms; and it is, at leaſt, a raſh thing, to attribute it to the impiety, or the hereſies, of the princes or ſubjects of thoſe empires. Do you think, continued he, that it is allowable for any one to ſay of a king, or emperor, that is heretical, or of a prince, in whoſe dominions there are heretics, when we ſee them deprived of their dominions, that they have loſt them upon the account of the hereſies that aroſe in them. This approaches too near, replied Euchariſtus, to that deteſtable doctrine, condemned for hereſy in the council of Conſtance *. For if it may be ſaid of a prince, that he loſt his ſovereign power, and was deprived by GOD for his crimes, for his hereſy, or for the hereſy that prevailed in his dominions, is not this to ſay, that theſe crimes deſerve the deprivation of a prince? This doctrine is not only ſeditious, but alſo an imitation of the complaints that were made by the Pagans againſt the Chriſtian church (62), on occaſion of the great ravages the Goths made in Rome, in all Italy, and elſewhere. The city of Rome was as ill treated by Charles the Vth, in 1527, as Conſtantinople was, when the Turks took it. Would not Father Maimbourg take it ill, if the Greeks ſhould tell him, that Rome was then laid waſte, becauſe ſhe was ſo ambitious as to require that the Greek church ſhould pay her obedience? What would he anſwer to this? that Rome was in the right, and that it was not ſo with the Greeks? But would not this be what is called Petitio principii? Men ought not thus to ſearch into the counſels of Providence. All parties ſtand in need of this leſſon; they often attribute the calamities of a contrary party to the qualities of it's doctrine, which is to forget the declarations of (63) JESUS CHRIST (64). Father Maimbourg would not have been much more unreaſonable, if he had adopted the ſtory related by Chalcondylas. That Hiſtorian pretends, that the Romans, being deſcended from Æneas, and being ſtill concerned in the ruin of Troy, ſaid, that the Greeks had ſuffered ſo much miſchief at the taking of Conſtantinople, as a puniſhment of the outrages they had formerly committed in the kingdom of Priamus. Facetus eſt Chalcondylas dum ait Romanos ſeu Latinos conſtanter aſſeverare, hanc cladem contigiſſe Græcis in ultionem eorum quæ olim feciſſent barbaris in deſtructione Ilii; quod videlicet dicantur Romani à Trojanis deſcendiſſe (65). According to this fine chimera, we ſhould not leave the numbers as they ſtand in the decalogue. We ſhould believe, that GOD viſits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, not unto the fourth, but unto the thouſandth generation, and ſo preſcription ſhould never take place; Delicta majorum immeritus lues Romane (66). France would have reaſon to fear, leſt, two thouſand years hence, an irruption of Barbarians ſhould revenge on her the injuries, which the Romans and Greeks received from Brennus.

[P] The tranſlation of his letters was publiſhed; I ſhall ſpeak of it below.] It was printed at Lyons in 4to in 1520, and ſince at Baſil, with the Epiſtles of Symmachus, by Frobenius (67). It was afterwards inſerted in a collection of letters, which John Oporinus publiſhed at Baſil in 1554, in 12mo (68). This collection was compiled by Gilbert Couſin, and intituled, Farrago Epiſtolarum Laconicarum & Selectarum. The tranſlation of Landin, in 8vo, was reprinted at Marpurg, in 1604, and again at Leipſic, in 12mo, in 1690, by the care of Simon Gœbelius Romhildenſis Francus (69). Melchior Junius, Profeſſor of Eloquence at Straſburg, publiſhed at Montbeliard, in 1595, a collection of letters, which contains three of thoſe, written to Scanderbeg by Mahomet II. The compiler took them out of a book of Marinus Barletius de vita & geſtis Scanderbegi. There are added to them three anſwers, that were returned to the Sultan. The Turkiſh ferocity does not at all appear in theſe three letters of Mahomet; they are written in very civil terms, and are ſuch as might become the moſt debonaire Chriſtian princes to write.

[Q] A letter which Pope Pius II wrote to the ſame Sultan . . . . has employed the controverſial writers.] Mr du Pleſſis Mornai was the aggreſſor in theſe words (70). The ambition of Pius II cannot be better known than by his Epiſtle 396, wherein he offers and promiſes

(53) Guillet, lib. vi, pag. 377.

(54) Maimbourg's Schiſm of the Greeks, lib. vi, pag. 369. He cites Leuncl. hiſt ro. Lonic. Hiſt. Turc. lib. i. Cuſpin. in Mahom.

(55) See the remark [I].

(56) He was called Phranzes.

(57) Maimbourg, Hiſtory of the Schiſm of the Greeks, lib. vi, pag. 347.

(58) Id. ib. pag. 358, he cites Phranzes, lib. iii, cap. xviii.

(59) In the Hiſtory of the Schiſm of the Greeks, lib. vi.

(60) See the Dialogues of Eudoxus and Euchariſtus, pag. 95, of the Holland edition.

(61) Ib. pag. 96.

* Seſſ. xv. quilibet tyrannus, &c.

(62) See Oroſius in his preface, and St Auguſtin, de Civit. Dei, in Præfat. & alibi paſſim.

(63) St Luke's Goſpel, ch. xiii.

(64) Confer quæ ſupra, citat. (21) of the article CAUSSIN.

(65) Spondanus, ad ann. 1453. num. xvii, pag. m. 30.

(66) Horace, Od. IV, lib. III.

(67) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, p. 533.

(68) Ib. p. 560.

(69) See Crenii, Animadverſ. Part. ii, pag. 26.

(70) Du Pleſſis, Miſtery of Iniquity, pag. 541.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of thoſe, who read it without the ſpirit of Criticiſm, and repreſent this Pope to them under an advantageous idea, and worthy of praiſe. Nay, even thoſe, who examine it ſtrictly, and conſider Pius II only under the notion of a ſovereign prince of one part of Italy, may judge his letter to be prudential; but, when it is weighed in the balance of the ſanctuary, and when we conſider, that he, who wrote it, calls himſelf the Vicar of JESUS

promiſes the Grecian empire to Mahumed king of the Turks, provided he would turn Chriſtian, and ſuccour the church, that is, his own party, and aſſiſt him to rend Chriſtendom in pieces, as he did by continual wars, giving him to underſtand, that it was in his gift, and that thus his predeceſſors had granted the empire of Germany to Charlemagne. Coëffeteau filled all the ſails of his eloquence, or rather of his anger, in anſwering this paſſage of Du Pleſſis. 'Is it poſſible, 'ſays he (71), that hereſy ſhould ſo far extinguiſh all 'ingenuity, as to make us condemn what is moſt 'commendable in the actions of thoſe we have a mind 'to defame? There can be nothing ſo learned and 'eloquent, nothing ſo ſolid and nervous, nothing ſo 'humble and Chriſtian, nothing ſo pious and reli-'gious, as this epiſtle; and yet Du Pleſſis alledges 'it, as a ſignal mark of the inſolence of it's author. 'Does then any ſpark of modeſty, any ſenſe of ju-'ſtice, remain with him? Here are the words, from 'which he would infer the ambition of Pius. If 'you deſire, ſays this Pope to Mahomet, to enlarge your 'empire among the Chriſtians, and render your name 'glorious, you need neither gold nor ſilver, nor armies, 'nor ſhips, to do it. One little thing may render you 'the greateſt, the moſt powerful, the moſt famous, of 'all men that live this day. You will aſk what it 'is? It is not difficult to find it, and you need not 'ſearch far for it; it is to be met with in all parts 'of the world; it is only a little water, to baptize 'you, that you may embrace the Chriſtian religion, and 'believe the Goſpel. If you do this, no prince in the 'world will exceed you in glory, or equal you in power. 'We will call you the emperor of the Greeks, and of the 'Eaſt; and what you now poſſeſs by violence and in-'juſtice, you ſhall then poſſeſs by right and equity. All 'Chriſtians will honour you, and make you arbri-'trator of their differences, &c. And again, If you 'were baptized, and would go with us into the 'houſe of the Lord, the people would no longer dread your 'empire, nor would we aſſiſt them againſt you; but ra-'ther we would implore your aid againſt thoſe, who 'ſometimes uſurp what belongs to the Roman church, 'and lift up their horns againſt their mother. And as 'our predeceſſors, Stephen, Adrian, and Leo, called in 'to their aſſiſtance Pepin and Charlemagne, againſt 'Aſtulphus and Deſiderius, kings of the Lombards, and, 'after they had by them been delivered from the oppreſſion 'of tyrants, transferred to their deliverers the empire of 'the Greeks; ſo we would make uſe of your aſſiſtance, 'and we would not be ungrateful for the benefit we 'ſhould receive. Can a reader, who conſiders theſe 'things without paſſion, diſcover any appearance of 'ambition in this epiſtle? was it not rather his zeal, 'that made him write thus, to influence the pride and 'courage of this Barbarian? And does he promiſe 'Mahomet any thing, but what all Chriſtendom would 'have conſented to, if this Barbarian had been willing 'to embrace theſe conditions, which Pius propoſed to 'him?' This language is very fit to prejudice thoſe againſt Du Pleſſis, who are unacquainted with books of controverſy; I mean, ſo far as to diſcuſs matters, and confront the ſeveral pieces, that the anſwers and replies may the better be compared together. This is almoſt the only way to be well aſſured, that thoſe, who give themſelves the greateſt airs of triumph, and make the moſt tragical exclamations, are generally reduced to ſome troubleſome ſtreights, and under a neceſſity of ſupplying by figures of Rhetoric, what they want of reaſon. Thoſe, who are verſed in this kind of reading, which I have deſcribed, and, beſides, are tenderly concerned for the glory and memory of du Pleſſis Mornai, will have no reaſon to fear, when they read all the words of his adverſary; but if they be novices, and ſuch as cannot very readily lay hold of this prejudice againſt Coëffeteau, viz. that he being a Dominican, does not manage controverſy fairly, they will be much afraid, that Du Pleſſis was miſtaken, and will think that he is utterly confounded; and therefore they will be impatient to inform themſelves, whether he, or any other, has anſwered Coëffeteau.

(71) Coëffet. Anſwer to the Myſtery of Iniquity, pag. 1197.

Whatever their uneaſineſs may be, they can no longer doubt of the victory of their champion, when they examine the reply of Rivet. And this ought to warn us to obey the precept, audi & alteram partem; hear alſo the other party, and that it is not ſufficient to examine what John ſays, and what Peter anſwers, but we muſt alſo inform our ſelves what is anſwered to Peter.

Rivet, anſwering for Du Pleſſis, confeſſes, that the long letter of Pius II to Mahomet contains very good things againſt the belief of the Turks, in confirmation of the Chriſtian faith; but, adds he (72), 'beſides that 'it appears to be a very uſeleſs deſign, that of con-'verting this prince by an epiſtle, which was no ways 'probable, there is a diabolical malice in it. For, in-'ſtead of ſhewing that the poor Chriſtian Greeks un-'der the empire of this Barbarian, raiſed the compaſ-'ſion of the Chriſtians in theſe parts, and exhorting 'him to treat them civilly, he ſeems to have written 'this epiſtle on purpoſe to blacken them as falſe Chri-'ſtians, and to diſcover, that their loſs does not affect 'the Latins. Our Hiſtory adds, as a mark of ambi-'tion, that he propoſes to Mahomet, provided he 'would be baptized, the peaceable empire of all he 'had uſurped, and promiſes him, that all will make 'him judge of their debates, and that the whole world 'will appeal to his deciſion (you may judge whether the 'princes, who had been a long time Chriſtians, were 'not mightily obliged to him); that many of themſelves 'would ſubmit to him, and to his ſentence, &c. He 'adds, that the charity of the Romiſh church will not 'only be towards him what it is to other kings, but ſo 'much greater, as he is higher than they. Obſerve this 'ſtroke. In fine, he repreſents to him, that the Romiſh 'church would implore his aid againſt the undutiful 'children that roſe up againſt their mother. And in 'fine, having boaſted, that the Popes had transferred 'the empire of the Greeks to the French, he pro-'miſes, that, in conſideration of his ſervices done to 'the church, he would do the like by him, in return 'for his benefits. There is wanting a long commen-'tary on this diſcourſe. In a few words, this way 'of converting men by promiſing them the empire of 'the world is not apoſtolical. II. It is a ridiculous 'thing to promiſe a foreign and potent prince, what 'he is already poſſeſſed of. III. It is contrary to 'charity, which is no reſpecter of perſons, to be 'greater toward thoſe who are more highly advanced. 'IV. It is againſt the ſame charity, to diſcover to an 'infidel the miſeries of Chriſtendom, and to deſire his 'converſion, on purpoſe to make uſe of him againſt 'princes already Chriſtians. V. It is vanity, ambi-'tion, and preſumption, to boaſt, that the empire of 'Charlemagne is a reward from the Pope, and to pre-'tend, that he could reward, after the ſame manner, 'him to whom he ſpeaks: let the reader judge, whe-'ther this diſcourſe becomes him, who ſays he is ſeat-'ed in the chair of St Peter: Is this a diſcourſe hum-'ble, chriſtian, modeſt, and pious? Would theſe con-'ditions and promiſes have been approved by all Chri-'ſtendom?' I know not whether Coëffeteau, or any o-ther Catholic, has anſwered this book of Rivet; and if I had in my hands the ſecond piece of the antagoniſts of Du Pleſſis, I would here ſet it down at length that nothing might be wanting, and that my readers might give ſentence, having a full knowledge of the cauſe, upon the charge alledged againſt Pius II. It ſeems not poſſible to reply any thing very material to the remarks of Rivet; but, on the contrary, it ſeems very poſſible to make them more unanſwerable; for what can be more horrible, and ſhameful to the Chriſtian religion, than to ſee Mahomet II, one of the greateſt criminals that ever lived, a man, who had ſhed ſo much blood, and robbed ſo many perſons of their eſtates by a continual train of cruelties and injuſtices, become lawful poſſeſſor of all his uſurpations, provided he would be baptized? What becomes of that inviolable law of Chriſtian morality, that the firſt ſtep of repentance that expiates a robbery, is the reſtitution of the ill-gotten goods? What would one ſay, (72) Rivet's Remarks upon the Anſwer to the Myſtery of Iniquity, Part ii, pag. 617.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

JESUS CHRIST, and consequently the protector of the morality of the Gospel, he cannot be excused. Since therefore this question has different faces, none ought to blame me for relating a little at large the words of the advocates, who plead this cause. My commentary ought to be considered, among other respects, under the notion of that volume, in which Historiographers insert all the pieces for their justification, which they mention in the course of the narrative. Let this be said once for all. Some persons believe, that the letter of Pius II was not written with the design of being sent to Mahomet [R].

if a Jew, guilty of a fraudulent bankruptcy for three millions, should obtain, by the meer ceremony of baptism, without being obliged to make any restitution, a full absolution of his crimes, and a right to possess those three millions? Would not the Infidels have very good reason to defame Christianity as the pest of equity and natural morality? And yet this procedure with respect to the bankrupt would be only a peccadillo, in comparison of the offers, which Pius II made to Mahomet, to make him lawful possessor of his conquests, by means of a few drops of water sprinkled upon his face. What would the apostles say at the sight of such a dispensation, and such an use of the keys? Is this agreeable to what St Paul says (73), or even to what Ovid an Heathen Poet says, (73) For we are not as many, who corrupt the word of God. 2 Cor. ii. 17.

(74) Ovid. Fast. lib. II, ver. 27.

O nimium faciles qui tristia crimina cædis
Fluminea tolli posse putatis aqua (74).

Fools! to believe, that water, duly spilt,
Can wash away the crimson stains of guilt.

(75) Guillet, Hist. of Mahomet II, Tom. I, pag. 361, & seq. ad ann. 1461.

† Francisco Sansovino, fol. 134.

[R] Some persons believe, that the letter of Pius II was not written with the design of being sent to Mahomet.] I shall add nothing to the words which I borrow from a Catholic writer (75). 'Here we must 'add a word about the long letter, which † Francisco Sansovino has published, under the name of 'Pope Pius (76) to Sultan Mahomet. For it appears 'by it, that this Pope wrote it at a time, when the 'conquest of Sinope and Trebizonde made the Latin 'princes fear the like effort from the Ottoman arms. 'It shews at large the advantages of the Christian 'religion above the Mahometan, and pretends to in'vite the Sultan to baptism by great examples, repre'senting to him, how glorious it was for Constantine 'the great, to have been the first of the Roman em'perors, who became a Christian, and to Clovis 'to have been also the first of the French kings, who 'embraced the Gospel, and that it would be no less 'honourable for him to be the first of the Ottoman 'monarchs, who embraced our faith. There are ma'ny, who, reflecting upon the unaccessible and morose 'humour of Mahomet, do not think it probable, that 'a letter, on so nice a subject, was ever delivered to 'him, or that any durst wait for an answer to it. 'They add, that at least it would have found the 'Sultan very little inclined to the proposal, and that, 'unless by a miracle, his conversion could not be 'the effect of the remonstrances of a letter. Thus 'when the Italians would express the little hopes there 'is of success in any matter, they say pleasantly in 'their language, La penna non toglie il filo alla spada: 'That the pen does not blunt the edge of the sword. It 'is probable therefore, that it was published among 'the western nations, after the taking of Trebizon'de, as a manifesto, to justify the arms of the Cru'sade, and to awake the ardor of the warriors in 'Christendom, after they had seen, that the Pope had 'endeavoured in vain to divert the arms of the Sultan 'in the peaceable way of remonstrances.'

(76) He seems to be ignorant, that this letter is found in the editions of Pius II, his letters.

MAHOMET GALADIN, emperor of Mogul, was famous for his good qualities, and chiefly for his great application to hear the petitions and complaints of his subjects. He gave them audience twice a day; and, that persons of a mean condition, who commonly could not, or durst not, approach his tribunal, might have an opportunity to declare their grievances, he caused a bell to be set near him, to which a rope was tied that went into the street, and, whenever the bell was rung, he either went out, or ordered him, who had pulled the rope, to be brought in (a). He died in the year 1605, and none could ever know of what sect he was (b). He had thoughts of becoming a Christian; but the Mahometan priests dissuaded him from it by two reasons [A].

(a) Don Clement Tosi, a Benedictin of the congregation of St Sylvester, in the first volume of his Gentilesimo confutato.

(b) Mori nel 1605, senza saperfi di qual Setta egli fosse stato. Giornale de Letterati, June 27, 1669, pag. 83, in the abstract of Gentilesimo confutato.

[A] The Mahometan priests dissuaded him from becoming a Christian by two reasons.] By one reason applied to the mind, and another to the heart. They told him, that the Christian religion proposed to him mysteries to be believed, which he could not at all comprehend, and that it would oblige him to marry but one wife. It is very probable, that the second reason weighed more with him than the first; for those who have been educated in the doctrine of Polygamy, and have put it in practice, have a frightful idea of the Christian doctrine in this point; and, although the Great Mogul might be told, that this evangelical doctrine did not much incommode many Christian princes, because almost all of them dispensed with it, not indeed by marrying many wives, but by keeping mistresses, he might still think it hard: for in short there is a great difference between practising things agreeable to religion, and not being able to practise them without violating the laws of religion. Poco vi manco che non accettasse la nostra religione, e ne fu ritirato da i Mulasi Sacerdoti Mahomettani dal non poter capir i misteri della fede col, lume naturale, e l'obligo di contentarsi d'una sola moglie (1). Lyserus, the grand apologist for Polygamy, does not forget to observe, that the law of marrying but one wife retards the conversion of the infidels (2).

(1) Giornale de Letterati, June 27, 1669, pag. 83, in the abstract of Gentilesimo confutato, by Don Clement Tosi.

(2) See Polygamia triumphatrix, pag. 92.

MAYERNE (THEODORUS TURQUET SIEUR DE) one of the most famous Physicians of his time, was born near Geneva (a) in 1572, or thereabouts (b). He took, at Montpelier in 1596, his degree of Bachelor of Physic, and his degree of Doctor in the same faculty, Febr. 20. 1597. He went from thence to Paris some time after, and applied himself very much to the practice of Chymistry; which was a study greatly decried at that time, and very odious to the Physicians of Paris. Upon which account they railed most vehemently against Mayerne and du Chesne (c), and endeavoured to make them pass for sworn enemies to Physic. This appears from a book, that was printed in 1603, against these two Physicians. Mayerne refuted it in another book, which was refuted in it's turn [A]. This was not all; for the faculty of Physic attacked

(a) In a country house, called Mayerne, in the territory of the Republic of Geneva. Browne, in Præfat. Operum Mayerni.

(b) See in the remark [C], the true day of his birth.

(c) See the remark [A], citation (8).

[A] Mayerne refuted it in another book, which was refuted in it's turn.] Guy Patin mentions this dispute, but like one, that took pleasure in censuring, and who was an enemy to innovating Physicians. 'The 'Sieur

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

attacked him by a decree prohibiting him to practise; but, notwithstanding this, Mayerne was sent for to court, and was made Physician in ordinary to Henry the Great. After the death of this prince, he retired to England, and there raised a very great fortune. He obtained the friendship of several illustrious persons there, and so far gained the favour of the learned king James, that he was not only his First Physician, but also in some measure his favourite. He was loaded with honours (d), and his fortune still increased under king Charles I. He was unanimously admitted Doctor of Physic in both universities of the kingdom. His reputation and practice were extraordinary, and he acquired a great estate. He had two sons and one daughter, who was married to the marquis de Ruvigni (e). He died at the age of eighty two years. I take this from the preface to his works, printed at London in 1700 [B]. We shall give in the remarks a more particular and exact account [C]. I must not forget, that our Mayerne met

(d) See in the remark [B], the inscription under his print.

(e) It is a mistake. See the remark [C].

(1) Patin, Letter viii, pag. 35, of Tom. i. It is dated Nov. 16, 1645.

(2) See the end of this remark.

(3) This book was seized, confiscated, and prohibited. See the French Mercury, Tom. ii, ad ann. 1611. pag. m. 184.

(4) Patin, ubi supra, pag. 36.

(5) Id. ib. pag. 37.

(6) Ib. pag. 39.

(7) In the body of this article, citation (c).

(8) Patin, Letter xxxi, pag. 142, Tom. i.

'Sieur de Mayerne Turquet, says he (1), Physician to 'the king of England, is, as I have been informed, 'a native of Geneva, the son of one, who wrote the 'History of Spain (2), which is now printed in two 'volumes in folio. His father wrote also a book in- 'tituled, the Aristodemocratic Monarchy (3), which 'was contradicted by Lewis d'Orleans, (who wrote 'the commentaries on Tacitus) in his Human Plant, 'printed at Lyons and at Paris. Turquet wrote an 'answer to Lewis d'Orleans, in 1617. He resided 'at Geneva, or near it, and was of the religion of 'that country .... (4). I believe that his son is a 'Physician of Montpellier. He came to Paris in 1602, 'and, as he affected to be a great Chymist, he had a 'quarrel with some of ours; whereupon a decree was 'made, that none should consult with him; yet he 'had some friends of our profession, who visited the 'sick with him. From this quarrel there proceeded 'an apology for the said Theodore Mayerne, of which 'he was no more the author than you or I. Two 'doctors of our society wrote it, Seguin, our antient, 'who always favoured the quacks, and his brother- 'in-law Acakia .... (5). This Mayerne is still 'in England to this day, very old and almost grown 'a child again. It is said, that he has quitted the 'king's party, and gone over to the parliament's side. 'I saw one of his children in this city, who studied 'Physic, and is since dead in England. It is said, that 'he is very harsh to his children, he is so covetous, 'and that he suffers them to starve. He is a great 'Chymist, very rich, and knows the way of procur- 'ing to himself a great number of Jacobusses, by a 'consult of five or six pages. He is, among other 'things, baron of Aubonne, a fine lordship in the 'country of Vaux, near Geneva, of which a certain 'bishop of Nevers, called Paul Spifame, was lord in '1560 .... (6). This apology of Mayerne did 'not want an answer. Riolanus, the father, answer- 'ed it, by a book very elegant and learned, accord- 'ing to his usual manner.'

Dr Brown, as I have already said (7), observes, that Mayerne had a companion of his fortune, in the persecution he suffered from the Physicians of Paris. He calls his associate Quercetanus, whose French name was du Chesne. Patin says nothing of it; but he speaks very satirically of this Quercetanus. In the same year 1609, says he (8), died a wicked rogue and quack, who killed many during his life, and even after his death, by the unhappy writings he left behind him, under his own name, which he had caused to be composed by other Physicians and Chymists, here and there. I mean Josephus Quercetanus, who went, at Paris, by the name of la Violette. He was a great drunkard, and a very ignoramus; who knew nothing of Latin, and, being by his first employment no more than a wandering Surgeon of the country of Armagnac, a poor, cursed, and unhappy country, passed at Paris, and particularly at court, for a great Physician, because he had learned something of Chymistry in Germany. I must observe, that the general history of Spain, written by Louis de Mayerne Turquet of Lyons, was first printed in the year 1587, and, after that, by Abel l'Angelier, in the year 1608, at Paris, and, after that, again by Samuel Thiboust, in 1635. The second edition comprehends thirty books, and comes down as far as the year 1582. The third edition has six books added to it, and comes down to the end of the XVIth century.

[B] I take this from the preface to his works, printed at London, in 1700.] They are a pretty large folio, divided into two books; the first contains, Consilia, Epistolas, & Observationes; and the second, Pharmacopœam variasque Medicamentorum formulas. There is prefixed to the book the picture of Dr Mayerne, such as he was at the age of eighty two years. It is the most agreeable physiognomy in the world (9); he has a lively, serene, and majestic air, and a venerable beard. Underneath the picture we read; 'Theo. Tur- 'quet de Mayerne Eques Auratus, Patriâ Gallus, Re- 'ligione Reformatus, Dignitate Baro, Professione alter 'Hippocrates, ac trium Regum (exemplo rarissimo) 'Archiater: eruditione incomparablis: experientia 'nulli secundus: & quod ex his omnibus resultat, fama 'late vagante perillustris. - - - Theodore Turquet Mayerne, 'Baronet, by birth a Frenchman, by religion a Protestant, 'by dignity a Baron, by profession another Hippocrates, and '(which is very uncommon) chief Physician to three kings: 'of incomparable learning; second to none in experience; 'and, which is the consequence, known far and near.' The English Physician (10), who had the care of this edition, affirms, that he had never yet seen any work of Mayerne, which was truly his. 'Quicquid hactenus 'sub Mayernii Nomine Orbem invisit, tam crebris fœ- 'datur interpolationibus, utpote quod partim ex suis, par- 'tim ex aliorum Chartis in Bibliotheca sua repertis im- 'perite consuitur, ut nemo hariolari possit, quid author 'sibi velit, ejusque scopum assequi valeat, cum Casus à 'Remediis pessimo Consilio ubique abscindantur.... 'Nihil hactenus sub ejus nomine comparuit, quod ip- 'sius revera esse dici possit (11). - - - - - Whatever has 'yet been published under Mayerne's name, is corrupted 'with such frequent interpolations, as being unskilfully 'patched up, partly out of his own papers, and partly 'those of others, found in his library, that no one can 'guess at the author's meaning, or find out what he aims 'at; the cases being injudiciously separated from the re- 'medies.... Nothing has yet appeared under his name, 'which can truly be affirmed to be his.' He gives us the reasons, which hindred the publishing the chirurgical works of this Physician. You may find in Lindenius renovatus (12) the titles of some writings of this author; but do not imagine that Theodorus Mayernus Turquetus, and Theodorus Turquetus de Mayerne, who are there mentioned as two different writers (13), are two different persons. No mention could be made there of the Praxeos Mayernianæ in morbis internis præcipuè grævioribus & chronicis syntagma; for that book was not printed till 1690 (14). The Journalists of Leipsic (15) have given us an abstract of it.

(9) See the Journal of Leipsic, 1691, pag. 57.

(10) Josephus Browne utriusque Facultatis Doctor.

(11) Id. in Præfat.

(12) At page 997, of the edition of Nuremberg, 1686.

(13) There is the like error in the Bibliotheque of Konig. See page 522, and 822.

[C] We shall give .... a more particular and exact account.] I shall give it such as I received it from Mr Minutoli (16) who was pleased at my request to inform himself exactly of all the circumstances.

(14) At London in 8vo. Dr Charleton wrote a preface to it.

'Sir Theodore de Mayerne, baron of Aubonne, 'Counsellor and chief Physician to their Britannic ma- 'jesties James I, and Charles I, was the son of Lewis 'de Mayerne, famous for the General History of 'Spain, which he composed, and for his Aristodemo- 'cratic Monarchy, dedicated to the States-General, 'and of Louisa, the daughter of Antony le Masson (17), 'treasurer of war to the kings Francis I, and Hen- 'ry II, in Piedmont. The family is originally of that 'country, having flourished a long time in the town of 'Quiers. And as to the name, or nick-name of Tur- 'quet, it came from a woman of their family, who, 'being well made, and of a pretty large size, was 'thought to resemble a fine Turkish woman; which 'made people commonly give the surname of Turquetti 'to all her children. Lewis de Mayerne retired to 'Geneva about the end of the year 1572, having had 'two houses demolished at Lyons upon the account 'of religion. On the twenty eighth of September, '1573, Theodore Mayerne was born to him, having

(15) At page 57, & seq. of the year 1691.

(16) Whom I have mentioned, above, citat. (5) of the article BALZAC (JOHN LEWIS), and remark [I] of the article LUCRETIUS (TITUS, &c.)

(17) Mentioned, above, remark [G] of the article FERRET.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google met with ſome envious perſons, who endeavoured to blacken him upon occaſion of the death of the prince of Wales, in the year 1612. But his honour was perfectly ſecured by authentic acts; I mean by the certificates, which king James, the lords of the council, and the officers and gentlemen of the deceaſed prince of Wales, gave him in the beſt form that could be wiſhed. They may be found, together with a relation of the diſeaſe, death, and opening of the body of that prince, in the work I have mentioned (f).

(f) Pag. 103, & ſeq. of the Opera Medica Theod. Turquet. Mayerni, Edit. 1700. Lond.

'for his god-father Theodore Beza. He was inſtructed, 'in his own country, in claſſical learning, and from 'thence ſent to Heidelberg, where he continued ſome 'years. After which, being deſigned for Phyſic, he 'went to Montpelier, where he took his degree of 'Bachelor, and afterwards of Doctor. From thence 'he went to Paris, where, applying himſelf to pra'ctice, he read lectures of Anatomy to young Sur'geons, and of Pharmacy to Apothecaries; and his 'preſcriptions gained him eſteem; ſo that he was 'known to Mr Ribbit Sieur de la Riviere, firſt Phy'ſician to king Henry IV, who recommended him ſo 'well to his majeſty, that he gave him the place of one 'of his Phyſicians in ordinary; and, in the year 1600, 'he appointed him to attend the duke of Rohan, in the 'journies he made for the affairs of France to the 'courts of the princes of Germany and Italy. Being 'returned, he was much eſteemed in the diſcharge of 'his office, and was in favour with the king, who 'promiſed him great things, if he would change his 'religion, ſetting, for that end, cardinal du Perron, 'and other eccleſiaſtics, to perſuade him to it. Nay, 'notwithſtanding his refuſal, the king iſſued out a 'warrant appointing him his firſt Phyſician, but the 'Jeſuits, who knew it, got it revoked by queen Mary 'de Medicis; a circumſtance and favour, which 'Dr Mayerne knew nothing of at that time; but, af'terwards, in England, in the year 1642, he learned 'it from the mouth of Cæſar duke of Vendoſme, a 'natural ſon of France. In 1607, he took care of 'an Engliſh lord, who was ſick, and who, being cured, 'carried him into England, where he had a private 'audience of king James. And, even after the death 'of Henry IV, he continued to be Phyſician in ordi'nary to Lewis XIII, till 1616, when he ſold this 'place to a French Phyſician. In 1611, the king of 'England by his embaſſador, invited him, to be firſt 'Phyſician to himſelf, and to his wife queen Anne, 'and gave him a patent, ſealed under the great ſeal of 'England, where he ſerved the whole royal family 'with great honour and approbation to his death; as 'he did alſo the greateſt part of the nobility, and 'people. He made an exact collection of his medi'cinal advices. He compoſed a very curious Phar'macopœa of Medicines, Galenical as well as Spa'gyrical; but he never printed any thing, except an 'Apology againſt the Faculty of Phyſic at Paris, 'which had attacked him. There was a Phyſician 'called Brouent, who ſent to Dr Beverovicius an ac'count of the bladder of Iſaac Caſaubon, written by 'the ſaid Mayerne, for which he expreſſed a reſent'ment. He had two wives, the firſt of whom was 'Margaret de Boetſlaer of the houſe of Aſperen, by 'whom he had two ſons, who died during his life. 'And the ſecond was Iſabel, the daughter of Albert 'Joachimy, famous for his embaſſies for the States-'General in Muſcovy, and Sweden, and for above 'twenty four years in England, by whom he had two 'ſons, who died before him, and three daughters, 'two of whom died while he was alive. He died the 'fifteenth of March, 1655, at Chelſey, near London, 'leaving one only daughter, who brought a great 'eſtate by her marriage to the Marquis de Montpouil'lan, grandſon to the marſhal duke de la Force; but 'ſhe died at the Hague, in 1661, in labour, or at 'leaſt during her lying-in.'

Note, That Dr Mayerne had a niece, who was married to an Engliſh lord of great merit. She was called Louiſa de Frotté, and by her marriage was named lady Windſor. She was a perſon of a great deal of wit, and much reading, and for many years was an ornament to the city of Geneva: ſhe died there about the end of the year 1691. See her Elogium in the Italia regnante of Mr Leti (18). See alſo the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (19).

(18) Part iv, pag. 64, & ſeq.

(19) Month of March 1692, pag. 336.

MAIGNAN (EMANUEL) one of the greateſt Philoſophers of the XVIIth century, was a Minim Frier, a native of Toulouſe. He quitted the opinions of the ſchools, and oppoſed them very ſolidly. He was neither Carteſian, nor Gaſſendiſt, but agreed with the heads of theſe two ſects, in rejecting accidents, qualities, and ſubſtantial forms, and cultivating experimental Philoſophy. He was very well verſed in the Mathematics, and had joined to all theſe ſciences ſo great a ſkill in Divinity, that he was capable of teaching it even at Rome itſelf (a). He was engaged in ſeveral diſputes with the Peripatetics, and was ſo much the more able to make head againſt them, as he followed in a great meaſure the method of the Scholaſtics in his writings. The manner, in which he explains the retaining of accidents, without a ſubject, in the myſtery of the Euchariſt, is more happy than that of Des Cartes [A]. I have read in ſome of the journaliſts,

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] The manner, in which he explains the retaining of accidents without a ſubject, is more happy, than that of Des Cartes.] Mr Rohault pretended the contrary; but it was becauſe he did not ſee the great difficulty conſequent upon that explication he takes for the beſt. Let us ſee how he relates that of F. Maignan. 'There is 'nothing ſo eaſy as to explain the manner how the ac'cidents of bread and wine ſubſiſt without the bread 'and wine; for, in a word, we need ſay no more, 'than that the bread and wine being taken away, 'GOD continues ſtill to make the ſame impreſſions 'upon our ſenſes, as they did, before they were 'changed. After this manner this myſtery is explained 'by a famous Divine of the order of the Minims, cal'led Father Maignan (1).' But Mr Rohault blames this hypotheſis, becauſe it admits two miracles, where but one is wanting. Although it be true, ſays he (2), that GOD can produce in our ſenſes the impreſſions of bread and wine, after they have been changed by Tranſubſtantiation, yet there is no neceſſity, after this, to have recourſe to a new miracle, as this good father ſeems to do: becauſe it follows from the very eſſence of the myſtery (which is, that the bread is really changed into the body of JESUS CHRIST) that we muſt continue to perceive all the ſame appearances, as we perceived before, i. e. that the accidents of bread and wine muſt ſubſiſt. This Carteſian pretends (3), that the body of JESUS CHRIST does in ſuch a manner take up the place of the bread, that the ſame ſpaces exactly, which ſerved for a place to the bread, are thoſe, wherein the body of JESUS CHRIST is diſpoſed, leaving to the matter, which filled the pores of the bread, the ſame ſpaces which it filled before. From whence it follows, that the parts of the body of JESUS CHRIST aſſume the figure, ſituation, and, in general, all the other modes of bread, and conſequently that they are bread: for, according to Mr Rohault, the eſſence of bread, or the form, which diſtinguiſhes it from all other bodies, is nothing but a particular concurrence of modifications: and therefore there muſt needs be bread whereſoever this concurrence is; and ſo, it being found in the body of JESUS CHRIST, at the ſacrament of the Euchariſt, this body is nothing elſe but bread: from whence it follows, that this great myſtery conſiſts in deſtroying a bit of bread, and replacing another bit of bread in the room of that, which was annihilated.

(1) Rohault, Entretiens ſur la Philoſophie, pag. 42.

(2) Id. ib. p. 55.

(3) Id. ib. pag. 53, 57, &c.

This

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

journaliſts, that ſomebody is writing his Life. If I had read it, I would very willingly make a long article of this learned Minim. I ſhall ſay a word of his writings [B]. He is ſometimes miſtaken for another Philoſopher, called Magnen [C]. This article was already in the preſs, when I diſcovered that Father Maignan was miſplaced (b) in the ſupplement to Moreri's dictionary.

(b) Under the word Magnan.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have ſeen a piece (c), whoſe title is, De vita, moribus, & ſcriptis R. Patris Emanuelis Maignani Toloſatis, Ordinis Minimorum, Philoſophi atque Mathematici præſtantiſſimi Elogium. It was compoſed by Father Saguens (d), and printed at Toulouſe in 1697. I ſhall extract from it a good ſupplement. Emanuel Maignan, born the ſeventeenth of July 1601, was of an antient and noble family [D]. He gave hopes from his cradle of his future inclination to letters and ſciences; for nothing would ſooner ſtop his crying, than to put a book in his hand. He would turn over the leaves, and look upon the characters with much pleaſure, and it was perceived, after he had paſſed the age of five years, that he diſpiſed the little pleaſures of children, and that he gave wonderful attention to prayers, and catechetical inſtructions. Upon this account they took care betimes to place him under the direction of a domeſtic tutor. He went through his claſſical learning in the college of the Jeſuits, and performed with great diligence all the duties of a good ſcholar, both with reſpect to the literary exerciſes, and thoſe of religion. He diſcovered in all his conduct ſo much modeſty and ſincerity, that he was afraid of being infected by lewd converſation; and from thence it was, that by degrees he withdrew himſelf from the company of his ſchool-fellows, and that he choſe rather to leave off the diverſions proper to his age, than to expoſe his innocence to any danger (e). His hours of recreation were ſpent in walking in the convent of the Minims, where he met with an old man, who diſcourſed to him about ſalvation. Theſe diſcourſes were the ſeeds of a religious life, to which he dedicated himſelf ſome time after; and to this he was ſtrongly inclined by a diſgrace, which happened to him when he was ſtudying Rhetoric: he had compoſed a poem, to diſpute the prize of eloquence, and he believed, that they unjuſtly dealt with him, in adjudging the victory to another. The reflexions he made, during his vexation, confirmed him ſo much in the thought of quitting the world, that he deſired the habit of a Minim. It was not long denied him; and having acquitted himſelf well during his noviciate, he was admitted to make his vows at eighteen years of age, that is in 1619. He went through a courſe of Philoſophy under a maſter very much attached to the doctrine of Ariſtotle, and he loſt no opportunity of diſputing againſt every thing that was ſuſpected of Heterodoxy in the Phyſics of that antient Philoſopher. This was taken for a good omen by his profeſſor, who quickly after was aſtoniſhed to find, that his ſcholar underſtood very well the Mathematics

(c) Of fifty one pages in 4to.

(d) A Minim, native of Toulouſe, who was a diſciple of Father Maignan, and taught the Philoſophy of his maſter at Toulouſe, at Bourdeaux, and at Rome, for a long time. He publiſhed, in 1700, a book of 286 pages in 12mo, intituled, Accidentia profligata, ſpecies inſtauratæ, ſive de ſpeciebus panis ac vini poſt conſecrationem Euchariſticam duntaxat manentibus, Opus Philoſophico-Theologicum, in which he maintains very ſtrenuouſly Father Maignan's opinion about the ſacramental ſpecies.

(e) Ad omnes vitæ ſuæ actus, & uſus advocabat honeſtum ac modeſtum illum pudorem, qui abhorret ab omni inquinamento laſcivientis colloquii. Quare cœpit paulatim declinare à ſocîis, præeligens omni joco abſtinere, quam facere vel leviſſimum verecundiæ ſuæ periculum. Saguens, in Elogio Em. Maignani, p. 5.

This is abſurd, and altogether remote from the doctrine of Popery. It is true, that, in this ſuppoſition, there needs no miracle to explain how the appearances of bread ſubſiſt with reſpect to all our ſenſes. This is a natural conſequence from the ſituation of the body of our Lord in the place of the bread deſtroyed: but this advantage, proceeding only from an hypotheſis, which includes ſuch abſurdities, as are inconſiſtent with the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, cannot make the Carteſian explication equal to that of Father Maignan, although it requires a particular miracle for the continuation of the appearances of the bread and wine in the Euchariſt.

[B] I ſhall ſay a word of his writings.] He printed at Toulouſe a courſe of Philoſophy in four volumes, in 8vo, in the year 1652. He publiſhed it again in folio (4) in 1673, with many additions, and dedicated it to the preſident d'Onoville, who is ſo much commended in the voyage of Mr Bachaumont and Mr la Chapelle. He added to it, among other things, a critical diſcourſe on the vortices of Mr Des Cartes, and a diſſertation on the ſpeaking-trumpet, invented by Sir Samuel Moreland. There is alſo a book of his relating to Divinity, intituled Philoſophia Entis ſacri, and a Perſpectiva horaria, printed at Rome in 1648, in folio, &c. Mr Baillet ſpeaks of this laſt book as follows. 'Mr Carcavi acquainted Mr Des Cartes, that 'there was at Rome a Minim, called Father Maignan, who was more intelligent and profound than 'Father Merſenne, who had given him hopes of 'making ſome objections againſt his principles. This 'Father . . . . was called Emanuel, and was born at 'Toulouſe. But he then dwelt at Rome, where he 'taught Divinity in the convent of the Trinity of 'mount Pincio, otherwiſe called of the French Mi'nims. A year before † he had publiſhed in Latin 'a curious work, divided in four books, concerning 'clocks and ſun-dials, and about the ſame time he 'wrote to Father Merſenne, being then alive ‡, that, 'by his Phyſical principles, he had proved Geome'trically the ſame proportion of refractions with that 'of Des Cartes. But he did not believe, that the 'principles, he had laid down for the motion of a 'luminous body, which ſwells and falls, were true, or 'that, ſuppoſing theſe principles, it was poſſible, that 'refractions ſhould be made, as it is certain they are. 'It was upon this ſubject Father Maignan had a great 'deſire to put ſome objections to Mr Des Cartes, as 'probably he acquainted Mr Carcavi a year after(5).' Let us not forget the Diſſertatio Theologica de Uſu licito Pecuniæ, publiſhed by our Minim in 1673, in 12mo. It was cenſured by ſome biſhops.

(4) Printed at Lyons by John Gregory.

† In 1648, in fol. at Rome. Perſpectiva Horaria, &c.

‡ Letter M.S. of Maignan to Merſenne, of July 17, 1648, pag. 512, of the firſt volume of M.S. Letters to Merſenne, Variorum.

(5) Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 379, 380, ad ann. 1649.

[C] He is ſometimes confounded with another Philoſopher called Magnen.] Some (I uſe the words of Mr Baillet) (6) have confounded Emanuel Maignan with John Chryſoſtom Magnen, Profeſſor of Pavia, who publiſhed, in 1648, Democritus Reviviſcens, which made the Dutch believe, that he was a Carteſian Philoſopher. Mr Baillet cites Revii Statera, p. 243. This John Chryſoſtom Magnen, was of Luxeuil, in Franche Comté, and profeſſed Phyſic at Pavia. Beſides the Democritus Reviviſcens, printed at Leyden, in 1648, in 12mo, and whoſe epiſtle dedicatory is dated April 30, 1646, I have ſeen a treatiſe of his de Manna (7), printed at the Hague, in 1658, in 12mo, and whoſe epiſtle dedicatory is dated April 5, 1648. Theſe Dutch editions are not the firſt.

(6) Ibid.

(7) It is printed with that of Tobacco, by the ſame author.

[D] He was of an antient and noble family.] His father was counſellor to the king, referendary and dean of the chancery of Toulouſe, and reckoned among his anceſtors the barons of Maignan, who made a great figure in Armagnac. He married the daughter of Emanuel Alvarez, Royal Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Toulouſe. Such was the father and mother of the Minim, we are ſpeaking of; and here follow the words of his Elogiſt. 'Pater ei fuit Pe'trus Maignanus Conſiliarius Regius, Referendarius '& Decanus in Cancellaria Toloſana, vir æquitatem 'ſervans, & conſpicuus ſplendidiſſimi generis antiquâ 'nobilitate indubitatâ. Siquidem ut omnes novimus, 'Maignani Toloſates iſti ſtirpem ſuam trahunt ex il'lis, quos Eluza urbs nunc obſcura, ſed antiquitate 'celeberrima

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mathematics, though no one had read lectures to him in that ſcience [E]. In this he was his own maſter. He was quite another man in his courſe of Divinity, than in that of Philoſophy; for, whereas in this he was very incredulous, and ſubmitted every thing to a ſevere examination, and to the moſt ſubtile diſcuſſions of diſpute, in that he ſubmitted humbly to Theological doctrines (f): but, as to the peripatetical reaſons, which were employed to illuſtrate and prove them, he did not think himſelf obliged to admit them without examination, and, if he found them not ſolid, he rejected them, and made no ſcruple to prefer the aſſiſtance of Plato to that of Ariſtotle. The proofs he gave of his parts during the ſix years that he ſate upon the benches, occaſioned his being looked upon as a fit perſon to mount the chair, &c. to do the office of a profeſſor; and he acquitted himſelf in that employment ſo ſubtilly, and ſo ſolidly, that his reputation flew over the Pyrenees and the Alps: whereupon the general of the Minims ſent for him to Rome, in 1636, to take upon him the like profeſſion. His great knowledge in mathematical inventions, and phyſical experiments, became quickly famous, and chiefly by a conteſt, which aroſe between him and Father Kircher, which was decided after ſuch a manner, that the glory of the invention, the ſubject of the diſpute, was not denied our Minim [F]. His book De Perſpectiva Horaria, printed at Rome in 1648, at the expence

(f) Submiſiſſimam è contra iſtis (exercitationibus Theologicis) fidem offert; refugitque ut à leviuſcula dubitatione, ſic ab omni curioſa indagine, ex quo audiit ſcrutatorem Majeſtatis oppreſſum iri à gloria. Id. ib. pag. 10.

'celeberrima ad Geliſam amnem ſita in Comitatu 'Arminiaco Barones ſuos ſtrenuos, opulentos, mag-'nificos per multas non interruptarum generationum 'ſucceſſiones reverenter, ac peramanter complexa eſt. 'Matrem habuit Gaudioſam de Alvarez charam fili-'am celeberrimi illius Medici Emanuelis de Alvarez 'quem Toloſa urbs Literarum omnium amantiſſima 'precibus ac pollicitationibus multis ex Luſitania ad-'vocavit perfuncturum munere Regii Profeſſoris. Hic 'originem ſuam ducebat ex antiquiſſima Familia Al-'vareziorum de Buhendya in regno Luſitaniæ & fuit 'parens luſtricus Maignani noſtri, qui ex illo nomen 'Emanuelis obtinuit (8). - - - His father was Peter (8) Saguens, in Elogio Emanuelis Maignani, p. 3.
'Maignan, the king's counſellor, referendary and dean of 'the chancery of Toulouſe, a man of probity, and conſpi-'cuous for the antient and undoubted nobility of his 'family. For, as we all know, the Maignans of Tou-'louſe are deſcended from the valiant, wealthy, and 'magnificent barons, who, for many ſucceſſive and unin-'terrupted generations, were the ornament of the city 'Eluza, now an obſcure town, but antiently very famous, 'ſituated on the river Geliſa, in the county of Armagnac. 'His mother was Gaudioſa de Alvarez, the beloved 'daughter of that famous Phyſician Emanuel de Alvarez, 'whom the city of Toulouſe, fond of all kind of learning, 'ſent for out of Portugal, by many entreaties and promi-'ſes, to diſcharge the office of Royal Profeſſor. This 'Phyſician was deſcended from the very antient family 'of the Alvarez of Buhendya in the kingdom of Portugal, 'and was god-father of our Maignan, who from him 'had the name of Emanuel.'

[E] He was very well acquainted with Mathematics, tho' no one had read lectures to him in that ſcience.] This is a ſecond inſtance of what we ſhall ſhew hereafter in the article of Mr PASCAL? and Father Saguens does not fail to confirm the one by the other. Let us ſee the particulars of it: Such things are chiefly to be collected together, and inſerted in ſuch books as this Dictionary. 'Multo celſiorem de illo 'opinionem accepit (Magiſter Ruffatius) (9) quum 'occaſione data ſchematis Mathematici, quo ipſe ad 'explanationem reconditioris cujuſdam Phyſici myſte-'rii lucem afferebat, intellexit eum eſſe Geometram; 'ſtupuitque, & curioſè requiſivit cauſam, ac metho-'dum comparatæ, & eò uſque occultatæ eruditionis. 'Verùm ut reſponſuri juvenis modeſtiæ parcam, di-'cam ipſe ego paulò liberius, quod multo poſt ad 'ſuadenda rerum Mathematicarum ſtudia enarrabat ſibi 'obtigiſſe, ut intra horas unius anni liberas, ſeu reci-'ſas à tempore ad cætera Chori, & Scholæ miniſteria 'uſitato, tot Theoremata, ac Problemata Geometrica 'per ſe ipſum adinveniret, ut deinceps non plura de-'prehenderit contineri totis ſex prioribus libris Eu-'clideorum Elementorum. An non diceres illum 'talem fuiſſe, qui niſi extitiſſent Elementa Euclidis 'edidiſſet. Simile quid refertur de clariſſimo viro Paſ-'calio inter Geometras hujus ſæculi celeberrimos an-'numerando: ita ut videatur utrique Deus præſtan-'tiſſimæ illius diſciplinæ anticipationem copioſiſſimam 'contuliſſe. Tum neque mirum eſt inquiebat Maigna-'nus, quod leves iſtos Mathematici tyrocinii conatus ultra 'promoverim: an neſcitis Crucem Matheſeos meæ Ma-'giſtram habui? Cum enim fruſtratus omni inſtru-'mentorum figuris exarandis inſervientium apparatu, 'nec normam haberet, nec circinum: circini quidem 'vice, duobus tignulis ligneis ex parte una liberè 'affixis infixerat ex altera duas acus ſutorias. At pro 'normâ, aut quod opportunum nihil occurreret, aut 'potius quod mallet ſua ſchemata omnia appoſito 'Crucis ſigno communiri, ut à pleriſque more Catho-'lico illud appingitur ſummis capitibus paginarum, 'cruce lignea utebatur (10). - - - - Ruffatius, his (10) Id. ib. pag. 8, 9.
'maſter, conceived a much higher opinion of him, when, 'on occaſion of a mathematical figure, which he pro-'duced in order to explain a difficult point in natural 'Philoſophy, he found him out to be a Geometrician, 'and was ſurprized at it, and was curious to enquire 'how he came by a knowledge, he had hitherto concealed. 'But, to ſpare the young man's modeſty, I will reply 'for him, that, in one year's vacant hours, or thoſe 'which were not employed in the ſchool, or the choir, 'he found out by himſelf as many geometrical theorems 'and problems, as are contained in the ſix firſt books of 'Euclid. May we not ſay, that, if Euclid's Elements 'were not extant, this man would have publiſhed them. 'The like is related of the famous Paſcal, one of the moſt 'celebrated Geometricians of this age: inſomuch that 'GOD ſeems to have beſtowed on them both an ample 'anticipation of that moſt excellent ſcience. Then it is 'no wonder, ſaid Maignan, that I carried farther 'thoſe ſmall beginnings of mathematical apprenticeſhip: 'know you not, that the croſs was my mathematical 'maſter? For being in want of the whole apparatus of 'inſtruments for delineating figures, and having neither 'rule, nor compaſs; inſtead of a compaſs, he made uſe 'of two Taylor's needles, fixed in two wooden ſticks, 'joined together looſely at one end. But inſtead of a 'rule, either becauſe he could find nothing that would 'ſerve the purpoſe, or becauſe he would have all his 'figures guarded by the ſign of the croſs, he made uſe of 'a wooden croſs, in the manner it is painted by many 'Catholics at the head of each page.'

[F] A conteſt, which aroſe between him and Father Kircher . . . ., the glory of the invention was not denied our Minim.] Father Saguens mentions only two books of a wonderful invention, and vaſt labour, written in the monaſtery of the order at Rome, by Emanuel Maignan. One was a book of Optics, and the other of Catoptrics. The firſt was a perſpective, the deſcription of which is to be found in the Thaumaturgus Opticus of the Minim Niceron (11). The other was a repreſentation of the heavens, with all the Aſtronomical circles, catoptrica anacamptica, complectiturque integram cæli faciem ſuis omnibus ad res Aſtronomicas ſpectantibus circulis interſtinctam (12). Father Kircher had no ſooner looked upon it, but he ſaid to a German gentleman, who accompanied him, What are you aſtoniſhed at? Is not this the figure of my book? Quid ſtupes, an non hæc eſt figura mei libri? A Minim, who heard this, and underſtood, that Father Kircher attributed to himſelf the whole glory of the invention, anſwered very bluntly, on the contrary, this is the book of your figure; imo hic eſt liber tuæ Figuræ, and related the thing quickly after to Father Maignan, who, being an humble man, ſaid no more, than that he was not conſcious of any theft, unleſs it were ſuppoſed that his hands had ſtolen the work from his mind (13). The matter had gone no further, if the friends on both ſides, had not thought it worthy of a further enquiry, as it

(9) It is the name of the Minim, under whom Father Maignan went thro' a courſe of Philoſophy.

(11) Ib. pag. 15.

(12) Id. ib.

(13) Nullius hac in re, inquit, furti mihi ſum conſcius, niſi fortè manus meas, opus quod elaboraverunt, menti ſubripuiſſe quis finxerit. Id. ib. pag. 16.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pence of cardinal Spada, was very much eſteemed. No body had yet undertaken ſuch a work (g). It contains a method of making Teleſcopes of his own invention, which he explains at large, and does not imitate thoſe, who conceal, as a myſtery, the inventions of their art, and die with their ſecret. He was not troubled with that diſeaſe; for if he met with any artificers, who had a mind to make dioptrical, or other inſtruments, according to his diſcoveries and method, he very readily communicated to them what he knew of that matter. He did not return from Rome to Toulouſe till 1650, and then he was received in his own country with univerſal joy. He was created provincial the ſame year, though he earneſtly deſired, that he might not be diverted from his ſtudies by the cares of any office. He publiſhed his courſe of Philoſophy, in 1652, by which work he may at leaſt expect to be called the reſtorer of it. And if, becauſe he explained Phyſics by the four elements, the glory of that invention ſhould be denied him, and given to Empedocles (b); yet it cannot be denied but he did, as to this hypotheſis, what Gaſſendus did as to that of the Atomiſts. The office of provincial being expired at the end of three years, our Minim had more leiſure to go on with his philoſophical Divinity; but a long ſickneſs, and ſome journies about the affairs of his order, retarded the execution of this deſign. We ſhall ſee in the remarks at what time the two tomes of that work appeared [G]. If the author had been ambitious, he might have found concerned the glory of a German, or of a French Mathematician; for the principal praiſe is always due to the inventor. Father Maignan had like to have loſt the cauſe, when a Jeſuit ingenuouſly declared, that he had ſeen a like work in France, made by Father Maignan. Thus the learned men of Rome left the glory of the invention to each of the contending parties. This is only an abridgment of what you may ſee at large in the Latin of Father Saguens (14).

(g) Opus vere eximium & ad illa uſque tempora intentatum. Id. ib. pag. 17.

(b) Father Saguens, pag. 25, ſays, that Plato, and not Empedocles, was author of the Elementary Philoſophy, and cites for this the Timæus of Euſebius, de Præparat. Evang. lib. xv.

(14) Id. ib.

'Totaque res ibi ſubſtitiſſet, niſi viſa fuiſſet commu-
'nibus amicis digna diligentiori examine; quodque
'ducebant vertendum ad gloriam non mediocrem aut
'Germani, aut Galli Mathematici. Omninò enim
'in quovis artium, & doctrinarum genere primum
'fuiſſe ita glorioſum eſt; ut id poſteritas omnis, quia
'imitari non poteſt, invidia dignum putet. Primus labor
'plerumque ſibi aut totum honorem vindicat; aut ſe-
'cundo non niſi magna ex parte imminutum relin-
'quit: vel quod difficultatem penè omnem, quam in
'rebus inveniendis maximam eſſe conſtat, exhauriat:
'vel quod non parùm emolliat: vel denique quod
'præſtantioris cujuſdam ingenii aciem, judiciique de-
'monſtret. Ecce itaque inter Doctos certatur, &
'ambigitur uter è duobus eximiæ illius primæ ex-
'cogitationis Catoptrico-Gnomonicæ laudem ſit re-
'laturus, graviſſimoque tandem judicio declinabant
'ad partes Kircheri, qui prior typis nuper eam com-
'miſerat: niſi in teſtem acerrimum compellatus oc-
'curriſſet alius R. P. ejuſdem Societatis Mathemati-
'cus, qui feliciter Romam acceſſerat, & ingenuè
'enarrabat vidiſſe ſe multos ante annos in Gallia, &
'in conventu quidem hujus Aquitanicæ Provinciæ
'noſtræ Albaterrenſi tale quoddam opus Catoptricum
'à P. Maignano elaboratum. Res ita erat; & Maig-
'nanus quidem, me audiente, non ſemel retulit cogi-
'tationem illam horographicam ſibi adhuc juniori
'ſubito immoderatoque impetu occurriſſe tantaque
'voluptate mentem occupaſſe, quâ nullam majorem
'in vita ſenſiſſet. Hinc eruditorum Romanorùm co-
'hors ſuam utrique palmam contulit, protulitque
'paria eſſe in gignendis fortunatiſſimi ingenii Viris
'Germaniæ Galliæque imperia. - - - - The whole
'matter would have reſted there, had not the friends on
'both ſides thought it worthy a more careful examina-
'tion, and that it would conduce not a little to the repu-
'tation either of the German, or the French Mathema-
'tician. For in every kind of art or ſcience, ſuch is
'the glory of being the firſt inventor, that all poſterity
'envies what it cannot imitate. The firſt labour claims
'the chiefeſt, if not the ſole honour, or at leaſt leaves it
'greatly diminiſhed to the ſecond: either becauſe it ex-
'hauſts almoſt all the difficulty, which is certainly the
'greateſt in the invention of things; or becauſe it ſoft-
'ens it not a little; or becauſe it is a proof of ſuperior
'abilities and judgment. It was therefore a conteſt
'among the learned, which of the two ſhould carry off
'the credit of that moſt excellent catoptrico-gnomonical
'diſcovery; and it would at length have been deter-
'mined in favour of Kircher, who firſt ſent it to the
'preſs, had not another reverend Father of the ſame ſo-
'ciety, and a Mathematician, who luckily came to
'Rome, ingenuouſly confeſſed, that he had ſeen many years
'before, in France, at the aſſembly of this our province
'of Aquitain, a catoptrical work of this nature, done
'by Father Maignan. And ſo it was. And Maignan
'often ſaid, in my hearing, that, in his younger days,
'that horographic invention had occurred to him, by a
'ſudden and impetuous ſtart of fancy, and had given
'him the greateſt pleaſure he had ever felt. Hence
'the learned men of Rome gave each his due praiſe, and
'concluded, that Germany and France produced equally
'happy geniuſes.' It is not impoſſible, but the ſame thing may be invented by two perſons, tho' the one is not aſſiſted by the other.

[G] We ſhall ſee . . . . at what time the two tomes of his Philoſophical Divinity appeared.] The firſt was printed in 1662, and the ſecond in 1672. There had been a leſs ſpace of time between the publication of theſe two volumes, if the author had not been obliged to anſwer ſome writings that were publiſhed againſt him. The firſt antagoniſt he anſwered was a Jeſuit (15) of the college of Toulouſe, who, in his book de Cycloide, had pretended, that Father Maignan was miſtaken in ſeveral points concerning the ſtructure and gravity of bodies, the acceleration of motion, and the equality of the angles of incidence and reflexion, &c. The Minim maintained, that there was a paralogiſm in the demonſtration of the Jeſuit, and this occaſioned a long diſpute, the reſult of which contributed very much to confirm this aphoriſm of geometrical phyſics, that an excellent Naturaliſt, moderately verſed in Geometry, is better able to maintain Phyſics, than an excellent Geometrician, who has but little ſkill in Phyſics. 'Plus proderit, inquit Maignanus, in rebus
'Phyſicis peritiſſimus Phyſicus mediocriter in Geome-
'tricis verſatus, quàm peritiſſimus Geometra parum
'Phyſicus. Then he adds, At ſi utroque genere excel-
'lat, nihil prorſus optabilius eſſe poteſt (16). - - But if
'he excels in both, nothing can be more deſirable.' This anſwer of Father Maignan was printed as an Appendix, and was followed by a ſecond Appendix, wherein he confuted the replies of the Jeſuit, and in which he intermixed very good obſervations concerning the ſucceſſive propagation of light, the ſcintillation of the fixed ſtars, and the glaſs-drops of Holland. The third Appendix is an anſwer to a Diſſertation, which Mr Ducaſſe publiſhed againſt the reaſon, which Father Maignan had given, why the Dutch glaſs-drops break in a thouſand pieces, after the little end is broken off (17). This experiment was made in the convent of the Minims, in 1662, in the preſence of many perſons. The fourth Appendix was an anſwer to a writer (18), with whom the Jeſuit at his death had entruſted the management of his cauſe. This writer dwelt upon acceſſories, and quitted the main point of the diſpute, which was the accuſation of a paralogiſm. He complained of Father Maignan, that he had injured the moſt famous Jeſuits, Suarez, Vaſquez, Mendoza, Zacchi, &c. The Minim anſwered all theſe complaints, and forgot not to produce again his proofs of the accuſation of a paralogiſm. This fourth Appendix was printed 1667, at Bourdeaux, whither the author went about the affairs of his order. The fifth Appendix was an anſwer to Theophilus Raynaud, who wrote againſt the hypotheſis, which our Minim made uſe of, to explain the retaining of the accidents

(15) Called Lalouvere.

(16) Id. ib. pag. 35.

(17) See Rohault's Phyſics, Part i, cap. xxii, num. xlvii, &c. p. m. 191.

(18) Father Courboullex, a Jeſuit of the college of Toulouſe.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

found a fair opportunity of satisfying himself, when the king desired him to come to Paris, which was in 1660, after that his majesty himself had seen an infinite number of machines and curiosities in the cell of this monk [H]. Cardinal Mazarin, who viewed them with the king, acquainted Father Maignan next day with the intentions of this prince, by Mr Fieubet, first president of the parliament of Toulouse. The Minim expressed so modestly and humbly his inclination to spend his whole life in the obscurity of a cloister, in which he had taken upon him the habit of his order, that the affair rested there. He had therefore the satisfaction of shunning the pomp, in which they would have engaged him, and peaceably spent his time in writing books, making experiments, and reading lectures. He was consulted by the greatest Philosophers, and gave a thousand answers to them, either by word of mouth, or by writing. Never man loved idleness less than he did; he studied even in his sleep; for his dreams put him upon some theorems [I], the deduction of which he pursued, till he arrived at the demonstration of them; and it often happened that he awoke suddenly, on account of the great pleasure he had in finding out a demonstration. The goodness of his morals, and the purity of his virtues, rendered him no less worthy of esteem, than his wit and knowledge. He died the twenty ninth of October, 1676 (i). We must not forget, that, when he went to Paris in 1657, he was admitted, with great marks of honour, to the philosophical conferences (k) at the house of Mr de Mommor, master of the requests (l), and that he composed with great facility, and without blots (m).

(m) Eloquar ne an tacebo incredibilem illam conscribendi fine lituris ullis cogitata sua rapiditatem; appendicem tertiam tribus horis, quartam conscripsit tribus hebdomadis. - - - - Shall I declare, or say nothing of, that incredible quickness in writing down his thoughts without any blots: he wrote his third appendix in three hours, and his fourth in three weeks. Id. ib. pag. 48.

(i) Taken from F. Sequens, in his Elogium of Emanuel Maignan.

(k) Those conferences are often mentioned in the letters of Sorbiere.

(l) Sequens, ubi supra, pag. 46.

dents of the bread and wine in the Eucharist. This Jesuit had shewn, that he understood nothing of the state of the question; for he believed, that the opinion of F. Maignan was the same with that of a certain Sicilian called Chiavetta. In the same Appendix, F. Maignan answered two other adversaries, who were F. Vincent Baron, and F. Nicholas Arnu, both Jacobins. These five Appendixes, having been printed at several times, were re-published together in 1672 (19). I have already spoken (20) of the second edition of his course of Philosophy, and of the two treatises, which were added to it, one against the vortices of Mr Des Cartes, and the other concerning Sir Samuel Morland's trumpet. I add here, that this father invented a machine, which he caused to play before several learned men, and which overthrew, what Des Cartes supposes concerning the manner, in which the universe was framed, or might have been framed, and concerning the tendency to move from the center of motion by tangents (21).

(19) Taken out of F. Sequens, pag. 34, &c.

(20) In the remark [B].

(21) Sequens, ubi supra, pag. 42.

[H] His majesty himself had seen, in the cell of this Monk, an infinite number of machines and curiosities.] The particulars, which I shall now mention, may serve to discover the diligence and industry of F. Maignan. ' Properabat Rex ad celebrandas nuptias suas. . . . . ' Sed casu Tolosæ parumper constitit: nec inter res, ' quæ oculis Regiis dignæ censebantur, infima fuit ' cellula Cœnobitica Patris Maignani, quæ inter Religiosæ egestatis angustias, si quid Matheseos pulchrum ' colvit, includebat; tubos omnis generis Telescopicos, ' Microscopicos, Polyoptricos, Hygroscopicos, Thermometricos; ut non adjiciam machinamenta Pneumatica, Hydraulica, Magnetica multa, sileamque de ' planisphæriis, tabellis opticis, fabrefactis tum ad figurati torni industrias, tum ad vires staticas attinentibus ingeniosissimis plurimis: speculisque ustoriis ' qualia nec capacioris Sphæræ, nec nitidioris formæ, ' nec demum incendii pernicioris ullibi tunc temporis ' prodebantur. In quo copiosissimo supellectilis Mathematicæ apparatu non tam mirabatur Rex suo cum ' Aulico Comitatu manum artificem, quæ totum elaboraverat, quàm mentem ad multò plura & utilio- ' ra Reipublicæ molimina perficienda instructam. Quare recogitare apud se ipsum occæpit, quantus Mathescos fulgor per universam Galliam irradiaret, si ' Vir ille bonus ex Tolosana, ut sic loquar, eremo in ' popularem Regiæ civitatis, & Aulæ frequentationem ' educeretur (22). - - - - The king was hastening to the celebration of his nuptials . . . . But, by accident, he stopped a little while at Toulouse; and, among the curiosities, which were thought worthy of his royal inspection, the cell of Father Maignan was not the least, being furnished, notwithstanding it's straitness, with all sorts of mathematical rarities; such as Telescopic, Microscopic, Polyoptric, Hygroscopic, Thermometric Tubes; not to mention Pneumatic, Hydraulic, and Magnetic, instruments; to say nothing likewise of planispheres, optical-tables, and many ingenious statical inventions; together with burning-glasses of the largest diameter, most beautiful form, and intensest heat, then extant. In which Apparatus of mathematical furniture, the king and his courtiers did not so much admire the artist-hand, that had framed the whole, as the mind of the artificer, qualified to bring greater undertakings, and more useful to the public, to perfection. Wherefore he began to consider, how much the credit of mathematical learning would increase over all France, if that good man were drawn out of the desart (if I may so speak) of Toulouse, to shine in the capital city of the kingdom, and at court.'

(22) Id. ib. pag. 31, 32.

[I] His dreams put him upon some theorems.] Here follows a fact, which confirms an observation I made above (23). It is of the nature of those I mentioned at the beginning of the remark [E]. Let us therefore relate it in the words of the original. ' Mentem laboribus istis ita feliciter assuefecerat (Maignanus) ut ' emensa diem studio, in nullam nocturnæ corporeæ ' quietis partem veniret. Quod rarum aliis, frequentissimum Maignano fuit, ut idem assequeretur somni, ' & somnii alicujus eruditi initium redeunte mente ' ad solita sua theoremata, nec abstinente donec de illis demonstrationem obtinuisset, cujus inopinata voluptas dormienti sæpe fuit pro suscitabulo. Tum ne ' illa fulguris ad instar emicaret & fugeret, cretam suo ' sub cervicali recondebat, quâ notulis, quantum id ' tenebræ patiebantur, in parata charta exaratis eam sisteret (24). - - - - Maignan had applied himself so successfully to those studies, that his mind, tho' employed the whole day, was not at rest even in the night. What rarely happens to others, was very common with Maignan, that same learned dream put him upon theorems, which his waking thoughts pursued, till he had obtained a demonstration of those things, the sudden pleasure of which had often waked him out of his sleep. And that those ideas might not vanish like lightening, he marked them down by short characters upon paper, as well as the darkness would permit, by the help of a piece of chalk, which he laid under his pillow.' Did our age love quibbles, we might say, that he was a Geometrician, whose stock increased in his sleep.

(23) In remark [G], num. ii, of the article LOTICHIUS (Peter).

(24) Id. ib. pag. 47, 48.

MAIMBOURG (Lewis) was born at Nancy in the year 1610, and became a Jesuit in 1626. He taught classical learning six years; after which his superiors employed him in the office of a preacher; which he discharged in the chief cities of the kingdom (a); and I think the last sermons he preached were against the version of Mons. The answers, which the Jansenists published to his sermons against this translation, represent him very much to his disadvantage. He wrote three treatises of Controversy (b), which are not ill performed; but he acquired a much greater reputation by several histories, which he published (c). The Jansenists criticised that of Arianism, and that of the Iconoclasts, and suffered all the rest to pass. That, which he wrote of Calvinism in 1681, stirred

(a) Taken from Nathan. Southwell, Bibl. Societ. Jesu, pag. 567.

(b) See the remark [D].

(c) The Supplement to Moreri has given a list of them.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ſtirred up againſt him a ſharp war, of which he left all the operations to his enemies; for he continued perfectly inactive; and neither acted offenſively, nor defenſively. He had already quitted the ſociety of the Jeſuits by order of their general, when he publiſhed the Hiſtory of Calviniſm, becauſe he declared too fiercely for the doctrines of the Gallican church, againſt thoſe of the Ultramontanes. He retired to the abbey of St Victor, and died there, Auguſt the thirteenth, 1686, after he had made a will, which ſhews that he was diſſatisfied with the Jeſuits [A]. He had a large ſhare in the friendſhip of Father Ferrier, the king's confeſſor [B]. I have elſewhere ſaid (d), that he ſtudied at Rome under John de Lugo. The books, that were written againſt him, are ſo common, and contain ſo fully a character of his genius and his conduct, that it is unneceſſary to collect thoſe facts here. But as thoſe, who have refuted his Hiſtory of Calviniſm, have ſaid nothing of a certain ſermon, which furniſhed a writer of Port-Royal with a merry ſtory [C], I ſhall inſert it in one of the remarks. I ſhall make another concerning the works of Father Maimbourg [D]; and another concerning

(d) In the article LUGO (JOHN DE) citation ‡.

[A] He made a will, which ſhews, that he was diſſatisfied with the Jeſuits.] See the news from the Republic of Letters for the month of September, 1686 (1).

(1) Page 1034, & ſeq.

[B] He had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of Father Ferrier the king's confeſſor.] He informs us of this himſelf in his Hiſtory of St Leo; for, after having ſhewn what is an opinion truly probable, againſt the falſe notion which ſome have framed of it; he adds, 'and this 'will be found very ſolidly proved in the little book 'concerning probable opinions, written by the deceaſ-'ed Father Ferrier, confeſſor to the king, and one 'of the moſt learned Divines that ever I knew; for 'whoſe memory I ſhall always have a ſingular vene-'ration, as well for his diſtinguiſhed merit, as for 'the particular obligations I have to him, and which 'I cannot diſcharge but by this ſmall teſtimony of 'my gratitude, which I will now leave to poſte-'rity (2).'

(2) Maimbourg, Hiſt. of the Pontificate of St Leo, lib. iv, pag. 343, Edit. Holl.

[C] One of his ſermons furniſhed a writer of Port-Royal, with a merry ſtory.] It is in a preface to the defence of the tranſlation of Mons, of the Cologne edition, 1668, and which was not reprinted in the Geneva edition of all the pieces which concern this tranſlation. Hence it is that this ſtory is but little known, and was not laid hold of by the cenſurers of the Hiſtory of Calviniſm. It will not therefore be impertinent to inſert it here in this remark, as the author of the preface tells it.

'It is now above twenty years, ſince going by 'chance into the chappel of the college of Clermont, 'I ſaw a man mount the pulpit, of an extraordinary 'mein, and who was none of thoſe, whom the ſcrip-'ture ſpeaks of, whoſe wiſdom ſhines in their countenance. 'On the contrary, there was nothing to be ſeen but 'fierceneſs in his eyes, in his geſtures, and in his 'whole air; and he might have ſtruck terror into the 'people, if this fierceneſs had not been mixed with a 'thouſand theatrical geſtures, fit to make people laugh '. . . . His diſcourſe was yet more aſtoniſhing than 'his air, and the oddneſs of it was ſo ſtrange, that I 'could never forget it. It was the ſecond Sunday af-'ter Eaſter, when the Goſpel about the good ſhepherd 'is read: from hence he took occaſion to magnify 'the condition of ſhepherds, by obſerving, that it 'was not formerly the profeſſion of the meaneſt peo-'ple, as it is at preſent; but that kings and princes 'did not think it unworthy of them. After this, 'he reckoned up a great number of princes, that 'were ſhepherds. He forgot not the patriarchs, but 'carried down the catalogue as low as David, upon 'whom he inſiſted a long time; for he gave us a 'merry deſcription of his beauty, the colour of his 'hair, his cloaths, and laſtly of his dog. It was, 'ſays he, a brave dog, and had ſo much courage, that 'we may believe, while his maſter fought with Goliah, 'this dog, to avoid the diſgrace of doing nothing in the 'mean time, hunted after the wolves. After this good 'father was once entered upon the ſubject of dogs, as 'if he had been linked to it by ſome ſecret ſympathy, 'he could not tell how to leave it, and therefore he 'divided his ſermon into four parts, according to the 'four ſeveral ſorts of dogs. The firſt ſort were bull-'dogs: the ſecond were maſtiff-dogs: the third were 'lap-dogs: and the fourth the good dogs; of which 'he made an application to different ſorts of preachers. 'The bull-dogs were the Janſeniſts, or, as they were 'then called, the Arnaudiſts, whom he repreſented 'as an indiſcreet people, who tore in pieces all men 'indifferently, and made no diſtinction between the 'innocent and the guilty, but oppreſſed every body 'with hard penances. He deſcribed the maſtiff-dogs 'as being cowardly, and having no courage, but up-'on their own dunghill, and who, when on from that, 'are always fearful, which he applied to preachers of 'that humour. The lap-dogs were, according to him, 'the court-abbots: They are, ſaid he, ſhaped like lions, 'and make a great noiſe; but when they are ſeen near, 'their noiſe is laughed at. Upon this occaſion, he de-'ſcribed their ruffles, their bands, their ſurplices, their 'geſtures. And laſtly, the good dogs were the Je-'ſuits, and ſuch preachers as himſelf. It is impoſſi-'ble to imagine after what manner he treated this ri-'diculous ſubject, and to what an exceſſive pitch he 'carried the buffoonry of his deſcriptions. I can aſ-'ſure you, that, being then preſent, I ſaw all the re-'verend Fathers, who were in the galleries above, 'holding their ſides with laughter, from the beginning 'of the ſermon to the end of it, and the reſt of the 'auditory could not well keep their countenance, and 'look grave: indeed there was nothing but burſts of 'laughter, which could not be ſtopped. All this di-'verted the good father, and inſpired him with a 'new ardor, to increaſe the laughter of his auditors, 'by new grimaces. After I had been a ſpectator of 'this ſtrange profanation, and was informed of the 'name of the Jeſuit who had preached, who was ſaid 'to be F. Maimbourg, I went out more ſcandalized 'at the ſociety than at their preacher (3).'

(3) Preface to the Defence of the Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, printed at Mons, againſt the ſermons of F. Maimbourg the Jeſuit, p. 6.

[D] I ſhall make a remark concerning the works of F. Maimbourg.] He publiſhed, at Roüen, two panegyrics in 1640; one is that of Lewis XIII, on his puting France under the protection of the virgin; the other is an elogium of the kings of France. He had publiſhed at Rome, in 1638, a funeral oration on Nicholas Zappi an Auguſtin monk; and he publiſhed at Paris his Lent-ſermons in 1670, in two volumes in 8vo. Father Southwell, who informed me of this, has ſaid nothing of the letters of Francis Romain, which is a work of F. Maimbourg; the title of which alone gives us to underſtand, that it relates to the manner of reconciling the obedience, due to the Pope, with that due to the king. Southwell did not forget the controverſial treatiſes, written by F. Maimbourg. They are three little treatiſes; one of which (4) is intituled, A peaceable method to bring back the Proteſtants, without diſputation to the true faith as to the Euchariſt, upon occaſion of the conteſt (5) concerning the perpetuity of the faith of the ſame myſtery. The ſecond is intituled, Of the true church of JESUS CHRIST. And the third, Of the true word of GOD. The firſt of theſe three works appeared ſo good to the Roman Catholics, that it holds the fifth place among the ſixteen methods of converting the Huguenots, which were recommended by the clergy of France to the controverſial writers in 1682. The words of the memorial, drawn up by that aſſembly, are theſe. 'The 'fifth is a peaceable method, and without diſputation 'founded upon the ſynod of Dort, which all the 'Proteſtants of France have received, and which has 'determined by the holy Scripture, that, when there 'is a conteſt about any article between two parties, 'which are in the true church, it muſt be referred to 'it's deciſion, under this penalty to any one that 'refuſes to ſubmit to it, that he ſhall be accounted 'guilty of ſchiſm and hereſy.' And indeed in this

(4) Printed at Paris in 1670, and reprinted there the third time in 1682.

(5) It was that, which then made ſo great a noiſe between Mr Arnaud and Mr Claude.

conſiſts

concerning a couſin of his [E], who became a Proteſtant, and is the author of two or three books.

conſiſts the whole ſtrength of the method of F. Maimbourg. He ſhews, by the conduct, which was obſerved in Holland, when diſputes aroſe between the Arminians and Gomariſts, that, according to the doctrine of the Proteſtants, it belongs to the church, in whoſe boſom the conteſts ariſe, to do juſtice to the parties, by deciding which is in the right, and which is in the wrong; and that, by virtue of it's definitive ſentence they muſt drop the diſpute; and that thoſe, who will not ſubmit to this deciſion, are to be reputed Heretics, and to be cut off from the body as unruly members. According to this principle, will the Papiſts ſay, the Proteſtants ought to acknowledge, that it belonged to the council of Trent to give ſentence, without appeal, as to the diſputes of Luther and Calvin; and that, after the deciſion of this council, they were no longer permitted to quarrel, but that each of them ought to have conformed himſelf, to the definitive decree, with the Romiſh doctors, upon pain of deſerving the thunder of excommunication, as a Heretic and Rebel. This is not a place to examine, whether this argument ad hominem has any force (6). It is ſufficient to ſay, that the Proteſtant church cannot be blamed for eſtabliſhing an order, without which it is impoſſible any ſociety can ſubſiſt: for, in all ſocieties there muſt be a tribunal, to give ſentence without appeal in the diſputes of private perſons, and who have power to inflict the penalties of rebellion upon thoſe, who refuſe to ſubmit to its decrees; for otherwiſe it would not be poſſible to cure any diſorder, nor to hinder diſputes from laſting eternally. I know very well, it is objected, that, in this reſpect, there is no other difference between the Romiſh and Reformed church, as to the point of authority, but that the one declares itſelf to be infallible, and does not permit private perſons to examine it's deciſions; whereas the other acknowledges itſelf fallible, and permits private perſons to examine the whole, provided that at laſt they ſubmit to it's decrees. I know very well, I ſay, that it is objected, that, in this reſpect, the way of authority is no leſs the laſt refuge of Proteſtants than of Papiſts; but I know alſo what the Proteſtants anſwer. Three of their authors (7) have refuted the method of Father Maimbourg. He, whom I name laſt, has taken the beſt expedient that could be taken; his reflexions are fine and good; but he did not always perceive whether his anſwers were a paralogiſm. I will give an example of it.

He propoſes this objection in page 347. 'If one 'is not obliged to ſubmit to the deciſions of councils and ſynods; if it be always lawful to appeal 'from them; if every one has a power to look upon 'thoſe deciſions as meer councils, and to reject them; 'when they judge them not agreeable to the word 'of GOD, there will be no way left of deciding any 'controverſy, or putting an end to it (8).' He anſwers, among other things, that they, who lay ſuch a ſtreſs upon this difficulty, do not remove it by the doctrine of the infallibility of the church. He proves it (9) by two hundred Hereſies, which, according to the calculation of Bellarmin, have made great devaſtations in the Romiſh church, which has always, ſays he, declared herſelf to be infallible. He adds (10) that there is in the birth of Hereſies θεῖον τι, ſomething ſupernatural, and therefore that we muſt not imagine that we have it always in our power to ſtop thoſe miſchiefs, unleſs GOD interpoſes in an extraordinary manner. There are two great defects in this anſwer: I. It is to confeſs to the oppoſite party, that GOD has not left in his church any ordinary means of determining diſputes. II. That the multitude of Hereſies, which have appeared in Chriſtendom, proves, that the doctrine of authority is not a proper means to extinguiſh them. How came this author not to ſee, that theſe Hereſies could never have laſted, if their followers had believed this doctrine? They were maintained only by rejecting it: Does this prove any thing againſt the goodneſs of the remedy? Is a ſick man, who is not cured, becauſe he rejects all that the Phyſician orders him, a good evidence, that the Phyſician's remedies are good for nothing? I ſay this only by the bye, to adviſe the readers, that there is a large field for criticiſm in controverſial books.

I return now to the books of Father Maimbourg; but ſhall not mention the titles of his hiſtories, which may be found in the ſupplement to Moreri. I think it may be ſaid, that he had a particular talent for ſuch works. They are very agreeably written, contain many lively ſtrokes, and a great variety of occaſional Inſtructions. There are few Hiſtorians, even among thoſe, who write better, and are more learned and exact than he, who have the art of engaging the reader ſo much as he does. I wiſh that thoſe, who could exceed him in candor and knowledge, would give us all the hiſtories he had undertaken to write, if he had lived twenty years longer, and that they would ſet them off with the ſame attractives as he did: it would be no ſmall advantage to the learned world. I have ſaid in the body of this article, that his hiſtories of Arianiſm, and of the Iconoclaſts, were criticized. That criticiſm is very good (11). It was burnt at Paris, in 1674, and printed again in Holland, in 1683. His hiſtory of the church of Rome was alſo criticized, and I have heard ſay, that Dr Boileau is the author of that criticiſm. His work was printed twice (12), and is very much augmented in the ſecond edition. The News from the Republic of Letters mentions the firſt (13). The abſtract, which is found there of this piece, ſhews, that Mr Maimbourg ſucceeded very ill in the attack he made upon the infallibility of the Pope, and the ſuperiority of the Holy See over councils.

[E] I ſhall make a remark concerning a couſin of his, named THEODORE MAIMBOURG.] He conformed to the cuſtom of the times, in publiſhing the motives why he changed his religion. The letter, which he wrote upon this occaſion to his eldeſt brother, was printed in 1659. He retired into Guienne (14), to the houſe of the marquis de Bougi, and wrote a Summary Anſwer to the method of cardinal Richelieu. He dedicated it to madam de Turenne, and ſent the MSS. to Samuel Mareſius, who publiſhed it at Groningen, in 1664. The author gives himſelf the name, of R. de la Ruelle. He returned to the Romiſh communion ſome time after, and made profeſſion of it when the famous book of the expoſition of the Catholic faith was printed (15). He made ſome reflexions upon that work, which were ſeen in MSS. by ſome of the Reformed religion. This made Mr de la Baſtide (16) affirm, That he knew a Catholic, who was writing againſt the Expoſition of the biſhop of Condom. I uſe the ſame words, which the biſhop of Condom cites, as taken from the 23d page of the preface of Mr de la Baſtide; but I find, in this preface, at page 30 of the ſecond edition, the following words: 'I have been informed, that there is a certain perſon 'of the Romiſh church, who is writing againſt this 'ſame Expoſition of the biſhop of Condom; and 'what thoſe of his own communion can ſay, concerning their own belief, will be of more weight, and 'leſs ſuſpected in their mouth, than in ours.' The biſhop of Condom obſerves, that the Proteſtants were impoſed upon, when they were told ſo. 'It would 'certainly, adds he (17), be a curious thing, that this 'good Catholic, whom the Catholics have never 'known, ſhould place ſo much confidence in the enemies of the church, as to tell them of a book he 'was preparing againſt a biſhop of his own commu'nion. But this imaginary writer has been now ex'pected too long a time, and the pretended Reformed 'will be very credulous, if for the future they ſuf'fer themſelves to be amuſed with ſuch like pro'miſes.' The perſon, meant by Mr de la Baſtide, was our Theodore Maimbourg, who went into England about the year 1682, to return to the Proteſtant church. He took with him ſeveral manuſcripts, which he had written, and, among the reſt, an anſwer to the peaceable method of his couſin the Jeſuit, and an anſwer to the book of the biſhop of Condom. The firſt of theſe two pieces was printed at Rotterdam, in 1683. The Bookſeller was earneſtly deſired to print the ſecond immediately; but the ſale of the firſt gave him no encouragement to do it. Thus the work lay buried in the obſcurity of a ſtudy. The author was appointed governor to one of the natural ſons of king Charles II. He died at London about two or three years ago (18), and, if one may believe the reports that were ſpread of him, he declared to the miniſters that prepared him for death, that he died a Socinian, and continued obſtinate in it to the laſt. I

(6) Mr Jurieu, in his treatiſe of the Power of the Church, pag. 333, confeſſes, that there is wit and cunning in this book of Mr Maimbourg. And pag. 325, That the turn he gives to the difficulty has ſomething dazzling, and which ſtrikes the mind with an idea of great difficulty.

(7) Viz. 1. Mr Lenfant, miniſter of Chatillon upon the Loing, father of Mr Lenfant, miniſter at Berlin. II. A couſin of Father Maimbourg, of whom I ſhall ſpeak below. III. Mr Jurieu, in his letters about the Power of the Church, printed at Roan in 1677.

(8) Jurieu's treatiſe of the Power of the Church, Letter vii, num. ix, pag. 347.

(9) Ib. pag. 348.

(10) Ib. pag. 351.

(11) The title is, Dialogues between Eudoxus and Euchariſtus, upon the Hiſtory of Arianiſm, and the Hiſtory of the Iconoclaſts of Father Maimbourg.

(12) In Holland in 1686, and in 1688.

(13) Month of April, 1686, pag. 461.

(14) To the caſtle of Calonge in Condomois, near Agen.

(15) Written by Mr Boſſuet, then biſhop of Condom. This book was printed the firſt time in 1671.

(16) In the advertiſement of his anſwer to the book of the biſhop of Condom. See the advertiſement of this prelate, on the ſecond edition, pag. 25. of the Holland Edition.

(17) Ibid.

(18) I write this in the month of January, 1696.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google have heard some say, that he was a man of a good mein, of a great deal of wit, and who knew the world very well. What we read in a letter of Mr Simon (19), is enough to make one believe, that this man openly died an Unitarian, and that he had been so a long time incognito. It is a very curious particular. I advise you to read it in the original.

(19) The fifth of his Select Letters, pag. 64, 65, edition of Trevoux, 1700.

There was a Jesuit, a native of Lorrain, called JOHN MAIMBOURG, who was not inferior, either in knowledge or wit, to the famous Serrarius, another Jesuit of Lorrain; but he would never publish any books, though he was earnestly exhorted to do it. A Jesuit of the same country gives us an account of these things. ‘ Magnum uterque Lotharingiæ lumen, magnum eruditionis omnis ornamentum, magnum pietatis, & Christianæ modestiæ decus. Ambo florentes ingeniis, eruditi ambo, ambo in omnis generis authorum assidua lectione versati, vel potius omnibus tum sacræ tum prophanæ doctrinæ partibus absoluti atque perfecti: ambo sacras literas, & hanc ipsam, quæ me suspensum tenebat, inscriptionem, Explanare pares, & respondere parati.

‘ alter scriptis in lucem publicam emissis illustrior: ‘ alter ingenio par, eruditione, virtutibus: hoc uno ‘ duntaxat inferior quod adduci nunquam potuit, ut ingenii doctrinæque suæ fœtus expromeret, ac prælo ‘ mandari pateretur. Alter erat Nicolaus Serrarius, ‘ alter Joannes Memburgus (20). - - - - - - They were both a great honour to Lorrain, a great ornament of all sorts of learning, and a great credit to piety and Christian modesty. They were both men of flourishing parts, both learned, both versed in the reading of all kinds of authors, or rather perfectly accomplished in all parts of learning, both sacred and prophane: they were both equally skillful in explaining the scriptures, and ready to answer their adversaries. The one was more famous for the works he had published; the other was his equal in wit, learning, and virtues; in this alone inferior to him, that he could never be prevailed upon to let his works see the light, or suffer them to be published. The one was Nicolas Serrarius, the other John Maimbourg.

(20) Nicol. Abramus, in Pharo Veteris Testamenti, pag. 256, col. 2.

MAINUS (JASON) one of the most famous Civilians of his age, was born in 1435. Andreot Mainus, his father, being banished from Milan, for a crime he had committed, retired to Pesaro, and there got his maid with child (a). To this noble exploit our Civilian owes his birth. He was educated at Milan, whither his father returned; but his tutor treated him very harshly, and did not take the same care of him, as he did of the legitimate sons of Andreot Mainus. He was sent, to study the Civil-law at Pavia; where he was so much addicted to playing at cards, that, having lost all his money and his books, he rambled about the streets in a miserable condition [A]. He profited by his father's punishment; for he applied himself so heartily to study, that he made a wonderful progress, both at Pavia and Bologna, insomuch, that he was judged worthy to teach the Civil-law in 1471. He taught in Pavia from that year till 1486, when he was called to Padua. Though they gave him a large salary [B], he was not contented with it; and because he could not obtain an augmentation of it, he retired, at the end of three years, to Pisa, where he had a better pension. He was recalled to Pavia in 1491, and became so famous there, that he had three thousand scholars. He was sent to Rome, the next year, to congratulate the new Pope Alexander VI, to whom he made a very fine harangue. That, which he made upon the marriage of Maximilian of Austria, king of the Romans, with the niece of Lewis Sforza, was no less applauded at the court of the emperor, from whence he returned loaded with presents, and honourable titles [C]. He harangued likewise in 1495, when Lewis Sforza was declared duke of Milan, which procured him new titles of honour (b). Having almost lost his sight, he broke off his lectures [D], but was prevailed upon to re-assume them by the urgent sollicitations

(a) Pisaurum ad Galeacium Malatestam oppidi dominum venit, ubi ex ancilla Annete concubina. . . . . Jasonem filium suscepit. Guidius Panzirollus, ubi infra, pag. 281.

(b) See the remark [C].

[A] He rambled about the streets in a miserable condition.] He was forced to be shaved, because the scurf had eaten into his head, and besides he was very ill cloathed. We shall make use of the words of Panzirollus. In pestilenti chartarum lusu adeo miserè deperditus est, ut omni consumpta suppellectile etiam jurium volumina in membranis magno pretio descripta vendere cogeretur, ad extremamque inopiam deductus vili veste, & tonso capite, quod deformi tinea obsitum erat, omnium sordidissimus incedebat (1).

(1) Panzirollus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. ii, cap. cxxvii, pag. m. 281.

[B] Though they gave him a large salary.] Viz. The sum of a thousand ducats, which none ever had before him; the whole pension, that was given to his predecessors, amounting only to two or three hundred ducats. Primus ex nostris jurium interpretibus mille aureorum salarium obtinuit, cum ante ducentis aut summum trecentis aureis docerent (2). He was also the first, who required fifty ducats for a consultation, nay, sometimes 100 and more; whereas, before, no more than four were given (3). He was mistaken sometimes in his advice; but I know not whether he kept his word to his clients, who consulted him, to whom he promised a restitution of the money, he had received from them, in case they lost the cause. Consultoribus onerosus in hoc laudem meruit, quod si causa excidissent, extortam pecuniam se restituturum pollicebatur, in quibusdam tamen minus rectè consuluisse arguitur (4). There are some sellers of febrifuges, who promise the like restitution, in case a fever does not go off. But should it so happen, I do not believe the people ever make them refund the money.

(2) Id. ib. pag. 282.

(3) Primus etiam 50. 100. & amplius aureos pro responsis accepit, cum prius quatuor aureolis honorarentur. Panzirol. ubi supra, pag. 282.

(4) Id. pag. 285. He cites Marzar. cons. i, fol. 10, & 12. in princ.

[C] He returned from the emperor's court loaden with presents and honourable titles.] Auro argentoque donatus & equestri ac palatina dignitate honestatus, Cæsarisque patritius factus lætus in patriam rediit (5). Mr Bullart relates (6), ‘ That Lewis Sforza, ‘ duke of Milan, having a mind to promote the ‘ glory of a man, who was his subject, preferred ‘ him to the rank of a senator in his council, and ‘ honoured him with the order of knighthood (7), ‘ and then sent him on some embassies to the emperors Frederic and Maximilian; who judging him ‘ worthy of their esteem, on account of his own ‘ merits, as well as of his character, did him extraordinary honours, and dismissed him loaded with ‘ presents.’ This is not well told; for, if we depend upon these words, we may imagine, that Mainus was sent successively to the emperors Frederic, and Maximilian. But this is a mistake; for he was sent only to the Imperial court, when Bonna Sforza married Maximilian, king of the Romans.

(5) Panzirol. ib. pag. 283.

(6) Bullart's Academy of Sciences, Tom. i, pag. 212.

(7) Ejus (Ludovici Sforziæ) Senator ac Patritius est declaratus. Panzirol. ibid.

[D] He broke off his lectures.] For more than nine years, if we may believe Panzirollus; but he himself will not permit us to believe him: for he says, that king Lewis XII engaged him to read public lectures again, and that Mainus, being invested with a fief, upon condition he would teach the Law (8), performed this condition, and yet was disappointed of his fief (9). He complained of this to Lewis XII, who dispatched letters in his favour; but they were thrown on the ground, and he who presented them received many blows. Jasonis amicorum opera à Rege literas impetravit, ut sibi ablata restitueretur; sed nuncius pugnis, & calcibus percussus penè cæsus est, Literæ in terram projectæ, & conculcatæ fuere. Mainus complained to Guy de Rocheford, chancellor of France, and did not forget to tell him of the hundred and fifty crowns, this affair had cost him, without getting one penny from the lands, the

(8) Castrum Pioperam Rex in feudum Jasoni, dum viveret, cum multis prædiis & proventibus concessit, hoc animo ut Jura profiteri teneretur, nisi valetudine esset impeditus. Id. ib. pag. 283.

(9) Dominus à Corcu regnæ dominus magister Jasonem Castro in liavit, eth post acquisitum Castrum semper d cuit. Id. ib. pag. 284.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

sollicitations of Lewis XII. He was honoured with the presence of this prince at one of his lectures [E]; which was attended with a thousand advantages; but the fief, wherewith he was invested, never brought him in one farthing (c); but on the contrary put him to great charges. The jealousy between him, and Philip Decius, another professor, was carried to a great height [F]. He was not a man of a very subtile wit, neither did he scruple to make use of the labours of others [G]. He exacted most exorbitant fees from those who came to consult him; but he promised to restore the money, if they lost their cause (d). He was excused from reading lectures during the last years of his life; which was a favour, that he obtained from the duke of Milan, and which the bad state of his mind was sufficient to procure him. This last part of his life was very melancholy. He had lost the use of his reason; and he had a nephew, who often beat him (e). He died at Pavia, the twenty second of March, 1519, aged eighty four years, and left a natural son behind him, who had employments in the republic of Genoa (f). The answer he made to Lewis XII is ill related by Mr. Moreri [H]. He is the author of several books [I]. He studied by candle-light in the daytime

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) Ferunt eum senio confectum delirasse, & sæpe à Corn. Hippolyto ex fratre nepote pugnis cæsum fuisse. Panzirol. ubi infra, pag. 286.

(f) Taken from Panzirol. lib. ii, de claris Legum Interpretibus, cap. cxxvii.

the king had given him. Panzirollus adds, that these things happened in the year 1500, and that Mainus continued to teach till the year 1511. The interruption did not begin, at the soonest, till the year 1495; where then shall we find the nine years which Panzirollus makes it continue? I used to be surprized, when I met with such faults of Arithmetic in good authors; but now I wonder no longer at it: I have found too many of them, not to be accustomed, and pretty well hardened, to them.

[E] He was honoured with the presence of Lewis XII at one of his lectures.] Lewis XII being at Pavia, had a mind to hear him. Mainus, being clad in a robe of gold, conducted him to the auditory. The king made him go before him, and said, that the royal power in these places was inferior to that of the professors (10). He was followed by five cardinals, and a hundred lords. He embraced Mainus, after he came down from his chair, and presented him with a castle. We may compare this to the honours paid by Pompey to the Philosopher Posidonius. 'Cn. Pompeius confecto Mithridatico bello intraturus Posidonii sapientiæ professione clari domum, fores percuti de more à lictore vetuit, & fasces literarum januæ submisit is cui se oriens occidens que submiserat (11). '--- Cn. Pompey, just after the Mithridatic war, designing to enter the house of the famous Philosopher Posidonius, forbad his lictors to strike the door, as usual, and struck his fasces at learning's gate; he, to whom the east and west had submitted.' The Sieur Bullart should not have said, that Lewis XII went often to this auditory (12); but this is the humour of all those, who make elogiums: they never regard the exact numbers; they multiply every thing. The subject, treated of by Mainus in this lecture, ought not to be forgotten: he maintained, that the dignity of a knight, conferred by a prince upon him, who had signalized himself in a battle, ought to pass from father to son. Ea lectione dignitatem equestrem ob spectatum in acie facinus de manu Regis traditam, accendendæ virtutis ergo ad posteros manare definivit (13).

(10) Rex eum velut præceptorem præire jussit, quod eo in loco professoribus regum potestatem inferiorem esse diceret. Panzirol. pag. 283.

(11) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. xxx.

(12) Bullart, ubi supra.

(13) Jovius, in Elog. cap. lxvi, pag. 154. See also Panzirol. ubi supra, pag. 283.

[F] The jealousy between him and Philip Decius, another Professor, was carried to a great height.] There is nothing more common than to see this kind of jealousy produce a torrent of reproaches and slanders; but it happens seldom that those, who are tainted with it, throw stones at one another, in a literal sense, as these two Professors did one day. They met in a narrow street, and disputed the wall, and had like to have knocked one another down with stones. What a strange fight was this! and how diverting to children, and all passengers! Jasonis nominis invidia exagitatus Philippus Decius, ipsum usque ad insanas cavillationes numquam insectari destitit. In tantum denique odium prorupere, ut semel in angiportu, obviam facti, cum de loco contendere capissent, etiam lapidibus sese incessisse ferantur (14).

(14) Panzirol. pag. 284.

[G] Neither did he scruple to make use of the labours of others.] It would have been wrong to have left him out of the list of Plagiaries (15); for he attributed to himself a book, which Alexander of Imola had composed; and he hired some scholars, who took copies of the lectures of the most learned Professors, of which he afterwards made an advantage. One of these Professors complained of it publickly, and was so enraged at the cheat, that he changed his sentiments out of spite, and refuted those opinions, which had been stolen from him. Read this Latin, and you will find the names of the persons concerned. 'Aliorum etiam laboribus Jason libenter fruebatur, siquidem commentarium in titulum de Actionibus ab Alexandro Imolensi scitè elaboratum sibi adscripsisse, & in lucem edidisse, fertur. † Hieronymi Torti Papiensis, qui cum Jacobo Puteo in patria vespertinas lectiones paulo ante explicuerat, & aliorum scriptis locupletari voluit; Bononiæ quoque dum ibi Bartholomæus Socinus, deinde Carolus Ruinus profiterentur, auditores aluisse dicitur, qui eorum descriptas lectiones ad se referrent: id & ejus commentaria ostendunt, & Ruinus sæpe publicè deploravit, qui, mutata per indignationem sententia, surreptas opiniones confutare consueverat (16). - - - - Jason freely made use of other mens labours; for he is reported to have ascribed to himself the commentary on the title de Actionibus, curiously written by Alexander of Imola, and to have published it as his own: he would enrich himself with the works of Jerom Tortus of Pavia, who, a little before, had explained, together with James Puteus, the evening lectures, in his own country, as also with the works of other authors; at Bononia likewise, during the Professorship of Bartholomew Socinus, and Charles Ruinus, he is said to have kept in pay certain scholars, to transcribe, and bring their lectures to him. This his commentaries shew, and Ruinus often publickly lamented, who, changing his sentiments through indignation, used to confute the opinions that were stolen from him.'

† Apostil. ad conf. lxii, & clxiii. Decii.

(16) Panzirol. ibid. pag. 283.

[H] His answer to Lewis XII is ill related by Mr Moreri.] 'Paul Jovius adds, That Lewis XII having asked him, why he was never married, he answered, because he was persuaded, that, by his Majesty's sollicitation, Pope Julius II would make him a cardinal (17).' This is not translating as he should have done, the words of Paul Jovius 'Me audiente interrogatus à Ludovico Gallorum Rege cur nunquam duxisset uxorem, ut te commendante, inquit, Julius Pontifex ad purpureum galerum gestandum me habilem sciat (18). - - - - - Being asked, in my hearing, by Lewis, king of France, why he never married, that Pope Julius, on your recommendation, said he, may know, that I am qualified to wear the red hat.' Nevertheless we may know, by this bad version, that Mainus wished for a cardinal's hat; but it availed him nothing to discover the secret of his ambition. Hoc responso animi quidem secretum ostendit, sed nunquam voti compos factus est (19). This is what Panzirollus says, after he had said what you are going to read. 'In domestico colloquio ab eodem (Rege) interrogatus Jason, cur nunquam uxorem duxisset, Ut tua, inquit, amplissime Rex, opera Julius Pontifex me ad purpureum Galerum promovere possit (20). - - - - Jason, in conversation, being asked by the same king, why he had never taken a wife, that by your means, said he, great king, Pope Julius may promote me to the red hat.'

(17) Moreri, at the word Mainus.

(18) Jov. in Elog. cap. lxvi, pag. 154.

(19) Panzirol. pag. 283.

(20) Compare with this the answer of ALLATIUS, related in his article, remark [D].

[I] He is the author of several books.] Of a Commentary upon the Pandects, and upon the Code of Justinian, besides four volumes of Answers, and the explication of the title de Actionibus (21). He compiled many things; but he did not always understand what he borrowed from others. 'Jason non multum ingenio acutus ob hæsitationem indecisos quandoque articulos reliquit, nec semel male percepta aliorum argumenta recitat, ac in referendis receptis opinionibus,

(21) Panzirol. pag. 282.

(15) He is in the Ms of Thomasius, num. 471.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google time [K].

‡ Hieron. Buttigel. in lib. i, §. si quis simpliciter. num. ix. ff. de ver. oblig.

(22) Ibid. pag. 285.

' opinionibus, quæ Communes vocantur, non nunquam ' decipitur. Vir alioqui laborioſus, & in cumulandis ' aliorum dictis diligens ‡, quicquid enim legebat, ' ſcriptis mandabat, unde à ſolo calamo Juris ſtudio- ' ſum adjuvari dictitabat, & ſe quantum ſtudebat, tan- ' tum ſcribere referebat (22). - - - Jaſon, not being of a ' quick apprehenſion, ſometimes left articles undecided, ' through doubt: he often repeats the arguments of others, ' without underſtanding them, and is ſometimes miſtaken ' even in relating received opinions. He is otherwiſe a ' laborious man, and induſtrious in compiling what others ' have ſaid; for he wrote down whatever he read; ' whence he ſaid, that a ſtudent of the law was aſſiſted by ' his pen alone, and that himſelf wrote, as much as he ſtu- ' died.'

[K] He ſtudied by candle-light in the day-time.] I have heard this ſaid of ſome other learned men, and I am very glad to find it printed concerning Jaſon Mainus. ' Linteo capiti obvoluto, etiam meridie occluſis fene- ' ſtris ad accenſum lumen elucubrare conſueveret, ne ' cœli claritate mentem evagari ſineret (23). - - - With ' a linen night-cap on his head, and his windows ſhut ' up, at noon-day, he uſed to ſtudy by candle-light, leſt ' the brightneſs of the ſkie ſhould divert, and take off his ' thoughts.' The reaſon of this conduct may be eaſily gueſſed; there are ſome men, who can produce no- thing, unleſs they collect themſelves, and concenter their thoughts within themſelves; and they find it very difficult to prevent diſtractions: upon which account it is neceſſary to remove from their eyes the variety of objects, which the open day-light preſents to them.

(23) Panzirol. ibid.

MAJORAGIUS (Marc Antony) profeſſor of Eloquence at Milan in the XVIth century, gained great reputation by the politeneſs of his ſtyle, and by his great knowledge in the Belles Lettres: he ſtudied at Como under a profeſſor, who was nearly related to him [A]; after which he went to Milan, where he met with a patron (a), in whoſe houſe he lodged five years, and ſo applied himſelf to ſtudy, that he almoſt killed himſelf by it [B]. It came into his head to revive the cuſtom of declaming, which antiently qualified youth to be capable early to make eloquent harangues, and after he had given many of his ſcholars very uſeful inſtructions to this purpoſe, and prepared them for it in private, he reſolved to employ himſelf in this function publickly. The curators of the college were ſo favourable to him, that they beſtowed that employment upon him, as ſoon as they knew his intentions. He was then but twenty ſix years old. He diſcharged that office very well; but, at the end of two years, all the profeſſors were diſmiſſed, becauſe the Milaneſe was threatened with a dangerous war. He retired to Ferrara, where he ſtudied the Civil-law under Andreas Alciatus, and Philoſophy under Vincent

(a) Called Lancelot Fagniano.

[A] He ſtudied under a Profeſſor, who was nearly related to him.] He was a perſon of great merit, and his name was Primus Comes (1). This name occaſioned an ambiguity, which ſurpriſed Eraſmus; for this Italian having put his name at the bottom of a note, wherein he acquainted him, that he intended to pay him a viſit, it made Eraſmus, though then very weak, go forth in all haſte to meet him, thinking that he was ſome great prince. He was much aſtoniſhed to find only a little man all alone; but he did not repent of having made ſuch haſte; for the converſation of the man pleaſed him very much. Majoragius relates this much better than I do, and ſo deſerves to be heard. Cum in Germaniam ea de cauſa profectus fuiſſet, ut Eraſmi conſuetudine per aliquot tempus frueretur, priuſquam ipſum Eraſmum conveniret, ad eum literas dedit, quibus adventus ſui cauſam declarabat, quarum in extrema parte nomen ſuum, ut ſit, ita ſubſcripſerat, Tui ſtudioſiſſimus Primus Comes Mediolanenſis. Hanc cùm Eraſmus ſubſcriptionem vidiſſet, credidit ſtatim magnum aliquem adeſſe Principem, ſui viſendi gratiâ. Quare licet admodum ſenex & infirmus eſſet, tamen quo ſtudio, quoque apparatu potuit, obviam conſobrino meo longe proceſſit. Sed poſtquam homunculum unum, nullo comitatu, nullo ſervorum grege ſtipatum, & benè quidem literatum, ſed nullo elegantiori cultu veſtitum reperit, errorem ſuum ridere jucundiſſimè cœpit: & tamen eum ſibi multò gratiorem adveniſſe, quàm ſi magnus Princeps fuiſſet, multis audientibus, teſtatus eſt (2). He informs us in the ſame place, that one reaſon why he quitted the name of Comes, Count (3), was, becauſe ſeveral perſons were deceived by it; for Gryphius, anſwering a letter of Majoragius, addreſſed him, as if he had been a prince. Eadem ratione deceptus aliquando fuit in nomine meo vir inſignis ac literatus Sebaſtianus Gryphius. Cùm enim ad eum literas dediſſem, & me Comitem inſcripſiſſem, ille mihi tanquam alicui Principi reſpondit, & clariſſimum Comitem non ſemel appellavit (4).

(1) See Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ix, cap. v, pag. m. 960. [Primus Comes ſignifies alſo firſt count. Rem. Crit.]

(2) Majoragius, Orat. 10. pag. m. 221, 222.

(3) We ſhall ſee, below, in remark [D], that Majoragius was called Antonius Maria Comes.

(4) Majoragius, ubi ſupra, p. 222.

[B] He ſo applied himſelf to ſtudy, that he almoſt killed himſelf by it.] Diverſions, ſports, feaſts, had no charms for him; and it was in vain to tell him that ſo ſedulous an application to his books would kill him, for he would not unbend at all; but at laſt a dangerous ſickneſs made him ſenſible, that he ſhould have yielded to the exhortations of his friends. This he himſelf informs us of. ' Fui apud hunc annos circiter quinque, ' quo quidem tempore literarum ſtudiis adeò vehemen- ' tem operam dedi, ut totum illud quinquennium in ' labore atque contentione animi contriverim, ut me ' non quies, non remiſſio, non æqualium ſtudia, non ' ludi, non convivia delectârint. Teſtis eſt vir iſte ' graviſſimus atque ornatiſſimus Lancillottus Fannianus, ' patronus meus, qui mihi adeſt, de me ſollicitus eſt, ' meum honorem atque exiſtimationem tuetur. Qui ' cùm in ſtudiis literarum me continenter verſari vide- ' ret, magno quodam cum amore ſæpiſſime reprehen- ' dere ſolebat, quod acquirendæ ſcientiæ deſiderio, ' propriæ ſalutis oblivíſcerer. Teſtes ſunt omnes, qui ' me norant eo tempore, ut non ſemel propter nimis ' aſſiduum ſtudium, cum in graviſſimos morbos inci- ' diſſem, de vitæ periculo dimicarim (5). - - - I abode ' with him about five years, in which time I applied ' ſo cloſely to ſtudy, that I ſpent the whole five years in ' the toil and labour of the mind; ſo that I took no delight ' in unbending my thoughts, in feaſting, and diverſions. I ' appeal for the truth of this to that excellent man Lan- ' celot Fannianus, my patron, who is preſent with me, is ' ſollicituous concerning me, and defends my honour and re- ' putation: who, ſeeing me perpetually taken up with ' ſtudy, uſed, to reprove me in a very friendly man- ' ner, telling me, that I neglected my own health for the ' ſake of acquiring knowledge. All, who knew me at ' that time, can witneſs, that more than once, falling in- ' to moſt grievous ſickneſſes, through too much ſtudy, I was ' in danger of loſing my life.' After he was cured, he wanted no leſs to be put in mind, that he took too much pains; the love of knowledge and of glory enticed him ſo much, that he did not conſider the prejudice his health ſuffered by it. ' Quo quidem mu- ' nere (Oratoriam artem publicè docendi) duos annos ita ' perfunctus ſum, ut (ne quid arrogantius de me di- ' cam) nemo diligentiam aut induſtriam meam deſide- ' rarit. Quin potius ita noctes & dies in omnium do- ' ctrinarum meditatione verſabar, ut non tantum pro- ' pinqui atque neceſſarii mei, ſed etiam multi ex vobis, ' P. C. me ſæpiſſime reprehenderent, quod nimios ' magnos labores & viribus meis impares aſſumere non ' dubitarem. Ardebam enim (ut ingenue fatear) in- ' credibili gloriæ cupiditate, quam in adoleſcente ne- ' quaquam eſſe vituperandam ſapientes omnes exiſti- ' mant. Nullum igitur omnino diem eſſe patiebar, in ' quo non aut publice docerem, aut private mecum ' ipſe meditarer, & vel ſcriberem, vel declamarem: ' frequenter autem eodem die hæc omnia faciebam (6). ' - - - - - Which employment (that of teaching Rhetoric ' publickly) I diſcharged, for two years, with the ' greateſt induſtry and diligence. Rather, I was ſo ' wrapt in ſtudy both night and day, that not only my re-

(5) Id. ib. p. 196.

(6) Ib. pag. 198.

' lations

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Vincent Magius. He publiſhed ſome pieces, in which he gave himſelf the name of Marcus Antonius Majoragius [C]. The alarms of war being over, he returned to Milan, and was reſtored to his profeſſorſhip, with a more conſiderable ſalary. His enemies, who had laboured in vain to hinder this, fell upon him, and drew up a proceſs againſt him, for the Name, which he had prefixed to one of his books [D]. He pleaded his cauſe publickly

(7) Orat. 10. pag. m. 199.

(8) Ibid. pag. 200.

(9) Hankius, de Rerum Roman. Scriptoribus, lib. 1, pag. 215.

(10) Majoragius, ubi ſupra, pag. 198.

(11) Ibid.

(12) See citation (12) of the article ALCIATUS (ANDREW).

(13) Cum apud nos maxima eſſet lætitia ſuſcepto, quotiam ingentes Gallorum copiæ ſam Alpes tranſcenderant, atque in Taurinis conſiderant, omnes publici bonarum artium Profeſſores, ut fit, in ea tumultu temporibus, dimiſſi ſunt, & ſtudia literarum intermiſſa. Majorag. ubi ſupra, pag. 198.

(14) Hic eſt exactæ vitæ meæ curſus, P. C. hæc ſtudiorum meorum ratio; hic duorum & triginta annorum, quibus hactenus vixi, ſpacium. Majoragius, ibid. pag. 201.

(15) Ibid. pag. 199.

(16) Ibid. pag. 190, 213.

(17) In the article AGRIPPA, remark [C].

(18) Hankius, de Romanar. Rerum Scriptorib. lib. 1, pag. 215, is miſtaken, when he ſays, In avi materni memoriam .... Annonæ dictus eſt.

lations and dependents, but even many of your venerable body, often reproved me for labouring beyond my ſtrength. For (to confeſs the truth) I had an incredible thirſt after glory, which all wiſe men think is by no means to be deſpiſed in a young man. Therefore I let no day paſs in which I did not either publickly teach, or meditate in private, and either write or declaim: nay, I frequently performed all theſe in the ſame day.'

[C] He publiſhed ſome pieces, in which he gave himſelf the name of Marcus Antonius Majoragius.] I can hardly reconcile his ſeveral dates. . . . He ſays in his plea (7); that, being at Ferrara, he reſolved, by the advice of his friends, to print ſome treatiſes. They were ſome harangues, and the apology of Cicero againſt Calcagninus (8). After they were publiſhed, he began to be known at Ferrara by the name, which he had prefixed to them. Afterwards he returned to Milan, and there reaſſumed his firſt profeſſion, notwithſtanding the ill offices of his enemies. Some time after, he was accuſed of changing his name, as will appear in the following remark. This is not eaſily reconciled with the epiſtle dedicatory of his anſwer to the cenſure of Calcagninus; it is dated the eighth of July 1543; and in it he ſpeaks of himſelf, as of one who peaceably exerciſed at Milan the functions of his profeſſion. It is not therefore true, that this book was publiſhed while the author was at Ferrara, whither he had retired, when the confuſions of war interrupted the public lectures at Milan. Another remark is this; he was born the twenty ſixth of October, 1514 (9), and he was made profeſſor of Rhetoric, when he was ſcarce twenty ſix years old (10), that is, in 1540. He diſcharged this office two years, and then went to Ferrara (11). So that he went thither in 1542. Now he was at Milan in July 1543, and there exerciſed his functions peaceably; and it was then he publiſhed his defence of Cicero againſt Calcagninus. He is miſtaken therefore, when he ſays, that this book appeared, while the war interrupted his lectures, and before he quitted Ferrara to return to Milan. Let us go farther. He ſtudied the civil-law at Ferrara, under Andreas Alciatus, who did not begin his lectures there till the year 1543 (12). Therefore Majoragius publiſhed a falſehood, when he ſays, that he was admitted profeſſor at the age of twenty ſix years, and that, at the end of two years, he went to Ferrara, where he heard the lectures of Alciatus. In this he is miſtaken; forgive him this falſhood, it will be eaſy to remove all the other difficulties, and to reſtore the true date of his journey to Ferrara. Since the public lectures ceaſed upon the French army's being arrived in Piedmont (13), this interruption muſt be placed in 1544. The duke of Enguien was ſent this year into Italy with a re-inforcement of troops, and gained the battle of Cerizolles. Majoragius, being quiet in his houſe in the month of July in the preceding year, had written the epiſtle dedicatory to his treatiſe againſt Calcagninus; but, before he put this book to the preſs, he was forced to go to Ferrara, and during his abode there, he publiſhed it. The ſame date may be proved by ſome places of his harangue, wherein Majoragius juſtifies himſelf as to the change of his name. He obſerves, that he was then thirty two years of age (14). He juſtified himſelf therefore in 1546. He obſerves, that Andreas Alciatus had taught the civil-law at Ferrara the four laſt years (15). This is not inconſiſtent with the year 1546. He obſerves, that it was a year ſince his return to Milan (16). He returned therefore in the year 1545. From whence we may conclude, that the interruption of his lectures, and his ſtay at Ferrara, laſted a year, in which he publiſhed ſome harangues, and the apology for Cicero.

I have obſerved elſewhere (17), that the learned are ſometimes careleſs in ſetting down the dates of their adventures. Here is one, who made himſelf younger than he was, when he entered upon public offices.

[D] His enemies drew up a proceſs againſt him for the name he had prefixed to one of his books.] His Chriſtian name was Antony, as was that of his uncle by the father's ſide (18). His mother, by her particular authority, joined to it the name of Maria, both upon the account of her devotion for the Holy Virgin, and becauſe ſhe delighted to hear that word. Boni ominis gratia . . . . nomini meo Mariam addidit, ut ſanctiſſimum illud divinæ matris nomen, materna quadam pietate muliebrique religione mihi additum, gratiorem ex nomine meo ſonum atque amabiliorem ad ipſius matris aures apportaret. Eam enim ſæpiſſime commemini dicere, ſe Mariæ nomine mirandum in modum ſolitam eſſe recreari (19). And thus from the cradle our Majoragius was called Antony Maria. His father and his neighbours called him by this name; and by this name he was known afterwards wherever he made himſelf known. People therefore were ſurprized to ſee him call himſelf, in the title of his firſt book, Marc Antony, ſuppreſſing the venerable name of the Holy Virgin, which he had always taken. I wonder this was not the principal attack of his accuſers, and that they did not endeavour to convict him of having done an injury to the Mother of the Son of GOD. The cauſe was pleaded before the ſenate of Milan with great pomp. I know not whether the pleading of his accuſers (20) was made public; but we have the defence of the accuſed among his harangues. He juſtifies himſelf very eloquently, and cited a great many illuſtrious examples of the liberty he took. He confeſſed ſincerely the reaſon why he durſt not appear in public under the name of Antony Maria, which was becauſe he was ſo ſcrupulous in the choice of words, that he durſt not employ any, but what were to be found in the beſt Latin authors. Now there is no inſtance in Roman antiquity of a man's being called Maria, and having at once a maſculine and feminine name. Upon which account he changed the name Maria into Marcus, by lengthening out the laſt ſyllable, and prefixed it to Antony: for it had been a barbariſm, an uſage unknown to ancient Rome, to call himſelf Antonius Marcus: he therefore not only lengthened out one of his names, but alſo changed it's place. Since we have here an example of the ſuperſtitions of the Ciceronian ſect (21), we muſt recite the very words of this author. In verborum delectu, quod C. Cæſar eloquentiæ principium eſſe dicitabat, adeo diligens, & pene dixerim ſuperſtitioſus eram, ut nullum omnino verbum, nullam verborum conjunctionem, nullam dicendi formulam admittendam mihi eſſe cenſerem, quam non apud veteres Latinos atque probatos auctores inveniſſem. Id igitur in nomine meo præcipue ſervandum eſſe ſtatuebam, ne, cum Latinæ linguæ candorem & elegantiam profiterer, aliquis mihi barbarum nomen & inuſitatum aliquando poſſet objicere: atque eo magis, quod mihi nullo modo convenire videbatur, ut muliebre nomen cum virili conjungeretur. Quis enim apud antiquos unquam talem nominis conjunctionem vel legit, vel audivit, ut quis à viro & muliere nominaretur (22)? As to the name Majoragius, he preferred it to that of Comes, for the reaſon I have given above (23). Thus, inſtead of Antonius Maria Comes, by which name he was called before he appeared as an author, he called himſelf Marcus Antonius Majoragius, when he ſet up for an author. I add, that Majoragius was the name of his father, and that his father was ſo called, becauſe he was born in the village Majoragio, near to Milan. 'Julianus Comes, homo cum innocentia atque integritate vitæ, tum officio, fide, auctoritate ſui municipii facile Princeps, mihi pater fuit, P. C. qui cum Majoragium vicum habitaret, atque ita ſe comiter liberaliterque gereret ut vicinis omnibus gratus & charus haberetur; cognomen à loco ſortitus eſt, & Majoragius appellatus (24) - - - -

(19) Majoragius, Orat. 10. pag. 195.

(20) Their names were Fabius Lupus, and Macrinus Niger.

(21) Majoragius was a moderate Ciceronian; he did not deſpiſe the terms, which Cicero did not make uſe of, provided they were in other good writers of antient Rome. See the remark [E] towards the end.

(22) Majoragius, ibid. pag. 199, 200.

(23) In the remark [A], citation (3).

(24) Majoragius, ibid. pag. 194. He ſays, pag. 222. Cum præfertim Majoragii cognomentum haberem adhuc à patre hæreditarium. - - - - -

My father was Julian Comes, a man diſtinguiſhed above his country-men both by the innocence and probity of his life, and by his office and authority: who, inhabiting the village of Majoragio, and being reſpected by all his neighbours for his courteſy and humanity, took a firname from the place, and was called Majoragius.'

For the reſt, this Julian Majoragius having married Magdalen de Conti, called himſelf Comes, in imitation of his brothers-in-law, who thought it improper to call themſelves de Comite, or de Comitibus. Of this our Majoragius informs us. 'Cum hoc locutionis genus Eſpecially ſince I ſtill retained the firname Majoragius, by inheritance from my father.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

publickly, and gained it (b). He continued to teach with great application; which, without doubt, ſhortened his life; for he lived only about forty years and ſix months. He died April the fourth 1555. Mr Moreri has given the titles of ſome of his books [E], and has committed ſome little faults [F]. Thuanus has alſo committed ſome [G].

(b) Taken from the tenth harangue of Majoragius. It is that, wherein he juſtifies the change of his name.

Majoragius ought to be put in the catalogue of thoſe, who are accuſed of being plagiaries [H].

‘ genus à conſuetudine Latini ſermonis abhorreret;
‘ primo vir eruditiſſimus avunculus meus, qui permul-
‘ tos annos Mediolani magna cum gloria publice do-
‘ cuit, cum elegantiæ ſermonis admodum ſtudioſus
‘ eſſet, non amplius ſe de Comitibus, ut cæteri fa-
‘ ciebant, ſed Petrum Comitem cœpit inſcribere. . . .
‘ Hunc imitati ſunt ejus fratres Jacobus & Aloyſius, ‘ atque etiam pater meus Julianus, qui horum ſororem
‘ Magdalenam, matrem meam in matrimonio habe-
‘ bat (25). - - - - As this manner of ſpeaking was not ‘ agreeable to the Latin idiom; my uncle, a very learned ‘ man, who for many years taught publickly, and with ‘ great reputation, at Milan, and was very exact as to ‘ the elegance of language, was the firſt, who wrote
‘ himſelf no longer de Comitibus, as the reſt did, but ‘ Petrus Comes. . . . . His was followed by his bro- ‘ thers James and Aloyſius, and alſo by my father
‘ Julian, who had married their ſiſter Magdalen, my ‘ mother.’ Note, that Julian and his wife were deſcended from the ſame anceſtors (26).

(25) Ibid. pag. 221.

(26) Idem, Orat. 8, pag. 141.

[E] Mr Moreri has given the titles of ſome of his books.] He forgot the harangues and prefaces, which have been printed ſeveral times. I think, the firſt edition was printed at Venice, in 1582 (27), by the care of John Peter Ayroldus Marcellinus. It contains twenty five harangues, fourteen prefaces, and the dialogue de Eloquentia. I make uſe of the edition of Leipſic, 1628, illuſtrated with marginal notes by Valentin Hartungus, profeſſor of Phyſic. They never ventured to publiſh in Italy the harangue of Majoragius againſt the avarice of the clergy (28). It is a very fine piece, and as well turned as poſſible. It was publiſhed at Utrecht in 1666, in 4to, from the M. S. of Mr Gudius. Mr Morhof, perceiving, that the copies of it grew ſcarce, cauſed it to be re-printed, with the diſcourſe he made upon this model, in 1690. Theſe two pieces are in the collection of harangues and programata, by Mr Morhof, publiſhed at Hamburg in 1698. You will find a very long extract of this harangue of Majoragius in Mr Seckendorf's Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm (29). Mr Moreri ought to have explained a little better the occaſion of the quarrel of Majoragius with Calcagninus, and with Nizolius. The quarrel with Calcagninus was in defence of the Offices of Cicero, againſt which Calcagninus had publiſhed twenty five diſquiſitions. Majoragius refuted them all by ſo many deciſions; which is the title he gave to his anſwers publiſhed in 1543. James Grifolus refuted alſo the diſquiſitions of Calcagninus. Theſe three pieces, I mean the cenſure of Calcagninus, and the anſwers of Majoragius, and Griſolus, were publiſhed together in 8vo, in the XVIth century. Mr Grævius has inſerted all this in his excellent edition of Cicero's Offices. Nizolius quarrelled with Majoragius through a jealouſy natural to men of the ſame profeſſion: he came off by the worſt, becauſe few learned men approved his being a rigid Ciceronian. ‘ Hunc Tullianæ elucubrationis genium
‘ cum inter cæteros ejus ætatis præferret etiam Marius
‘ Nizolius Brixellenſis, orta eſt inter utrumque de
‘ primæ laudis acquiſitione contentio, multa viciſſim
‘ ſibi publicè objectantem, ac ſua viciſſim ſcripta car-
‘ pentem: in quo tamen Nizolius ideo acerbiora
‘ tulit eruditorum judicia, quod ſubacri & tetricâ ſu-
‘ perſtitione, in tanta latinorum procerum fœcundi-
‘ tate ne hilum quidem à Ciceronis formulis recedendum arbitraretur. Sua igitur non ineptè tutatus
‘ placita Majoragius perdocti ac induſtrii ingenii no-
‘ men emeruit (30). - - - - It happening that Marius
‘ Nizolius of Breſſello, among others of that time, af- ‘ fected the Ciceronian ſtyle, theſe two became rivals for
‘ the ſuperiority, objecting many things publickly againſt
‘ each other, and, by turns, cenſuring each others
‘ writings: in which conteſt however, the ſentiments
‘ of the learned were leſs favourable to Nizolius, becauſe, ‘ among ſuch a variety of Latin authors, he was for ‘ adhering ſuperſtitiouſly to the phraſeology of Cicero alone.
‘ Majoragius therefore, by his apt defence of his opinions,
‘ gained the reputation of a very learned and induſtrious
‘ man.’ We muſt not forget, that Gaudentius Merula is to be reckoned among the adverſaries of Majoragius, who accuſeth him of being a great plagiary (31).

(27) It is in 4to.

(28) The title of it is Philochryſus, ſive de Laudibus auri.

(29) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 342, & ſeq.

(30) Joh. Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtor. pag. 126.

(31) In Apologia, pag. 28, apud Almelovenium in Plagiariorum Syllabo, pag. 27.

[F] Mr Moreri has committed ſome little faults.] I. He ſhould not have ſaid, that Majoragius was a native of a caſtle of that name; for Majoragio is only a village. If any one ſhall ſay, that this does not hinder but there might be a caſtle in that village, I will confeſs it; but then I will add, that Majoragius was not born in a caſtle; and this I prove from theſe words (32): ‘ Amphortius qui ex illis (33) natu
‘ maximus erat, Majoragium vicum extruxit, atque
‘ in eo turrim, cujus adhuc in domo mea paterna,
‘ poſt ſeptingentos atque ampliùs annos, quædam ex-
‘ tant veſtigia atque fundamenta; hic noſtri generis
‘ auctor fuit. - - - Amphortius, the elder of them, built
‘ the village of Majoragio, and in it a tower, the ruins
‘ of which, and part of the foundation, after more than ‘ ſeven hundred years, are ſtill to be ſeen in my father's ‘ houſe: this perſon was the founder of our family.’ Would Majoragius have talked thus of his paternal houſe, if it had been the caſtle of the place? Add to this, that he confeſſes, his father was very poor (34); but not that he was a domeſtic of the lord of the village. II. It was not he, but his father, who, from the village Majoragio, where he dwelt, took the name of Majoragius. See the remark [D], citation (24). III. It is not true, that his name was Marc-Antony Maria. IV. Nor that he taught at Ferrara.

(32) Majoragius, Orat. 10. pag. 220.

(33) He means three brothers, whom Deſiderius, king of the Lombards, their uncle by the mother's ſide, promoted to the dignity of counts, and to whom he gave a great deal of land.

(34) Licet in tenuiſſima re familiari verſaretur. Majoragius, ibid. pag. 236.

[G] Thuanus alſo has committed ſome faults.] I. He ſhould not ſay, that Majoragio was ſo called, from a town, where his father dwelt (35). I have already ſhewn, that his father was called Majoragius. II. His epitaph, in the Muſæum Imperiale, imports, that he taught for the ſpace of fourteen years; but, in the theatre of Ghilini, it tells us, that he taught only nine years. Thuanus, in Mr Teiſſier, makes the profeſſorſhip of Majoragius to ceaſe at the end of eight years, and ſuppoſes, that he quitted it, to apply himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of Divinity. My edition of Thuanus informs me, that Majoragius did not begin this ſtudy till he had ſpent thirteen years in inſtructing youth. III. He ſays, in the ſame Mr Teiſſier, that Majoragius lived forty two years. The Latin edition allows him but forty, tho' the truth is, he lived forty years, and near ſix months.

(35) I make uſe of the ſame verſion, that Mr Teiſſier uſed, Addit. to the Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 105. Edit. 1696. The Latin has it, A Majoragio, vico in quo ejus pater habitabat, ita vocatus. Thuanus, lib. xvi.

[H] He ought to be placed in the catalogue of thoſe, who are accuſed of being plagiaries.] Natalis Comes aſſirms, that he heard ſome learned Florentines ſay, that Majoragius, being indebted to Peter Victorius for illuſtrations upon Ariſtotle's Rhetoric, had not the gratitude to own it, but adorned himſelf with the ſpoils of others. ‘ Qui locus (Ariſtotelis in 3 libro Rheto- ‘ ricorum) cum ante noſtram ætatem legeretur depra-
‘ vatus, Petri Victorii patricii Florentini ac viri clariſ-
‘ ſimi ingenio eſt integritati reſtitutus: ut mihi, cum
‘ eſſem Florentiæ, multis rationibus probarunt viri
‘ quidam eximiæ integritatis & eruditionis, atque in ‘ primis Vicentius Borghinus, vir omnium quos un-
‘ quam cognovi, multiplici rerum cognitione præ-
‘ ſtantiſſimus. Horum gravium teſtium autoritate
‘ commotus non potui non ſummopere improbare M.
‘ Antonii cujuſdam Majoragii neſcio impudentiam ne
‘ appellem, an exquiſitam ambitionem: qui omni
‘ explicatione propè Ariſtotelicæ artis ipſius Victorii
‘ ſcriptis accepta, ut ex iiſdem viris illuſtribus cognovi,
‘ ex hac emendatione elatus, mox alibi in Victorium
‘ ipſum non ſemel inſultavit, & per hujus loci cor-
‘ rectionem viros omnes clariſſimos ſuæ ætatis infectatus
‘ eſt: atque in primis Hermolaum Barbarum virum ‘ præſtantiſſimum (36). - - - - Which paſſage of ‘ Ariſtotle's Rhetorics, book the third, having been cor- ‘ rupted before our time, was reſtored to the true read-
‘ ing, by the moſt ingenious and celebrated Petrus Victo-
‘ rius of Florence, as was fully proved to me, when I
‘ was at Florence, by perſons of great integrity and learn- ‘ ing, particulary Vincentius Borghinus, a man of the ‘ moſt extenſive knowledge I ever met with. Affected
‘ by the teſtimony of ſuch great men, I could not but ‘ greatly

(36) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ix, cap. 9, pag. m. 959.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'greatly blame the impudence (ſhall I call it?) or 'exquiſite ambition of one Marc Antony Majoragius, 'who borrowing almoſt his whole explication of the 'Ariſtotelian art from the writings of Victorius, as the 'fame illuſtrious perſons informed me, and growing vain 'upon this emendation, more than once inſulted Victorius, 'and attacked the moſt eminent men of his time, par- 'ticularly the great Hermolaus Barbarus, upon the 'ſtrength of this correction.'

MAJUS (JUNIANUS) a Neapolitan gentleman, taught the Belles Lettres in Naples, towards the end of the XVth century (a). Among other ſcholars, he had the famous Sannazarius [A]. He contributed much by his lectures and books to reſtore the elegancy of the Latin tongue [B]; but he diſtinguiſhed himſelf much more by interpreting dreams [C]. He was the greateſt Onirocritic of his age; and people flocked to him

(a) See the Biblioteca Napoletana of Nicolo Toppi, pag. 162.

[A] He had amongſt other ſcholars . . . Sannazarius.] This appears by the ſeventh elegy of the ſecond book of Sannazar, dedicated ad Junianum Majum præceptorem. I ſhall cite a long paſſage out of it below.

[B] He contributed much to reſtore the elegancy of the Latin tongue.] This is the commendation Sabellicus has given him. ' Subjiciet his aliquis, ſays he (1), ' haud immerito Jo. Tortelium Aretinum & Junianum ' Parthenopæum. Juverunt illi induſtria uterque ſua, ' nec multum inter ſe diverſa verborum utriuſque ' linguæ copiam. - - - Some one will very deſervedly ' add here John Tortelius Aretin, and Junianus Par- ' thenopæus. They both, by an almoſt equal induſtry, ' contributed to reſtore the elegancy of both languages.' Majus publiſhed a book at Naples in 1475, de priſcorum proprietate verborum, which was reprinted in the ſame city in 1490. The ſecond edition is full of faults, occaſioned by the negligence of the Printer (2): but he greatly commends the Printer of the firſt. The words he uſes will pleaſe the curious; for they acquaint us with the name of him, who firſt began to practiſe Printing in that country. ' Accedit ad hæc ' quod Germani ſolerti ac incredibili quodam invento ' nuper novam quandam imprimendi rationem inve- ' nerunt, præcipue Matthias Moravus vir ſummo in- ' genio ſummaque elegantia in hoc genere impreſſio- ' nis effloruit. Quem conſilio Blaſii Monachi Rome- ' rii viri ſacris literis inſtituti ac ſanctis moribus pro- ' bati, hac noſtra urbe excepiſſe gratulamur, &c. (3). ' - - - Add to this, that the Germans have lately found ' out a new method of Printing; eſpecially Matthias a ' Moravian, a moſt ingenious man, diſtinguiſhed himſelf ' in this new invention: whoſe reception in this our ' city, by advice of Blaſius a monk of Romerium, we ' congratulate.' Some believe, that Volaterran ſpeaks of our Majus in the words which follow: ' Chalci- ' dius Græcorum non erat ignarus, nec imperitus ' Grammaticus, attamen infans & abſque genio. Di- ' ctionibus in primis invigilabat, lexiconque condide- ' rat quod obitu ipſius ſuperveniente Jovinianus ejus ' diſcipulus ſibi vindicavit (4). - - - Chalcidius was ' verſed in the Greek authors, and a ſkillful Gramma- ' rian, yet a meer child, and without genius. He par- ' ticularly ſtudied Phraſeology, and had compiled a Di- ' ctionary, which his diſciple Jovinian, after his death, ' claimed as his own.' This Chalcidius taught at Rome. Majus would deſerve a place among the plagiaries, if he is the perſon mentioned by Volaterran. On the other ſide, Calepin made a great advantage of the book of Majus, as Toppi remarks. Diede alla luce un libro della proprieta delle parole antiche, del quale ſe n'e ſervito Ambroſio Calepino aſſai bene (5).

(1) Sabellicus, de lingua Latinæ Repertoribus, pag. 40 c. apud Anton. Nicodemum Additioni alla Biblioteca Napoletana, pag. 144.

(2) Nicolo Toppi, Bibl. Napolet. pag. 162.

(3) Junian. Majus, Epiſtola dedicatoria ad Regem Ferdinandum, apud Nicodemum, ubi ſupra.

(4) Volaterranus, lib. xxi, pag. m. 776.

(5) Nicolo Toppi, ubi ſupra.

[C] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf . . . . . by the interpretation of dreams.] Alexander ab Alexandro, who had been his ſcholar, ſays wonderful things of his knowledge in theſe matters. Every morning the houſe of Majus was full of people, who came to tell him their dreams, that they might learn their interpretation; and among them there were ſome perſons of quality. He anſwered them, not, as moſt others do, in dark ſpeeches, and a few words, but clearly, and at large. Many perſons, by following his advice, ſecured themſelves from death, and prevented ſometimes very great troubles. We may ſee this more at large, if we conſult the Latin of Alexander ab Alexandro. Junianus Majus, ſays he (6), conterraneus meus, vir bene literatus, in exquirendis adnotandiſque verborum & ſententiarum viribus, multi ſtudii fuit: & præterquam quod in eruditendis juvenculorum animis, imbuendiſque doctrina pueris, caſtigatiſſimæ diſciplinæ, ſomniorum quoque omnis generis ita verus conjector fuit, ut ipſius reſponſa, divina fere monita haberentur. Ad eum memini, cum puer adhuc eſſem, & ad capiendum ingenii cultum frequens apud eum ventitarem, quotidie ſomniantium turbam, homineſque celebri fama & multi nominis, de ſomniis conſultum veniſſe. Declarabat definiebatque ille, non breviter aut ſubobſcure, ut plerique, ſed expoſite atque aperte ænigmata ſomniorum, ſive boni, ſive mali prænuncia: ita apte, ut judicium factum à veridico diceres. Multi quoque illius monitu, vitæ interitum nonnunquam animi ægritudines vitarunt. Sannazarius, another ſcholar of this interpreter of dreams, found it happy both for himſelf and his miſtreſs, that he had recourſe to ſuch an oracle. He extols him to the ſkies, and prefers him before all the antient Augurs. Let us remember, that he writes as a Poet; and therefore that he did not intend, we ſhould give credit to his words, without making ſome abatement. However, let us hear what he ſays.

(6) Alexander ab Alexandro, Genial. Dierum, lib. i, cap. xi, pag. 81, 82.

At tibi venturos, Mai, prædicere caſus
Fas eſt, & mites conſuluiſſe Deos.
Nec tantum aut aræ fumos, aut nuntia ſentis
Fulgura, ſed Stygiis ſomnia miſſa locis,
Somnia quæ miſeram perturbant ſæpe quietem,
Dum mens incertis pendet imaginibus.
O quoties per te vanum poſuiſſe timorem
Me memini, & lætos continuaſſe dies.
O quoties, trepidus cum non ſpernenda putarem,
In noſtrum cavi damna futura caput.
Sæpe meæ tibi cum narraſſem viſa puellæ,
Dixiſti, certos haud procul eſſe metus,
Sæpe illam madidos luſtrare in flumine crines
Juſſiſti, & miſto ſolvere farra ſale.
Quod ſi olim terris talem te fata dediſſent,
Spreviſſet Thuſcos Martia Roma viros.
Nam te quis melius calidas deprendere fibras,
Conſulere aërias aut potuiſſet aves?
Illa triumphatum, &c (7).

(7) Sannazar. Eleg. vii, lib. ii, pag. 96. Edit. Amſtel. 1689.

Favour'd by gods, to thee, my friend, 'tis giv'n
Events to ſcan, and read the will of heav'n.
Nor ſmoak alone from reaking altars ſent,
Or winged lightnings, teach thee each event;
But dreams to thee the laws of fate diſcloſe,
From Stygian darkneſs ſent, to break the mind's repoſe.
Thou from my heart vain fears haſt chas'd away,
And bad continu'd mirth prolong the day.
Secur'd by thy advice, I ſafely tread,
And dangers vainly threaten o'er my head.
Oft, when my miſtreſs, waking in a fright,
Has trembled at the viſions of the night,
Preſcrib'd by thee, due rites have baniſh'd fear,
And taught her to believe no danger near.
Rome, had'ſt thou flouriſh'd in thoſe martial days,
Above Etrurian ſeers, had ſung thy praiſe;
More ſkill'd in ſmoaking entrails fate to ſpy,
And better read i'th' language of the ſky.

Martin del Rio, who is otherwiſe ſo credulous, and ſo little wont to reject romantic ſtories, ſpeaks of Majus in another tone, and treats him with the laſt decree of contempt. ' Cæterorum onirociti- ' corum veterum, non magna reipub. jactura omnes ' libri interierunt, præter unum Artemidorum Daldi- ' anum, delirum ſenem, qui libris quinque cuncta ab ' aliis tradita complexus fuit. Brevior eſt Aſtram- ' pſychus Græcè & Latinè his annis editus: ſed æque ' nugax, ut & alius ille Arabs, qui Græcè barbari- ' zans una cum Artemidoro in lucem prodiit in Gal- ' lia. Hodiè in pretio habent Apomaſaris Arabica

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him from all Parts, to know what such and such dreams presaged. Many pretended, that his answers were very useful to them. This is not unworthy of consideration [D].

'Apotelesmata, ex recentioribus Contra. Wimpina, 'vellem ne tam multa sine antidoto congessisset †. 'Avorum quoque memoria, hanc in Italia vanissimè 'profitebatur artem Junianus Majus ‡: cujus extant 'epistolæ & libelli quidam Grammatici (8). - - - All 'the books of the other antient Onirocritics, with no 'great detriment to the public, are lost, except only Arte-'midorus of Daldia, a doting old man, who comprized 'in five books all that the rest had delivered. Astram-'pschus is shorter, who has been lately published in 'Greek and Latin; but he is equally a trifler, as is 'that other Arabian, whose book in barbarous Greek, 'lately came out, together with that of Artemidorus, in 'France. At present they esteem Apomasar's astrolo-'gical works in Arabic, and among the Moderns Conr. 'Wimpina; I wish he had not made such great collecti-'ons without an antidote. In the memory likewise of our 'grand-fathers, Junianus Majus professed this vain 'art in Italy; who hath left behind him some epistles, 'and grammatical pieces.'

† L. de divinat. cap. xiv, & lib. de insomniis per decem capita.

‡ De quo Alex. ab Alex. lib. i, cap. xi.

(8) Mart. Del Rio Disquisit. Magicar. lib. iv, cap. iii, quest. vi, pag. m. 278.

A REFLEXION on dreams.

[D] This is not unworthy of consideration.] It were to be wished, for the happiness and quiet of an infinite number of persons, that dreams had never been mentioned as presages of future events; for those who are once possessed with this notion, imagine that the greatest part of the images, that pass through their minds in their sleep, are so many predictions, which very often threaten them with future evils: from whence arise a thousand uneasy thoughts; and where there is one man, who is not subject to this weakness, there are a thousand, who are not able to free themselves from it. I think we may say of dreams the same almost as of inchantments, that they are far less mysterious than people believe, and somewhat more than Free-thinkers fancy. The histories of all times and places relate, both with respect to dreams and magic, so many surprizing things, that those who obstinately deny them all, render themselves suspected, either of want of sincerity, or judgment to discern the force of the proofs. A violent prejudice, or a certain turn of mind, blinds their understanding, when they compare the reasons pro and con. I have known some men of parts, who denied all presages from dreams upon this principal, viz. None but GOD, said they, know things to come, that is, such as are called contingent: but dreams are generally supposed to foretel contingent futurities; GOD therefore must be the author of those dreams, and then he must produce them by a miracle; and so, in all the countries of the world, he must work an infinite number of miracles, which are no wise agreeable to the character either of his infinite greatness, or sovereign wisdom. These gentlemen insist strongly upon this, that the most mystical dreams are as common among Pagans and Mahometans, as among the followers of the true religion. In effect, read Plutarch, and the other Greek and Roman Historians; read the books of the Arabians and Chinese, and you will find in them as many examples of miraculous dreams, as in the Bible, or in Christian histories. It must be confessed, that this objection is of great force, and seems to lead us necessarily to another system, viz. that, which attributes these sort of dreams, not to GOD as the immediate cause, but to certain intelligences, who, under the direction of GOD, have a great share in the government of man. It may be supposed, according to the doctrine of occasional causes, that there are general laws, which subject a great number of effects to the desires of such and such intelligences, as there are general laws, which subject to the desires of men the motion of certain bodies. This supposition is not only agreeable to an opinion, which was very common among the Pagans, but also to the doctrine of the Scripture, and to that of the antient Fathers (9). The Pagans acknowledged several inferior gods, who presided over particular things, and they pretended also, that each man had a genius that governed him. The Roman Catholics pretend, that the doctrine of a guardian-angel, and of an angel presiding over a whole country, a city, or a province, is founded upon the Scripture. If you once lay it down for a truth, that GOD has thought fit to appoint certain spirits, as the occasional cause of man's conduct, with respect to certain events, then all the difficulties that are objected against dreams, vanish away. We must no more wonder, that we do not find a character of greatness or gravity in the images, which advertise us in dreams (10). Tho' they be confused or childish, and though they vary according to times and places, and according to the temperament of mens bodies, this ought not to surprize those, who know the narrow bounds of creatures, and the obstacles which occasional causes, of different kinds, must needs reciprocally raise against one another? Do we not find by experience, every day, that our soul and our body mutually hinder each other in those operations that are peculiar to them? an intelligence, that should act both upon our body and our mind, must needs find divers obstacles in the laws, which establish these two principles (11), as the occasional cause of certain effects. But whence comes it, may some ask, that these invisible genii do not make use of a fitter time? Why do they not advertise men of things future, while they are awake? Why do they wait till they are asleep? 'Illud etiam requiro, cur, si deus ista visa nobis pro-'videndi causa dat, non vigilantibus potius det quàm 'dormientibus? Sive enim externus, & adventitius 'pulsus animos dormientium commovet, sive per se 'ipsi animi moventur, sive quæ causa alia est, cur se-'cundùm quietem aliquid videre, audire, agere videa-'mur, eadem causa vigilantibus esse poterat: idque 'si nostra causa dii secundum quietem facerent, vigi-'lantibus idem facerent; præsertim cùm Chrysippus, 'Academicos refellens, permulto clariora, & certiora 'esse dicat, quæ vigilantibus videantur, quàm quæ 'somniantibus. Fuit igitur divina beneficentia dignius, 'cùm consuleret nobis, clariora visa dare vigilantibus, 'quàm obscuriora, per somnium: quod quoniam non 'fit, somnia divina putanda non sunt. Jam verò quid 'opus est circuitione, & amfractu, ut sit utendum inter-'pretibus somniorum potiùs, quam directo? Deus, si 'quidem nobis consulebat, Hoc facito, Hoc ne feceris, 'diceret? idque visum vigilanti potiùs, quàm dormi-'enti daret (12)? - - - - I likewise ask, why, if GOD 'gives us these visions, for the sake of fore-sight, he 'does not rather give them us, when awake, than when a-'sleep? For, whether an external and adventitious im-'pulse affects the minds of the sleepers, or their minds 'are moved of themselves, or there be any other cause, 'why, in our sleep, we seem to see, hear, or do, any thing; 'the same might be effected in those that are awake: 'and if the gods did this for our sakes, when we are 'asleep, they would do the same, when we are awake, 'especially since Chrysippus, refuting the Academics, says, 'that our waking ideas are much more clear and certain 'than our sleeping. It were therefore more worthy of the 'divine goodness, in consulting our benefit, to give us clearer 'visions, when awake, than more obscure in sleep: 'which not being done, dreams are not to be considered 'as divine. Besides, where is the use of the round-'about way of consulting interpreters of dreams, rather 'than the direct? For if GOD considered our good 'he would say, Do this, avoid doing that: and would 'present such a vision rather to our waking, than our 'sleeping thoughts.' Why do they communicate their predictions to people of weak minds, rather than to those of stronger heads? It is easily answered, that those, who are awake, are not proper to be thus advertised; for then they consider themselves as the cause of every thing that presents itself to their imagination, and clearly distinguish between what they imagine, and what they see. But when they are asleep, they do not distinguish between their imaginations and sensations; all the objects, which they imagine, appear to them to be present, and they cannot retain exactly the coherence of their images (13): and so they cannot persuade themselves that they have not connected them together themselves; from whence they conclude that some of them proceed from other causes, and were inspired by some spirit, that would advertise them of something. Can it be denied, that an engine is fitter to be played in a certain manner, when some of it's parts are at rest, than when they are not? Let us say the same of our brain. It is more easy to direct in it certain motions for exciting presaging imaginations, when the eyes, and other external senses, are locked up, than when they are in action. Do we know how far the effects of sickness or madness may assist the authors of dreams? can we doubt, but that

(9) According to the Theology of St Augustin, which includes, as F. Thomasin teaches, the antient tradition of all men, nothing is done in the world but by angels or by demons, or by the sentiments, which God imprints on the minds of men. Arnaud, against the System of Malebranche. Tom. i, pag. 191.

(10) There are some dreams that are meer rebus's, like that, which Brantome speaks of, which foretold to Margaret of Austria, who was to be married to Charles VIII, that Anne of Bretagne should take from her the crown of France. She dreamed, that, as she was walking in a garden, an ass came to her, and took away a nosegay, which she held in her hand.

(11) Viz. the human body, and the human soul.

(12) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. ii. cap. lxi.

(13) See the article LOTICHIUS (PETER), remark [G].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that the laws of motion, according to which our organs are moved, and which are only to a certain degree ſubject to the deſires of created ſpirits, trouble and confound the images, which the author of a dream would render more diſtinct? Cicero ſeems to triumph, upon pretence that theſe images are obſcure and intricate. 'Jam vero quid opus eſt circuitione, '& amfractu, ut ſit utendum interpretibus ſomniorum 'potius, quam directo (14)? . . . . Venit in contentionem, ſit probabilius, deoſne immortales, rerum 'omnium præſtantia excellentes, concurſare omnium 'mortalium, qui ubique ſunt, non modò lectos, verum etiam grabatos, & cùm ſtertentes aliquos viderint, objicere his quædam tortuoſa, & obſcura, 'quæ illi exterriti ſomnio ad conjectorem manè deferant: an natura fieri, ut mobiliter animus agitatus, quod vigilans viderit, dormiens videre videatur '(15). - - - - - Beſides, where is the uſe of ſuch a round about way, of conſulting interpreters of dreams, rather than the direct? . . . . It is diſputed, whether it be more probable, that the immortal gods, who excel in all perfection, run up and down, and ſurround, not only the beds, but the very couches, of all men, every where, and, when they find any aſleep, preſent to their imaginations ſome intricate and obſcure ideas, which terrified by the viſion, they are to carry in the morning to an interpreter; or that it happens by a natural effect, that the mind, being put into motion, ſeems to ſee in ſleep, what it really ſaw when awake.' But to this it may be anſwered, that every creature is limited and imperfect: there may therefore be variations, and even ſome oddities, according to our way of judging, in the effects, which are directed by the deſires of a created ſpirit. This may ſerve us as an anſwer to ſome objections, which the free-thinkers alledge to thoſe, who talk to them about the exiſtence of magic. In fine, I ſay, that the knowledge of things future is not ſo great as is imagined, in ſuppoſing that there are dreams of divination. For if we duly examine the common relations and popular tradition, moſt of theſe dreams inform us only of ſuch things as happen in other countries, or ſuch as are quickly to come to paſs. A man dreams of the death of a friend or a relation, and it is found, ſay they, that this friend or relation died fifty leagues off at the time of this dream. To reveal ſuch a thing as this, does not imply the knowledge of things to come. Others dream of I know not what, that threatens them with ſome misfortune, as with death, if you pleaſe. The genius, who is the author of this dream, may know the plots and devices, which are framing againſt them; it may ſee, in the ſtate of the blood, a near diſpoſition to an apoplexy, a pleuriſy, or ſome other mortal diſeaſe. But this is not to know things future, which are called contingent. But ſome may ſay, there are private perſons, who have dreamed that they ſhould reign, and they did not reign till twenty or thirty years after. I anſwer, that their genius being of a very high order, active and wiſe, had a mind to raiſe them to a throne; he was reſolved to lay hold of every opportunity, and did not doubt of ſucceſs (16); and from theſe conjectures, which were almoſt certain, he imparted the dream. Men would do as much proportionably to their ability.

I do not produce theſe things as proofs, or ſtrong reaſons, but only as anſwers to the difficulties, which are propoſed againſt the common opinion: and it muſt alſo be conſidered, that I confine my ſelf within the bounds of natural light; for I ſuppoſe the diſputants would not make uſe of the authority of Scripture. I deſire alſo that it may be obſerved, that thoſe, who maintain there are dreams of divination, need only weaken the objections of their adverſaries; for they have an infinite number of facts to alledge for their opinion; as have thoſe alſo, who maintain that there is ſuch a thing as magic. And this being ſo, it is ſufficient for them, that they can anſwer objections; but it belongs to thoſe, who deny theſe facts, to prove that they are impoſſible, and without this they will never gain the cauſe. I ought alſo to put the reader in mind that I do not pretend to excuſe the antient Pagans, either as to the care they took to relate ſo many dreams in their Hiſtories, or as to the proceedings that were conſequent upon certain dreams. Sometimes they had no other foundation for appointing certain ceremonies, or for condemning the accuſed (17). 'Quum ex æde Herculis patera aurea gravis ſurrepta 'eſſet, in ſomniis vidit (Sophocles) ipſum deum dicen-

(14) Cicero, ubi ſuprà.

(15) Id. ib. cap. xxv.

(16) See the remark [D], in the article CALNIES.

(17) See Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i, fol. m. 311. A.

'tem, qui id feciſſet. Quod ſemel ille, iterumque neglexit, ubi idem ſæpius, aſcendit in Ariopagum: 'detulit rem. Ariopagitæ comprehendi jubent eum, 'qui à Sophocle erat nominatus. Is, quæſtione adhibita, confeſſus eſt, pateramque retulit. Quo facto, 'fanum illud Indicis Herculis nominatum eſt (18). - - - A large golden goblet being ſtolen out of the temple of Hercules, Sophocles, in a dream, ſaw the GOD himſelf telling him who had done it. He diſregarded the viſion once, and twice; but it being repeated, he went to the court of Ariopagus, and gave information of the matter. The Ariopagites ordered the perſon, whom Sophocles had named, to be arreſted. Upon examination by torture, he confeſſed the fact, and reſtored the goblet. From thence that temple received the name of Hercules the diſcoverer. One may juſtly laugh at the weakneſs of Auguſtus (19), and much more at the law which enjoined all private perſons in certain countries, who had dreamed any thing concerning the Republic, do declare it openly, either by a public advertiſement, or by a cryer (20); and, excepting ſome particular dreams, we may ſay of all the reſt what we read in Petronius (21). 'Hinc ſcies Epicurum hominem eſſe 'divinum, qui ejuſmodi ludibria facetiſſimâ ratione condemnat.

Somnia, quæ mentes ludunt volitantibus umbris,
Non delubra Deum, nec ab æthere numina mittunt;
Sed ſibi quiſque facit. Nam cum proſtrata ſopore
Urget membra quies, & mens ſine pondere ludit:
Quidquid luce fecit, tenebris agit. Oppida bello
Qui quatit, & flammis miſerandas ſævit in urbes, &c.

'Hence you may know, that Epicurus was a God-like Philoſopher, who very juſtly and pleaſantly condemns theſe idle notions.

Dreams, which delude the mind with fleeting ſhades,
Come not from temples, or the gods above:
Each his own viſions makes; for, ſtretch'd in ſleep,
When ſlumber looſens the material chains,
The active mind in airy viſions ſports,
And acts, in dreams, the buſineſs of the day.
The ſoldier dreams of war, and cities fired, &c.

(18) Id. ib. cap. xxv.

(19) Somnia neque ſua neque aliena de ſe negligebat. - - - He neglected neither his own dreams, nor thoſe of others concerning him. Sueton, in Auguſt. cap. xci.

(20) See Caſaubon upon Suetonius, in Aug. cap. xci. who cites Artemidorus, lib. i, cap. ii.

(21) Petronius, pag. 178. Edit. Roterod. 1693.

And I continue in the ſame opinion, which I have declared elſewhere (22), that there is no employment more frivolous and ridiculous, than that of the Onirocritics. Our Junius Majus deſerved a ſeverer cenſure than that paſſed upon him by Martin del Rio. If we would compare, with what happens to us, an infinite number of images, that ariſe in our minds, when, being awake, we abandon our ſelves to all objects that offer themſelves, we might find in them as much relation to our adventures, as in any dreams, which we look upon as preſages. And I do not value the reaſon which appears ſo ſtrong to many people. But ſay they, we not only ſee in a dream the objects, but we hear them tell us ſuch things, as we never heard when we were awake, and conſequently of which we could have no traces in our brain. We ſometimes believe that we ſee, in a dream, a new book, which we have never heard of before, and we read the title, preface and a hundred other things in it. This reaſon is of no force. Do we not all this, while we are awake? Do we not repreſent to our ſelves ſuch and ſuch perſons, who tell us a hundred things, which we our ſelves frame? Cannot we imagine, if we pleaſe, that ſuch a one has juſt now publiſhed ſuch a book, which contains ſuch and ſuch things? And ſo this pretended great reaſon is of no weight: but I believe, at the ſame time, that we cannot doubt of certain dreams, which are mentioned by authors, neither can we explain them by natural cauſes, I mean without acknowledging an inſpiration, or a revelation. See Valerius Maximus (23), and the letters of Grotius (24). As to the objections of Cicero, which are indeed very ſtrong, and almoſt unanſwerable, they are of no ſtrength, but upon the ſuppoſition, that GOD himſelf is the immediate author of our dreams. It was the ſuppoſition of the Stoics, whence it comes to paſs, that Cotta ſpeaks thus: 'Quomodo iidem dicitis non omnia Deos perſe-'qui, iidem vultis à Diis immortalibus hominibus diſ-'partiri ac dividi ſomnia (25)? - - - - How comes it that you ſay, the gods do not perform all things, and at the ſame

(22) In the article ARTEMIDORUS, remarks [B] and [C].

(23) Valer. Maximus, lib. i, cap. vii.

(24) Grotius, Epiſt. cccv. Part. ii.

(25) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. iii. ſub fin.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

same time affirm, that all dreams proceed from them? Primum igitur, says he (26), intelligendum eſt, nullam vim eſſe divinam effectricem ſomniorum. Atque illud quidem perſpicuum eſt, nulla viſa ſomniorum proficiſci à numine deorum. Noſtra enim cauſa dii id facerent, ut providere futura poſſemus. Quotus igitur eſt quiſque, qui ſomniis pareat? qui intelligat? qui meminerit? quàm multi verò, qui contemnant; eamque ſuperſtitionem imbecilli animi, atque anilis putent? Quid eſt igitur, cur his hominibus conſulens deus, ſomniis moneat eos, qui illa non modo cura, ſed ne memoria quidem digna ducant? nec enim ignorare deus poteſt, qua mente quiſque ſit: nec fruſtrà, ac ſine cauſa quid facere, dignum deo eſt: quod abhorret etiam ab hominis conſtantia. Ita ſi pleraque ſomnia aut ignorantur, aut negligun- tur; aut neſcit hoc deus, aut fruſtrà ſomniorum ſignificatione utitur. Sed horum neutrum in deum cadit. Nihil igitur à deo ſomniis ſignificari fatendum eſt. - - - - - In the firſt place, we are to underſtand that dreams cannot be cauſed by any divine power. And this is very evident, that no viſions of dreams proceed from the gods. For, the gods would do it for our ſakes, that we might foreſee future events. But how few obey dreams, how few underſtand them, or remember them? And how many are there, who deſpiſe them, and think them the ſuperſtition of a weak and doating mind? Why then ſhould GOD, conſulting the good of theſe men, admoniſh by dreams ſuch as think them not only unworthy of their regard, but even of their remembrance? Nor can GOD be ignorant of the diſpoſition of each man's mind; and it is unworthy of GOD to do any thing in vain, and without reaſon; which is abhorrent even from human conſtancy. Therefore, if moſt dreams are either forgotten, or neglected; either GOD knows not this, or he ſends dreams to no purpoſe. But neither of theſe can be true of GOD. We muſt therefore acknowledge, that nothing is ſignified to us in dreams from GOD.' This is his firſt reaſon. We have already ſeen the ſecond (27). Here follows the third (28). ' Jam verò quis dicere audeat, vera omnia eſſe ſomnia? ' Aliquot ſomnia vera, inquit Ennius, ſed omnia non eſt neceſſe. Quæ eſt tandem iſta diſtinctio? quæ vera, quæ falſa habet? & ſi vera à deo mittuntur, falſa unde naſcuntur? nam ſi ea quoque divina, quid inconſtantius deo? quid inſcitius autem eſt, quàm mentes mortalium falſis, & mendacibus viſis concitare? ſin vera viſa divina ſunt: falſa autem, & inania, humana: quæ eſt iſta deſignandi licentia, ut hoc deus, hoc natura fecerit potiùs, quàm aut omnia deus, quod negatis, aut omnia natura? - - - And now, who will venture to ſay, that all dreams are true? Some dreams Ennius tells us, muſt neceſſarily be true, but not all. What diſtinction is this? And how ſhall we know which are true, which are falſe? And if the true are ſent by GOD, whence proceed the falſe? For if they likewiſe are Divine, can any thing be more inconſtant than the deity? And what can be more ignorant, than to ſtir up the minds of men by falſe and lying viſions? But, if true dreams are Divine, and the falſe and empty, human, what liberty is this of diſtinguiſhing, and ſaying, that GOD does this, and nature that, rather than that all is done by GOD alone, which you deny, or by nature alone?' He propoſes a fourth, founded upon the obſcurity of dreams, which has been already conſidered (29); but let us conſider it a little better. There is no one, ſays he, who has ſufficient capacity to expound dreams aright; if therefore the gods ſpeak to us in this way, it will be as if the Carthaginians ſhould harangue the ſenate of Rome in their own language, and bring no interpreter with them, ' Vide igitur, ne etiam ſi divinationem tibi eſſe conceſſero, quod nunquam faciam, neminem tamen divinum reperire poſſimus. Qualis autem iſta mens eſt deorum ſi neque ea nobis ſignificant in ſomniis, quæ ipſi per nos intelligamus: neque ea, quorum interpretes habere poſſimus? ſimiles enim ſunt dii, ſi ea nobis objiciunt, quorum nec ſcientiam, neque explanatorem habeamus, tanquam ſi Pœni, aut Hiſpani in ſenatu noſtro loquerentur ſine interprete. Jam verò quò pertinent obſcuritates, & ænigmata ſomniorum? intelligi enim à nobis dii velle debebant ea, quæ noſtra cauſa nos monerent (30). - - - - But ſuppoſing I ſhould grant you, that there is ſuch a thing as divination, which I never will, perhaps even this may not lead us to a Divine Being. For what kind of mind is that of the gods, if they neither ſignify thoſe things to us in dreams, which we may of our ſelves underſtand; nor theſe, of which we can find interpreters? for if the gods throw ſuch things before us, as we have neither knowledge, nor interpreter of, it is the ſame thing as if the Carthaginians, or Spaniards, ſhould ſpeak in our ſenate without an interpreter. Beſides, to what purpoſe ſerves the obſcure and ænigmatical nature of dreams? for the gods ought to deſire that we ſhould underſtand thoſe things, which they admoniſh us of for our own ſakes.'

(26) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. ii, cap. lx.

(27) Citat. (12).

(28) Cicero, ibid. cap. lxi, lxii.

(29) In citation (14) above.

(30) Cicero, ibid. cap. lxiv.

MAKOWSKI (JOHN), in Latin Maccovius, a Poliſh gentleman, and profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, was born at Lobzenic in the year 1588. He began his ſtudies ſomewhat late, but he repaired this backwardneſs by his great application, and natural ſharpneſs of wit. He ſtudied Latin, and his courſe of Philoſophy, at Dantzic, under the famous Keckerman; and he improved himſelf ſo conſiderably, that he glorioufly excelled his ſchool-fellows, and particularly in diſputation; and, when he returned to his father's houſe, he was made governor to ſome young gentlemen (a). He travelled with them, and upon all occaſions improved his talent of diſputing as well againſt the Jeſuits, as the Socinians [A]. He ſaw the moſt flouriſhing academies of Germany, thoſe of Prague, Heidelberg, Marpurg, Leipſic, Wittemberg, and Jena; after which he came to Franeker, where he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, March the eighth 1614. He gave ſuch great proofs of his wit and learning, that the curators of the univerſity reſolved to detain him, and for that end they made him profeſſor extraordinary of Divinity, April the firſt 1615, and profeſſor in ordinary the next year. He diſcharged the office for almoſt thirty years, that is, till his death, which happened towards the end of the month of June, 1644 (b). He married three wives, whoſe families may be ſeen, if any one deſires it, in the funeral oration, which furniſhed me with this article. Cocceius, his colleague, who ſpoke it, informs us, that Maccovius maintained, with great zeal, and even with too much heat, the good cauſe againſt the Arminians, which was to him a ſource of vexations [B]: They are the common conſequences of this kind of temper.

(a) Their name was Sieninſki.

(b) The Diarium Biographicum of the Sieur Witte, places it on the twenty fourth of July; which cannot be, ſince the funeral oration was ſpoken the ſecond of July. Maccovius was dead eight days before; die Lunæ ante octiduum, ſays Cocceius, in the funeral oration of Maccovius.

[A] Upon all occaſions, he improved his talent of diſputing.] At Prague he attacked the Jeſuits in one diſpute; at Lublin he entred the liſts with the Socinians; and, during his ſtay at Heidelberg, he went to Spire, on purpoſe to diſpute with the Jeſuits, in the room of of Bartholomew Coppenius, whom they had challenged, and who could never obtain leave of the elector Palatine to appear there (1).

[B] His great zeal . . . . againſt the Arminians . . . was to him a ſource of vexations.] Cocceius (2), having ſaid, that Maccovius was not a dog, that could not bark during the troubles of a church, but that he fought valiantly for the truth of grace, adds, that theſe ſort of wars generally producing ill ſuſpicions, enmities and diſcords, thro' human infirmity; we muſt not think it ſtrange, that the infirmity of the fleſh made Maccovius drink deep of this bitter cup, Hot ſpirits, adds he, have this fault, that altho' they defend a good cauſe, they appear ſometimes to be tranſported with paſſion. It happens to them as to good dogs (3) (ſuffer me ſo far to extend a compariſon borrowed from ſcripture) who, while they keep their maſter's houſe, bark againſt all ſtrangers, tho' they may be the greateſt friends of the houſe. Thus the defenders of the truth, whom the prophet Iſaiah commands

(1) Taken from Coccejus, Orat. Funeb. Maccovii.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Concerning this compariſon, ſee, above, remark [D] of the article St BERNARD, and remark [L] of the article CASTELLAN.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

temper. He had ſome trouble in the ſynod of Dort [C]. We ſhall ſee below the titles of the greateſt part of his printed works [D]. I paſs over thoſe, which were found among commands (4) to bark aloud, (as being the great dogs, that keep the flock) while they are employed againſt the enemy, and think of nothing but fighting, are often ſo careleſs, that they very indecently uſe harſh and bitter words againſt the innocent. After this he makes uſe of the compariſon of mariners, who in a violent ſtorm, murmur and complain againſt one another, tho' the general aim of them all is to ſave the veſſel. This was ſufficient to declare what was the fate of Maccovius. He had raſhly laid about him both againſt the heterodox, and orthodox, and at laſt, in his turn, was attacked by them both. Theſe are the fruits of diſputing: ſtout dogs fancy they every where ſee the wolf, as often as they meet with any one that does not agree with them in all their hypotheſes; and if they find a brother, who departs from them, they leave the common enemy, and ruſh upon that fellow-labourer, as upon a traytor (5). They tell them their own; hinc illæ lacrymæ! Conſider theſe words of one of the Fathers of the ſynod of Dort. 'Qui revera primo quoque auditu videbantur, 'exceptis uno aut altero, non fuiſſe tanti momenti, ut 'homo doctus de illis coram Synodo accuſaretur: com- 'plurimi ipſorum erant ex iſta receptiſſima diſtinctione 'agentis phyſicæ & moraliter ab accuſatore male intel- 'lecta (6). - - - Which indeed, at the very firſt hear- 'ing, one or two of them excepted, ſeemed not to have 'been of ſo great importance, as that a learned man ſhould 'be accuſed before the ſynod upon their accounts: moſt of 'them were of that vulgar diſtinction of a phyſical and 'moral agent, which the accuſer did not well under- 'ſtand.

[C] He had ſome trouble in the ſynod of Dort.] They read, in the hundred and thirty eighth ſeſſion, the petition, which he preſented to the aſſembly; he complained of being accuſed of Hereſy before the ſtates of Frieſland, by his colleague Sibrandus Lubbertus, and he moſt humbly prayed the ſynod, that they would determine this difference, or permit the accuſer and himſelf to chuſe commiſſioners in this aſſembly, who ſhould inform themſelves of the matter of fact, and give an account of it to the aſſembly. Lubbertus, being queſtioned about this matter, denied that he had accuſed him, and declared that he had only been the mouth of the Claſs of Franeker, who were the true accuſers of Maccovius, and therefore he would not acknowledge himſelf a party in this ſuit. It was ordered, that the acts ſhould be read, which were brought from Frieſland, relating to this affair. They were read in the hundred and fortieth ſeſſion, and there were found in them fifty errors, of which Maccovius was accuſed, and which appeared all of them to be of ſmall importance, and were founded upon the bad ſenſe, which the accuſer put upon the words of the accuſed (7). Two apologies of Maccovius were read, and ſome deputies, who were foreigners, ſaid, that the fifty heads of accuſation might have been reduced to four, and that the crime of Hereſy, imputed to Maccovius, did not appear. Quidam ex Exteris Theologis dicebant, potuiſſe illos quinquaginta errores, ad quinque vel etiam quatuor reduci; nec ullum crimen hæreſeos, ſicut objectum fuerat, in illis deprehendi (8). When Lubbertus gave his opinion, he broke out into a great heat againſt one of the members of the aſſembly, and produced a new liſt of the errors of Maccovius. He was anſwered, that they had heard from perſons worthy of credit, that though he would not be a party, yet it was he who had extracted, from the theſes and lectures of Maccovius, the propoſitions that were pretended to be erroneous. He was very angry, and ſwore twice, that this was not true. Quod ut audiebat D. Sibrandus, vehementiſſime commotus, bis Deum vindicem in animam ſuam precabatur ſi iſthæc vera eſſent; adeo ut D. Præſes eum ſæpius modeſtiæ ſanctæ, & reverentiæ Synodo debitæ juſſerit meminiſſe (9). In the hundred and forty ſecond ſeſſion, it was thought proper not to read before the ſynod the third apology of Maccovius, becauſe it contained ſeveral perſonal matters againſt Lubbertus. It was read only in a particular committee, of which Sculletus (10) would be one, though he was very unfit to be a judge, ſince the Divines of Heidelberg had already declared, that they condemned the accuſed party. Certe Exteri mirabantur D. Sculletum nominatum fuiſſe à Provincialibus; & multo magis, D. Sculletum id munus velle ſubire, cum facultas Theologica Heidelbergenſis, cujus ipſe pars eſſet, theſes illas, quæ examinandæ ſunt, jam hactenus tanquam otioſas, metaphyſicas, & falſas damnaverit (11). The judgment of the commiſſioners was, that Maccovius had been falſely accuſed, and that he was neither guilty of Paganiſm, nor Judaiſm, nor Pelagianiſm, nor Socinianiſm, nor of any other Hereſy; but that he ought not to have made uſe of obſcure and ambiguous phraſes, borrowed from the ſchoolmen, nor have denied certain propoſitions. They may be ſeen in the Latin, which I ſhall here ſet down. By this means it will appear, that he was a Supralapſarian, and that he expreſſed himſelf harſhly as to certain doctrines, in which he ſhould have ſtudied to pleaſe nice ears. 'Legitur judicium deputatorum à Synodo 'in cauſa Maccoviana: cujus ſumma hæc erat; D. 'Maccovium nullius Gentiliſmi, Judaiſmi, Pelagia- 'niſmi, Socinianiſmi, aut alterius cujuſcunque hære- 'ſeos reum teneri, immeritoque illum fuiſſe accuſa- 'tum; peccaſſe eum, quod quibuſdam ambiguis, & 'obſcuris phraſibus ſcholaſticis uſus ſit; quod ſcho- 'laſticum docendi modum conetur in Belgicis Acade- 'miis introducere; quod eas ſelegerit quæſtiones diſ- 'ceptandas, quibus gravantur Eccleſiæ Belgicæ: Mo- 'nendum eſſe eum, ut cum Spiritu Sancto loquatur, 'non cum Bellarmino aut Suarezio: hoc vitio ver- 'tendum ipſi, quod diſtinctionem ſufficientiæ & effi- 'cientiæ mortis Chriſti aſſeruerit eſſe futilem; quod 'negaverit humanum genus lapſum eſſe objectum præ- 'deſtinationis; quod dixerit Deum velle, & decernere 'peccata; quod dixerit Deum nullo modo velle om- 'nium hominum ſalutem; quod dixerit duas eſſe ele- 'ctiones. Judicant denique, liticulam hanc inter D. 'Sibrandum, & D. Maccovium componendam eſſe, '& deinceps neminem debere eum talium criminum 'inſimulare (12). - - - - The judgment of the deputies in 'Makowſki's caſe was read; which amounted to this, 'that Makowſki was neither guilty of Paganiſm, Ju- 'daiſm, Pelagianiſm, Socinianiſm, nor any other kind 'of Hereſy, and that he was unjuſtly accuſed: that he 'had offended in making uſe of certain ambiguous and 'obſcure phraſes of the ſchools; in endeavouring to in- 'troduce the ſcholaſtic method of teaching in the uni- 'verſities of Holland; in ſelecting thoſe queſtions to be 'controverted, with which the churches of Holland are 'burthened: that he be admoniſhed to ſpeak according to 'the Holy Spirit, not according to Bellarmin or Suarez: 'that he was to blame in aſſerting that the diſtinction of 'the ſufficiency and efficiency of the death of CHRIST 'was idle; in denying that fallen man was the object 'of Predeſtination; in ſaying that GOD wills and de- 'crees ſin; in ſaying that GOD by no means wills the 'ſalvation of all men; and in ſaying that there are 'two elections. They are of opinion laſtly, that this little 'broil between Sibrand and Makowſki be made up, and 'that no one thenceforward ought to bring ſuch kind of 'accuſations againſt him.' The ſynod approved the judgment of the commiſſioners (13); and this was the iſſue of that ſuit. There was a deputy of Frieſland, who deſired they would proceed againſt the accuſers, and offered to prove by authentic writings, that Lubbertus had orders to be his accuſer. This motion occaſioned ſuch a tumult in the ſynod, that the political deputies were forced to knock with a hammer, to command ſilence. Communi collegarum nomine coram Synodo proteſtari, ſalvo jure ut agant contra accuſatores; partes autem accuſatorias domino Sibrando eſſe demandatas, conſtare ex literis quibuſdam publicis, quas è ſinu deprompſit, ac coram Synodo legi poſtulavit: increbreſcenti hac in expoſtulatione plurium fervori, ac multiloquio, modum imponunt Delegati politici malleo ſuo, quo mos eſt ſilentium obſtrepentibus imperare (14).

[D] Here is the titles of . . . . his printed works.] I have taken them out of the Diarium Biographicum of the Sieur Witte, where theſe words are to be found (15): Reliquit Collegia Theologica: Locos Communes: Diſtinctiones & Regulas Theol. ac Philoſophicas: Opuſcula Philoſophica: Πρῶτον ψεῦδος Anabaptiſtarum: Πρῶτον ψεῦδος ſive oſtenſionem primi Falſi Arminianorum: Prælectiones pro Perkinſo contra Arminium: Diſceptationes de Triuno vero Deo, &c. Note, that the greateſt part of theſe books are poſthumous, and were publiſhed by the care of a Polander (16), who was miniſter of a little town of Frieſland, and afterwards profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker. He promiſed to publiſh ſeveral others, as

(4) Chap. lvi.

(5) That it might appear, that I do not enlarge upon the thoughts of Cocceius, I would have placed them here in Latin, but I could not find upon the funeral oration.

(6) G. Balcanquallus apud Epiſt. Eccleſ. & Theolog. pag. 573. col. 1, Edit. in fol. 1684.

(7) Id. ib.

(8) Id. ib.

(9) Ib. col. ii.

(10) Deputy of the palatinate, and profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelberg.

(11) Balcanq. ubi ſupra, pag. 573. col. ii.

(12) Ibi pag. 574, col. ii.

(13) Legitur, & per plura Synodi ſuffragia approbatur, ſententia deputatorum in cauſa Maccoviana, qui eum ab omni hæreſi abſolvendum cenſuerunt; ſed monendum, ut Theologiam docendi modum commodiorem ſequatur, verborumque formis ex ſacra Scriptura petitis utatur; etiam juſtam eum reprehenſionem incurrere ob quaſdam propoſitiones ab ipſo crudius & rigidas aſſertas. Ibid. pag. 576, col. i.

(14) Ibid.

(15) Ad 24. Jul. 1644.

(16) Called Nicolas ARNOLDUS, of whom I have given an article.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

among his papers, and were never publiſhed. He has been accuſed of Plagiariſm [E].

as may be ſeen in his preface to the Loci-communes of Maccovius. He cauſed them to be re-printed with many corrections and additions taken out of the author's MSS. His epiſtle dedicatory is dated in 1649. The edition, which I make uſe of, is of the year 1658.

[E] He was accuſed of plagiariſm.] He, who made this diſcovery, propoſed it modeſtly, and did not forget to praiſe Maccovius; theſe are his words: 'Imo 'ne abſolvi quidem crimine hoc plane poteſt inter 'Theologos noſtros vir alioqui ſubtiliſſimus, Joannes 'Maccovius. Quod ſi enim inſpicere non detrectes 'Exercitationes ipſius Remonſtrantium hypotheſibus ab- 'hinc annos aliquot oppoſitas, docebunt te oculi tui, 'eximiam earum partem non tantum quoad † materiam, ſed quoad ipſa etiam verba, è Belgico Latine 'verſa, è ‡ Clar. Molinæi Anatome Arminianiſmi com- 'pilatam eſſe. Quod in Doctore, extemporanei acumi- 'nis honore alias celebratiſſimo, miratus ſemper 'fui (17). - - - Even our great Divine John Makowſki 'ſtands convicted of this crime: for if you will take the 'pains to look into his* Exercitations, oppoſed a few years 'ago to the hypotheſes of the Remonſtrants, your eyes will 'inform you, that a conſiderable part of them, not only 'as to the matter, but as to the very words, tranſlated 'out of Dutch into Latin, is compiled from Molinæus's 'Anatomy of Arminianiſm. I have always wondered at 'this in a Doctor, otherwiſe famous for the readineſs of 'his genius.'

† Maccov. Colleg. Theolog. Diſp. iv, & xi.

‡ Molin. Anatom. Arminianiſmi, cap. v, & xxiv.

(17) Saldenus, de libris, pag. 156.

MALDONAT (JOHN), a prieſt of Burgos in Caſtile, flouriſhed about the year 1550. He wrote good Latin, and publiſhed a piece, to recommend the ſtudy of polite learning, Paræneſin ad litteras politiores. His Abridgment of the Lives of the Saints was printed ſeveral times (a). We ſhall ſee below whether he had reaſon to boaſt ſo much of his correction of the Breviary [A].

(a) Taken from Andrew Schottus, Bibl. Hiſp. pag. 350, 351.

[A] We ſhall ſee . . . . whether he had reaſon to boaſt ſo much of his correction of the Breviary.] I find what follows in a book of Mr Thiers, publiſhed in 1699, under the title of a Diſſertation concerning the place where at preſent lies the body of St Firmin third biſhop of Amiens. '(1) John Fonſeca, biſhop of Burgos, the 'capital city of the antient Caſtile, deſigning to pub- 'liſh a new edition of the Breviary of his dioceſe, 'appointed three learned men, Carrera, Lara, and 'John Maldonat, to manage it. This John Maldo- 'nat, ... who muſt not be confounded with the 'famous John Maldonat the Jeſuit, took upon him 'to compoſe, and put into Latin, the lives of the 'ſaints, which were to ſerve for leſſons in that Bre- 'viary. He underſtood Latin very well, and ac- 'quitted himſelf ſo well (as he imagined) of this com- 'miſſion, that he boaſted of his Breviary, as the moſt 'exact, the moſt correct, and finiſhed work that ever 'was.' Theſe boaſts are contained in an epiſtle, which he printed at the end of this Breviary, and of theſe lives of the ſaints, of the Lyons edition, 1561. . . . . It is addreſſed to his two colleagues Carrera and Lara (2). Mr Thiers gives it at length, and then adds theſe words (3): 'Any one, who has read this epiſtle, 'would believe, that the leſſons containing the lives 'of the ſaints of the Breviary of Burgos are entirely 'free from faults: and yet that epiſtle is nothing but 'a Spaniſh rhodomontade, and in thoſe leſſons there 'are many ſilly things, which are to be found in 'the antient Legends.'

(1) Pag. 18. of the diſſertation of Mr Thiers.

(2) Ib. pag. 19.

(3) Ib. pag. 21.

MALDONAT (JOHN) a Spaniſh Jeſuit [A] was born in 1534. He ſtudied at Salamanca, and taught Philoſophy, Divinity, and the Greek tongue there, before he devoted himſelf to the ſociety of the Jeſuits in the ſame city. He did not there take the habit of the order, but at Rome in 1562. He was ſent to Paris the next year, to teach Philoſophy there, in the college, which the Jeſuits had lately obtained. He afterwards taught Divinity there [B] with very great ſucceſs; for what is related of the multitude of his auditors, is wonderful [C]. He was ſent to Poictiers with nine other Jeſuits, in 1570. There he read Latin lectures, and preached in French; but, not finding a good ſettlement there, he returned to Paris, after he had maintained ſome diſputations againſt thoſe of the reformed religion. He made a ſhort journey to Lorrain; and as he paſſed through [A] A Spaniſh Jeſuit.] The place of his birth is called Las Caſas de la Reina. It is ſituated near Larena, in the province of Eſtramadura, and belongs to the great maſter of the knights of St James. Maldonat atteſts all theſe things in a writing ſigned with his own hand, which is kept at Rome in the archives of the Jeſuits (1). Therefore George Cardoſus (2), Thuanus (3), and Mr Thiers (4), are miſtaken, when they make him a Portugueſe. Alegambe was not perfectly acquainted with this, for he calls Maldonat's country Fuente del Maeſtro in ditione Zafrenſi (5). Nicolas Antonio (6) calls it by the ſame name. Mr Moreri has perverted this name into Fruente deli Maeſtro.

(1) Taken from Nathan. Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Societ. pag. 473.

(2) In Agiologio ad diem 6. Jan. apud Sotuel. ibid. pag. 475.

(3) Thuanus, lib. liii, pag. 1088.

(4) Thiers, Diſſertat. ſur ſaint Firmin, p. 18.

(5) Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, p. 255.

(6) In Bibliotheca Script. Hiſp. Tom. i, pag. 558.

[B] He afterwards taught Divinity there.] I do not mean, that he taught it full ten years, though Southwell affirms it (7); for I find ſome little difficulty in this matter. This author ſays, that Maldonat firſt taught Philoſophy at Paris, whither he had been ſent in 1563, and that he went to Poictiers about 1570, and that afterwards he made a journey into Lorrain. He ſpeaks no more of his lectures of Divinity: where then ſhall we find theſe ten years? Southwell ſhould have ſaid, that, after his journey to Lorrain, Maldonat began again to be a profeſſor in the college of Paris. Maldonat was at firſt reader of Philoſophy, and began to teach it in the year 1564 (8). He ſpent two or three years in this: for at that time a courſe of Philoſophy could not be finiſhed ſooner. He afterwards taught Divinity, and finiſhed a courſe of it in four years. Tradidit ille primum totam Theologiam compendio annis quatuor (9). We are come now to the time, when he was ſent to Poictiers. Now, ſince a miniſter (10), who had changed his religion during the maſſacre of Paris, accompanied him in his journey to Lorrain, we cannot place this journey before the month of September 1572. It is very probable, that being returned to Paris, he began to execute his deſign of dictating a courſe of Divinity larger than the former; for if he had began to execute it after his return from Poictiers, would he have been taken from this exerciſe, and ſent into Lorrain? This larger courſe was interrupted by a proceſs of Hereſy, and of a teſtamentary cheat, which was entered againſt him. Iterum eandem uberius tradere aggreſſus, cum jam procul eſſet progreſſus, alieniſſimo ſane tempore, ab hoſtibus variis calumniis appetitus eſt (11). Now this ſuit was determined in 1575, and Maldonat, notwithſtanding his abſolution, quitted Paris. I know not therefore where we ſhall find thoſe ten years of his teaching Theology, which are mentioned by the two Bibliographers of the Jeſuits. I have inſiſted the longer on theſe trifles, to ſhew, that a clear and exact narrative is a work more difficult than is commonly thought. Does not Alegambe, who is accounted very exact, throw us here into confuſion? Can there be any thing more obſcure and intricate than his account? They, who write books like his, oughtt o know what I have criticiſed here.

(7) Totos decem annos Theologiam profeſſus eſt. Sotuel, Bibliotb. Scriptor. Societat. pag. 474.

(8) Richeome, Apologetical Complaint, pag. 33.

(9) Sotuel, ubi ſupra.

(10) Du Roſier. See Thuanus, lib. liii. pag. 1088.

(11) Sotuel, ibid.

[C] What is related of the multitude of his auditors is wonderful.] The Bibliographers of the ſociety ſay, that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

through Sedan, he disputed there with more than twenty ministers [D]. He was brought into trouble at Paris; for he was not only accused of Heresy, but also of having stolen an inheritance [E], by seducing the president St André to leave his estate to the Jesuits. Peter de Gondi, bishop of Paris, acquitted him of Heresy [F], and the parliament declared that people, lest they should not find a place, went to the school two or three hours before he mounted the chair, and that he was often obliged to read his lectures in a court, and in the streets, because the benches were not sufficient for all those who came to hear him. They add, that there were also some ministers of the Reformed religion present at his lectures. Ne ipsi quidem Calviniſtæ, & Calviniſtarum Miniſtri ipſius prælectionibus abſtinerent. Duabus quotidie, tribuſve horis ante ſubſellia certatim implebant, quam ludum ille ingrederetur, ne excluderentur. Sæpe in aperto, atque adeo in viis publicis docere coactus eſt ob multitudinem Auditorum, quos nullæ extedræ capiebant (12).

(12) Alegambe, pag. 255. Sotuel, pag. 574.

[D] He disputed at Sedan with more than twenty ministers.] Genebrard, an author whose testimony is to be suspected, says, that Maldonat overcame them all, and that two of them were converted. 'De quo 'certamine Genebrardus ſic ait; Joannes Maldonatus 'Capellum, Holinum, Loqueum, & xx alios Miniſtros 'Calviniſtas, primum diſſerendo, deinde declamitando 'proſtravit: nam in declamationes diſputationem commutandam Miniſtri cenſuerant, quod ejus vim Syllogiſticam non poſſent depellere. Additque Launeum & Hericum Penneterium Miniſtros, qui aderant, fuiſſe converſos (13). - - - - Of which dispute Genebrard thus 'speaks: John Maldonat vanquished Capellus, Holinus, Loqueus, and twenty other Calvinist ministers, 'first by disputation, and then by declamations: for 'the ministers were for his turning his disputation 'into declamations, because they could not guard 'against the force of his syllogisms. And he adds, 'that the Ministers Launoi and Henry Pennetier, who 'were there, were converted.' It is certain, that Matthew de Launoi, and Henry Pennetier, changed their religion; but this was not a consequence of that dispute with Maldonat. They became Papists in 1577, and immediately published a book of controversy (14), which they dedicated to the French king. There they mention Maldonat, but do not say, that he had disputed with the ministers of Sedan, or that his reasons had opened their eyes. They inform us (15), that du Rosier, a minister, who had changed his religion, accompanied Maldonat, and left him at Metz, to go into Germany, because the ministers of Sedan persuaded him, that, if he returned to Paris with this Jesuit, he would be put to death, and that Maldonat had given some intimation of it, by saying, that he was still a Heretic. They do not say in what year this was done; but it may be affirmed, that it was three or four years before their abjuration; for as I have already observed, it was after the massacre at Paris, that Maldonat and du Rosier were sent to Metz. It was believed at the court of France (16), that du Rosier, having changed his religion, and contributed very much to the abjuration of the king of Navarre, the princess Catherine, the prince of Condé, and the wife and mother-in-law of this prince, would be a fit instrument to make converts at Metz, and therefore he was sent thither with Maldonat. The duke of Mompensier desired them to go to Sedan, that they might undeceive the duchess of Bouillon, his daughter, who was a very good Huguenot (17).

(13) Id. ib.

(14) See the title of it in remark [D] of the article LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE).

(15) Felix 139.

(16) Thuanus, lib. liii, pag. 1088, ad ann. 1572. See also Theod. Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. xvi, pag. 475.

(17) Thuan. ibid.

[E] He was not only accused of Heresy, but also of having stolen an inheritance.] Let us quote Alegambe. 'Alieniſſimo ſane tempore, ab hoſtibus variis calumniis appetitus eſt: nam & Præſidem Montibrunenſem St Andreæ moribundum circumveniſſe, & poſteros ejus fortunis evertiſſe, illi perſuadendo ut ſua omnia Societati legaret, dicebatur, ſeductor ſimul & prædo nuncupatus; & a nonnullis Lutetiæ zelo præpoſtero, hæreſis eſt accerſitus; verum ab hac eum injuriâ vindicavit Summi Pontificis Gregorii XIII, auctoritate Petrus Gondius Pariſienſis Antiſtes: ab illa vero publico Senatus conſulto liberatus eſt. Veram quamvis ſic ejus innocentia publice ſatis teſtata foret, ſatius tamen fore putavit, ſi paucorum æmulationi, præſertim ingraveſcente ætate viribuſque labefactatis, cederet, lucemque illam hominum fugeret (18). - - - - - His enemies took a very improper time to attack him with calumnies: for it was said, 'that he had imposed upon president St André, as he lay 'upon his death-bed, by persuading him to leave all his 'effects to the society, and he was called both a seducer 'and a thief: Nay, some preposterous zealots of Paris 'accused him of Heresy. But Peter de Gondi, arch-'bishop of Paris, by authority of Pope Gregory XIII, 'vindicated him from this injurious charge; and he was 'acquitted of the other by a public sentence of the par-'liament. Yet, though his innocence was thus publickly 'enough attested, he chose, especially as he was in the 'decline of life, to give way to the jealousy of a few, 'and to retire from the world.'

(18) Alegambe, and Sotuel, ubi supra.

Antony Arnauld, pleading against the Jesuits, in 1594, supposes, that Maldonat was really guilty of seducing the president St André, and that the parliament of Paris had not acquitted him. 'Nothing 'comes out, says he (19), every thing goes in, whether people die intestate, or make their wills, which 'they extort every day, representing on one side the 'terrors of Hell to those who are near death, and 'on the other, proposing Paradise open to those, who 'give to the society of Jesus; as Maldonat did to the 'president Montbrun St André, drawing from him 'his goods and purchases, by a confession full of avarice and imposture; upon which Mr Pibrac appealed 'to the parliament in a full audience.' I know not what the Jesuit Richeome answered as to this article; for I have not the apology he published under the name of Francis de la Montagne (§ a) against the plea of Antony Arnauld.

(19) Arnauld, Plea against the Jesuits, pag. 37.

[(§ a) Des Montagnes is the name, which the Jesuit Richeome takes in his book of The Truth defended, &c. See the notes on the Confession of Sanci, edition of 1699, pag. 415. REM. CRIT.]

[F] Peter de Gondi . . . . acquitted him of Heresy.] The Bibliographers of the Jesuits do not say of what Heresy he was accused: but here follows some particulars, which Mr Simon affords me. It was very difficult for a man of his merit, and who professed to speak his mind freely, without regarding the prejudices of others, to please every body. Some false zealots accused him of having taught Heresies. Their accusations proceeded so far, that they were carried to Rome, and Pope Gregory XIII sent them back to the bishop of Paris, to be examined upon the spot. His accusation was, that, contrary to the sentiment of the faculty of Divinity at Paris, he had taught, that it was not a point of faith, that the Holy Virgin was conceived without original sin. The doctors pursued this affair with so much heat, that Maldonat, who had done so good service to religion and the State, was forced to appear before the bishops tribunal, who acquitted him. His brethren thought it convenient to print the sentence of his absolution before his commentary, in the manner it had been published: yet it is to be found only in the first editions, viz. in that of Pont a Mousson, which appeared in 1596, and in the others till 1615, at which time the Jesuits revised that Commentary in an edition of Lyons; and I find, that, afterwards, this reformed edition was generally followed, from which the sentence of absolution was taken away, which I shall here set down entire, as I have read it in the edition of Pont a Mousson (20). Mr Simon having set down the whole sentence (21), adds, that tho' it was very favourable, Maldonat thought it better to lay aside his Divinity lectures, than to give occasion to his enemies to excite new troubles against him. He retired to Bourges to study quietly there in the college of his society (22).

(20) Simon's Critical History of the Commentators on the New Testament, cap. xlii, pag. 620.

(21) It is dated January 17, 1575.

(22) Father Simon, ubi supra, pag. 621.

Let us set down here some extracts from the registers of the faculty of Divinity at Paris. John Maldonat read lectures upon the master of the sentences in the college of Clermont in 1574, and disputed earnestly concerning the immaculate conception of the Holy Virgin against the faculty of Divinity, which made their members swear, that they would believe this conception as an article of faith. The rector of the university of Paris called together the four faculties, and they resolved unanimously to complain of this Jesuit to Peter de Gondi bishop of Paris. The faculty of Divinity being assembled, all the doctors, except eight or nine, declared expressly, that they held it as an article

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

clared him innocent of the other crime. But this did not hinder Maldonat from resolving to hide himself in the college of Bourges, that he might apply himself entirely to his commentaries upon the scripture. He had a dream, which the event confirmed [G]. Being gone to Rome, by order of the Pope, to take care of the edition of the Greek Bible, he finished there his commentary upon the Gospels, and presented it to the general Aquaviva, December 21, 1582. A little while after, he fell sick, exactly according to his dream, and was found dead in his bed, on the eve of the Epiphany, 1583. There is, no doubt, but his too earnest application to study shortened his days. He wrote many books [H], which shew, that he had a great capacity (a). Thuanus gives him article of faith, that the Holy Virgin was conceived without original sin. Hence it came to pass, that the bishop of Paris published a censure against the rector, and the principal members of the university; but, seeing that his proceeding raised great tumults, he changed his method, and thundered out an excommunication against the dean, and the syndic of the faculty of Divinity, the four faculties appealed from this, as a grievance, to the parliament, who disapproved the conduct of the bishop. This you will find in Latin in a book of Mr Joli (23): you will find there likewise (24) what follows. 'Five months and a day after the sentence of the bishop of Paris, by which Maldonat was discharged from the accusation of Heresy brought against him concerning the conception; and after that the rector, and the principal members, the dean, and the syndic of the faculty, were excommunicated, for acting contrary to the decree of the council of Trent afore-related: all the faculties, on the eighteenth of June 1575, declared, that the bishop of Paris had no power to excommunicate either the rector, or the principal members of the university, and condemned the words of Maldonat as heretical. Here follow the words taken out of the registers of the nation of France. Rursus XVIII ejusdem mensis Junii eædem Facultates fuerunt convocatæ super anathemate Episcopi Parisiensis, qui quoniam Dominus Tissart Rector proposuerat omnibus Facultatibus dictos articulos Maldonati cum & cæteri Accademiæ . . . percussit, declaratum est & conclusum Episcopum Parisiensem non posse ferire anathemate neque Rectorem, neque cæteros Academiæ proceres, eademque Congregatione fuit condemnata opinio Maldonati tanquam Hæretica.' They, who know the present state of the controversy concerning the immaculate conception, will doubtless wonder that a Jesuit was persecuted by the Sorbonnne upon such an occasion.

(a) Taken from Nathanael Southwell, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societat. pag. 473, & seq.

(23) Intituled, Prescriptions concerning the conception of our lady, and printed in 1676. See pag. 19, & seq. and pag. 89, & seq.

(24) At pag. 95, and 96.

[G] He had a dream, which the event confirmed.] He thought he saw a man, who exhorted him to go on vigorously with his commentary, and assured him he should finish it, but should not long survive the conclusion of it. When he had said this, he pointed to a certain part of his belly, which was the very same place, where Maldonat felt the sharp pains, of which he died. 'Cum autem instituisset primum in quatuor Evangelia Commentarios scribere, per aliquot noctes visus est sibi videre quendam; qui ut strenue cœptum opus prosequeretur, exhortabatur, fore enim ut illud ex sententia perficeret: sed operi parum diu superviçturum; atque hæc cum diceret, intento digito certam aliquam ventris partem illi signabat. Hoc visum quanquam pro somni ludibrio habitum, comprobavit eventus; nam à Gregorio XIII, Pontifice Maximo è Gallia in urbem accersitus, ut operam suam præstaret ad editionem Græcam LXX Interpretum, quam parabat, non diu Romæ superstes fuit. Ibi lucubrationem illam suam absolvit, & Claudio Aquavivæ recens in Præpositum generalem electo ad diem xxi Decembris, anno MDLXXXII obtulit; ac secundum id, acerrimus eum dolor incessit eâ corporis parte, quæ tanto jam prius illi fuerat per nocturnam signata visionem (25). - - - - - Having first resolved to write a commentary on the four Gospels, a certain person appeared to him for some nights, who exhorted him to go on vigorously with the work he had undertaken, for that he would finish it to his wish, but not long survive his work: and when he had said this, he pointed with his finger to a certain part of his belly. This vision, though looked upon as the delusion of a dream, was confirmed by the event. For, being sent for, by Pope Gregory XIII, from France to Rome, to assist in publishing an edition of the Septuagint, which that Pope was preparing, he soon after died there. It was there he finished his lucubration, and presented it, the twenty first of December 1582, to Claudius Aquaviva just then elected general: and, according to his dream, he was seized with acute pains in that very part of his body, which had been pointed out to him in his sleep.' It is very probable, that this was known from Maldonat himself, and that he did not intend to deceive those to whom he related it. And it is by no means probable, that chance was the cause of the great conformity between the dream of this Jesuit, and the event. Such facts as this, of which the world is full, confound unbelievers more than they are willing to own.

(25) Alegambe, ubi supra, pag. 256.

[H] He wrote many books.] He published nothing himself; all that came out was printed after his death. The first of his works, that was published, is his commentary upon the four Gospels. Mr Simon has commended it much, as appears from his own words, which are both critical and historical (26). 'Of all the commentators, that we have mentioned hitherto, there are few, who have explained with so great care, and even with so good success, the literal sense of the Gospels, as John Maldonat, a Spanish Jesuit. Dying at Rome before he attained the age of fifty years, Claudius Aquaviva, general of his society, to whom he recommended his commentray upon his death-bed, gave orders to the Jesuits of Pont à Mousson, to cause it to be printed from the copy, which was sent to them. These jesuits tell us in the preface, prefixed to this work, that they have inserted something of their own, and that they were obliged to rectify the MS. copy, which was defective in some places, it not being in their power to consult the original, which was at Rome. Besides, the author having not set down, in the margin of his copy, the books, and places, from which he took a good part of his citations, they supplied this defect. It appears also that Maldonat had not read in the original authors a great many of those places, which he cites, but that he had made use of the labours of former writers, as is commonly done. He is not so exact, as if he had put the last hand to that commentary (27). Notwithstanding those defects, and some others, which may be easily supplied, it appears plainly, that this Jesuit took a great deal of pains in composing this excellent work. He lets no difficulty, pass without examining it thoroughly. When he meets with several literal senses of the same place, he usually chooses the best, without shewing too much regard to the authority of the ancient commentators, nor even to the greater number, because he regarded nothing but truth. He often rejects the interpretation of St Austin, &c.'

(26) Simon, ubi supra, pag. 618.

(27) Thuanus is of the same opinion. Nihil vivens publicavit, says he, lib. lxxviii, pag. 481. post mortem ejus, opera ac cura Clementis Puteani ex eadem sodalitio viri doctissimi, prodierunt eruditissima Commentaria in IV Evangelistas Mussiponti edita, meliora & integriora multorum judicio futura, si superstite auctore edita fuissent.

The commentaries of Maldonat upon Jeremiah, Baruch, Ezekiel, and Daniel, were printed at Lyons in 1609, and at Cologne in 1611. To which they added his exposition upon the 109th Psalm, and a letter about his dispute at Sedan. His treatise, De fide, was printed at Mentz in 1600, and that about angels and demons at Paris, in 1605. As to the Sum of cases of conscience, and the controversies about the seven Sacraments, two books which have appeared under his name, the Bibliographers of the society look upon them as suppositious, as appears by their own words. 'Summa casuum conscientiæ, quæ tanquam hausta è scriptis & doctrina Maldonati, & collecta per Martinum Codognat Minimum prodiit Lugduni apud Hæredes Guelielmi Rovillii MDCIV, Venetiis etiam & alibi, partus suppositicius est, erroribus scatens, Maldonato prorsus indignus, & merito ab Apostolica Sede damnatus. Similiter Disputationum ac Controversiarum decisarum circa VII Ecclesiæ Romanæ Sacramenta, tom. II. Lugduni sine Typographi nomine, nec illius nec ullius de Societate sunt, & suos etiam errores continent (28). - - - - - The Sum of cases of conscience, which, as having been extracted from the writings, and doctrine of Maldonat, and collected

(28) Alegambe, pag. 257. Southwel, pag. 475.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him great commendations [I]. Some Proteſtants have alſo much commended him (b); but they complain of ſome paſſionate expreſſions that have dropt from his pen. Others ſpeak of him with the greateſt contempt [K]. One of his lectures, concerning the exiſtence

(b) See Sir Thomas Pope Blount, Cenſura Autorum, pag. m. 535.

' by Martin Codognat a minim, was publiſhed at Ley-
' den, for the heirs of William Roville, 1604, as alſo
' at Venice and elſewhere, is a ſpurious piece, full
' of errors, altogether unworthy of Maldonat, and de-
' ſervedly condemned by the Apoſtolical See. Alſo the ' Diſputations and Controverſies decided relating to the ſe-
' ven Sacraments of the Romiſh church, printed in two vo-
' lumes at Lyons, without the Printer's name, are neither
' his nor any other Jeſuit's, and are not without faults.'
They ſay nothing of a folio that was printed at Paris by Sebaſtian Cramoiſy, in 1643, with this title, Johannis Maldonati Soc. J. Commentarii in præcipuos ſacræ Scripturæ libros Veteris Teſtamenti. Don Nicolas Antonio makes mention of it (29), and of ſome other MS pieces of the ſame Jeſuit. Some pieces of Maldonat were publiſhed at Paris in 1677, which had never appeared before, viz. his treatiſe of grace, that of original ſin, that of providence and juſtice, that of juſtification and the merit of works; his prefaces, his harangues, and his letters. Theſe new treatiſes do not make three volumes in folio, as Mr Teiſſier affirms (30), but only one. The two others, printed at the ſame time by Pralard, had already been publiſhed. We are put in hopes, that ſome other treatiſes of this Jeſuit, will appear; and it is the more probable, becauſe a great number of perſons tranſcribed what he dictated at Paris (31). I think it was Mr du Bois, doctor of the Sorbonne, who procured the edition of the new treatiſes of Maldonat: he has prefixed a preface to it, which contains the elogy of this Jeſuit (32).

I have read in a book of Mr Joli, a paſſage, which I will now tranſcribe. ' The MS. Letters of Maldo-
' nat, and his book of the Sacraments, were printed
' at Paris about twenty or thirty years ago; but the
' Jeſuits buy up all the copies (33).' Father Simon has proved that this work on the ſacraments is Maldonat's (34). See the fifteenth of his Select Letters: it is full of particulars relating to this learned Jeſuit. See alſo the ſame work of Father Simon, pages 181, 182, 187, 188.

[I] Thuanus commends him very much.] According to him, the merit of Maldonat was the cauſe why the parliament of Paris decreed nothing againſt the Jeſuits, tho' they were ſuſpected by the wiſeſt heads, and the whole univerſity hated them very much. Can any man be better praiſed? Unus in cauſſa exſtitiſſe merito creditur, ut ſodalitium illud toti Academiæ valde inviſum, & alioqui jam prudentioribus ſuſpectum, ob tanti viri gratiam ac commendationem à Senatu apud quem lis adhuc indeciſa pendebat, tamdiu tolleretur; & eouſque dum rebus ſodalium in urbe confirmatis, Maldonatus poſt conciliatam inſigni ſua unius eruditione novo ordini celebritatem, a Gregorio XIII Pontifice Romam evocatus eſt (35). Thuanus had juſt before ſaid, that this Jeſuit joined a ſingular piety and purity of life, and an exquiſite judgment with an exact knowledge of Philoſophy and Divinity. Qui ad exactum philoſophiæ & theologiæ ſtudium ſingularem pietatem, morum candorem & acerrimum judicium cum attuliſſet, magna cum laude & frequenti omnium Ordinum concurſu totos X annos Lutetiæ Pariſiorum, ubi & tum pueri audiviimus, in Claromontana ſchola profeſſus eſt (36). He did not know the true age of Maldonat; for he ſuppoſes him to have lived more than fifty ſix years, when indeed he did not arrive to fifty. You will wonder the leſs at this miſtake, when you know, that Richeome has made Maldonat younger than he was, at a time when the intereſt of his cauſe required, that he ſhould rather have added more years to his Life, than have taken any from it. It was objected to the Jeſuits, that they appointed young men to teach the lower claſſes (37). Richeome anſwers (38), John Maldonat began to read Philoſophy, when he was twenty ſeven years of age, in 1564. It is a miſtake: he ſhould have ſaid, when he was thirty years old, and by that ſome will ſay, the anſwer would have been better. It ſeems ſo at firſt; but when we conſider the matter more cloſely, this miſtake of Richeome appears to be advantageous to his cauſe; for his deſign was to prove, that a man, tho' he be young, may nevertheleſs be qualified to teach well. Maldonat, whoſe lectures were admired, is an example of this. Now the younger you make him, the more weight you give to that example. Thus Richeome was not miſtaken to his prejudice.

I have ſaid elſewhere (39), that it is difficult to abridge a book well; I will add here, that it is difficult to make pertinent additions to it. An addition, perhaps, requires that twenty places be corrected. Patience alone does not always fit a man to make theſe emendations: he muſt be ſenſible of the moſt imperceptible connexions, and remember them a long time, and whenever it is neceſſary. An author, who enlarges his own work, has not always theſe qualifications; but commonly he ſucceeds better in the corrections, which the additions require, than one, who adds to the work of another. This fault is to be excuſed in him, when the addition is far diſtant from the place which is to be corrected. This is not Southwell's caſe, with reſpect to the following cenſure; for his addition precedes but a few lines the words of Alegambe, which wanted correction. Alegambe ſays, that Maldonat died, in the beginning of his fiftieth year, the fifth of January, 1583 (40). If he could not ſay it without telling an untruth, at leaſt he could ſay it without refuting himſelf, ſince he takes no notice of the year of his birth. Southwell, his continuator, has inſerted ſome additions in the article of Maldonat; one among the reſt, which informs us, that this Jeſuit was born in the year 1534. From hence it appears, that the words of Alegambe, which I have related, muſt be falſe, and yet Southwell has changed nothing in them; he has related them, and conſequently he is guilty either of a contradiction, or of a falſe calculation.

That it is a difficult taſk to make additions to a book.

[K] Some Proteſtants .... complain of the paſſionate expreſſions, that have dropped from his pen. Others ſpeak of him with the greateſt contempt.] I will cite Caſaubon (41). ' Quum ubique virulentus hic ſcriptor
' in magnos viros pro ſua modeſtia, pari petulantia
' & impudentia debacchetur; nuſquam tamen male-
' dicæ linguæ ſuæ laxiores habenas indulſit, quam
' in hac diſputatione: hæreticos tertio quoque verbo
' nominans illos, qui eandem cum Auguſtino & aliis
' ſententiam tuentes PETRAM exponunt de
' Chriſto: cujus Majeſtatem defendere, hodie eſt
' hærefin committere .... (42). Omnium accuratiſ-
' ſime (quod equidem ſciam) ejuſmodi argumenta
' congeſſit in hunc locum Maldonatus, acris &
' magni ingenii vir; ſi affectibus, ſi linguæ, ſi odio
' veritatis, potuiſſet moderari. - - - - This virulent
' writer, who every where, with impudence and ſcur-
' rility, falls foul upon great men, has no where given a
' greater looſe to his ſlanderous tongue, than in this diſ-
' putation; calling thoſe, every third word, by the name
' of Heretics, who, with St Auguſtin, and others, ex-
' plain the word PETRA (ROCK) of CHRIST;
' to defend whoſe majeſty at preſent is to be guilty of
' Hereſy .... Maldonat has (as far as I can judge)
' very accurately collected the arguments of all writers
' on this paſſage; and is a man of great abilities, if
' he could but moderate his paſſion, bridle his tongue,
' and reſtrain his hatred of truth.' This judgment is at once both obliging and offenſive; but Scaliger does not obſerve this temperament: he ſays nothing but what is ill of this Jeſuit. If he allows him to have publiſhed ſome good things, yet he robs him of all the glory of them, becauſe he acccuſes him of having ſtolen them. ' Maldonatus in Evangelia maledicus,
' inſignia tamen quædam habet bona. - - - Maldonatus
' is abuſive in his commentary on the Goſpels; yet he
' has ſome remarkable good things.' Having taken all this from Beza, he ſpeaks ill of him. ' Quando
' aliquid habet boni furatur à Calvino, & ut agnoſcas,
' maledicit ei, ut Euſebius ex Africano conatur furta
' ſua tegere (43). - - - When he has any thing good, he
' ſteals from Calvin, and to convince you of it, he
' ſpeaks ill of him, in like manner as Euſebius endeavours
' to conceal what he has ſtolen from Africanus.' He denoted him by the word Iyon; but he denied it, when he ſaw that ſome took advantage of it. We muſt believe, that he did not remember he had uſed that word, and that he did not apprehend, when he uſed it, there

(39) At the end of remark [C] of the article ACHILLES; and the end of remark [A] of the article ARTAXATA.

(40) Mortuus in lectulo inventus, ætatis vixdum anno 50, ſalutis vero 1583, ineunte, pervigilio Epiphaniarum. Alegambe, p. 236.

(41) Caſaubon. in Baronium, Exercitat. xv, num. xii, pag. m. 347, col. 1.

(42) Id. id. col. ii.

(43) Scaligerana, pag. 148.

(29) Bibl. Script. Hiſp. Tom. 1, pag. 558.

(30) Addition to the Eloges, Tom. 1, pag. 14. Edit. 1696.

(31) Ex ejus ſchola prodierunt viri eruditi quamplurimi, & vix quiſquam poſtea fuit in Gallia qui eum ejus auditor eſſe non poniſſet, quæ in ſchola dictaverit ſibi dictum ſcripta non haberet. Adv. pag. 355. Simil. pag. 474.

(32) Simon, ubi ſupra, pag. 620.

(33) Joli, Preface concerning the conception of our Lady, pag. 19. This book was printed in 1676.

(34) Simon, Select Letters, pag. 134. Edit. of Trevoux, 1700.

(35) Thuanus, Hiſtoriarum, pag. 421.

(36) Id. ib.

(37) Richeome's Apologetical Lampoon, pag. 32.

(38) Ib. pag. 33.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſtence of God, occaſioned a greater outcry than the thing deſerved; and I wonder, Paſquier did not perceive the weakneſs of that objection [L].

there would be any thing diſobliging in the alluſion. However this be, my proofs are theſe (44). ‘ Pag. 313. ‘ Inſultas Scioppio: Proferat fur (inquis) ſcriptum ‘ meum, in quo ulla veſtigia extent, quod Maldonatum ‘ LEONEM vocarim. Proh Deum immortalem! ‘ tune tam impudens es, ut id negare audeas? Cedo ‘ enim, an non hæc tua ſunt verba de Maldonato in ‘ Elencho trihæreſii adverſus Serarium, cap. xi. fol. 89. ‘ Raro verum dicit, niſi in illis, quæ ab aliis accipit, ‘ quibus cum maledicit, putat ſe furta ſua occultare ‘ poſſe. Utinam viveret, non inultas ſycophantias fer- ‘ ret. Sed LEONI non reſpondetur poſt mortem ejus. ‘ I nunc, & Scioppium mendacii poſtula. - - - - Let ‘ the thief (ſay you) produce a work of mine, in ‘ which there are any footſteps of my having called ‘ Maldonat LYON. Good God! are you ſo loſt to ‘ ſhame as to deny it? Pray, tell me; are not theſe ‘ your words concerning Maldonat, in the xith chap. ‘ fol. 89. of the Elench. Trihæreſ. adv. Serrar. He ‘ ſeldom ſpeaks truth but where he borrows of others, ‘ by ſpeaking ill of whom he thinks he ſhall be able ‘ to conceal his thefts. I wiſh he were alive, he ‘ ſhould ſmart for his ſycophancy. But we anſwer ‘ not a LYON after his death. After this, give Sci- ‘ oppius the lye.’ Rivetus has followed the foot-ſteps of Scaliger; he does not allow Maldonat one good quality (45), he makes him a very ill man, and very ignorant, or at leaſt a meer pretender to learning. Pareus, in his commentary upon St Matthew, has cenſured this Jeſuit very often, and very ſharply.

(44) Oporinus Grubinius, in Amphotidibus Schioppianis, pag. 254.

(45) Nos certe merito in eo & veram eruditionem, & fidem, etiam aliquando mentem & ſenſum requirimus. Rivetus, Comment. in Pſalm. ex. Operum, Tom. ii, p. 329.

[L] Paſquier did not perceive the weakneſs of that objection.] Here follows a paſſage of his plea againſt the Jeſuits in 1564. ‘ Within theſe two Months, ‘ your Metaphyſician Maldonat, in one of his le- ‘ ctures, endeavoured to prove a God by natural ‘ reaſons, and, in another, by the ſame reaſons, to ‘ prove, that there is none, he ſays and unſays on ſo ‘ worthy a ſubject. Now I would aſk, in which is ‘ the greateſt impiety and extravagance, in the firſt, ‘ or in the ſecond? Indeed, theſe are the holy my- ‘ ſteries, by which you become famous among the ‘ people; theſe are the good ſeed which you ſow ‘ among us (46).’ There are three faults in this objection: I. It is contrary to candor, to pretend, that one, who firſt gives the proofs of the exiſtence of a God, and after that propoſes the reaſonings and objections of the Atheiſts, intends to overthrow what he has eſtabliſhed. This advocate therefore cannot be excuſed. He reports unfaithfully the ſtate of the caſe; he would perſuade us, that Maldonat did equally intend to prove, that there is a God, and that there is none. But this was by no means the intention of this Jeſuit; for, in both diſcourſes, he intended to prove the exiſtence of a God: in the firſt, by propoſing the ſolid arguments of thoſe who maintain it; in the ſecond, by expoſing the weak arguments of thoſe, who deny it. II. Paſquier trifles childiſhly, when he blames this method of diſputing; for, on all ſubjects, a Philoſopher ſhould examine the objections of his adverſaries, and not weaken them through policy. Thus Maldonat, as a Metaphyſician, did but his duty, when he ſet apart one lecture for examining the arguments of the Atheiſts. III. It is an abſurdity, I will not ſay unworthy of ſo learned a man as Stephen Paſquier, but of any man of common ſenſe, to affirm, that there is as much impiety in proving a God by natural reaſons, as in proving, by the ſame reaſons, that there is none. Whoever conſiders theſe three cenſures of this paſſage of Paſquier, will eaſily believe, without farther proof, that this able advocate had the ſhame to be worſted in this cauſe. Nevertheleſs I will ſhew after what manner he was attacked.

(46) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, livr. iii, c. xliii, pag. m. 337.

‘ Before I ſhew here the ignorance of Paſquier, I ‘ muſt take notice of the occaſion of this calumny. ‘ Maldonat, in the year ſixty four, handled the ‘ queſtion, which is uſeful at all times, and neceſſary ‘ in ours; a queſtion, which the maſter of the ſen- ‘ tences, St Thomas, and all the other doctors of ‘ Divinity, have handled among the queſtions de ‘ Deo, viz. Whether there be a GOD? Which ‘ queſtion is to be decided by natural reaſons, ſuch ‘ as are fit to convince the Atheiſts, who admit no ‘ teſtimonies from Scripture, but only arguments ‘ drawn from nature. The divines, who treat ſolidly ‘ this ſubject, bring arguments pro and con, and con- ‘ firm the truth by ſtrong reaſons, and by the ſame ‘ confute the falſhood and impiety of the Atheiſts, ‘ and their contrary arguments. This Maldonat has ‘ done. Paſquier, neither knowing, nor deſiring to ‘ underſtand the ſenſe of the queſtion, hath founded ‘ a calumny both upon his ignorance and malice. ‘ Now, in this queſtion, there are two contradictory ‘ propoſitions; the one is, there is a GOD; the ‘ other, there is no GOD. Paſquier calls both theſe ‘ propoſitions equally impious in a tranſcendent man- ‘ ner, that is beyond meaſure. And herein he firſt ‘ diſcovers, that he is beyond meaſure ignorant, not ‘ only in religion, but alſo in the firſt principle of ‘ nature: Secondly, that he himſelf is an impious ‘ man (47).’ The advocate of the Jeſuits here ſpoils his cauſe; for he miſtakes the meaning of his adverſary, and ſo confutes a chimerical impiety; for Paſquier's meaning was not, that there is as much impiety in this propoſition, there is a GOD, as in this, there is no GOD. And yet he aſcribes this to him, and ſpends a whole page in refuting it, which I do not ſet down. Paſquier meant, that there is as much impiety in proving by natural reaſons the exiſtence of a God, as in denying it by natural reaſons. His adverſary, attacking him in this manner, which was the only way of doing it, quite overthrows him. ‘ He is no leſs ignorant in the Chriſtian ‘ religion than in nature, to think it an impiety to ‘ prove a God by natural reaſons, as I ſhall ſhew ‘ very plainly. There is no Chriſtian ſo little in- ‘ ſtructed in our faith, but knows, that God ‘ demonſtrates and proves himſelf by his works. ‘ There never was any good Philoſopher, though ‘ a Pagan, who did not naturally know, and ‘ acknowledge a God from the works of God. ‘ The Scripture ſays expreſsly, that the creatures ‘ teſtify there is a God. St Paul purpoſely ſhews ‘ this, when he ſays, writing to the Romans, The ‘ inviſible things of GOD are clearly ſeen, being under ‘ ſtood by the things that are made. And ſpeaking of ‘ the Philoſophers, he ſays, Who knowing GOD, did ‘ did not glorify him as GOD (48).’

(47) The anſwer of Renatus de la Fon, to the plea of Simon Marion, chap. xxxvij, pag. 173, Edit. 1599.

If Paſquier had been wiſe, he had continued ſilent all his life, as to his objection againſt Maldonat; but, tho' he found himſelf weak, and incapable of aſſuming on this occaſion, that triumphant air, which he ſhews in the reſt of his catechiſm, yet he would not hold his peace. He pretended (49) that the Jeſuits, who defended Maldonat, were fallen into the Hereſies condemned by the whole Gallican church, and by Pope Innocent II, namely into the Hereſy of Peter Abelard, who ſaid, that we muſt believe nothing but what may be proved by natural reaſon. This was to make his laſt condition worſe than the firſt; and it will always be the fate of thoſe obſtinate men, who, being fallen into groſs miſtakes, will neither acknowledge them ſincerely, nor hold their peace, but maintain what they have ſaid to be right. It will always be their fate to defend one falſhood by another (50). This is what Paſquier did, and he fared the worſe for it. Read what was replied to him. ‘ He had been charged with having ſaid, when he ‘ ſlandered the lectures of John Maldonat, a divine ‘ of this ſociety, that it was as great an impiety to ‘ prove by natural reaſons that there is a God, as ‘ to prove that there is none; which is groſs igno- ‘ rance and blaſphemy againſt God, who proves ‘ and manifeſts himſelf by all nature. It is alſo con- ‘ trary to the holy Scripture, and againſt all the ‘ creatures in the univerſe, which teſtify that there ‘ is a moſt powerful, moſt good, and moſt wiſe God. ‘ How does he clear himſelf of this crime? By ſaying, ‘ that the Jeſuits teach, by the pen of Renatus de la ‘ Fon, that the Deity is to be proved by natural reaſon, ‘ and that he, who confines himſelf only to faith, is im- ‘ pious. Here is a double forgery for his juſtifica- ‘ tion; for Renatus de la Fon ſays only, as Maldo- ‘ nat, and all divines have ſaid, that we may piouſly ‘ teach, that there is a God, by natural reaſons, ‘ againſt the Atheiſts, which is the Catholic doctrine; ‘ and

(48) Renatus de la Fon, ubi ſupra, pag. 175.

(49) Paſquier's Catechiſm of the Jeſuits, book ii, ch. vii, pag. m. 239, 240.

(50) See the article LUTHER, remark [R], citation (88).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'and not that the Deity is to be proved only by natural 'reaſon, without recurring to faith, which is the 'Hereſy of Abelard, who would believe nothing 'but what is proved by natural reaſon, and who de- 'ſtroyed faith, by which we believe what is above 'reaſon and ſenſe. And thus, inſtead of clearing 'himſelf, he is juſtly charged with two new calum- 'nies (51).'

(51) Richeome, Apologetical Compleat, num. 601, pag. 300, 301.

Paſquier might have defended himſelf ſomewhat better, by ſaying, that, ſince firſt principles are not to be proved, all thoſe, who undertake to prove, there is a GOD, do hereby confeſs, that they do not rank among firſt principles this propoſition, there is a GOD: but it is impious not to reckon it among firſt principles. But this anſwer, tho' ſomewhat better than the other, would nevertheleſs have been a very bad one; for it would have accuſed of impiety the moſt holy, and moſt famous authors, and even the cuſtom of all ages, authorized by the ſtate and the church. I ſhould never have done, if I ſhould undertake to name all the authors, who have proved by natural reaſons, that there is a GOD. I ſay, pious authors, and ſuch as are no leſs exemplary for their virtue than learning. And every one knows, that, in all the ſchools in Chriſtendom, where Philoſophy is taught, there is always a metaphyſical chapter ſet apart for the proofs, which natural reaſon affords us, of the exiſtence of a GOD, and for the refutation of the ſophiſms of the Atheiſts. The greateſt part of the common-places of Divinity, that have been publiſhed, contain ſuch a chapter. It would therefore be ridiculous for any one to pretend, that all thoſe, who prove by natural reaſons, that there is a GOD, are impious, or do not acknowledge, as a principle, this poſition, there is a GOD. We muſt take notice, that all the propoſitions, which are called principles, are not equally evident. There are ſome, which are not to be proved, becauſe they are as clear, or clearer, than any medium that can be uſed to prove them. Such, for inſtance, are theſe propoſitions: The whole is greater than a part; if from two equal quantities you take away equal parts, the remainder will be equal: two and two make four. Theſe axioms have this advantage, that we have not only a clear idea of them in our mind, but they alſo fall under our ſenſes: daily experience confirms them, and ſo the proof of them would be altogether uſeleſs. We cannot ſay the ſame thing as to the propoſitions, which fall not under our ſenſes, or which may be oppoſed by other maxims; they want to be diſcuſſed and proved. We muſt ſecure them from objections. It cannot be denied, that this theſis, there is a GOD, is one of this number: it does not fall directly under our ſenſes; it has been denied in all ages by men of letters, and who made profeſſion of reaſoning, and we ſhall ſee hereafter (52), that it is denied to this day by ſome flouriſhing ſects. It is not therefore ſuperfluous to undertake the proof of it; nay, it is very uſeful and neceſſary to produce it, tho' we could not make vulgar minds ſenſible of it, as we make them ſenſible of the properties of numbers. This is what a famous miniſter pretends (53).

(52) Cite. (55), in a paſſage of Mr ARNAULD.

(53) This truth, That there is a God, may be demonſtrated, I believe, but not by a demonſtration that is ſuitable to a vulgar mind, in like manner as every one may be convinced, though of the meaneſt capacity, that ſix is the half of twelve. Jurieu of Nature and Grace, pag. 248.

But ſome perhaps may ſay, is it not a ſcandalous thing to propoſe it as a problem in a metaphyſical lecture, whether there be a GOD or no? I have heard of a German prince, who was about to ſuppreſs an univerſity that he had founded, becauſe he was informed, this queſtion was diſputed in it. Probably ſome body alarmed him in the ſame manner that ſome perſons attempted to prejudice the parliament of Paris againſt Maldonat. We ſhall add a few words about this difficulty. It is certain, that, according to the rules or method of diſputing, we muſt reduce this great and important truth into a queſtion, as ſoon as we undertake to prove by Philoſophical reaſons, that there is a GOD; for the natural and juſt end of this undertaking, is to convince thoſe of falſhood, who deny this theſis. Now, according to the rules of diſputing, it may and ought to be required of them, that they ſhould lay aſide their prejudices, and that they ſhould not employ their peculiar principles againſt the reaſons, which ſhall be oppoſed to them; for, if they did it, they would fall into the Sophiſm, which the ſchools call petitio principii, which is an enormous fault, and ought to be baniſhed from all controverſies, as an eſſential obſtacle to the deſign of diſcovering the truth. They have the like right of requiring the ſame thing; ſince, in all diſputes, that are well regulated, the combatants ſhould be equally armed. Thus, for a certain time, that is, while each party is alledging his reaſons, both thoſe who deny, and thoſe who affirm, ought to lay aſide their theſis, and neither affirm nor deny it. It will be then a queſtion; it will be a matter of enquiry; to proceed impartially in which, we muſt not ſuffer our pre-conceived opinions to add any weight to the arguments that favour them, nor to weaken the contrary reaſons. We muſt examine every thing, as if we were a tabula raſa. It is not neceſſary actually to doubt, and much leſs to affirm, that all we have believed is falſe: it is ſufficient to keep it in a kind of ſuſpence; that is, not to ſuffer our perſuaſion to byaſs us, in the judgment we are to paſs upon the proofs of the exiſtence of a GOD, and the difficulties and arguments of the Atheiſts. This is doubtleſs what Des Cartes intended, when he would have his Philoſopher doubt of every thing, before he examines the reaſons of the certainty of it. If any one will not believe me, let him hear at leaſt a miniſter, who, in a diſpute with the Atheiſts, would have us, for a time, renounce the principles, to which they do not agree. 'Ut clare oſtendamus, ſays he (54), 'quæ iſta tanto pere declamata dubitatio eſt, cui tot 'retro annis tantæ lites motæ atque etiamnum mo- 'ventur, rem ipſam paulo altius & ab initio repete- 'mus. Conſtat, ab omni tempore repertus eſſe, qui 'Dei naturam, exiſtentiam, providentiam, & quid- 'quid horum eſt, quibus omnis plane nititur Religio, 'neſcio quibus non ſubtilitatibus aut evertere, aut dubia 'ſaltem reddere non vererentur. . . . Cui tamen malo 'quantum pote obviam eundo, iiſque quos infeciſſet, 'convincendis, haud pauci ſemper viri docti ac egre- 'gii ingenia calamoſque ſuos acuerunt. Quibus certe, 'ii quid proficere volunt, non ex principiis adverſæ 'parti negatis, ſed ab eadem conceſſis neceſſario eſt 'diſputandum; utut illæ alias in ſe ipſæ poſſint eſſe 'certiſſimæ. Quod cum recte perpenderet Carteſius, 'eaque de exiſtentia Dei argumenta proferre ſtuderet, 'ad quæ pertinaciſſimus quiſque Scepticus obmute- 'ſceret, ecquid potuit aliter, quam ut ea omnia de 'quibus iſti dubitant, tantiſper ſeponeret? - - - - - 'That we may ſhew, what that ſo cried up doubting it, 'which ſo many years ago occaſioned diſputes, and ſtill 'occaſions, I will take the matter higher, and give an 'account of it from the very beginning. It is certain, 'there always have been perſons, who were not aſhamed 'to endeavour to overthrow, by I know not what ſubtil- 'ties, or at leaſt to render doubtful, the exiſtence and 'providence of GOD, and every thing on which reli- 'gion is built. . . . To obviate which evil, and refute 'thoſe whom it had infected, ſeveral great and learned 'men have exerciſed their wits and pens; who, if they 'would at all ſucceed, muſt neceſſarily argue, not from 'principles denied by the adverſe party, but from ſuch 'as they allow; however certain they may be otherwiſe 'in themſelves. This Des Cartes being well aware of, 'and ſtudying to produce ſuch arguments for the exiſtence 'of a GOD, as might confound the moſt obſtinate Sceptic, 'could he do otherways than ſet aſide for a time ſuch 'principles as thoſe men doubt of?' He names Diagoras, Epicurus, and the Sceptics: he might have cited whole bodies of the Chineſe, as Mr Arnauld has done, who thus addreſſes himſelf to the Jeſuits. 'The 'moſt able miſſionaries of China, ſome of whom are 'of your ſociety, maintain, that the greateſt part 'of literati there are Atheiſts, and that they are 'idolaters only through diſſimulation and hypocriſy; 'like many of the Pagan Philoſophers, who adored 'the ſame idols with the common people, tho' they 'did not believe in any of them, as may be ſeen in 'Cicero and Seneca. The ſame miſſionaries inform 'us, that theſe literati do not believe any thing to 'be ſpiritual, and that the King above, which your 'Matthew Ricci took for the true GOD, is nothing 'but the material Heaven; and that what they call 'the ſpirits of the earth, rivers, and mountains, are 'nothing but the active virtues of thoſe natural bo- 'dies. Some of your authors ſay, that they fell into 'this Atheiſm ſome ages ago, by having ſuffered the 'great diſcoveries of their Philoſopher Confucius to 'be loſt. But others, who have ſtudied theſe mat- 'ters with greater care, as your Father Longobardi, 'maintain, that this Philoſopher ſaid many fine things 'about morality and politics; but, as to the true 'GOD, and his law, he was as blind as the 'reſt (55).'

A REFLEXION upon the Carteſian doubting.

(54) Abrahami Heidanus, Conſiderat. ad res quaſdam nuper geſtas, pag. 135, 136.

(55) Arnauld, in his fifth denunciation of the Philoſophical Sin, pag. 35. See alſo Father Gobien, in the preface to the Hiſtory of the Edict of the Emperor of China; and, below, remark [A] of the article SOMMONA-CODOM.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We conclude therefore, that our John Maldonat deſerved not the cenſure, which Stephen Paſquier has inſerted in his plea againſt the Jeſuits. No reader can doubt this.

I am ſorry, that Mr de St Evremond, whom I admire and honour as much as any man in the world, holds an opinion contrary to the method uſed by Maldonat, and that I muſt prefer to it that of an anonymous writer, who criticiſed him. 'Let us leave 'Divinity entirely to our ſuperiors, ſays he (56), and 'follow, with reſpect, thoſe who have the care of our 'ſouls. Though it muſt be confeſſed, that our 'teachers are the firſt to deſtroy this deference; and 'that they inſpire us with a ſort of curioſity, that 'leads inſenſibly into error. There is nothing ſo well 'eſtabliſhed among men, but what they ſubject to 'the extravagance of reaſoning. They burn a man, 'who is ſo unhappy as not to believe there is a GOD, 'and yet they make it a queſtion in the public 'ſchools, whether there be one. By this means you 'offend the weak, and give the diſtruſtful room to 'ſuſpect. By this you arm the furious, and allow 'them to ſeek for pernicious reaſons, with which 'they oppoſe their own opinions, and the true im-'preſſions of nature.' Let us ſee the obſervation of his cenſurer (57). When the Divines aſk whether there be a GOD, it is not to doubt of his exiſtence, but to give certain proofs of it, and to confound the Atheiſts, as Phyſic inſtructs us in the knowledge of poiſons, in order to cure thoſe who are infected by them. . . . . (58) He calls all the doctors ſcandalous and imprudent men, and St Thomas himſelf, who, in the beginning of his Summa, Quæſt. II, Art. III, puts the queſtion, whether there be a GOD. Can Mr de S. E. imagine, that any body will take his part againſt ſo many learned Divines, who have treated this queſtion in all the moſt famous univerſities, for ſo many years, in the face of the church? &c.

(56) St Evremond's Judgment on the Sciences, &c. Vol. i, of his works, pag. 50, of the Lond. Edit. 1728.

(57) Diſſertation on St Evremond's Works, pag. 216. Paris Edit. 1698.

(58) Ibid. pag. 308.

MALHERBE (FRANCIS DE) the beſt French Poet of his time, was born at Caen, about the year 1555, and died at Paris in 1628. I ſhall not ſay many things of him. Mr Moreri has ſaid enough for the greateſt part of readers; and thoſe, who deſire more may be eaſily ſatisfied in books, which are every where to be found (a). I know upon what Mr Moreri might ground what he ſaid, That Malherbe expreſſed himſelf with a very ill grace: but Racan affirms the contrary [A]. He informs us of a thing, which confirms what I have ſaid in the article LOTICHIUS (b), viz. That the Poets form to themſelves imaginary miſtreſſes [β], that they may have an opportunity of giving vent

(a) The Life of Malherbe by Racan, printed at Paris, in 1672. The converſations of Balzac. A collection of the fineſt pieces of the French Poets, reprinted in Holland in 1692, Tom. ii, p. 215.

(b) (PETER), remark [F].

[A] I know upon what Mr Moreri might ground what he ſaid, that Malherbe expreſſed himſelf with an ill grace: but Racan affirms the contrary.] Moreri might ground it upon theſe words of Balzac (1): 'What 'you have been told is true; Malherbe was a moſt 'ingenious man in converſation; but he had not a 'graceful elocution, and his way of reciting was very 'diſagreeable. We uſed to call him Anti-Mondori; for 'he ſpoiled his fine verſes in pronouncing them. Be-'ſides, he could not well be heard, on the account of 'an impediment in his tongue, and the lowneſs of his 'voice: he would ſpit at leaſt ſix times in repeating 'a ſtanza of four verſes. And this occaſioned Cava-'lier Marini to ſay of him, that he never knew a 'man more moiſt, nor a Poet more dry.' Racan ſays quite the contrary. 'Such, ſays he (2), were the or-'dinary diſcourſes he had with his moſt familiar 'friends; but they cannot be expreſſed with ſuch a 'grace as he ſpoke them, becauſe they derived their 'greateſt ornament from his geſture, and the tone of 'his voice.'

(1) Balzac, Converſation xxxvii, pag. m. 355.

(2) Racan's Life of Malherbe, pag. 22.

[B] The Poets form to themſelves imaginary miſtreſſes.] This will appear by the following narrative. 'Racan 'and Malherbe one day were diſcourſing of their 'amours; to wit, of the deſign they had of making 'choice of ſome lady of great merit and quality, to 'be the ſubject of their verſes. Malherbe named 'Madam de Rambouillet; and Racan, Madam de 'Termes, who was then a widow, They found, that 'both of them were named Catherine; viz. the firſt, 'whom Malherbe had choſen, Catherine de Vivonne, 'and Racan's choice Catherine de Chabot (3).' They ſpent all the afternoon 'in ſeeking anagrams on this 'name, that might be ſoft enough for verſe, and they 'found but three, Arthenice, Eracinthe and Charin-'tee. The firſt was judged the fineſt; but Racan ha-'ving made uſe of it in his paſtoral, which he made 'immediately after, Malherbe deſpiſed the two others, 'and reſolved to make uſe of Rodante . . . . He was 'then married, and far advanced in years; wherefore 'his amours produced but few verſes, and, among 'the reſt, thoſe which begin thus, Chere beauté, que 'mon ame ravie, &c. - - - - Dear beauty, how my ſoul 'is raviſh'd, &c. and theſe others, which Boiſſet ſet 'to a tune, Ils s'en vont ces Rois de ma vie. - - - - - 'These kings of my life go away. He wrote alſo ſome 'letters under the name of Rodante: But Racan, who 'was thirty four years younger than he, and a ba-'chelor, changed his poetical love into a true and 'lawful one, and took ſome journies into Burgundy 'for that end (4).' Obſerve well the difference they make between a poetical love and a real one. At that age, honeſt Malherbe was fit only to love poetically; and yet, if one had judged of him by his verſes, one would have thought that he had a miſtreſs, who often made him ſigh, and who embraced him very cloſe; though he was ſo chilly, that he numbered his ſtockings with the letters of the alphabet, leſt he ſhould put more upon one leg than upon the other: he confeſſed one day, that he was come as far as the letter L (5). His infirmities were known, and jeſted upon. It was objected to him one day in verſe, that he was in the wrong to make women his idols, ſince he had nothing for them but words (6). Here are other verſes that concern him.

(3) Id. ib. pag. 42, 43.

(4) Id. ib. pag. 43, 44.

(5) Id. ib. p. 17.

(6) See the article LOGES, remark [F].

Avoir quatre chauſſons de laine,
Et trois Caſaquins de futaine,
Cela ſe peut facilement:
Mais de danſer une Bourrée
Sur une Dame bien parée,
Cela ne ſe peut nullement (7).

To wear four woollen ſocks,
And three fuſtian frocks;
He can do it at any hour:
But to dance a Bourrée
O'er a fair lady;
Alas! 'tis beyond his pow'r.

(7) Menage's Obſervations upon the poems of Malherbe, pag. 497.

He was ſenſible of his weakneſs, and complained of it very much. 'I am not buried; but thoſe, who 'are, are not more dead than I am. I have no rea-'ſon, thank GOD, to murmur at the conſtitution na-'ture has given me: it is ſo good, that, at the age 'of ſeventy years, I know not one of thoſe inconve-'niences, to which men are commonly ſubject in old 'age. And if to be well, were nothing elſe but not 'to be ill, I ſee but few perſons, whom I ſhould 'envy. But what? becauſe I not am ill, ſhall I be ſo 'fooliſh as to make myſelf believe, that I am well? 'I know not what others think, but I am not ſo 'eaſily ſatisfied. Indolence is the deſire of thoſe, 'whom the gout, the gravel, the ſtone, or ſome ſuch 'diſtemper, put upon the rack once a month. I de-'ſire, not only to be free from pain, but to enjoy 'pleaſure; not indeed all ſorts of pleaſure; for I do 'not confound gold with copper; but that which 'men reliſh by the incomparable ſweetneſs of con-'verſing with women (8).' He deſcribes afterwards this ſweetneſs, and then he ſays, 'Judge, if, after 'this, there be any misfortune equal to that of not 'being able to have a ſhare in their favours; and I 'am ſure you will hardly condemn me. But I muſt 'no longer continue this diſcourſe, leſt it ſhould bring 'me to deſpair (9).' He ſaid, one day, to the duke de Bellegarde, 'You act the part of a galant, and 'lover of fine ladies; can you pay a bill at ſight? 'This

(8) Malherbe's letter to Balzac, pag. 67, of the collection of new letters, printed at Paris, 1642.

(9) Ib. pag. 65.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google vent to their thoughts. It is very probable, that Malherbe had ſcarce any religion [C]. His

‘ This was his uſual phraſe, to expreſs, whether he ‘ was ſtill ready to ſerve them. The duke anſwered ‘ him, yes. Malherbe replied in theſe words; as I ‘ live, Sir, I had rather reſemble you in this, than in ‘ your being a duke and a peer (10).’ Some caviller perhaps may tell men, that Malherbe reſembled one of the ancients, who would not renounce love, even when age obliged him to renounce enjoyment.

(10) Racan, ibid. pag. 19.

Amare liceat, ſi potiri non licet.
Fruantur alii: non moror, non ſum invidus,
Nam ſeſe excruciat qui beatis invidet:
Quos Venus amavit, facit amoris compotes:
Nobis Cupido velle dat, poſſe abnegat.
. . . . . .
Hæc illi faciant quęis Venus non invidet,
At nobis caſſo ſaltem delectamine
Amare liceat, ſi potiri non licet (11).

(11) Apuleius, in Asclep. sive, ex Menandro, in veterum Poetarum Catalectis ad calcem Petronii, pag. m. 220.

Sure I may love, though I cannot enjoy;
Let others reap the bliſs, I envy not;
For he, who envies, tortures but himſelf.
Whom Venus loves, ſhe for enjoyment forms;
But fruitleſs wiſhes only are my lot.
. . . . . .
This may they do, whom Venus envies not.
Let me at leaſt the empty pleaſure taſte,
To love, though 'tis not giv'n me to enjoy.

I anſwer, that if Malherbe had been ſtill in a condition to have taken a real miſtreſs, he would not have made choice of Madam de Rambouillet, whoſe quality, and much more her virtue, would have left him no manner of hope. Rambouillet-houſe, which is become ſo famous, was truly a palace of honour. There was nothing but galantry there, and no love. Mr de Voiture, giving one day his hand to Mademoiſelle de Rambouillet, who was afterwards Madam de Montauſier, was ſo bold as to kiſs her arm. But Mademoiſelle de Rambouillet ſhewed ſo ſeriouſly, that his boldneſs did not pleaſe her, that he had no inclination after that, to take the ſame liberty another time (12). We conclude from all this, that the miſtreſſes of Poets, I mean their Chloe's, their Phyliis's, &c. for whom they make ſo many love verſes, are not always the objects they love. Theſe are only poetical miſtreſſes, whom they make uſe of, that they may have a fixed ſubject, to which they may apply ſome thoughts.

(12) Menage, pag. 186, 187.

[C] It is very probable, that Malherbe had ſcarce any religion.] When the poor ſaid to him, that they would pray to GOD for him; he anſwered them, that he did not believe they had great intereſt in Heaven, ſince they were left in ſo bad a condition in this world; and that he ſhould like it better if the duke de Luyne, or ſome other favourite, had made him the ſame promiſe (13) . . . In his Primer, he had blotted out all the particular names from the Litanies of the ſaints, ſaying it was ſuperfluous to name them all one after another, and that it was ſufficient to name them in general, Omnes ſancti & ſanctæ Dei, orate pro nobis (14). . . . . He would ſay ſometimes, That the religion of gentlemen was that of their prince (15). During his laſt ſickneſs, he had much a-do to reſolve to confeſs to a prieſt (16); for which he gave this reaſon, That he was not wont to do it but at Eaſter. . . . . He who prevailed with him to reſolve upon this, was Yvrande, a gentleman, who had been bred up a page to the great royal ſtables, and was his ſcholar in Poetry, as well as Racan. To perſuade him to receive the ſacraments, he told him, that having always profeſſed to live like other men, he muſt alſo die like them; and Malherbe having aſked him what he meant by that, he told him, that, when other men died, they confeſſed to a prieſt, communicated, and received the other ſacraments of the church. Malherbe owned he was in the right, and ſent for the vicar of St Germans, who aſſiſted him in his laſt hours (17). Obſerve, that no motive of religion, no inſtinct of conſcience, prevailed with him to confeſs; but he yielded to a reaſon purely human, namley, that we muſt follow the cuſtom of other men, as well at the point of death, as during our life. We ſhall ſee, that at the approach of the fatal moment, which determines our condition for eternity, he ſcarce thought of Heaven or Hell. An hour before his death, after he had been two hours in an agony, he awaked on a ſudden, to reprove his land-lady, who waited upon him, for uſing a word that was not good French; and when his confeſſor reprimanded him for it, he told him, he could not help it, and that he would defend the purity of the French tongue until death (18). I have heard ſay, that this confeſſor having repreſented to him the happineſs of another life, with very little eloquence, and aſked of him, whether he did not feel a great deſire to enjoy quickly that happineſs; Malherbe anſwered him, ſpeak no more of it; your bad ſtile diſguſts me. But I am willing this ſhould be looked upon as a meer ſtory, and even that the truths, which Balzac thought fit to ſuppreſs (19), ſhould be thought to have no relation to the laſt hours of this Poet. Let us only inſiſt upon the facts, that are taken out of his life, written by Racan his good friend: Do they not raiſe a ſtrong preſumption, that his faith and piety were very ſlender. Racan enquired very carefully in what manner he died, becauſe he had heard him ſay, That the religion of gentlemen was that of their prince (20). This is a curioſity, which ſhews, that he was ſuſpected of irreligion, and it is alſo a good ground for theſe ſuſpicions. It is therefore to no purpoſe for Racan to tell us, that his friend was very ſubmiſſive to the commands of the church; that he did not willingly eat meat on the forbidden days without leave, though he was very old; that he went to maſs every holy-day and Sunday, and that he never failed to confeſs, and to communicate at Eaſter at his own pariſh; that he ſpoke always of GOD and holy things with great reſpect, and that one of his friends made him confeſs one day before Racan, that he had once made a vow to go from Aix to the cave of St Magdalen bare-headed, for the diſeaſe of his wife (21). Racan may tell us theſe things as much as he pleaſes; but he can never remove the bad impreſſions, which the other facts have produced; and if he gains any thing, it is only this, that Malherbe had determined nothing, either for or againſt religion, and that, having ſome ſort of religion in his mind, not in his heart, he conformed to the common uſage by way of precaution; as to a thing, which whatever happened, might be ſerviceable, and could do him no hurt. We may believe, that, in time of great affliction, when the ſoul is troubled, and turns itſelf on all ſides, and tries all remedies it can think of, he might have had ſome thoughts, which put him upon making vows; but that this tempeſt was calmed in his heart, after the danger was over. We may add to this, that he had reaſon to fear a real and effectual damage, by not obſerving the commands of an abſolute obligation, ſuch as thoſe of his church are, to communicate once a year, to hear maſs upon holy-days and Sundays. A man of parts, who wants to make his fortune, or deſires to continue in his preſent condition, will never deſpenſe with this kind of precepts; he will ſo behave himſelf, that his neighbours, friends, and domeſtics ſhall not know, that he deſpiſes his church, and even carry the matter ſo far, that he will not, without leave, eat meat on the forbidden days. All the religious actions, that Malherbe performed, were ſo eaſy, and ſo neceſſary to his fortune, and to the reputation of an honeſt man, which he maintained in all other things, that they cannot balance the proofs of irreligion, which the relations of Racan furniſh us with. When I ſaid, that, in all other things, he maintained the reputation of an honeſt man, I had regard to the way of judging, which the corruption of the times has introduced over all the world; for mankind is ſo depraved, that the purſuit of venereal pleaſures by unlawful ways, and criminal galantries, do not hinder a man from being accounted honeſt. If we ſhould judge otherwiſe of things, Malherbe would not paſs for ſuch an one; for he deſcribes himſelf as one beſotted with thoſe kind of pleaſures. He repreſents himſelf as within an ace of deſpair, when he reflects, that old age renders him incapable of enjoying women (22). Finding himſelf in this ſtate of decay, in which nature ſeeks, but cannot find herſelf, quærit ſe natura nec invenit; he groaned and ſighed (23); he ſhed almoſt tears of blood, and wiſhed rather to recover his vigour that way, than to

(13) Racan, Life of Malherbe, p. 15.

(14) Id. ib. pag. 24.

(15) Ib. pag. 45.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Ib. pag. 46.

(18) Ibid.

(19) I cite his words in the remark [D] citation (31).

(20) Racan, ibid. pag. 45, 46.

(21) Ib. pag. 45.

(22) See his letter to Balzac, cited, and referred to, above, remark [B], citat. (8).

(23) Confer what has been ſaid in the article ACHILLES, remark [L].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

His good friend, having no mind that this ſhould be believed, has taken ſuch a method as puts it out of all doubt. In the article of Madam DES LOGES, we have ſet down ſome facts relating to Malherbe. I point out the beſt edition of his poems [D], and I will ſay ſomething of his tranſlations [E]. Mr Baillet (c), to whom I refer my readers, has carefully collected whatever has been ſaid in favour or to the diſadvantage of (c) Jugement des Sçavans, Tom. iii, num. 944, and on the Poets, Tom. iv. num. 1411.

to have the dignity of a duke and peer. In this he differed very much from the opinion of the wiſe Pagans (24), who reckoned that among the advantages of old age, which he accounted a misfortune. How much did he fall ſhort of the virtue of Sophocles, a Poet, as he was, but a Pagan Poet! Being old, he was aſked one day, whether he could ſtill divert himſelf with the fair ſex: GOD forbid, anſwered he, I am delivered out of the hands of ſo furious a maſter, and I eſteem it the greateſt pleaſure in the world. 'Bene Sophocles, 'cum ex eo quidam jam affecto ætate, quæreret, 'utereturne rebus venereis: Dii meliora, inquit. Li'benter vero iſtinc, tanquam à domino agreſti, ac 'furioſo profugi. Cupidis enim rerum talium, odio'ſum, & moleſtum eſt fortaſſe carere. Satiatis vero, '& expletis, jucundius eſt carere, quam frui. Quam'quam non caret is, qui non deſiderat. Ergo hoc 'non deſiderare, dico eſſe jucundius, quam frui (25). '---- For to thoſe, who are eager after ſuch pleaſures, perhaps it is hateful and troubleſome to be without them: but to thoſe, who are ſatiated with them, the want of them is more pleaſing, than the enjoyment. Though he does not want, who does not deſire. Therefore, not to deſire this, I ſay, is more pleaſing than to enjoy it.' Malherbe is accuſed of another moral fault, or rather of two: I mean, vanity, and avarice. He is eaſily convicted of the former, by ſeveral paſſages in his poems (26); but the proofs of the ſecond are of no force. 'Some have thought, ſays Mr Baillet (27), 'that there are, in the poems of Malherbe, ſome marks 'of a meaneſs of ſoul, and of his being too much 'addicted to his intereſt, which ſometimes deprived 'him of the natural ſentiments of humanity. But I 'think, this accuſation has no other foundation, than 'the epitaph of one of his relations, call'd Mr d'Is, 'whoſe heir he was, in which he declared, that he 'wiſh'd to ſee all his kindred buried, that he might 'have the whole eſtate of his family. The verſes of 'Malherbe upon this occaſion are theſe.'

Icy gît Monſieur d'Is,
Plût or à Dieu qu'ils fuſſent dix!
Mes trois ſœurs, mon Pere, & ma Mere,
Le grand Eleaſar mon Frere;
Mes trois Tantes, & Monſieur d'Is:
Vous les nommé-je pas tous dix?

Here lies Monſieur d'En,
I would to God here were ten,
My three ſiſters, my father, and my mother,
The great Eleazar my brother,
My three aunts, and Monſieur d'En,
Don't I name you all the ten?

To judge of this impartially, this ſeems to be, not the diſpoſition of Tiberius (28), but a ſally of wit, and a poetical jeſt, in which the heart has no ſhare. Malherbe was inconſolable for the loſs of his ſon (29); and he loved his wife ſo well, that the affliction of ſeeing her ſick awaked his dormant religion, and engaged him to do a thing, which he was very much aſhamed of afterwards: For he made a vow to go bare-headed to St Baume (the cave, where St Mary Magdalen did penance); but he was not pleaſed to find it was known that he was ſo devout, and he was ſo far from boaſting of it, that he endeavoured, by all means, to keep it a ſecret (30).

[D] The beſt edition of his poems.] It is that, which Menage procured, and improved with many notes. It was printed at Paris in 1666. Mr Menage had been long before at work upon it, as appears by a letter of Balzac, dated January 23, 1651. 'The news 'of a commentary upon the works of Malherbe 'ſurpriſed me; and how comes it to paſs, that our 'excellent friend has given over his deſign of publiſh'ing Diogenes Laërtius, and many other works of 'great importance, which he had promiſed the pub'lic, to amuſe himſelf with explaining a poet ſo plain 'and intelligible as ours is? I knew him, it is true, 'and that very particularly; and I know ſeveral par'ticulars of him, which all others, beſides my ſelf, 'are ignorant of. I have with me, as yet, one who 'ſaw him die, and whom I ſent him, not being able 'my ſelf to go and ſee him, on account of my indiſ'poſition. But what I know, Sir, more than others, 'cannot be decently written; for there are certain 'truths, which are only fit to be ſuppreſs'd (31).' As I promiſed, in the the preceding remark, a part of this paſſage, it is therefore longer than my text requires. Mr Menage himſelf informs us (32), That he was no more than twenty years old, when he firſt had a deſire to comment upon Malherbe; and that, if his friends had not diſſuaded him, he would have begun with that, to make himſelf known to the world. He adds, that before his notes were publiſhed, Mr Chevreau had printed a commentary upon the ſame poems. I do not doubt, continues he, but this commentary contains many very curious things, and very well worth reading: But I have deprived my ſelf of the pleaſure of reading them, leſt I ſhould be accuſed of ſtealing from Mr Chevreau, if I ſhould happen to hit upon the ſame thoughts; or of having a mind to contradict him, if I am not of his opinion. Thoſe who have not this work of Mr Chevreau (of whom I am one), may form an idea of it from theſe words of Mr Baillet (33). 'It were tedious to run 'over all the other faults, which are charged upon 'Malherbe. Thoſe who would be fully inſtructed, 'may conſult a book of remarks, which Mr Chevreau 'has wrote, upon our poet. Mr Roſteau declares, 'that, having communicated theſe remarks, or ra'ther cenſures, to Madam de Scuderi, ſhe gave him 'to underſtand, after ſhe had read them, that ſhe was 'very much ſurprized. This learned and judicious 'lady confeſſed, that there may be ſomething, which 'deſerves reproof in ſome places of Malherbe's po'ems; but ſhe could not have ſeriouſly imagined, that 'this famous poet furniſhed matter for ſo many cor'rections.'

Note, that Mr Chevreau will not allow, that his remarks had not been ſeen by Mr Menage. See his narrative and complaints in a letter, which I quote (34). See alſo, in the ſecond part of his miſcellanies, and of his Chevræana, many fine and ſolid obſervations againſt Malherbe.

[E] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his tranſlations.] He has tranſlated ſome works of Seneca, and ſome books of Livy, and, if he was not ſucceſsful in it, yet he had the happineſs to be well ſatisfied with his labour. 'His principal buſineſs was to criticize upon the 'French language; in which he was ſo well ſkilled, 'that ſome of his friends deſired him one day to make 'a Grammar for our tongue..... He anſwered them, 'That he needed not take that pains, for they might read 'his tranſlation of the xxxiii book of Livy, and he 'would have them write after that manner. But every 'body was not of this opinion. Madam de Gour'nay, a learned lady of that time, uſed to ſay, That 'this book appeared to her like broth of fair water. She 'meant, that the language of it was too plain and 'ſimple, and ſome thought that ſhe was in the 'right (35).' Mr Huet obſerves (36), that the ſtrong deſire Malherbe had to pleaſe courtiers, made him to invert the method of his author; that he neither followed his pointing nor his words, and that he ſtudied only to purify and poliſh our language. Mr Racan confirms this: 'Malherbe, ſays he (37), often ſaid, and chiefly 'when he was reproved for not following the ſenſe of 'the authors, whom he tranſlated or paraphraſed, that 'he would not dreſs meat for cooks; meaning, that 'he did not much regard the praiſes of learned men, 'who underſtood the books he had tranſlated, pro'vided he was praiſed by the courtiers.'

(24) Habeo ſenectuti magnam gratiam, quæ mihi ſermonis aviditatem auxit, potionis & cibi ſuſtulit.... At non eſt voluptatum tanta quaſi titillatio in ſenibus. Credo: ſed ne deſideratio quidem. Nihil autem moleſtum, quod non deſideres. ---- I am greatly obliged to old age, which has increaſed in me the deſire of converſation, and taken away that of eating and drinking... But old men have not ſuch a titillating ſenſe of pleaſures. I believe it: but neither have they the deſire. Now nothing gives us uneaſineſs, which we do not deſire. Cicero de Senectute, cap. xiv, p. m. 421, 423. Illa quanti ſunt, animum tanquam emeritis ſtipendiis libidinis, ambitionis, contentionis, inimicitiarum, cupiditatum omnium, ſecum eſſe, ſecumque (ut dicitur) vivere? --- What a happineſs is it to be free from the dominion of luſt, ambition, ſtrife, enmities, and every paſſion, and to be our own maſters? Idem, ibid. pag. 424.

(25) Id. ib. pag. 423. Plato de Repub. lib. i, Circa init. pag. m. 572, 573, relates this anſwer of Sophocles.

(26) See Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, Part iv, num. 1411. pag. 14, & ſeq. Conſult below, remark [H].

(27) Ib. pag. 17, 18.

(28) Identidem felicem Priamum vocabat, quod ſuperſtes omnium ſuorum exſtitiſſet. ---- The ſame prince uſed to call Priam happy, becauſe he ſurvived his whole family. Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. lxii.

(29) See Balzac, Converſation, xxxvii, pag. m. 356, & ſeq.

(30) I have cited above, theſe words of Racan: One of his friends made him confeſs, &c.

(31) Balzac, Letter fourth to Conrart, lib. ii, p. m. 100, 101.

(32) In the preface to this edition of Malherbe.

(33) Baillet, ubi ſupra, Part iv, num. 1411, pag. 23.

(34) It is in pag. 103, & ſeq. of the firſt part of his Miſcellanies

(35) Sorel, Bibl. Françoiſe, pag. 259, 260. Edit. 1667.

(36) De claris Interpretibus, lib. ii, pag. 186. apud Baillet, Jugem. Tom. ii, n. 944, citat. 2.

(37) Racan, ubi ſupra, pag. 28.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of his works. I do not find, that Malherbe had any great ſhare in the affection of cardinal Richelieu [F].

He was of the number of thoſe authors, whom I have mentioned twice or thrice, who write with extream difficulty [G], and who put their mind upon the rack, in correcting their

[F] I do not find, that he had a great ſhare in the affection of cardinal Richelieu.] It was the misfortune of this great Poet, that his parſimony of wit was known to that cardinal. It was diſcovered, that, inſtead of putting himſelf to any expence in celebrating the glory of that great miniſter, Malherbe had only patched together old ſcraps, which he found among his papers. This was not the way to pleaſe a perſon of ſo delicate a taſte and ſo haughty a ſpirit; and therefore he received this homage from Mr Malherbe very ill. Read theſe words of Mr Menage. 'I 'learned from Mr Racan, that Malherbe wrote thoſe 'two ſtanza's above thirty years, before Richelieu, 'to whom he addreſſed them, was made a cardinal, 'and that he changed only the firſt four verſes of 'the firſt ſtanza, to accommodate them to his ſub- 'ject. I learned alſo from the ſame Racan, that car- 'dinal Richelieu, who knew that theſe verſes had 'not been made for him, did not receive them well, 'when Malherbe preſented them to him, which 'cauſed Malherbe not to proceed (38).'

(38) Menage, Obſervations upon the poems of Malherbe, pag. 545.

[G] He was of the number of thoſe authors, who write with extream difficulty.] He, who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Yigneul-Marville, was not ignorant of this. It was not, ſays he (39), without much watching and labouring hard, that Malherbe produced his divine poems. They might have compared his muſe to certain women, who are ſeven or eight hours in hard labour, before they can bring forth a Child; and, ſince his pains were much longer, and more troubleſome, than thoſe, to which Balzac was expoſed in the like caſe, they muſt have been very terrible. Conſider a little theſe words: (40) 'At laſt it is 'finiſhed; I mean the diſcourſe, which was mentioned 'in my laſt letter, and which is one of the five that 'I have promiſed you. It has wearied me, ſpent 'my ſprits, and made me curſe the buſineſs a dozen 'times. Whatever you may ſay upon this occaſion, 'I am ſtill leſs difficult to be pleaſed, than the good 'man, I have often mentioned to you, who waſted 'half a ream of paper in making and unmaking one 'ſingle ſtanza. If your curioſity deſires to know 'what ſtanza it was, the beginning is as follows.

(39) Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, pag. 223, Edit. de Rouen, 1699.

(40) Balzac, Letter xi, book ii, to Conrart, pag. 113, Dutch Edit.

Comme en cueillant une guirlande,
L'homme eſt d'autant plus travaillé.

'Good God! what pains do we take in ſuch kind of 'trifles! trifles moral and political, in French and 'Latin, in proſe and verſe.' This is what Mr Balzac wrote to Mr Conrart the 25th of June 1651. The good man here mentioned is our Malherbe, as plainly appears from the fifth ſtanza of his ode to the duke of Bellegarde.

Comme en cueillant une guirlande,
L'homme eſt d'autant plus travaillé,
Que le parterre eſt émaillé
D'une diverſité plus grande;
Tant de fleurs de tant de coſtez
Faiſant paroiſtre en leurs beautez
L'artifice de la Nature,
Il tient ſuſpendu ſon deſir
Et ne ſait en cette peinture
Ni que laiſſer, ni que choiſir (41).

(41) Malherbe's poems, book iv, pag. m. 102.

As when a man wou'd from the field
Cull the beſt flowers it's borders yield,
The rich parterre, in ſummer pride,
With thouſand flow'rs diverſify'd,
Whoſe beauties, variouſly gay,
Great nature's artifice diſplay,
Diſtracts his eye; nor can he chuſe
Theſe flow'rs, nor can he thoſe refuſe.

If Mr Menage had known this circumſtance, which Balzac knew, concerning the pains, which that ſtanza coſt the author, he had doubtleſs inſerted it in his notes upon this place of Malherbe. I have elſewhere related (42) what is commonly ſaid of the inconceivable difficulty wherewith Mr Balzac wrote his books. We have already ſeen what he ſays of it himſelf; and here follows another paſſage out of his letters to Mr Conrart. 'Mr Courbé (43) thinks perhaps, that 'I proceed as faſt as Salmaſius, who goes faſter than 'the tranſcribers and Printers. One ſmall letter coſts 'me more pains than a large book does this devourer 'of books. Happy are thoſe writers, who are ſo 'eaſily ſatisfied, who labour only with their memory 'and fingers, who without chuſing, write all that 'they know (44). This ſerves me for a proof; for, ſince Malherbe was yet more difficult to be pleaſed than Balzac, whatever repreſents to us the pains of the latter, increaſes the idea we have of the great pains of the former. What follows is a ſhorter proof, ſince we find in it, that Malherbe ſurpaſſed Balzac in point of trouble. 'Honeſt Malherbe told me often, that, 'after having compoſed a poem of one hundred 'verſes, or a diſcourſe of three ſheets, one ought to 'reſt ten whole years. Mr Courbé is not of that o- 'pinion, neither am I. I do not want to reſt ſo 'long after ſo ſmall a work. But ſhould they expect 'from me that happy facility, which enables Mr 'de Scuderi to produce large volumes, they muſt 'know very little of me, and do me a greater honour 'than I deſerve (45).'

(42) In citat. (38) of the article GUARINI.

(43) He was a Bookſeller at Paris.

(44) Balzac, Letter xii, of the firſt book to Conrart, pag. 50. See what he ſays in Letter xxiv of the ſecond book. O happy writers, Salmaſius in Latin, and Scuderi in French! I admire your eaſe and copiouſneſs! You can write more Calepins, than I can Almanacks.

(45) Balzac, Letter xvi of the ſame book, pag. 58.

There are ſo many things to be collected in relation to this character of wit, that, after the many citations I have already produc'd (46) upon this ſubject, there remains ſtill more to be added. Caſaubon had freed himſelf from the ſlavery, under which theſe authors groan, who write their letters many times over, and do nothing but blot out. He has made an authentic declaration of it. 'Da mihi quæſo, ſays he (47), ut 'ἀυτοφυεῖ καὶ ὡς εἰπεῖν ἀσκεπάρνῳ λόγῳ tecum 'loqui liceat. Polire impenſa cura quæcunque ſcribas, 'præſertim autem epiſtolas, & de ſingulis vocibus ire 'in conſilium, diligentioris eſt hominis atque, ut in- 'genue dicam, πάσαν τὴν ἀληθειαν φιλοπονωτέρᾳ 'quam ego ſum. ----- Allow me to deal freely with 'you. This poliſhing every thing you write, and weighing 'every word, diſcovers more diligence, and a greater re- 'gard for politeneſs than I can pretend to.' The phraſe he makes uſe of to expreſs the ſcruples of a writer, who deliberates upon every word, is borrowed from Seneca the father. 'Illi qui ſcripta ſua torquent, qui 'de ſingulis verbis in conſilium veniunt, neceſſe eſt 'quæ totiens animo ſuo admoverint noviſſime affi- 'gant (48). ----- They who torture what they write, 'and deliberate on every word, muſt at laſt fix upon 'what they have ſo often revolved in their minds.' The exceſſes, committed this way, are very much to be blamed, and are indeed a yoke, which reduces the pen ſometimes to a kind of barrenneſs. Quintilian cenſures them very juſtly, and calls this the being condemned to the unhappy puniſhment of ſlandering one's ſelf. 'Nec enim rurſus eos qui robur aliquod in ſtylo fece- 'rint, ad infœlicem calumniandi ſe pœnam alligandos 'puto. Nam quomodo ſufficere civilibus officiis poſ- 'ſit, qui ſingulis actionum partibus inſeneſcat? Sunt 'autem quibus nihil ſit ſatis: omnia mutare, omnia 'aliter dicere quam occurrit, velint: increduli qui- 'dam & de ingenio ſuo peſſime meriti, qui diligentiam 'putant, facere ſibi ſcribendi difficultatem (49). ---- 'Nor again do I think, that they, who have exerted 'their ſtrength in writing, are to be tied down to the un- 'happy puniſhment of calumniating themſelves. For how 'can he perform the ſeveral duties of ſocial life, who 'dwells a long time on each particular branch of actions? 'Now there are ſome, who think nothing enough: they 'are for changing every thing, and for altering every ex- 'preſſion that has occurred to them. They are infidels to 'themſelves, and deſerve ill of their own wit, in miſ- 'taking that for diligence, which is indeed only making it 'a difficult taſk to write.' It is not eaſy to determine, adds he, whether thoſe, who approve whatever they write, are more to be blamed than thoſe, who are always diſſatisfied. He obſerves, that this great niceneſs is attended ſometimes with ſpite and diſpair; and he relates what was ſaid to a young man, who was vexed for having taken a great deal of needleſs pains for the ſpace of three days to find out the exordium of his ſubject (50). Would you, ſaid one to him, write

(46) Remark [G] of the article GUARINI; and the article LINACER, remark [E].

(47) Caſaubon, Epiſt. clxxiii.

(48) Seneca, Præf. lib. i, Controverſ. pag. m. 72.

(49) Quintil. lib. x, cap. iii, pag. m. 484.

(50) This confirms what I have ſaid in the article LINACER, remark [F], that the beginning of a work coſts moſt pains.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

their works. The vain-glorious manner, in which he ſpoke of his own poems, would be more offenſive; were it not that Poets have always taken the liberty of praiſing themſelves exceſſively [H]. I do not doubt but that it is he whom Balzac ſpeaks of, when he laughs at a certain tyrant of ſyllables [I].

write better than you can? The words of Quintilian have more beauty and ſtrength. 'Nec promptum eſt 'dicere, utros peccare validius putem, quibus omnia 'ſua placent, an quibus nihil. Accidit enim etiam 'ingenioſis adoleſcentibus frequenter, ut labora conſumantur, & in ſilentium uſque deſcendant nimia 'bene dicendi cupiditate. Qua de re memini narraſſe 'mihi Julium Secundum, illum æqualem meum, atque à me, ut notum eſt, familiariter amatum, miræ 'facundiæ virum, infinitæ tamen curæ, quid eſſet ſibi 'à patruo ſuo dictum. Is fuit Julius Florus, in elo'quentia Galliarum (quoniam ibi demum exercuit eam) 'princeps, alioqui inter paucos diſertus, & dignus illa 'propinquitate. Is cum Secundum ſcholæ adhuc operam dantem triſtem forte vidiſſet, interrogavit, Quæ 'cauſſa frontis tam obductæ? Nec diſſimulavit adoleſ'cens, tertium jam diem eſſe, ex quo omni labore 'materiæ ad ſcribendum deſtinatæ non inveniret exordium: quo ſibi non præſens tantum dolor, ſed 'etiam deſperatio in poſterum fieret. Tum Florus ar'ridens, Num quid tu, inquit, melius dicere vis, quam 'potes? Ita ſe res habet: Curandum eſt, ut quam op'time dicamus: dicendum tamen pro facultate. Ad pro'fectum enim opus eſt ſtudio, non indignatione (51). '- - - - Nor is it eaſy to ſay, which I think the moſt to'blame; thoſe, who are pleaſed with every thing of 'their own, or thoſe, who like nothing. For it often 'happens, that even ingenious young men ſink under la'bour, and are reduced to ſay nothing thro' too great a 'deſire of expreſſing themſelves well. This puts me in 'mind, that Julius Secundus, my equal, whom it is 'known I intimately loved, a man of wonderful elo'quence, but extreme diligence, related to me what his 'uncle had told him. His name was Julius Florus, 'the beſt Orator of France; for it was in that country 'he laſt of all exerciſed that art. This Julius by 'chance ſeeing Secundus, who ſtill followed the ſchool, 'very melancholy, aſked him the reaſon of it; upon 'which the young man confeſſed, that he had been three 'days in vain endeavouring to find an exordium of a 'ſubject; which not only gave him a preſent concern; 'but made him deſpair for the future. Upon which 'Florus, ſmiling ſaid: Would you write better than you can? The matter is thus: We muſt take care to expreſs ourſelves the beſt we can; but ſtill we can 'but do our beſt: and, to go forward, we have need 'of application, not indignation.'

(51) Quintil. ubi ſupra.

(52) In the new Letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 123.

(53) Coſtar, Letter L, Vol. i, pag. 126.

(54) Idem, Continuation of the Defence of Voiture, pag. m. 32.

(55) Menage's Obſervations upon the poems of Malherbe, pag. 331, &c ſeq.

(56) Id. Anti-Baillet, Tom. ii, cap. cxxxix.

[H] The Poets have always taken the liberty of praiſing themſelves to exceſs.] I have elſewhere (52) blamed Malherbe for praiſing himſelf in a manner more becoming a braggadochio in a play, than a gentleman: And I have cited two authors, one of whom condemns him (53), or juſtifies him only ironically (54); and the other excuſes him in earneſt, and ſhews, that the liberty of giving one's ſelf pompous elogiums, is an ancient privilege of the ſons of the Muſes (55). He obſerves, that Virgil, Horace, and Ovid, have made uſe of it. He treats this matter more largely in another work, wherein he recites (56) the places, in which Ennius, Nævius, Plautus, Catullus, Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Propertius, Lucan, Statius, and Martial, praiſe themſelves. He ſhews alſo (57), that the Moderns (58) have imitated thoſe examples. Note, that he goes back as far the Greek Poets; for he cites (59) Pindar, Heſiod, Theocritus, and Moſchus. I reproved a perſon the other day, who told me, that thoſe, who pretend, that the Greeks knew nothing but what they had learned from the Phœnicians, had forgot a remark, which favours them; which is this, That the Poets, who promiſed immortality to ſome perſons, whom they praiſed, had borrowed this idea from the Epithalamium, contained in the 45th Pſalm, which ends thus, according to the verſion of Buchanan.

(57) Id. ib. cap. cxxxvii, cxl.

(58) F. Caſimir Sarbieſchi, F. Vavaſſeur, F. Rapin, F. Commire, in their Latin verſes: Ronſard, Joachim du Bellai, Malherbe, and du Perier in their French verſes.

(59) Men. ibid. cap. cxxxviii.

Nec tu carminibus regina tacebere noſtris,
Quaque patet tellus liquido circumſone ponto
Poſteritas te ſera canet, dumque aurea volvet
Aſtra polus, memori ſemper celebrabere fama.

Nor ſhall my verſe, O queen, forget thy name,
But late poſterity ſhall ſing thy fame,
Long as the ſtars ſhall glitter round the pole,
And wide as ocean's ſwelling waters roll.

I told this perſon that his remark appeared to me childiſh, and that he was much to blame to wonder, that Mr Menage had not made uſe of it. Mr Menage had too much judgment to mix profane and ſacred authorities together.

[I] Balzac ſpeaks of him when he laughs at a certain tyrant of ſyllables.] The deſcription is very lively, and may convince us, that there are people, who are little reſpected, after their deaths, by thoſe perſons, who gave them a thouſand tokens of veneration. They fancy, that, provided they do not name them, they may be as ſmart upon them as they pleaſe. This is my proof of it. 'You remember the old court peda'gogue, who was formerly called the tyrant of words 'and ſyllables; and who, when he was in a good 'humour, called himſelf the Grammarian with ſpe'ctacles and grey hair. We muſt not imitate the ri'diculous things which are related of this old doctor: 'our ambition is to follow better examples. I pity 'a man, who makes ſo great a difference between pas 'and point, who treats of gerunds and participles, as if 'they were two neighbouring nations, jealous of their 'frontiers. This doctor, in the vulgar tongue, 'uſed to ſay, that he had endeavoured for many 'years to ungaſcon, the court, but that he could 'not obtain his end. Death caught him turning a 'period, and he was ſurprized by his climacterical 'year, whilſt he was deliberating, whether doute and 'erreur were maſculine or feminine. With what at'tention did he deſire to be heard, when he dogma'tized on the uſe and virtue of particles (60).'

(60) Balzac's Chriſtian Socrates, Diſcourſe x, pag. m. 267, 268.

MAMMILLARIANS, a ſect among the Anabaptiſts. I do not know the time, when this new Schiſm aroſe; but the city of Haerlem is ſaid to have given birth to this ſub-diviſion (a). It owes its original to the liberty, which a young man took of putting his hand into the boſom of a maid, whom he loved, and had a mind to marry: this touch of her breaſt came to the knowledge of the church; and thereupon they conſulted what puniſhment the delinquent ought to ſuffer. Some maintained, that he ought to be excommunicated; others ſaid, that his fault deſerved favour, and would never conſent to his excommunication. The diſpute grew to ſuch a height, that it cauſed a total rupture between the two parties. Thoſe, who declared for indulgence to the young man, were called Mammillarians (b) [A]. In one ſenſe, this does a great deal of honour to the Anabaptiſts; for it is a proof, that they are much more ſtrict in their morals, than thoſe, who are called Rigoriſts in the Spaniſh Low-countries [B]. I ſhall relate to this purpoſe

(a) See Micræ-lius, Syntagm. Hiſtor. Eccleſ. pag. 1012. Edit. 1679.

(b) See Stoupp's religion of the Hollanders, Letter iii, pag. m. 61. See alſo the Syntagma of Micrælius, bi upra.

[A] They were called Mammillarians.] I need not here turn Etymologiſt: all, who underſtand Latin know, that the word mamilla ſignifies a breaſt.

[B] The Anabaptiſts are much more ſtrict in their morals than . . . . the Rigoriſts.] The looſeſt Caſuiſts, the Sanchez's, and the Eſcobars, condemn the touching of the breaſt. They agree, that it is an impurity, and a branch of luxury, one of the ſeven mortal ſins. But, if I miſtake not, they do not impoſe upon him, who is guilty of it, any very ſevere penance; and there are

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

purpoſe a certain ſtory, which is told of Labadie [C]. I have been informed, that ſome people of ſenſe maintained one day in converſation, that there will never be any Baſilarians, or Oſculariens among the Anabaptiſts [D].

are many countries in Europe, where they are forced to treat this as one of the ſmall faults, which are called quotidianæ incurſionis. This bad practice is ſo common in thoſe countries, and it is a thing ſo frequent even the middle of the ſtreets, eſpecially among the common people, that the moderate Caſuiſts perſuade themſelves, this prevalency of cuſtom blots out one half of the crime. They think it is not conſidered under the idea of a very indecent liberty, and that the offence the ſpectators take at it is very ſmall: upon which account they ſlightly paſs over this article of confeſſion. I do not believe, that any Rigoriſt, upon ſuch an occaſion, ever delayed the abſolution of his penitent, even in thoſe climates where this kind of toying is little uſed, and paſſes for one of thoſe liberties, at which women are obliged to be angry. Thus the Anabaptiſts are the moſt rigid of all the Chriſtian moraliſts, ſince they condemn to excommunication him who touches the boſom of a woman, whom he intends to marry, and break off eccleſiaſtical communion with thoſe who will not excommunicate ſuch a ſpark.

[C] I will relate a certain ſtory, which is told of Labadie.] All, who have heard of this man, know, that he recommended to his devotees, both men and women, ſome ſpiritual exerciſes, and that he prepared them for inward recollection and mental prayer. It is ſaid, that, having given one of his female diſciples a ſubject of meditation, and earneſtly recommended to her an entire and cloſe application to this great object for ſome hours, he approached her, when he thought ſhe was moſt recollected, and put his hand into her boſom. She briſkly repulſed him, and expreſſed to him her great ſurprize at this kind of proceeding, and was preparing to cenſure him, when he prevented her. I perceive, my child, ſaid he to her, without being diſturbed, and with a devout air, that you are ſtill very far from perfection: confeſs humbly your weakneſs; beg pardon of GOD for having been ſo little attentive to the myſteries you were meditating upon. If you had had all the neceſſary attention, you would not have perceived what was done to your breaſt. But you was ſo little abſtracted from ſenſe, ſo little concentred with the Deity, that in a moment you knew when I touched you. My deſign was to try your fervour in prayer, whether you were raiſed above matter, and united to the ſovereign Being, the living ſource of immortality and ſpirituality, and I perceive, with much grief, that you have made but a very ſmall progreſs. Let this, my child, fill you with confuſion, and excite you to perform better for the future the holy duty of mental prayer. It is ſaid, the maid, having good ſenſe as well as virtue, was no leſs angry at theſe words, than at the action of Labadie, and that ſhe would no more hear of ſuch a guide. I do not warrant the certainty of all theſe facts, but I affirm, that it is very probable, that ſome of thoſe ſpiritual devotees, who make people believe, that a ſtrong meditation will raviſh the ſoul, and hinder it from perceiving the actions of the body, have a mind to toy with their devout ſifters, with impunity, and to do ſtill worſe: of which the Molinoſiſts are accuſed. In general, there is nothing more dangerous to the mind, than too myſtical, and too abſtracted devotions, and doubtleſs the body in that caſe runs ſome hazard, and many are glad to be deceived.

[D] There will never be any Baſilarians or Oſculariens among the Anabaptiſts.] Theſe would be a ſort of people, who would be cut off from their communion, for not conſenting to excommunicate thoſe, who kiſs their miſtreſſes. Thoſe who denied, that any ſuch ſchiſm can be expected, did it upon theſe grounds. Such a ſchiſm is not poſſible, ſaid they, unleſs ſome caſuiſts ſhould be ſo ſevere, as to make excommunication the puniſhment of a kiſs; as ſome have been found ſo rigid, as to make a man undergo that penance, who has touched the breaſts of his miſtreſs. Theſe two caſes are not at all parallel. The laws of courtſhip in certain nations, continued they, have eſtabliſhed from generation to generation, and chiefly among perſons of the common ſort, that kiſſes ſhould be the firſt favour, and that touching the breaſts ſhould be almoſt the laſt, or the laſt but one. When people are educated in theſe principles, they do not believe, that they do, or ſuffer, any great harm by kiſſing; but they believe they do, or ſuffer, a great deal by the handling of the breaſts. And therefore, though they, who adminiſter the canon-laws, complained very much of the young man, who was protected by the Mammillarians, it does not follow, that they would do ſo againſt the other kind of courtſhip. No; they would allow ſomething to cuſtom, and pardon thoſe liberties, which paſs for the firſt elements, and the alphabet of endearments. I relate theſe things, only to ſhew, that there is no ſubject, to which the converſation of perſons of merit will not ſometimes deſcend. It is of ſome uſe to diſcover this weakneſs of men of underſtanding. Does ſuch a ſpeculation deſerve, in conſcience, to be examined? and after all, had it not been much better not to have given a deciſive anſwer about a thing future? De futuro contingenti non eſt quoad nos determinata veritas, is the judicious ſaying of the maſters of the ſchools of Philoſophy.

Obſerve, by the way, that, in ſome countries it was ſuppoſed, that the firſt kiſs a maid received from her galant, was that of her betrothing. This we read in the Hiſtory of Marſeilles (1). It was uſual for the bridegroom to give a ring to the bride on the day of their betrothing, and make alſo ſome conſiderable preſent, in acknowledgment for the kiſs he gave her. In effect, Fulco, viſcount of Marſeilles, made a grant, in 1005, to Odila, betrothed to him, for the firſt kiſs, of all the demeſns he had in the territories of Sixfours, Cireſte, Soliers, Cuges, and Olieres. This cuſtom was founded, as I take it, upon the law * 16. Si à Sponſo, which ordained, that, when the marriage did not take effect, the woman betrothed ſhould get half of the preſents ſhe had received from the man; for the antients believed, that the purity of a virgin was defiled by one ſingle kiſs; but this law at preſent is abrogated in this kingdom.

(1) Ruffi, Hiſtory of Marſeilles, Tom. ii, pag. 391, Edit. 1696.

* Leg. 16. Cod. lib. v.

See, above (2), the anſwer which was made by a young Florentine lady.

(2) Remark [A] of the article GUALDRADA.

MAMURRA, a Roman knight, a native of Formium, acquired prodigious riches in Gaul, where he attended Cæſar in the quality of ſurveyor of the workmen (a), if I may ſo tranſlate the Præfectus Fabrûm in Pliny. He uſed his riches as voluptuous men do; he heaped them up with great avarice, and a devouring extortion, and ſpent them prodigally in all ſorts of luxury: Alieni appetens, ſui profuſus, as is ſaid of Catiline (b). He built an houſe extreamly magnificent at Rome, upon mount Cœlius; all its walls were covered with marble, and he was the firſt who built one with that magnificence [A]. It conſiſted in placing properly little pieces of marble very thin, and of divers colours, all over

(a) Cicero, ad Attic. lib. vii, Epiſt. vii. Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. vi.

(b) Salluſt. in Bello Catilinar.

[A] He built an houſe . . . . . whoſe walls were covered with marble; and he was the firſt, who built in ſo expenſive a manner.] ‘ Primum Romæ parietes ‘ cruſta marmoris operuiſſe totius domus ſuæ in Cœlio ‘ monte Cornelius Nepos tradidit Mamurram Formiis ‘ natum, equitem Romanum, Præfectum fabrum C. ‘ Cæſaris in Gallia. Neque indignatio ſit tali auctore ‘ inventa re, hic namque eſt Mamurra, Catulli Vero- ‘ nenſis Carminibus proſciſſus, quem & res & domus ‘ ipſius clarius quam Catullus dixit habere quidquid ‘ habuiſſet comata Gallia, &c (1). - - - - - Cornelius ‘ Nepos related, that Mamurra, born at Formiæ, a ‘ Roman knight, and ſurveyor of Cæſar's workmen in ‘ Gaul, was the firſt in Rome, who covered his whole ‘ houſe on mount Cœlius with a cruſt of marble. Nor ‘ ought we to be angry, that ſuch a man invented this ‘ magnificence; for he is that Mamurra, ſatirized in the ‘ verſes of Catullus of Verona, whom his eſtate and ‘ houſe

(1) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. vi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google over the walls. There was no column in this houſe, but what was entirely of the moſt precious marble. Catullus made very ſatirical verſes againſt the immenſe robberies of Mamurra, and the leud intercourſe he ſuppoſed there was between Julius Cæſar and him [B]. We have ſpoken of it in the article of this Poet.

'houſe prove, more clearly than Catullus, to have poſ-'ſeſſed whatever Gallia Comata afforded.'

[B] Catullus made very ſatirical verſes . . . . againſt him.] Here follows the beginning of his thirtieth epigram:

Quis hoc poteſt videre, quis poteſt pati
Niſi impudicus, & vorax, & helluo?
Mamurram habere quod Comata Gallia
Habebat unctum, & ultima Britannia.
Cinæde Romule hæc videbis & feres,
Es impudicus, & vorax, & aleo.

Who, but a wretch as vile, can bear to ſee
Mamurra riot thus in luxury,
Rich with the ſpoils and plunder'd wealth, he bore
From long-hair'd Gaul, and diſtant Britain's ſhore?
The Pathic Roman, who, unmov'd, can ſee
Such wanton riot, is as baſe as he.

The fifty eighth epigram is yet more ſevere.

Pulcre convenit improbis Cinædis,
Mamurræ Pathicoque Cæſarique.

This ſuits ſuch impious Pathics well,
Cæſar and vile Mamurra . . . . .

Some interpreters of Cicero (2), think, that theſe words of the fifty ſecond letter of the thirteenth book to Atticus, Tum audivit de Mamurra, vultum non mutavit (3), ſignify, that Cæſar did not change his colour, when he was told, that Catullus had written verſes againſt him and Mamurra: but this explication is ill-grounded. Cæſar, being returned from the defeat of Pompey's ſons, was then at a country-houſe of Cicero's. Now what probability is there, that he was then ignorant of the verſes of Catullus, and that it was any news to inform him of them? we have ſhewn at large in another place (4), that the defeat of Pompey's ſons was long after the reconciliation of Cæſar and Catullus. Manutius imagines, that ſome at that time ſpoke to Cæſar about the neglect of the ſumptuary laws, of which Mamurra was then guilty. This is more probable than the explication of Lambinus.

(2) Corradus, and Lambinus.

(3) The edition of Mr Grævius has it, non mutavi.

(4) In the article CATULLUS, remark [I], num. 2.

MANARD (JOHN), born at Ferrara in 1462, was one of the ableſt Phyſicians of his age: you will find in Moreri, that he was Phyſician to Uladiſlaus king of Hungary, that afterwards he was profeſſor of Phyſic at Ferrara, and that, having married, when he was very old, a young wife, he run into exceſſes which killed him. The Poets did not fail to jeſt upon this affair [A], and chiefly thoſe who knew, that an Aſtrologer had foretold, he ſhould die in a ditch. He died at Ferrara in March 1536, at the age of ſeventy

[A] He fell into exceſſes, which killed him. The Poets did not fail to jeſt thereupon.] Paul Jovius accuſes him of great want of judgment. When he was very old and gouty, ſays he, he married a maid, whoſe beauty and youth required a man in the flower of his age. The worſt of it was, adds he, that he fell into intemperance, even at the expence of his life: he ſhewed a greater deſire to have children than to live, and he was willing to haſten the hour of his death, provided he could obtain the title of father. Duxit autem uxorem plane ſenex, & articulorum dolore diſtortus, ab ætate, formaque, florentis juvenis toro dignam, adeo levi judicio, & letali quidem intemperantia, ut maturando funeri ſuo, aliquanto prolis, quam vitæ cupidior ab amicis cenſeretur (1). You may find in Moreri an epigram conſiſting of ſix Latin verſes (2) upon this ſubject, by Curſius; but you will not find there this diſtich of Latomus.

(1) Paul Jovius, in Elog. cap. lxxxi, pag. 190.

(2) It is in Paul Jovius, ibid.

In fovea qui te periturum dixit Aruſpex,
Non eſt mentitus: conjugis illa fuit.

'Twas ſaid, you in a ditch ſhou'd loſe your life;
And ſo it prov'd; the ditch was your own wife.

This diſtich was ſo much deſcanted upon, that at laſt ſome ſaid, that Manard, to ſhun the prediction kept at a diſtance from all ditches. He dreamed of nothing but the literal ſenſe, and never miſtruſted the allegorical: but he knew by experience, that it is not always the letter, which kills, and that the allegory ſometimes gives the mortal blow. He died on the night of his marriage, in the very minute of enjoyment, and thus the prediction was fulfilled. Thus ſome writers circumſtantiate the thing. I wonder they did not compare him to bees, who die by the ſtings which they give (3). Johannes Manardus - - - - - cum ab Aſtrologo ipſi prædictum fuiſſet, vitæ periculum in FOVEA ipſi imminere, à foveis ſibi timuit & foſſis, non ſatis perſpecta oraculi κρύφει. Cum vero illiberis, prolis aliquanto quam vitæ cupidior, plane ſenex uxorem duceret juvenculam, prima nuptiali nocte cum dilecta concumbens, deſideratis intentus amoribus, in genitali fovea extinctus, ſuavi morte oraculi implevit ſcopum, & funus maturavit ſuum (4). I believe they are miſtaken; for ſuch a circumſtance would never have been omitted by thoſe, who firſt ſpoke of this matter; and I obſerve, that Paul Jovius induces us to believe, that Manard did not ſink ſo ſoon. No body informs us whether his endeavours were attended with any fecundity, and whether he had at leaſt the conſolation to leave his wife big with child. To labour much, and after all return empty, is very unpleaſant.

(3) Animaſque in vulnere ponunt. Virgil. Georg. lib. iv, ver. 238.

(4) Sacra Eleuſinia patefacta, pag. 181, 182. Edit. Francof. 1684.

Αἰσχρὸν τοι ἀνῆρ τε μίμνειν κενεόν τε νέεσθαι.

Nam turpe diuque manere inanemque redire (5).

(5) Homer. Iliad. lib. ii, ver. 298.

If it were true, that this good old man died on the night of his marriage, a Soothſayer, who had foretold him what is to be ſeen in the two verſes, which are in the cloſe of a paſſage, I am now to tranſcribe, would have anſwered much better than the author of the Latin diſtich already cited. The paſſage is taken out of Mr Chevreau, and is here very much to the purpoſe; for it relates to the imprudence of old men, who marry. 'If you had conſidered ſeriouſly the principal end of marriage, you 'would eaſily have perceived, that this principal 'end does not belong to us, who are eighty years 'old: and I offer, at a venture, to maintain at my own 'expence the nurſes of the firſt-fruits of your family, 'provided you have no helper, and do not delight in 'rocking other folks children in your own cradle (6). 'The advice of St Paul, That it is better to marry than 'to burn, in my opinion, does neither belong to 'you, nor to me: and I could relate to you many 'examples and authorities of the ridiculouſneſs of old 'men, who reſolve to marry, when they ought to 'think of their funerals. This ridiculouſneſs is 'always mortal; and you may underſtand me with-'out a commentary, when I remind you of the verſes, 'which Hardy puts in the mouth of a confident of 'Alcyoneus, who thought that, in order to get the 'dominions of his king, the way was to marry his 'daughter.

(6) Chevreau's Miſcellanies, Part i, pag. 149, in a letter dated Octob. 13, 1693.

One torch ſhall light you to your bed and grave (7).

(7) Ibid. pag. 150.

Let us add to this a paſſage of Guy Patin. A counſellor of the Great Chamber, being very old, and almoſt upon the brink of the grave, will needs marry a pretty young daughter of another counſellor. I believe the good man fancies he ſhall do a fine exploit; but conſider how well qualified

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

seventy four years [B], and was interred in the cloister of the Carmelites (a). It is said, in the inscription of his monument, that he had restored Physic to its antient lustre [G], after he had several times put to flight the many base pretenders who dishonoured it. His letters are the best of his works (b). Calcagninus commends them, and speaks of their author with great esteem [D].

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) They are divided into twenty books: you may find a summary of them in Gesner's Bibliotheque.

qualified these good men are to judge our causes, who commit such follies (8). We have seen in another place (9) what Dr Patin said of such another amour of Dr De Lorme a famous Physician, and who, as some say, met with a fate very different from that of our Manard; he was the occasion of the death of his young spouse, and thereby shewed, that the aphorism, The weakest goes to the wall, is not always true.

(8) Patin, Lettre xxv, pag. 383, of Tom. i.

(9) In the article LORME (N. de), remarks [D] and [E].

[B] He died in March, 1536, at the age of seventy four years.] This is set down in his epitaph. Brother Augustin Superbi of Ferrara is mistaken, when he affirms, that our Manard died in 1545 (10). Gesner, on the other side, who wrote his Bibliotheque in 1544, and who tells us, that he heard some say, that Manard died about six years before (11), was not well informed.

(10) F. Agostino Superbi da Ferrara, Theologo, e Predicatore de Minori Conventuali, Apparato de gli huomini illustri della Citta di Ferrara, pag. 76.

(11) Gesner, in Bibloth. fol. 455.

[C] It is affirmed, that he restored Physic to it's antient lustre.] The words of his epitaph are these (12):

' Ann. P. M. L. X (13). Continenter tum docendo
' & scribendo, tum innocentissime medendo omnem
' Medicinam ex arce bonarum literarum fœde pro-
' lapsam, & in Barbarorum Potestatem ac ditionem
' redactam, prostratis ac profligatis hostium copiis
' identidem ut Hydra renascentibus in Antiquum
' Pristinumque statum ac nitorem restituit - - - - By ' constantly teaching, and writing, and healing in the ' most innocent manner, he restored Physic to it's antient
' state and lustre, which had been shamefully abused,
' vanquishing and putting to flight it's enemies, which
' were perpetually springing up.'

(12) It is in Agostino Superbi, ubi supra, who says it is to be seen in the cloister of the Carmelites of Ferrara. It is more perfect in the Itinerarium Italiæ of Andrew Schott, fol. m. 114.

(13) I do not know whether these four letters signify plus minus sexaginta.

[D] Calcagninus speaks of Manard with very great esteem.] It is in a letter he wrote to Erasmus in 1525, wherein you may see that, having declared his affliction for the death of Leonicenus, he adds (14):

' Una res mihi solatio fuit, quod Joannes Manardus,
' vir Græce & Latine doctissimus, rem medicam &
' naturæ arcana iisdem vestigiis prosequitur, cujus rei
' specimen dare possunt epistolæ, quas proxime edidit:
' eas puto in manus tuas perveniisse, quod si nondum per-
' veniisse significaveris, dabo operam, ut quamprimum ad
' te perferantur. Scripsit ille quidem alia plurima digna
' immortalitate, sed vir minime ambitiosus ea nondum
' publicam materiam fecit: hoc superstite minus Leoni-
' cenum desideramus. - - - One thing afforded me conso-
' lation; namely, that Manard, a very learned man both
' in the Greek and Latin languages, follows Physic and the ' secrets of nature on the same steps; of which you may see
' a specimen in the letters he lately published: I suppose they
' are come to your hands; but if not, I will take care
' they shall be brought to you as soon as possible. He ' wrote likewise many other things worthy of immortality;
' but, being a man of the least ambition, he has not
' yet made them public: while this man lives, we the
' less want Leonicenus.'

(14) Calcagninus, Epist. liv, lib. xx, inter Erasmianas, pag. 1019.

MANCINELLUS (ANTONY) was an excellent Grammarian of the XVth century. He taught in the college of Rome, and afterwards went to Venice by the advice of Pomponius Lætus (a), and continued to publish several books of Literature [A]. It is said, that having made an oration against the immoralities of Alexander VI, that Pope was so enraged, that he ordered his tongue to be cut out, and his hands cut off (b). The two authors whom I quote for this fact, are, the one a good Catholic, and the other a good Protestant. I shall quote a third, who gives us a little more particular account of the matter [B].

(a) See the verses, which Gesner cites, fol. 69 verso, of his Bibliotheque.

(b) Prateolus, History of the Church, Vol. ii, fol. 304, verso. Crespin, of the State of the Church, pag. m. 502.

[A] He continued to publish several books of Literature.] You will find the titles of most of them in Gesner's Bibliotheque, who observes, that Mancinellus's Commentary on the first book of Cicero's Rhetorics ad Herennium, was printed at Venice in the year 1497, in the presence of the author. I add, that Mancinellus made notes on Horace, Juvenal, Suetonius, &c. and corrections on Laurentius Valla's Elegantiæ. He likewise composed orations, and Latin verses, which have been inserted in the second volume of the Deliciæ Poëtarum Italorum.

[B] I will quote a third author, who gives us a little more particular account of the matter.] Mr Du Plessis Mornai, alledging those, who spoke against the papacy under Alexander VI, begins with citing a passage of Jerom, Paul Catalan, and then adds (1),

' Antony Mancinellus was still more bold. On ' a solemn day, just as the procession was setting for' ward, mounted on a white horse, according to ' custom, he made an oration at Rome before all the ' people, against Alexander VI, openly reproving his ' irregular, scandalous, and abominable behaviour;
' and having finished it, he threw copies of it among
' the people. Alexander caused him to be seized,
' and both his hands to be cut off: as soon he was
' cured, he made a more bold speech on another
' festival; and then Alexander ordered his tongue to
' be cut out, of which he died *.'

(1) Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquite, pag. 567.

* Hieronymus Marius, in Eusebio Caprivo.

Coëffeteau could answer nothing to this, but that he knew not what to believe of it. There are few persons, except such as are of a melancholy disposition, who set so little value on their lives (2). Without doubt, he knew not, that the Hieronymus Marius, whom Du Plessis had cited, and whom he calls Hieromse le Maire, was an author, who fled from Italy, for the liberty of professing the Protestant religion. In a word, it is the Jerom MASSARIUS, whose article you will find below. The Jesuit Gretser (3) had but an imperfect knowledge of him; but yet he has charged him with being an enemy to the Popes. I know not whether this adventure of Mancinellus can be proved by any other testimony than this; but I doubt not, that the testimony of all those, I have any knowledge of, who have spoken of it, is derived mediately or immediately from him. I have read in the Diarium of Burchard, a particular which relates to this affair: namely, that, on the first Sunday of Advent 1502, the duke of Valentinois, son of Alexander VI, ordered the hand and the end of the tongue of a man masked, who had spoken ill of him, to be cut off. For two days his hand was seen hanging at a window, the end of the tongue being fastened to the little finger. Eadem die sero quidam mascheratus usus est per Burgum quibusdam verbis inhonestis contra Ducem Valentinum, quod Dux intelligens fecit eum capi & duci ad curiam sanctæ crucis, & circa nonam noctis fuit ei abscissa manus, & anterior pars linguæ, quæ fuit appensa parvo digito manus abscissæ, & manus ipsa feneſtra curiæ sanctæ crucis appensa, ubi manſit ad secundum diem (4). Many things, as unlike as these two, have served as a foundation to one another, by a metamorphosis, to which historical facts are very subject. I do not affirm, that this is the present case; but, that it may be enquired into, whether some mixture of accidents may not have confounded matters here, I will relate a story, which Thomasi tells immediately after that of the unknown person, whose tongue and hand were cut off.

(2) Coëffeteau, Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1213, 1214.

(3) Gretser, in Exam. Myst. Plessiani, pag. 552.

(4) Burchard, in Diario, pag. 78, 79. See also Thomaso Thomasi, in the Life of Cæsar Borgia, pag. 367.

' The Pope, and the duke of Valentinois, being ' informed, that a brother of one John Lorenzo of ' Venice, at that time famous for his learning, had ' translated into Latin, and even sent to Venice, to be ' printed there, some libels, which he had caused to ' be rendered into Greek (5), against the life of the ' one and the other, by the said John Lorenzo, who ' was since dead, they gave orders to seize him,
' taking all the precautions to keep the matter
' secret,

(5) This passage has not been rightly translated: the original Italian imports, that these books had been written in Greek by John Lorenzo, and that they were found among his papers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ ſecret, and with all poſſible diligence: they ordered
‘ all his effects and papers to be taken from him, ‘ whether they belonged to him or his brother; of ‘ which the republic was ſoon apprized, being very ‘ particularly intereſted in the perſons and goods of ‘ theſe brothers: for which reaſon ſhe immediately
‘ ſent orders to her ambaſſador to intercede as power‘ fully as poſſible with the Pope, in her name, for the ‘ releaſe of this priſoner. The ambaſſador performed
‘ his orders as ſoon as poſſible, preſſing his holineſs
‘ in an extraordinary manner, in a long audience
‘ which he had of him, and preſenting to him the ‘ ſenate's letters, to grant him the enlargement of ‘ the perſon he demanded; to whom the Pope
‘ anſwered, that he could not have thought the re‘ public would have intereſted itſelf ſo far in behalf
‘ of the priſoner, and that he was extreamly ſorry
‘ he could not comply with her demands; ſince the ‘ proceſs, and the life of the perſon, for whom ſhe ‘ interceded, were already at an end, he having been ‘ ſtrangled, and thrown into the Tiber ſome nights
‘ before (6).’

I have only to obſerve farther, that Auguſtin Niphus, ſpeaking of the witty ſayings, which we ought to avoid, that we may not run any hazard, makes uſe of the example of Jerom Mancionus a Neapolitan, whoſe tongue Cæſar Borgia ordered to be cut out (7).

(6) Thomaſo Thomaſi, Life of Cæſar Borgia, pag. 368, 369.

(7) Cum Hieronymus Mancionus Neopolitanus adverſus Cæſarem Borgiam uſus eſſet talibus aculeatis ſermonibus, & a Cæſare linguæ mutilatione in illum animadverſum eſt. Aug. Niphus, de Aulico, lib. i, in fine, pag. m. 337.

MANDUCUS. Thus the Romans called certain figures, which they produced in plays, or at other publick ſports [A], to make ſome laugh, and to terrify others. It is not difficult to gueſs why theſe figures were thus called. We need only remember, that they had great cheeks, a great open mouth, and long and ſharp teeth, with which they made a ſtrange cracking noiſe. Juvenal informs us, that children were very much frightened at them (a). And from hence doubtleſs the mothers took occaſion to threaten their children, who would not obey their commands, that Manducus would come and eat them (b). It therefore became a nocturnal ſcare-crow, or ſpectre. This did not ill agree with the tradition of the Lamiæ; for it was ſaid, that they alſo devoured children. If we may believe Scaliger [B], Manducus was called Pytho Gorgonius, by a Poet, who thus intituled a Dramatic piece. This Poet applied himſelf chiefly to the Comedies called Atellanæ, wherein the figures, I am ſpeaking of, chiefly took place. Our remarks contain a proof of all this. In a parallel between the ancient and modern cuſtoms, we ſhould join together Manducus and Bugbear. See the article ACCO.

(a) Tandemque redit ad pulpita notum
Exodium cum perſonæ pallentis hiatum
In gremio matris formidat ruſticus infans. Juvenal, Sat. III, ver. 174.

(b) See the commentary upon the emblems of Alciatus, pag. 717, of the Edit. of Padua, 1661.

[A] Or at other public ſports.] I prove it by theſe two verſes of Plautus (1).

C H. Quid ſi aliquo ad ludos me pro Manduco locem?
L A. Quapropter? C H. Quia pol clare crepito dentibus.

C H. What if I let myſelf out to the public games for a Manducus? L A. Why ſo? C H. Becauſe I make an excellent cracking with my teeth.

(1) Rudent. Act. ii, Scen. vi, ver. 51.

Upon which the commentator Philippus Paræus makes this note, which he borrowed from Scaliger (2). ‘ Manducus eſt μορμολυκεῖον quod in ludis circumfe-‘ rebatur inter cæteras ridicularias & formidoloſas per-
‘ ſonas, magnis malis, lateque dehiſcens & clare cre-
‘ pitans dentibus. - - - - - Manducus was a frightful
‘ figure, carried about in ſhews among other ridiculous
‘ and terrifying pageants, with great cheeks, a wide
‘ gaping mouth, and making a loud cracking with it's ‘ teeth.’ Scaliger adds, that this was done chiefly when the Atellanæ were acted, and cites the paſſage I have related out of Juvenal. ‘ Dentes, continues he,
‘ magnos & voracitatem attribuebant nocturnis illis
‘ terriculamentis; quo nomine factum ut Lamiam pue‘ rorum infantium deglutricem fingerent. - - - - - They ‘ aſcribed great teeth and voracity to thoſe nocturnal
‘ ſcare-crows: hence it was, they feigned, that Lamia
‘ devoured young children.’

(2) Scalig. in Varron. de Ling. Lat. pag. 150.

[B] If we may believe Scaliger.] Here is the ſequel of the words, cited in the preceding remark. ‘ Inde Pomponius Atellanarius Poëta inſcripſit exodium
‘ quoddam Pythonem Gorgonium, qui nihil aliud erat,
‘ ut puto, quam ille Manducus, de quo dixi. Nam
‘ Pythonem pro terriculamento, & Gorgonium pro
‘ Munduco, quia γοργόνες cum magnis dentibus
‘ pingebantur. Itaque apud Nonium ita leges, gumiæ
‘ Guloſi. Lucillius libro xxx.

Illo quid fiat Lamia, & Pytho oxyodontes.
Quo veniunt illæ gumiæ, vetulæ, improbæ, ineptæ.

‘ From thence Pomponius, the Atellanarian Poet, intitu-
‘ led, a certain interlude Pytho Gorgonius, which was no
‘ other, I believe, than the Manducus, I have been ‘ ſpeaking of; becauſe the Gorgons were painted with ‘ great teeth. Hence in Nonius you meet with Gumiæ ‘ Guloſi, i. e. Gluttons; and in Lucilius, book xxx;’

Illo quid fiat Lamia, &c.

MANICHEES, heretics, whoſe infamous ſect, founded by one Manes [A], begun in the IIId century, and eſtabliſhed itſelf in ſeveral provinces, and ſubſiſted a very long time. They taught ſuch doctrines, as ought to inſpire us with the greateſt horror.

[A] A ſect founded by one Manes.] He was a Perſian by nation, of a very mean birth, but well-ſhaped, and of a good wit, which was the reaſon that a widow, who bought him, took a liking to him, adopted him for her ſon, and took care to have him inſtructed, by the magi, in the diſcipline and philoſophy of the Perſians; wherein he improved ſo much, that being otherwiſe naturally eloquent, and expreſſing himſelf eaſily, and with a good grace, he acquired the reputation of a ſubtile and learned Philoſopher (1). He ſtudied chiefly the books of a certain Arabian called Scythianus, and took from him the greateſt part of his wicked doctrines. Terebinthus, heir to the eſtate, money, and impieties of Scythianus, had brought upon himſelf a great perſecution, for having publiſhed ſome doctrines in Perſia, and fled to this widow's houſe. He made a very tragical end; his books and money remained with the widow, and by this means Manes found in her houſe the writings of Scythianus. ‘ When, accord‘ ing to his cuſtom, he aſcended in the night-time
‘ to the top of the houſe (2) to invoke, upon
‘ the platform, the demons of the air, which the ‘ Manichees have ſince practiſed in their execrable
‘ ceremonies, he was ſuddenly ſtruck with a blow
‘ from heaven, which threw him down from the top
‘ to the bottom upon the ground, whereby his head
‘ was cruſhed, and his neck broken (3).’ St Epiphanius relates, that Scythianus had the ſame fate; that is, that he fell from the top of the houſe (4). Others ſay, that the devil carried Terebinthus into a deſert, and there ſtrangled him, and that Scythianus was cruſhed under the ruins of his houſe at Jeruſalem. Scythianus autem domus ſuæ ruina oppreſſus miſeri periit. Diſcipulum autem & ſucceſſorem doctrinæ ſuæ habuit quendam nomine Buddam, cognomine Terebinthum, qui & ipſe à Satana in ſolitudinem abreptus ſtrangulatus eſt (5). They ſay alſo that Manes married the widow, who enfranchiſed him (6,) and hereby they find a continuation of the parallel they make between him and Mahomet. They add, that he was flea'd alive, becauſe of the enchantments and witchcraft he uſed, to kill the king's ſon. Poſtquam ſuis incantationibus Regis

(1) Maimbourg's Hiſtory of St Leo, book i, pag. 11.

(2) That is, the widow's houſe.

(3) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra.

(4) Epiphan. adv. Hæreſ. pag. 620.

(5) Lamb. Danæus, notis in librum Auguſt. de Hæreſibus, fol. 118. verſo.

(6) Id. ib. fol. 120.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google horror. Their weakneſs did not conſiſt, as at firſt it may ſeem, in their doctrine of two principles, one good, and the other bad; but in the particular explications they gave of it, and in the practical conſequences they drew from it [B]. It muſt be confeſſed, that this gis Perſarum filium necaſſet, vivus ab eo excoriatus eſt (7). But it is much more probable, that he did all he could to cure him. It is certain, that he pretended to reſtore his health, but did not perform his promiſe. 'The report being ſpread every where 'of the great power, he ſaid he had of working 'miracles, he was ſent for by king Sapores, to cure 'his ſon who was very ſick. At firſt, this bold de- 'ceiver drove away all the Phyſicians, who had under- 'taken the cure of this young prince, and promiſed 'the king to reſtore him quickly to perfect health, 'without any other remedy, but that of his own 'prayers (8). But the child dying in his arms, the 'king, enraged againſt him, cauſed him to be im- 'priſoned; but he eſcaped, and fled into Meſopota- 'mia. There he was twice confuted in two ſolemn 'diſputes, by the holy and learned biſhop Arche- 'laus *, who, with difficulty, ſaved him from the 'fury of the people, who would have torn him 'in pieces. Nevertheleſs this ſecured him but a little 'while; for ſoon after he was re-taken by ſome horſe- 'men, who were ſent every where after him, and 'carried to Sapores, who cauſed him to be flea'd 'alive, and then threw his body to the dogs, to be 'devoured by them, and hanged up his ſkin, ſtuffed 'with ſtraw, before one of the gates of the city (9).'

(7) Id. ib.

(8) S. Epiphan. pag. 621, ſays however, that he did recover. Τοῦ οἴκου φαρμακευτικῆς ἐφευρετικὸς. Cum medicamenti curandi adhibendi.

* Hiſt. de Script. Eccl. in Archelao.

(9) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 13, 14.

[B] The explications they gave of it, and the practical conſequences they drew from it.] According to the Manichees (10), the two principles fought together, and this conflict occaſioned a mixture of good and evil. Ever after the good principle laboured to ſeparate what belonged to him: he ſpread his virtue among the elements, to make in them this ſeparation. The elect alſo laboured in it; for all that was impure in the meat, they did eat, ſeparated from the particles of the good principle, and then theſe particles, thus ſevered and purified, were tranſported to the kingdom of GOD, their firſt country, in two veſſelsappointed for that purpoſe. Theſe two veſſels are the ſun and moon. Ipſam vero boni à malo purgationem ac liberationem non ſolum per totum mundum, & de omnibus ejus elementis virtutem Dei facere dicunt; verum etiam Electos ſuos per alimenta quæ ſumunt, & eis quippe alimentis, ſicuti univerſo mundo, Dei ſubſtantiam perhibent eſſe commixtam, quam purgari putant in Electis ſuis eo genere vitæ, quo vivunt Electi Manichæorum, velut ſanctius & excellentius auditoribus ſuis (11). . . . . Quicquid vero undique purgatur luminis per quaſdam naves (quas eſſe lunam & ſolem volunt) regno Dei tanquam propriis ſedibus reddi (12). Theſe Heretics 'imagined, that, 'to ſave ſouls, GOD had made a great machine, 'compoſed of twelve veſſels, which inſenſibly carried 'the ſouls up, and afterwards unladed them in the 'moon, which, having purified theſe ſouls by it's 'rays, conveyed them into the ſun, and into glory, 'and hereby they explained the different appearances 'of the moon. It was in the full, when the 'veſſels brought thither a multitude of ſouls, 'and it decreaſed in proportion as theſe ſouls were 'removed out of it into glory (13).' There were in theſe veſſels, ſaid they, certain virtues, which aſſumed the ſhape of a man, on purpoſe to make the women of the other party fall in love with them; for, during the motions of luſt, the light which is entangled in the members, flies away, and is received into the tranſport veſſels which reſtore it to it's natural place. Eſſe autem in eis navibus ſanctas virtutes, quæ ſe in maſculos transfigurant, ut illiciant fœminas gentis adverſæ, & per hanc illecebram commota eorum concupiſcentia fugiat de illis lumen, quod membris ſuis permixtum tenebant, & purgandum ſuſceperant ab Angelis lucis, purgatumque illis navibus imponatur ad regna propria reportandum (14). While ſome virtues aſſumed the ſhape of a man, others took upon them that of a woman, to entice men to love them, and ſo reciprocally to make the laſcivious fires ſeparate the ſubſtances of light from the ſubſtances of darkneſs. Certe illi libri Manichæi ſunt omnibus ſine dubitatione communes, in quibus libris illa portenta ad illiciendos, & per concupiſcentiam diſſolvendos utriuſque ſexus principes tenebrarum, ut liberata fugia ab eis, quæ captivata tenebratur in eis divina ſubſtantia, de maſculorum in fœminas, & fœminarum in maſculos transfiguratione conſcripta ſunt (15). If you add to this, that they fancied, that the parts of light were much more intermixed with the parts of darkneſs, in perſons that do the work of generation, than in others (16), you may underſtand the monſtrous alliance they made between theſe two doctrines, one of which was, that men muſt not marry, nor procreate children; the other that they may give the reins to the tranſports of nature, provided they hinder conception. Et ſi utuntur conjugibus, conceptum tamen generationemque devitant, ne divina ſubſtantia quæ in eos per alimenta ingreditur vinculis carneis ligetur in prole (17). It ſeems, they believed that Saclas, one of the princes of darkneſs, a greater devourer of children than Saturn, could not find a better way of holding in cloſe priſon the divine particles he had eaten, than that of generation, and that for this end he came near his wife, and begot two children on her, which were Adam and Eve. Adam & Evam ex parentibus principibus fumi aſſerunt natos, cum pater eorum nomine Saclas ſociorum ſuorum fœtus omnium devoraſſet, & quicquid inde commixtum divinæ ſubſtantiæ ceperat, cum uxore concumbens in carne prolis, tanquam tenaciſſimo vinculo, colligaſſet (18). Now becauſe they looked upon their elect as very good purifiers, I mean as perſons, who did admirably filter the parts of the divine ſubſtance, entangled and impriſoned in the aliments (19), they gave them the principles of generation to eat; and it is ſaid, that they mixed them with the ſymbols of the Euchariſt, a thing ſo abominable, that the biſhop of Meaux had reaſon to ſay, That one dares not think, and much leſs write it (20). The words of St Auguſtin are theſe: 'Qua occaſione vel potius exe- 'crabilis ſuperſtitionis quadam neceſſitate coguntur 'Electi eorum velut Euchariſtiam conſperſam cum 'ſemine humano ſumere, ut etiam inde, ſicut de aliis 'cibis quos accipiunt, ſubſtantia illa divina purge- 'tur (21). . . . . Ac per hoc ſequitur eos, ut ſic eam 'de ſemine humano, quemadmodum de aliis ſemi- 'nibus, quæ in alimentis ſumunt, debeant manducan- 'do purgare. Unde etiam Catharistæ appellantur, 'quaſi purgatores, tanta eam purgantes diligentia, ut 'ſe nec ab hac tam horrenda cibi turpitudine abſti- 'neant (22). . . . . Upon which occaſion, or rather compelled by an execrable ſuperſtition, their elect are obliged to take as it were the ſacrament ſprinkled with human ſeed; that from thence alſo, as from other kinds of food which they take, that divine ſubſtance may be purged. . . . . They likewiſe purge this ſubſtance by human ſeed, as well as by other kinds of ſeed, which they take in their food. Whence alſo they are called Puriſts, that is purgers; purging it ſo diligently, that they abſtain not even from this horrid and ſhameful food.' They did not own, that they committed this abomination; but it is pretended, that they were convicted of it (23): let us recite the words of a modern writer, 'As they believed, that the ſpirit came from a 'good principle, and that the fleſh and the body were 'from an ill one, they taught, that men ought to 'hate, deſpiſe, and diſhonour it by all ways poſſible; 'and, upon this infamous pretence, there is no ſort 'of execrable uncleanneſs, wherewith they did not 'defile themſelves in their aſſemblies (24).' St Auguſtin does not attribute to them this; yet I do not ſay, that Maimbourg is miſtaken, for the doctrine and conduct of the Manichees is related many different ways; which happened without doubt, either becauſe they varied their doctrine from age to age, or becauſe all their cotemporary doctors did not explain it after the ſame manner; or laſtly, becauſe all their adverſaries did not rightly underſtand them. It was thought fit to deſtroy all the books of the Manichees: which may have been of ſome uſe; but this little inconvenience ariſes from it, that we cannot be ſure of their doctrine, as we might have been by conſulting the works of their moſt learned authors. By the fragments of their ſyſtem, which we meet with in the fathers, it plainly appears, that they were not happy in their hypotheſes, when they came to particulars. Their firſt hypotheſis was falſe, and it grew worſe in their hands by the little art and philoſophical ſkill they employed in explaining and applying it.

(10) Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. xlvi.

(11) Id. ib. fol. 115. Edit. Lamberti Danæi.

(12) Ibid. fol. 115. verſo.

(13) Baſnage, Hiſt. of the Religion of the Reformed Churches, Tom. i, p. 125, 126.

(14) Auguſt. ubi ſupra.

(15) Id. ib. fol. 116.

(16) In cæteris autem hominibus, etiam in ipſis auditoribus ſuis, hanc partem bonæ diviæque ſubſtantiæ, quæ mixta & colligata in eſcis & potibus detinetur, maximeque in eis qui generant filios, arctius & inquinatius colligari putant. Ibid. fol. 115.

(17) Auguſtin. ibid. fol. 117.

(18) Id. ib.

(19) See the laſt remark.

(20) Hiſt. of the Variations, book xi, num. xv, pag. m. 129.

(21) Auguſt. ib. fol. 115. verſo.

(22) Ib. fol. 116. verſo.

(23) Ib. fol. 116.

(24) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 17, 18.

[C] This

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

this falſe tenet, which is much more ancient than Manes [C], and cannot be maintained by [C] This falſe tenet is much more ancient than Manes.] We have already ſeen, that he found it in the books which Terebinthus inherited from his maſter Scythianus. It is not true, as St Epiphanius ſuppoſes that this Scythianus lived in the times of the apoſtles (25); he ſhould have ſaid only, that he might have been Manes's grandfather: But it is very true, that the doctrine of two principles was known in the world a long time before the preaching of the apoſtles. Scythianus was indebted to Pythagoras for it, if we may believe Epiphanius (26). Some ſay (27), that Terebinthus borrowed it from Empedocles. The Gnoſtics, Cerdonians, Marcionites, and ſeveral other ſectaries, who introduced this bad doctrine into Chriſtianity, before Manes was ſpoken of, were not the inventers of it: they found it in the Pagan Philoſophers. Plutarch informs us of the antiquity and univerſality of this ſyſtem, not as a mere hiſtorian, but as a faithful follower of it. 'It is impoſſible, ſays 'he (28), that one cauſe alone, whether good or bad, 'ſhould be the principle of all things together, be- 'cauſe GOD is not the cauſe of evil, and the har- 'mony of this world is compoſed of contraries, like 'a harp, whoſe muſic conſiſts of high and low notes; 'as Heraclitus ſaid, and to the ſame purpoſe Euri- 'pides alſo:

The good was never ſeparated from the evil,
The one is always mixed with the other,
That all things in the world may go on the better.

'Wherefore this opinion is very ancient being de- 'ſcended from Divines and Lawgivers, in times paſt, 'to the Poets and Philoſophers, but without its being 'known who was the firſt author of it; although it 'is ſo firmly imprinted in the minds of men, that it 'can by no means be defaced or rooted out: it is ſo 'frequently taught, not only in private diſcourſe, 'and common reports, but at the ſacrifices and di- 'vine ceremonies of the gods, as well in the bar- 'barous nations, as among the Greeks in many 'places, that neither does this world float in uncer- 'tainty, without being governed by providence and 'reaſon; neither is it one reaſon alone, which main- 'tains and governs it with I know not what rudders, 'and reins of obedience; but there are many of them 'mixed with good and evil; and to ſpeak openly, 'there is nothing here below, which nature brings 'forth and produces, that is in itſelf pure and ſimple; 'nor is there one only diſpenſer of the two veſſels, 'who diſtributes to us all affairs, as a Vintner does his 'wines, by mingling and brewing them one with ano- 'ther. Thus this life is governed by two principles 'and two powers contrary to one another; one of 'which directs and conducts us to the right hand by 'a right way, and the other, on the contrary, diverts 'us from it, and turns us back. Thus this life is 'mixed, and this world, if not all of it, yet at leaſt 'the lower and terreſtrial part of it below the moon, 'is unequal and variable, ſubject to all the changes 'that are poſſible: For nothing can be without a 'preceding cauſe, and what is good in it ſelf 'can never be the cauſe of evil; nature therefore 'muſt have a principle and cauſe, from which e- 'vil proceeds, as well as another, from which good 'proceeds. This is the opinion of the greateſt part, 'and the wiſeſt among the ancients; for ſome think, 'there are two gods acting in an oppoſite man- 'ner; the one the author of all good, and the o- 'ther of all evil: Others call him GOD, who is 'author of all good, and the other a dæmon; as 'did Zoroaſter the magician, of whom it is ſaid, 'that he lived five hundred years (29) before the 'times of the Trojan war. He therefore called the 'good god Oromazes, and the other Arimanius: 'And moreover he ſaid, that the one reſembled 'light more than any other ſenſible thing, and the 'other darkneſs and ignorance; and that there was 'between them two, one called Mithres; wherefore 'the Perſians do ſtill call him, who intercedes and 'mediates, Mithres; and he taught men to ſacri- 'fice to the one, to deſire of him all good things, and 'thank him for them; and to the other, to divert 'and keep off all evil and unfortunate things. . . . . 'did not conſider, that he curſed the generation and 'production of all things, which come into being 'by the ſtruggle and contrariety of the paſſions, and 'that the ſun would not tranſgreſs the bounds, 'prefixed to him, leſt the furies, the miniſters 'and aſſiſtants of juſtice, ſhould meet him. And 'Empedocles ſays, the principle of good is called 'love and friendſhip, and often harmonia; and the 'cauſe of evil is

A bloody fight, and peſtilential noiſe.

'As to the Pythagoreans, they denote and ſpecify 'this by many names, calling the good principle, 'one, finite, reſting, ſtreight, odd, ſquared, dexter, 'luminous; and the bad, two, infinite, moving, 'crooked, even, more long than broad, unequal, 'ſiniſter, dark. Ariſtotle calls the one Form, and 'the other Privation. And Plato, ſhadowing, as it 'were and covering his meaning, in many places, 'calls one of theſe contrary principles the Same, 'and the ſecond the Other: But in his book of 'laws, which he wrote when he was old, he no 'more calls them by ambiguous and covered names, 'nor by ſignificant notes, but in plain terms he ſays, 'that this world is not managed by one ſoul only, 'but by many, at a venture, at leaſt by two, whereof 'one is beneficent, and the other contrary to it, and 'produces contrary effects. And between theſe two 'there is alſo a third cauſe, which is not without 'a ſoul, nor without reaſon, nor unmoveable of it 'ſelf, as ſome think, but adjacent and adhering to 'the two others.' Plutarch, in another book (31), ſays expreſsly, that the nature of GOD does not permit him to do any thing but what is good, nor to be angry with any one, nor to hurt him. This author therefore muſt have been perſuaded, that the afflictions, which ſo often torment men, proceed from another cauſe than GOD, and conſequently that there were two principles, one that did nothing but what was good, and the other which did nothing but what was evil. I add, that the Perſian Philoſophers, who are much ancienter than thoſe of Egypt, have conſtantly taught this doctrine (32).

Plutarch carries it too far when he pretends, that this doctrine appeared in the public acts of religion among the Barbarians and Greeks (33), for though it be true, that the Pagans acknowledged and honoured hurtful gods; yet they taught alſo, both by their books and by their practice, that the ſame GOD, who ſometimes beſtowed good things upon a nation, did ſome time after afflict it, to take vengeance for ſome offence. If you read the Greek authors never ſo little, you will plainly perceive this: We may ſay the ſame thing of Rome. Read Livy, Cicero, and other Latin writers, you will clearly underſtand, that the ſame Jupiter, to whom ſacrifices were offered for a victory gained, was honoured upon other occaſions, that he might ceaſe to afflict the people of Rome: And though there was one Vejovis, much more inclined to do evil than to do good; nevertheleſs it was believed, that Dijovis, or Dieſpiter, that is, the good Jupiter, darted the thunderbolt. Aulus Gellius expreſſes himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he clearly diſtinguiſhes

(25) St Epiphan. adverſ. Hæreſ. pag. 620, ſuppoſes, that Scythianus went to Jeruſalem, to confer with the apoſtles. He went therefore before Titus took the city; and ſo his diſciple could not be cotemporary with Manes in the IIId century.

(26) Ib. p. 619.

(27) Suidas, in Μάνης.

(28) Plutarch, in his treatiſe of Iſis and Oſiris, pag. m. 1043. This paſſage in the Greek and Latin edition of Frankfort, 1620, is at pag. 369, and following.

(29) He ſhould ſay 5000: ſee the remark [E] of the article ZOROASTER, at the beginning.

(30) Ib. p. 1046.

(31) Non poſſe ſuaviter vivi juxta Epicurum pag. 1102.

(32) Diog. Laërt. in proœmio, num. viii. Agathias, Hiſt. lib. ii.

(33) Obſerve, that I cenſure Plutarch only for ſuppoſing, that by the public acts of religion the Greeks teſtified that there were ſome gods, the good Jupiter, for inſtance, who could do nothing but what was good.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by any one, who admits the Holy Scripture, either in whole or in part, would not easily be distinguishes Jupiter from Vejovis (34). ‘ Cum Jovem ‘ igitur & Dijovem à juvando nominassent : eum quo- ‘ que contra deum, qui non juvandi potestatem sed ‘ vim nocendi haberet (nam deos quosdam ut prodes- ‘ sent celebrant, quosdam ne obessent placabant) Ve- ‘ jovem appellaverunt, dempta atque detracta juvandi ‘ facultate. . . . . Simulachrum dei Vejovis, quod est ‘ in æde, de qua supra dixi, sagittas tenet, quæ sunt ‘ videlicet paratæ ad nocendum : quapropter eum de- ‘ um plerique Apollinem esse dixerunt. . . . Virgilium ‘ quoque aiunt, multæ antiquitatis hominem sine osten- ‘ tationis odio peritum, numina læva in Georgicis ‘ quoque deprecari, significantem quandam vim esse ‘ hujuscemodi deorum in lædendo magis quam in ju- ‘ vando potentem. Versus Virgilii hi sunt :

(34) Aulus Gellius, lib. v. cap. xi.

In tenui labor, at tenuis non gloria, si quem
Numina læva sinunt, auditque vocatus Apollo (35).

(35) See concerning these two kinds of gods, a passage of Arnobius, in the remark [G] of the article PAULICIANS.

‘ . . . Having named Jupiter and Dijovis from juvare ‘ to help ; on the contrary, they called that god, who had ‘ not the power of helping, but of hurting, Vejovis ; ‘ for they honoured some gods, that they might assist them, ‘ and some they prayed to, lest they should hurt them. . . . . ‘ The image of the god Vejovis, which is in the temple ‘ I before mentioned, holds arrows in his hand, to shew ‘ his readiness to hurt ; for which reason many have ‘ taken him for Apollo. . . . . . They say likewise, that ‘ Virgil, who was skilled in antiquity without ostenta- ‘ tion, deprecates the unpropitious deities in his Georgics, ‘ signifying, that these gods are more powerful to hurt, ‘ than to assist : He says ;

Though mean the theme, the glory will be great,
If hurtful gods permit, and Phœbus hear my pray'r.

Plutarch is also mistaken, when he thinks, that the Philosophers and Poets are agreed in the doctrine of two principles. Did he not remember that Homer, the prince of poets, their pattern, their common original ; that Homer, I say, set only one god over the two vessels of good and evil ?

Δοιοὶ γάρ τε πίθοι κατακείαται ἐν Διὸς οὔδει
Δώρων οἷα δίδωσι, κακῶν, ἕτερος δὲ ἑάων.
Ὅ μὲν καμμίξας δώῃ Ζεὺς τερπικέραυνος,
Ἄλλοτε μέν τε κακῷ ὅγε κύρεται, ἄλλοτε δ' ἐθλῷ
Ὧ δέ κε τῶν λυγρῶν δώῃ, λωβητὸν ἔθηκε.
Καί έ κακὴ βόσκουσι ἐπὶ χθόνα δῖαν ἐλάυνει·
Φοιτᾷ δ' οὔτε θεοῖσι τετιμένος οὔτε βροτοῖσιν.

Duo quippe dolia jacent in Jovis limine
Donorum quæ dat, alterum malorum, alterum vero bonorum :
Cui quidem miscens dederit Jupiter fulmine gaudens,
Interdum quidem in malum ille incidit, interdum & in bonum :
Cui vero ex malis dederit, injuriis omnibus obnoxium facit :
Et illum exitialis dolor acerbissimus super terram almám exercet :
Vagaturque, nec diis honoratus neque mortalibus (36).

(36) Homer, Iliad. lib. ult. 527.

Two vessels stand before the throne of Jove,
Replete with gifts ; these good, the others ill.
On some the god that thunders pours them mix'd :
Such lead a chequer'd life of happiness and woe.
But he, to whom the bad alone he sends,
Harrass'd with endless misery and pain,
Wanders, an outcast both of gods and men.'

Mr Costar has justly censured these words of Mr Girac : It seems, you imitate Homer's Jupiter, and that, drawing out of vessels, you pour out with both hands, as he did, this diversity of matter, by chance, and without choice. Here follows the censure. The comparison ‘ of Jupiter does me honour ; but it does ‘ little honour to him, who alledges it so impertinent- ‘ ly. Homer *, who is the inventer of this fiction, ‘ and Plato, who relates it † in his Republic, do ‘ not say, that Jupiter, having drawn out of his ‘ two vessels all the goods and evils of life, scatters ‘ them inconsiderately upon miserable mortals. They ‘ say only, that sometimes he pours them out pure, ‘ sometimes he mixes them ; from whence it comes to ‘ pass, that, among men, some are always unhappy, ‘ and the fortune of others is nothing but a reciprocal ‘ flux of happiness and misery (37).’ But Mr Costar forgot one thing, which deserved notice : He did not say, that of the three things, which Jupiter could do with these two vessels, he does but two of them : For he might either take out of the good vessel, or out of the bad, or partly out of one, and partly out of the other. Homer took care not to speak of these three offices ; for he knew too well, that the first never takes place, and I think he had done well to have suppressed the second ; for is there any man so unhappy, as to enjoy no manner of good ? Plato rejected this thought of Homer, because it is essential to God to do nothing but what is good ; from whence he concluded, that God is not the cause of some events that befal men. Οὐδ' ἄρα ὁ θεὸς, ἐπειδὴ ἀγαθὸς, πάντων ἂν εἴη αἴτιος, ὡς οἱ πολλοὶ λέγουσιν· ἀλλ' ὀλίγων μὲν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις αἴτιος, πολλῶν δὲ ἀναίτιος. πολὺ γὰρ ἐλάττω τἀγαθὰ τῶν κακῶν ἡμῖν. καὶ τῶν μὲν ἀγαθῶν οὐδένα ἄλλον αἰτιατέον· τῶν δὲ κακῶν ἄλλ' ἄττα δεῖ ζητεῖν τὰ αἴτια, ἀλλ' οὐ τὸν θεόν. Non igitur Deus, quum bonus sit, omnium causa est, ut multi dicunt, sed paucorum quidem hominibus causa est, multorum vero extra causam. Multo enim pauciora nobis sunt bona quam mala. Et bonorum quidem solus Deus causa est dicendus. Malorum autem quamlibet aliam præter Deum causam quærere decet (38). He says, that the Poets, who give us this fiction of two vessels, speak foolishly of God, and are guilty of a great sin. Οὐκ ἄρα ἀποδεκτέον ὅτε Ὅμηρε, ὅτ' ἄλλα ποιητὴν ταύτην τὴν ἁμαρτίαν περὶ τοὺς θεοὺς ἀνοήτως ἁμαρτάνοντα, καὶ λέγοντας ὡς δοιοὶ πίθοι. Neque Homeri igitur, neque alterius poëtæ admittendum est peccatum, stulte de Diis dicentis, in Jovis limine duo jacere dolia (39). We shall elsewhere (40) give a larger account of the Platonic hypothesis concerning the original of good and evil.

† Dialog. ii.

(37) Costar, Apol. pag. 225.

(38) Plato de Repub. lib. ii, pag. m. 605. D.

(39) Id. ib.

(40) In the remark [L] of the article PAULICIANS.

The Apology of Costar being very scarce in foreign countries, I shall make no scruple to cite a long passage out of it (41). ‘ Perhaps Mr Girac believed the ‘ romance of the rose, which makes fortune a Vintner, ‘ who distributes by pots and pints the several li- ‘ quors of these two vessels, according to her caprice ‘ and fancy ;

(41) Costar, ubi supra, pag. 226, 227.

Jupiter en toute saison
A sur l'issuë de sa maison,
Ce dit Homer, deux pleins tonneaux,
S'il n'est vieulx Homs ne Garçonneaux
Ni n'est Dame ni Demoiselle,
Soit vieille, jeune, laide ou belle,
Qui vie en ce monde reçoive,
Qui de ces deux tonneaux ne boive.
C'est une Taverne pleniere,
Dont Fortune est la Taverniere,
Et en trait en pots & en coupes,
Pour faire à tout le monde soupes.
Tous elle en abreuve à ses mains,
Mais aux uns plus, aux autres moins.
N'est nul qui chacun jour ne pinte,
De ces tonneaux, ou quarte ou pinte,
Ou muy, ou septier, ou chopine,
S'il, comme il plaist à la mechine,
Ou plene paulme, ou quelque goute,
Que la Fortune au bec luy boute :
Et bien & mal à chacun verse,
Si comme elle est douce & peverse.

That is,

‘ Homer informs us, that Jupiter has always two ‘ full vessels before him ; and that every one, whether ‘ old

* Iliad. α.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google be refuted, if it were maintained by Pagan Philoſophers, well ſkilled in diſputing [D].

*' old or young, man or boy, matron or maiden, hand-
' ſome or ugly, drinks of theſe veſſels. It is a tavern
' of which fortune is the Vintner, who draws for all the ' world, and gives them to drink with her own hand, to ' ſome more, to others leſs. Every one drinks a certain ' portion, be it pint, quart, or gallon, every day out of ' this veſſel, as it pleaſes fortune, who mixes to all, good or
' evil, as ſhe happens to be in good or bad humour.'*

For the reſt, the ancient hereſy of two principles prevails ſtill in ſome oriental countries (42); and it is believed, that it was very common among the ancient barbarous people of Europe. ' Apud Sclavos nondum ' quidem Chriſti fide imbutos, ſimile dogma receptum ' fuiſſe, Helmoldus ‡ auctor eſt, qui malum illorum ' Deum Zeevuboch vocatum ſcribit. Paria & de aliis ' Germanorum populis Voſſius * conjicit. Atque ' hodienum, Provinciæ Fetu in Africa incolas perſua- ' ſum ſibi habere, eſſe aliquod Numen, cui omnia ' mala, aliud cui bona accepta ferenda, Joh. Guil. ' Mullerus , Danicæ in Africa Eccleſiæ quondam Pa- ' ſtor, teſtatur (43). - - - Helmoldus tells us, that the Sclavonians, before their converſion to Chriſtianity, held a like opinion: he informs us, that their bad god was called Zeevuboch. Voſſius conjectures the ſame of the other nations of the Germans. And John William Muller, formerly miniſter of the Daniſh church in Africa, tells us, that the inhabitants of the province of Fetu in Africa, at this time, aſcribe all the good they receive to one god, and all the bad to another.' The Gurdes, a nation in Aſia, worſhip two principles, one as the author of good, the other as the cauſe of evil; but with this difference, that they are infinitely more exact in the worſhip of the latter, than of the former (44).

[D] It would not eaſily be refuted, if it were maintained by Pagan Philoſophers, well ſkilled in diſputing.] By reaſons à priori they would quickly have been routed: but the reaſons à poſteriori were their ſtrong holds: with theſe they might have fought a long time, and it would have been difficult to force them. You will underſtand me better by the explication I ſhall now ſubjoin. The moſt certain and moſt clear ideas of order we have, teach us, that a Being, which exiſts by itſelf, which is neceſſary and eternal, muſt be one, infinite, almighty, and endowed with all kind of perfection. If therefore we conſult theſe ideas, we ſhall find nothing more abſurd, than the hypotheſis of two eternal principles, and independent on one another, one of which has no goodneſs, and can put a ſtop to the deſigns of the other. This is what I call reaſons à priori; and which neceſſarily lead us to reject this hypotheſis, and to admit only one principle of all things. If nothing but this were required to prove the goodneſs of a ſyſtem, the cauſe would be determined to the confuſion of Zoroaſter, and all his followers. But every ſyſtem requires theſe two things to make it good; one, that the ideas of it be diſtinct; the other, that it accounts for what experience teaches us. We muſt ſee therefore whether the phœnomena of nature can be conveniently explained by the hypotheſis of one principle alone. When the Manichees tell us, that, ſince we ſee in the world many things, that are contrary to one another, as heat and cold, white and black, light and darkneſs, there muſt neceſſarily be two firſt principles (45), they argue pitifully; for the oppoſition between thoſe Beings, however confirmed by what we call variations, diſorders, and irregularities of nature, cannot make one half an objection againſt the unity, ſimplicity, and immutability of God. All theſe things may be accounted for, either by the different powers God has given to bodies, or by the laws of motion, which he has eſtabliſhed, or from the concurrence of occaſional intelligent cauſes, by which he is pleaſed to act. This does not require the quinteſſences, which the Rabbins have imagined, and which have furniſhed an Italian biſhop with an argument ad hominem, in favour of the incarnation. Di queſta unione parla diffuſamente l'Autore, portando gli eſempi e le ſimilitudini, con cui la ſpiegano i Rabbini (alcune delle quale ſono le medeſime che adoprano i noſtri Theologi per eſplicar l'Incarnaſione) e con le ſteſſe loro dottrine prova evidentemente ch'ella non ſia altro che un inſefroſatione, cioe due nature ſefireita, è Divinita inſieme in un ſuppoſto (46). They ſay, that God has united himſelf to ten moſt pure intelligences called Sefira, and that he acts with them in ſuch a manner, that all the variations and imperfections of effects muſt be attributed to them. Attribuendoſi à Dio ne' ſacri libri atti frà ſe contrarii e imperfetti, per ſalvare l'immutabilita e ſua ſomma perfettione, hanno poſta una Gerarchia di dieci Intelligenze puriſſime, per mezo delle quali, come inſtrumenti della ſua potenza, egli opera tutte le coſe, ma in modo che à loro ſole s'attribuiſce ogni varieta, imperfettione, e mutatione (47). Without being at the expence of ſuch an hypotheſis, the ſimplicity and immutability of the ways of God may be ſaved; the ſole eſtabliſhment of occaſional cauſes is ſufficient for that, provided we are only to explain the phœnomena relating to bodies, and do not conſider man. The heavens, and the reſt of the univerſe, declare the glory, power, and the unity of God; man alone, that maſter-piece of his creation among things viſible, Man alone, I ſay, affords the greateſt objection againſt the unity of God. The matter is thus:

Man is wicked and unhappy: every one knows it by what he feels in himſelf, and by the intercourſe he is obliged to have with his neighbours. He, who lives only five or ſix years (48), may be perfectly convinced of theſe two things; and they, who live long, and are much engaged in worldly affairs, know this ſtill more clearly. Travels afford perpetual leſſons upon this ſubject: they ſhow every where the monuments of mens misfortunes and wickedneſſes: this appears every where by the many priſons, hoſpitals, gibbets, and beggars. Here you ſee the ruins of a flouriſhing city; elſewhere you cannot even find the ruins of it (49).

Jam ſeges eſt ubi Troja fuit, reſecandaque falce
Luxuriat Phrygio ſanguini pinguis humus (50).

*Where the famed Troy once ſtood, now corn is found,
And Phrygian blood manures the fertile ground.*

Read theſe fine words taken from a letter that was written to Cicero: ' Ex Aſia rediens, cum ab Ægina ' Megaram verſus navigarem cœpi regiones circum- ' circa proſpicere. Poſt me erat Ægina, ante Megara, ' dextra Piræeus, ſiniſtra Corinthus: quæ oppida quo- ' dam tempore florentiſſima fuerunt, nunc proſtrata & ' diruta ante oculos jacent (51). - - - - Returning out of Aſia, and ſailing from Ægina towards Megara, I began to take a view of the countries on every ſide of me. Behind me was Ægina, before me Megara, on my right hand Piræeus, on my left Corinth: which cities were once in a moſt flouriſhing condition, but now lye in ruins.' Studious men, without going out of their cloſets, make the greateſt diſcoveries on theſe two articles; becauſe, in reading hiſtory, they take a view of all the ages and countries of the world. Hiſtory, properly ſpeaking, is nothing but a collection of the crimes and misfortunes of mankind; but we muſt obſerve, that theſe two evils, the one moral, and the other phyſical, do not wholly fill up hiſtory, nor all the experience of private perſons. There are every where ſome things, that are phyſically good and morally good; ſome examples of virtue, and ſome examples of happineſs: and this is that, which makes the difficulty; for if there were none but evil and unhappy men, there would be no occaſion to have recourſe to the hypotheſis of two principles; it is the mixture of happineſs and virtue with miſery and vice, which requires this hypotheſis; and this is the ſtrong hold of the ſect of Zoroaſter.

See the reaſoning of Plato and Plutarch in the paſſages I have cited above.

In order to make it appear how difficult it would be to refute this falſe ſyſtem, and that we may conclude, that it is neceſſary to have recourſe to revelation to overthrow it, let us feign here a diſpute between Meliſſus and Zoroaſter, who were both Pagans, and great Philoſophers. Meliſſus, who acknowledged but one principle (52), would ſay, at firſt, that his ſyſtem agrees admirably well with the ideas of order. The neceſſary Being is not bounded; and therefore is infinite and almighty, and conſequently one; and it would be a monſtrous thing, and a contradiction, if he had no goodneſs, but the greateſt of all vices, viz.

(42) See the words of Father Thomaſſin, in the remark [D] of the article PAULICIANS.

‡ Helmold. Chronic. Sclav. cap. liii.

* Voſſ. de Orig. Idololatr. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 280.

 Guill. Muller. Beſchreibung der Africaniſchen Landſchafft Fetu, pag. 43, 44.

(43) Tobias Pfannerus, Syſtema Theol. Gentilis, pag. 258.

(44) Venerano come i Manichei due principii, uno del bene, e l'altro del male: con queſta differenza che poco penſando al primo, come quello che credono non poter loro far alcun malo, attendono ſolo al culto del ſecondo. Giornale de Letterati, of the thirty firſt of March, 1673, pag. 33, of the abſtract of Viaggio, &c. of the voyage to the Eaſt Indies, of Vicenzo Maria, of St Catherine of Siena, procurator-general of the Carmelites.

(45) See St Epiphanius, when he ſpeaks of Scythianus, pag. 619, adv. Hæreſ.

(46) Joſeph Cianes, biſhop of Marſico, in diſcurſu de ſanctiſſima Incarnatione clariſſimis Hebræorum doctrinis ab eorundem argumentorum oppoſitionibus defenſa, in the Journal of Italy, Aug. 27, 1668. pag. 102.

(47) The Journal of Italy, ibid. pag. 101.

(48) At that age he has played and ſuffered malicious tricks; he has had grief and ſorrow, and has powted many times, &c.

(49) See Converſation XXX, of Balzac.

(50) Ovid. Epiſt. Penel. ad Ulyſſ. ver. 53.

(51) Sulpicius ad Ciceron. Epiſt. v, lib. iv. Cicer. ad Famil.

(52) See Diogenes Laertius, lib. ix, num. xxiv, & ibi Menagius.

an

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It was a happy thing, that St Auguſtin, who underſtood ſo well all the arts of controverſy, an eſſential malice. I confeſs to you, would Zoroaſter anſwer, that your ideas are very well connected, and I am willing to grant, that, in this reſpect, your hypotheſis ſurpaſſes mine. I will not inſiſt upon an objection, which I might make uſe of; which is this, that as infinity muſt include every thing that is real, and malice (53) being no leſs a real Being than goodneſs, the univerſe requires, that there ſhould be both wicked and good Beings; and that, ſince a ſovereign goodneſs, and a ſovereign malice, cannot ſubſiſt in one and the ſame ſubject, there muſt be in nature one Being eſſentially good, and another eſſentially evil: I do not inſiſt, I ſay, upon this objection (54); I will allow, that your ſyſtem is more agreeable to the notions of order than mine: but explain to me, I pray, by your hypotheſis, whence it comes to paſs, that man is wicked, and ſo ſubject to pain and grief? I defy you to find in your principles a reaſon of this phænomenon, as I can in mine; and now I have regained the advantage I gave you; for, as you ſurpaſs me in the beauty of ideas, and in reaſons à priori, ſo I ſurpaſs you in the explication of phænomena, and in reaſons à poſteriori. And ſince the principal character of a good ſyſtem is to account for what experience teaches us, and that the bare incapacity of explaining it, is a proof, that an hypotheſis is not good, how beautiful ſoever it appears, you muſt grant, that I have hit the mark, by admitting two principles, and that you have not hit it, by admitting but one.

(53) That is, a malicious action. I remark this, leſt any one ſhould allledge, that evil is nothing but a privation.

(54) I have read, in the Journal of Italy, of the thirty firſt of Auguſt, 1674, pag. 101, that Piccinardi, in the third book of his Dogmatica Philoſophia Peripatetica Chriſtiana, refutes this theſis, An aliud Deus & poſſibile, which was maintained by Father Peter Conti againſt Colmenar.

Here, without doubt, lies the ſtreſs of the whole matter: here Meliſſus has a great opportunity to ſhow his parts; Hic Rhodus, hic ſaltus. Res ad triarios rediit. Nunc animis opus, Æneа, nunc pectore firmo. Let us hear Zoroaſter continuing his diſcourſe.

If man is the creature of one principle perfectly good, moſt holy and omnipotent, can he be expoſed to diſeaſes, to heat and cold, hunger and thirſt, pain and grief? can he have ſo many bad inclinations? can he commit ſo many crimes? can perfect holineſs produce a criminal creature? can perfect goodneſs produce an unhappy creature? would not omnipotence, joined with infinite goodneſs, furniſh his own work plentifully with good things, and ſecure it from every thing that might be offenſive or vexatious? if Meliſſus conſults the notions of order, he will anſwer, that man was not wicked when God made him. He will ſay, that man was created by God in a happy ſtate; but he not following the light of his conſcience, which was intended by the author of his Being to conduct him in the way of virtue, became ſo wicked, and deſerved, that God, who is perfectly juſt as well as perfectly good, ſhould make him feel the effects of his wrath. God therefore is not the cauſe of moral evil, but he is the cauſe of phyſical evil, i. e. of the puniſhment of moral evil; a puniſhment, which is ſo far from being inconſiſtent with a principle perfectly good, that it flows neceſſarily from one of his attributes, I mean from his juſtice, which is no leſs eſſential to him than his goodneſs. This anſwer, which is the beſt that Meliſſus could make, is good and ſound at the bottom; but it may be oppoſed by reaſons that have ſomething more ſpecious, and dazzling: for Zoroaſter would not fail to repreſent, that, if man were the work of a principle infinitely good and holy, he ought to have been created not only without any actual evil, but alſo without any inclination to evil, ſince that inclination is ſuch a defect, as could not have ſuch a principle for it's cauſe. It remains therefore, that we ſay, that man, coming out of the hands of his Creator, had only the power of determining himſelf to evil, and that having determined himſelf to it, he was the ſole cauſe of the crime, which he committed, and of the moral evil, which has introduced itſelf into the world. But, I. we have no diſtinct idea, that can make us underſtand, that a Being, which does not exiſt by itſelf, can nevertheleſs act by itſelf. Zoroaſter therefore will ſay, that the free will, which was given to man, is not able actually to determine itſelf, ſince it exiſts continually and totally by the action of God. II. He will put this queſtion: did God foreſee, that man would make an ill uſe of his free-will? if you anſwer yes, he will ſay, that it ſeems not poſſible, that any thing can foreſee that, which depends wholly upon an indeterminate cauſe. But I will grant you, will he ſay, that God did foreſee the ſin of his creature, and from thence I conclude, that he would have hindered him from ſinning; for the ideas of order will not ſuffer us to believe that a cauſe infinitely good and holy, which can hinder the introduction of moral evil, ſhould not hinder it, eſpecially ſince, by permitting it, God was obliged ſeverely to puniſh his own work. If God did not foreſee the fall of man, yet at leaſt he muſt think it poſſible: ſince therefore he ſaw himſelf obliged, in caſe it ſhould happen, to depart from his paternal goodneſs, and to make his children very miſerable, by exerciſing upon them the office of a ſevere judge, he would have determined man to moral good, as he determined him to that which is phyſical; he would not have left in the ſoul of man any power, which ſhould incline him to ſin; any more than he has left any to incline him to miſery as ſuch. This is what our clear and diſtinct ideas of order lead us to, when we follow, ſtep by ſtep, what a principle infinitely good ought to do: for if a goodneſs, ſo bounded as that of earthly fathers neceſſarily requires that they ſhould prevent, as much as is poſſible, the bad uſe their children may make of the good things they give them; much more will an infinite and almighty goodneſs prevent the ill effects of his gifts. Inſtead of giving them free-will, it will determine it's creatures to that which is good; or, if it gives them a free-will, it will alway effectually watch over them, to keep them from ſinning. I believe indeed, that Meliſſus would not remain ſilent; but all that he could anſwer would be preſently oppoſed by reaſons as plauſible as his, and ſo there would be no end of the diſpute (55).

If he had recourſe to retortion, he would very much perplex Zoroaſter; but by once granting him his two principles, he would leave him an open way to come at the explication of the origin of evil. Zoroaſter would go back to the time of the chaos, which is a ſtate, as to his two principles, very like that, which Hobbes calls the ſtate of nature, and which he ſuppoſes to have preceded the firſt eſtabliſhment of ſocieties. In this ſtate of nature one man was a wolf to another, and every thing belonged to the firſt poſſeſſor: none was maſter of any thing, except he was the ſtrongeſt. To get out of this confuſion, every one agreed to quit his right to the whole, that he might have a property in ſomething; they tranſacted together, and the war ceaſed. The two principles, weary of the chaos, wherein each confounded and overthrew what the other would do, came at laſt to an agreement; each of them yielded ſomething, each had a ſhare in the production of man, and in the laws of the union of the ſoul (56). The good principle obtained thoſe, which procure to man a thouſand pleaſures, and conſented to thoſe, which expoſe man to a thouſand ſorrows; and if it conſented, that moral good ſhould be infinitely leſs in mankind than moral evil, he repaired the damage in ſome other kind of creatures, wherein vice ſhould be much leſs than virtue. If many men in this life have more miſery than happineſs, this is recompenſed in another ſtate: what they have not under a human ſhape, they ſhall recover under another (57). By means of this agreement, the chaos was diſembroiled, the chaos, I ſay, a paſſive principle, which was the field of battel between theſe two active principles. The poets have repreſented this diſembroiling under the image of a quarrel ended (58). This is what Zoroaſter might alledge, boaſting that he does not attribute to the good principle the production of a creature at his own pleaſure, which was to be ſo wicked and miſerable; but only after he had found by experience, that he could do no better, nor better oppoſe the horrible deſigns of the evil principle. To render his hypotheſis the leſs offenſive, he might have denied, that there was a long war between the two principles, and lay aſide all thoſe fights, and priſoners, which the Manichees ſpeak of. The whole might be reduced to the certain knowledge of the two principles, that one could never obtain from the other but ſuch and ſuch conditions. And thus an eternal agreement might have been made upon this foot.

A thouſand great difficulties might be objected to this Philoſopher; but as he would find anſwers, and after all deſire to be furniſhed with a better hypotheſis, pretending to have ſolidly refuted that of Meliſſus, he would never be brought back into the way of truth. Human reaſon is too weak for this end: it is a principle

(55) All this is more largely diſcuſſed in the remarks of the article PAULICIANS.

(56) Apply here what Juno ſays to Venus in Virgil, Æneid. lib. iv, ver. 98.
Sed quis erit modus, aut quo nunc certamine tanto?
Quin potius pacem æternam pactoſque hymenæos Exercemus? . . . . .
. . . . . Communem hunc ergo populum, paribuſque regamus
Auſpiciis. . . . . Let diſcord be no more, but peace eterna! Succeed; and, when the nuptial band is tied, One common people be our common care.

(57) Note, that all thoſe, or the greateſt part of thoſe, who admitted two principles, held the metempſychoſis.

(58) Hanc Deus & melior LITEM natura diremit. Nature, and nature's god, this STRIFE compos'd. Ovid. Metam. lib. I, ver. 21.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

verſy, abandoned the Manichean Hereſy; for he would have removed its groſſeſt errors, and framed ſuch a ſyſtem, as, by his management, would have puzzled the Orthodox. Pope Leo I, acted very vigorouſly againſt the Manichees; and his zeal being ſupported by the Imperial laws [E], this ſect received then a very great blow. It became formidable in Armenia in the IXth century, as I ſay elſewhere (a), and it appeared in France in the ciple of deſtruction, and not of edification; it is only fit to ſtart doubts, and to turn itſelf all manner of ways, to perpetuate a diſpute: and I think I am not miſtaken, if I ſay, of natural revelation, that is, of the light of reaſon, what divines ſay of the Moſaical œconomy. They ſay, that it was only fit to diſcover to man his weakneſs, and the neceſſity of a redeemer, and of a law of mercy. It was a ſchoolmaſter (they are their own words) to bring men to JESUS CHRIST. Let us ſay the ſame of reaſon; it can only diſcover to man his ignorance and weakneſs, and the neceſſity of another revelation, which is that of the ſcripture. There we find what is ſufficient to refute unanſwerably the hypotheſis of two principles, and all the objections of Zoroaſter. We find there the unity of GOD, and his infinite perfections; the fall of man, and the conſequences of it. Let any one tell us with a pompous ſhew of arguments, that it was not poſſible, that moral evil ſhould introduce itſelf into the world by the work of a principle infinitely good and holy; we ſhall anſwer, that this was nevertheleſs done, and conſequently that it is very poſſible. There is nothing more fooliſh than to reaſon againſt matter of fact; this maxim, Ab actu ad potentiam valet conſequentia, is as clear as this propoſition, two and two make four (59). The Manichees were ſenſible of what I have juſt now obſerved, and therefore they rejected the Old Teſtament; but what they retained of the Scripture ſupplied the orthodox with ſufficient arms againſt them. And ſo it was not very difficult to confound thoſe Heretics, who otherwiſe childliſhly entangled themſelves when they came to particulars (60). Now ſince the Scripture affords us the beſt ſolutions, I cannot be blamed for ſaying, that it would be difficult to gain the victory over a Heathen Philoſopher in this cauſe. This is the text of this remark.

(a) In the article PAULICIANS, remarks [B], and [D].

(59) See the article PAULICIANS, remark [E] towards the beginning.

(60) See the remark [B].

How long ſo ever it be, I ſhall not conclude without adverti ſing my reader, that there remains ſtill three obſervations to be made, for which I refer the reader to another article (61). In the firſt, I ſhall conſider, whether the Fathers have always reaſoned well againſt the Manichees, and whether they could always ſilence them. In the ſecond I ſhall ſhew, that, according to the doctrines of Paganiſm, the objections of Zoroaſter had no great force; and in the third, in what ſenſe it may be ſaid, that the Chriſtians do not reject the ſyſtem of the two principles. It is more difficult for them, than the Pagans, to reſolve theſe difficulties, in the way of reaſon, becauſe they have among them diſputes about liberty, in which the aggreſſor ſeems always to have the better (62); and becauſe the ſmall number of thoſe, who are predeſtinated, and the eternity of hell-torments afford ſuch objections, as Meliſſus would not very much fear.

(61) To that of the PAULICIANS, remarks [E], [G], and [H].

(62) See the remark [F] of the article MARCIONITES.

[E] The zeal of Pope Leo was ſupported by the Imperial laws.] There were Manichees at Rome when St Auguſtin came thither in 383. 'For he lodged in 'the houſe of a Manichee, and converſed very often 'with thoſe of that ſect. . . . . But after Carthage 'had been taken and deſtroyed by Genſerich king of 'the Vandals, in 439, the greateſt part of the Mani'chees in Africa fled, as well as the Catholics, in'to Italy, &c. and chiefly to Rome (63).' Pope Leo obliged the people to make an exact ſearch after theſe Heretics, and ſhewed by what marks they might be diſcovered (64). 'To create in all men the greater 'abhorrence of ſo deteſtable a ſect, he held an aſ'ſembly, to which, together with the biſhops, who 'lived near Rome, he invited the chief of the clergy, 'of the ſenate, of the nobility of Rome, and of the 'common people †. There he produced the moſt 'conſiderable among the Manichees, and one of 'their biſhops, who made a public confeſſion of their 'abominable luſts, which I dare not declare, leſt I 'ſhould offend the ears, or rather the chaſte eyes of 'my reader; and which thoſe ſame perſons, who 'had been guilty of them in their ſecret aſſemblies, 'by order of this falſe biſhop, declared before all the 'world, and diſcovered at the ſame time what their 'biſhops and prieſts were, and the ſecret places where 'they aſſembled, their prophane myſteries and ſacri'legious ceremonies, all which was authentically 'taken down in writing. And St Leo gave an ac'count of all this to the people a little while after in 'a ſermon, which he made for the faſt of the Ember'week, wherein he declared ‡, that they were obliged 'in conſcience to accuſe thoſe, whom they knew to 'be engaged in ſo infamous and pernicious a Hereſy; 'that all ought to unite and act with the ſame zeal, 'and with equal vigilance, againſt thoſe common 'enemies; and that thoſe, who thought they ought 'not to diſcover them, would be guilty of a very 'criminal ſilence before the great tribunal of JESUS 'CHRIST, tho' they did not partake in their errors. 'In fine, he cauſed ſuch diligent ſearch to be made 'after the Manichees, and was ſo well ſeconded by 'the people, that none of them could eſcape; ſo 'that he had the good fortune to deliver Rome en'tirely from that Hereſy. For many of thoſe Here'tics, being ſtrongly affected by his powerful exhor'tations, were ſeriouſly converted to GOD; and, 'after they had made a public abjuration of their 'Hereſy in the church ‡, and ſigned the form, which 'was preſented to them, containing a condemnation 'of Manes, and of his doctrine and books, they ſub'mitted to the penance, which was impoſed on them. 'Thoſe who continued obſtinate in their error, and 'refuſed to ſubſcribe this condemnation, were con'demned by the judges to baniſhment, according to 'the laws and edicts of the emperors. But, becauſe 'the moſt wicked and dangerous followers of this 'execrable Hereſy, fearing the puniſhment of their 'crimes, had fled away; he gave notice of it to 'the biſhops of Italy, and other provinces, by a 'circular letter, wherein, after he had declared to 'to them all that was done at Rome in this cauſe of 'the Manichees, he exhorted them to proſecute thoſe 'fugitives, and to give all neceſſary orders to prevent 'their retiring into their dioceſes, proteſting, that 'they would be inexcuſable before GOD *, if it 'ſhould ever happen, that any of their ſubjects were 'ſeduced by theſe impoſtors, for want of due care to 'diſcover them, to drive them away, and to hinder 'them from ſpreading among the people the venom 'of their deteſtable doctrine. And that which finiſhed 'the extermination of this Hereſy, was, that the em'peror Valentinian III, knowing that the holy 'Pope had diſcovered the crimes of the Manichees, 'cauſed an edict to be publiſhed , wherein he con'firms and renews all the ordinances of his predeceſ'ſors againſt them, declares them infamous, incapable 'of any offices, and of bearing arms, making a will, 'contracting and doing any valid act in civil ſociety; 'forbids all the ſubjects of the empire to conceal and 'ſhelter any of them, and requires them to diſcover 'and proſecute them, that they may be puniſhed as 'ſoon as they ſhall be known. Thus this Hereſy, 'which came from Africa into Italy, was quickly 'baniſhed from it by the effectual zeal of St Leo (65).'

† Contra communes hoſtes pro ſalute communi una communis debet eſſet vigilantia; . . . . & qui tales non prodendos putant, in judicio Chriſti invenientur rei de ſilentio, etiamſi non contaminenatur aſſenſu. Ser. 5. de jejun. decim. menſ.

‡ Ut damnarent Manichæum cum prædicationibus & diſciplinis ſuis publicâ in Eccleſia profeſſione, & manus ſuæ ſubſcriptione compulimus. S. Leo. Ep. ii. ad Epiſc. per Italiam: & Epiſt. 93. ad Turib. Aſturic.

* Ante tribunal Domini de reatu negligentiæ ſe non poterit excuſare quicunque plebem ſuam contra ſacrilegæ perverſionis auctores noluerit cuſtodire. Epiſt. ii. ad Epiſc. per Italiam.

 Nov. Valent. 3. de Manic.

Father Thomaſſin does not forget this example of the uſe of penal laws againſt Hereſy. 'St Leo the Pope, 'ſays he (66), in his firſt Decretal, ſays, that ſeveral 'Manichees were converted at Rome, but that 'ſome among them were ſo far engaged in thoſe 'deteſtable errors, that no remedies, that could be 'uſed, were ſufficient to reclaim them; that after'wards the rigour of the laws had been made uſe of, 'and, according to the conſtitutions of the Chriſtian 'princes, the public judges had condemned them to 'a perpetual baniſhment, leſt their contagious con'verſation ſhould infect the reſt of the flock.' I put in the margin the words, which he quotes from St Leo (67). A little after, he cites the Code of Juſtinian, to inform us, that the eleventh law of the fifth title of the firſt book condemns the Manichees to loſe their head in whatever part of the Roman empire they are found. Manichæo in loco Romano deprehenſo (63) Maimbourg's Hiſt. of St Leo, book i, pag. 14.

(64) Id. ib. pag. 18.

† Ep. 93. ad Turib. Ser. 5. de jejun. decim. menſ.

(65) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 20, ad ann. 443.

(66) Thomaſſin of the Unity of the Church, Tom. i, pag. 339.

(67) Aliquanti vero, qui ita ſe demerſerunt ut nullum his auxiliantis poſſet remedium ſubvenire, ſubditi legibus, ſecundum Chriſtianorum Principum conſtituta, ne ſanctum gregem ſua contagione pollueret, per publicos judices perpetuo ſunt exilio relegati.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the time of the Albigenſes (b). This cannot be denied: but it is not true, that the Albigenſes were Manichees (c). Theſe, among other errors, taught that the ſouls of plants are rational; and condemned Agriculture as a murdering employment; but they permitted it to their hearers in favour of their elect [F].

(b) See the biſhop of Meaux's Hiſt. of Variations, book xi.

(c) See Mr Baſnage, Hiſt. of the Religion of the Reformed Churches, Part i. ch. iv, &c.

NOTA BENE. As in this article, in that of the MARCIONITES, and PAULICIANS, and ſome others, there are ſome things, which have given offence to ſeveral perſons, and have made them ſuſpect, that I had a mind to favour the Manichean ſect, and raiſe doubts in the minds of my Chriſtian readers, I here GIVE NOTICE, that you will find at the end of this work, a diſſertation to ſhew, that this can by no means weaken the foundations of the Chriſtian Faith.

(68) Thomaſſin, in pag. 377.

(69) Ib. p. 378.

prehenſo caput amputare (68). The next law, continues he (69), is of the emperor Juſtin, and it diſtinguiſhes the Manichees not only from the Heretics, but alſo from the Greeks, that is, from Pagans, Jews, and Samaritans. The Manichees are puniſhed with death; all others are only condemned as Heretics, who cannot be promoted to any magiſtracy, or dignity, nor diſcharge the office of judges, or patrons, or fathers of cities.

[F] They permitted Agriculture to their hearers in favour of their elect.] The Manichees were divided into two orders, that of the elect, and that of the hearers. The former were not allowed to exerciſe Agriculture, or even to gather fruit; the later were allowed to do theſe things, and were aſſured, that the murders, they committed in this exerciſe, were pardoned them by the interceſſion of the particles of GOD, which came out of priſon, when the elect did eat them. Thus the remiſſion of theſe murders was founded upon this, that they furniſhed the elect with food, and procured liberty to the particles of the divine ſubſtance, that were impriſoned in plants. St Auguſtin relates theſe chimæras, and laughs at them as they deſerve. ‘ Cæteras animas & in pecora redire putant, ‘ & in omnia quæ radicibus fixa ſunt, atque aluntur ‘ in terra. Herbas enim atque arbores ſic putant vi- ‘ vere, ut vitam, quæ illis ineſt, & ſentire credant, ‘ & dolere, cum læduntur, nec aliquid inde ſine ‘ cruciatu eorum quenquam poſſe vellere, aut carpere. ‘ Propter quod agrum ſpinis purgare nefas habent. ‘ Unde agriculturam, quæ omnium artium eſt innocentiſſima, tanquam plurium homicidiorum ream ‘ dementes accuſant; ſuiſque auditoribus ideo hæc ‘ arbitrantur ignoſci, quia præbent inde alimenta ‘ electis ſuis, ut divina illa ſubſtantia in eorum ventre ‘ purgata impetret eis veniam, quorum traditur oblatione purganda. Itaque ipſi Electi nec in agris ‘ operantes, nec poma carpentes, nec ſaltem folia ulla ‘ vellentes, expectant hæc afferri uſibus ſuis ab auditoribus ſuis, viventes de tot ac tantis ſecundum ſuam vanita- ‘ homicidiis alienis (70). - - - - As for other ſouls, they think that they return into beaſts and plants. For they hold, that herbs and trees have ſuch a kind of life, as is ſenſible of pain, when they are hurt, and that nothing can be pulled or torn from them without torturing them. For this reaſon they think it a crime to root thorns out of a field. From whence they are ſo fooliſh as to condemn Agriculture, the moſt innocent of arts, as being guilty of many murders; and they think their hearers are therefore allowed to practiſe it, becauſe by that means they provide food for their elect, that that divine ſubſtance being purged in their belly may obtain pardon for thoſe, by whoſe offering it is delivered to be purged. Therefore the elect themſelves, neither working in the fields, nor gathering fruit, nor pulling off any leaves, expect theſe things to be brought them for their uſe by their hearers, living, as they vainly think, by the repeated murders of others.’

(70) Auguſt. de Hæreſ. cap. xlvi, fol. m. 116. verſo.

MANTO, the daughter of Tireſias, and a great Diviner, as well as her father. She was ſo highly eſteemed, that, when the Argians plundered the city of Thebes, they thought they could not acquit themſelves of the vow, they had made to Apollo, to conſecrate to him the moſt excellent thing they had among their ſpoils, but by offering to him this maid. She was therefore ſent to the temple of Delphi: but this did not oblige her to make any vow of continence, or if ſhe was engaged to it, ſhe very ill obſerved her vow; for we read, that Alcmæon, who was generaliſſimo of the army that took Thebes, had two children by our Manto; a ſon, whoſe name was Amphilochus, and a daughter, who was very handſome, and was called Tiſiphone. Theſe were the fruits of a courtſhip, which had ſomething very ſingular in it, ſince it happened during the fury, which ſeized Alcmæon, after he had put his mother to death. This is what Apollodorus (a) tells us concerning Manto. Others ſay (b), that ſhe was indeed carried to Delphi with the other Theban priſoners, but that the oracle having ordered them to go and plant a colony, they went to Claros [A], where Rhacius had ſettled one; and that Rhacius having learned from Manto, who thoſe were, with whom ſhe had made this journey, and for what end they made it, took her to wife, and had a ſon by her named Mopſus (c). Diodorus Siculus (d), inſtead of this, tells us, that the daughter of Tireſias was called Daphne; that ſhe was ſent to Delphi as an offering, and an Ex-voto of the Argians; that ſhe improved the prophetic knowledge ſhe had already acquired, and wrote a great number of oracles; that it is pretended, Homer ſtole from her many verſes to adorn his Poems; and that ſhe was named Sibylla, becauſe ſhe was often ſeized with a divine ſpirit, and gave many anſwers (e). Pauſanias ſays, that, in his time, at Thebes, before the porch of a temple, the ſtone was ſhewn, on which Manto ſate, and which was called the chair of Manto (f). He ſpeaks of the tomb of Manto in another place (g); but there he means another perſon, who was the daughter of Polyidus. She of whom Virgil ſpeaks, is the ſame with the daughter of Tireſias [B]. And this ſhews, that

(a) Bibl. lib. iii, pag. m. 196, 200.

(b) Pauſanias, lib. viii, pag. m. 207.

(c) See, below, citation (2).

(d) Bibl. lib. v, cap. vi.

(e) See one of her oracles in Ovid, Metam. lib. vi, upon occaſion of the worſhip of Latona.

(f) Pauſan. lib. ix, pag. 289.

(g) Ib. lib. i, pag. 41.

(1) Lib. i, cap. xvii.

(2) Mopſus, according to Strabo, was the ſon of Apollo and Manto, and not, as Pauſanias would have it, of Rhacius and Manto. See the article MOPSUS.

[A] They went to Claros.] I do not underſtand why Pauſanias did not add what Pomponius Mela ſays (1), that Manto, flying from the conquerors of Thebes, built the temple of Apollo Clarius, and that her ſon Mopſus (2) built Colophon. Take notice of theſe words of Mela; Fugiens victores Thebanorum Epigonos; for if I am not very much miſtaken, they ſhew, that Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hoffman, are in the wrong to ſay, that Manto fled from the tyranny of Creon and and Theſeus, when ſhe fled to build the temple of Claros. Moreri had nothing to ſay of Manto, tho', if he had ſearched well, he might have found matter enough concerning her.

[B] She, of whom Virgil ſpeaks, is the ſame with the daughter of Tireſias.] Servius (3) informs us, that ſhe was the daughter of Tireſias, for Virgil only ſpeaks of her as a propheteſs, and mentions her love for the Tiber.

(3) In Virgil. ubi infra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(b) Æneid. lib. X, ver. 199.

that this poor propheteſs is made to have been a great traveller; for Virgil (b) tranſports her into Italy, not to preſerve her virginity there, but to make her bring forth a child, which built Mantua.

Ille etiam patriis agmen ciet Ocnus ab oris
Fatidicæ Mantûs & Tuſci filius amnis,
Qui muros matriſque dedit tibi, Mantua, nomen (4).

(4) Virgil. Æn. lib. X, ver. 198.

His country's force the valiant Ocnus leads;
Ocnus, deſcended from the genial bed
Of Manto, mixing with the Tuſcan ſtream.

The ſame Servius adds, that ſome ſaid Hercules was the father of this propheteſs. Leander Albertus relates a vaſt number of traditions concerning this founder of Mantua. Conſult him, if you pleaſe, in his deſcription of Italy (5).

(5) Pag. m. 602, & ſeq.

MARASCIA (JOSEPH VINCENT) born at Palermo, was of the congregation of the oratory of St Jerom de la Charité. He wrote a book, to prove, there were two St Mamilians, archbiſhops of Palermo [A]. He died the ſeventeenth of January 1699 (a).

(a) Taken from the Journal de Trevoux, March 1702, pag. 94, Edit. of Trevoux.

[A] He wrote a book to prove that there were two St Mamilians, archbiſhops of Palermo.] The book is intituled, De due Santi Mamiliani, Archivescovi e Citadini di Palermo, Riſolutione Hiſtorica, and was printed by the care of Mr Mongifore (1), after the death of the author. There are but one or two modern Critics, who acknowledge two Mamilians. Maraſcia confeſſes, that he oppoſes the ſtream of Sicilian Hiſtorians; but he has on his ſide ſome antient manuſcripts, which he cites, and ſome conjectures, which he thinks very ſolid (2).

(1) He is a doctor of Divinity.

(2) Taken from the Journal de Trevoux, ubi ſupra, pag. 94, 95.

MARCA (PETER DE) one of the moſt illuſtrious ornaments of the Gallican church, was born at Gant in Berne, January 24, 1594. He was baptized by a prieſt in the dioceſe of Tarbes [A], and went through his ſchool-learning (a), and a courſe of Philoſophy (b) under the Jeſuits: then he ſtudied the Civil-law (c) for three years; after which he was admitted, in 1615, counſellor in the ſupreme council of Pau. He was not the firſt of his family, who bore an office in the long robe [B]. All his collegues were then of the reformed religion (d): but the face of affairs was quickly changed; for, in a little time after, none could be admitted into that council, erected into a parliament, who was not of the Romiſh religion (e). Peter de Marca had a great ſhare in the intrigues, which produced this change. He married a lady of the antient family of the viſcounts of Lavedan; but loſing her, in 1632, after he had had many children by her (f), he would not marry again. He was made preſident in the parliament of Berne in 1621, and counſellor of ſtate in 1639. Three years after, the king nominated him to the biſhopric of Conſerans. He had already been employed to write a work of great importance [C]. He was ſent into Catalonia in 1644, to exerciſe the office of viſitor-general,

(a) At Auſch.

(b) At Toulouſe.

(c) At Toulouſe.

(d) [Stephanus Baluzius, in vita Petri de Marca, pag. 12.

(e) Ib. pag. 13.

(f) The eldeſt, Galhetarius de Marca, ſucceeded in his father's office; I mean that of preſident in the parliament of Pau.

[A] He was baptized by a prieſt in the dioceſe of Tarbes.] The exerciſe of the Romiſh religion was forbidden in Berne ever ſince the edict of 1569; ſo that the few Catholics who remained in that country, were forced, for want of prieſts, to get their children baptized in the churches of the Reformed (1). James de Marca would not follow their example. He cauſed his ſon to be carried to the monaſtery of St Peter de Generes in Bigorre. There our archbiſhop was baptized by a Benedictin monk, who was curate of the pariſh. This refutes Patin, who ſays, ſomewhere, that this prelate was born of the reformed religion. See the following remark.

(1) Stephanus Baluzius, de vita & rebus geſtis Petri de Marca, pag. 8, Edit. 1663, in 8vo.

[B] He was not the firſt of his family, who bore an office in the long-robe.] The family of Marca comes originally from GARCIAS de MARCA, who commanded the cavalry of Gaſton prince of Berne, at the ſiege of Saragoſſa, in the year 1118. His poſterity followed the profeſſion of arms; but, about the year 1440, there was one Peter de Marca, a good civilian, who, after he had been attorney-general to the prince, his maſter, in all his dominions, was made preſident of his councils (2). I have read in a book, which was printed in the time of the league, that one de Marqua ſecond preſident in the parliament of Pau, could never be admitted or reſtored to his office . . . . till he had made the common proteſtation againſt the maſs, together with a profeſſion of the Calviniſt faith, appointed by the late queen of Navarre, mother to Henry the Great (3). This refutes Guy Patin, who affirms, that our Mr de Marca was of mean birth. Let us produce the paſſage, it contains many falſhoods; for, to ſay nothing of the reſt, it is falſe, that this prelate was ever either a miniſter among the Reformed, or a Jeſuit. We ſhall here have an example of the falſe reports, which are ſpread againſt great men: one cannot collect too many ſuch examples, to bring the world to a ſpirit of incredulity in this reſpect. ' We are informed here, ' that the archbiſhopric of Toulouſe is beſtowed upon ' Mr de Marca, biſhop of Conſerans, by means of ' 50000 crowns, which he has given to cardinal Mazarin. This is a good fortune for that ambitious man. ' He is of a mean original: after he had ſtudied, he ' became a miniſter to the party of the Reformed (4), ' of whom he was one. After he had changed his ' religion, he became a Jeſuit; and then, quitting ' the ſociety, he married, and became counſellor in ' the parliament of Pau, and after that preſident: ' Afterwards he came to Paris, and, by the favour of ' the chancellor Seguier, he was made counſellor of ' ſtate in ordinary, after that intendant of Catalonia, ' and then biſhop of Conſerans, after he had a long ' time waited for his bulls, which he could not get ' from Rome, becauſe of the quarrel he had with the ' Jeſuits, after he had quitted them; and at laſt he ' had them not, till he had reconciled himſelf to them: ' and now he is made archbiſhop of Toulouſe. When ' he has paid his debts, if a red hat be offered to him, ' he will be ſure to purchaſe it for money. I cannot ' better compare Mr de Marca than to the late Mr le ' Jay, who from a ſmall beginning became firſt preſident in the parliament of Paris (5).'

(2) Id. ib. pag. 6, 7.

(3) An anſwer of the true French Catholics to the advertiſement of the Engliſh Catholics, pag. 53, Edit. 1589.

(4) Note, that, in order to juſtify Patin, the conſtraint that was put upon the preſident de Marca cannot be alledged; (ſee, above, citat. (3), for our Peter de Marca was the ſon of a military man. He had not therefore been obliged to make an abjuration, to preſerve an office. See the Life of Peter de Marca by the abbot Faget, pag. 7, 8.

[C] He had already been employed to write a work of great importance.] The hiſtory of Berne, which he publiſhed in 1640, confirmed extreamly the good opinion, which was conceived of his knowledge and great capacity. It was therefore believed, that he would be very fit to be employed about a nice and important matter, which offered it ſelf a little while after. The volume of the liberties of the Gallican church, which Peter du Puy had publiſhed, alarmed the partiſans of the court of Rome; and ſome of them endeavoured to make it believed, that theſe were the preliminaries of a ſchiſm, which was deſigned by cardinal Richelieu; as if his eminence had had ſome thoughts of erecting a Patriarchate in the kingdom, that ſo the Gallican church might have no dependance upon the Pope. A French Divine, under the name of Optatus Gallus (6), wrote upon this ſubject, and inſinuated, that the cardinal

(5) Patin, Letter lxix, pag. 294, of Tom. I, dated June 28, 1652.

(6) He was a prieſt of Paris, called Hersent. See the Life of F. Morin, pag. 52. The Jeſuit Michael Rabardeau wrote an anſwer to him, which was cenſured at Rome. See Theophilus Raynaudus, de bonis & malis libris, num. 514, pag. m. 295.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

general, and intendant; which he diſcharged till the year 1651, with ſo great capacity, that nal had gained over a great perſon, who would write an apology for this new eſtabliſhment. This great perſon was no other than Peter de Marca. 'Sequens 'menſis Martius materiam præbuit novis ſermonibus, 'ob editionem Libelli Parænetici ad Antiſtites Regni; 'de cavendo ſchiſmate, quod præ foribus adeſſe nun- 'ciabat Optatus Gallus. Sub eo namque nomine la- 'tere voluit auctor; ſatis alioqui cognitus, ſi larvam 'illi detrahere liberet. Occaſionem turbandi ſumebat 'ex editione Voluminum de Libertatibus Eccleſiæ 'Gallicanæ, quæ anno ſuperiore prodierant curâ Cla- 'riſſ. Viri Petri Puteani; atque item ex rumore vul- 'gi, differentis eam Cardinali Richelio mentem eſſe; 'ut omiſſo Epiſcopo Romano, Patriarcha in Galliis 'conſtituatur. Ajebat præterea, magnum virum in 'partes tractum promiſſis ingentibus, qui ſcripto defen- 'deret quæ pro ea cauſa Cardinalis facturus erat, neque (*) Baluzius, ubi ſupra, pag. 23, 24. 'dubitatur, quin Marcam intelligeret (7). - - - - - - 'The following month of March furniſhed new matter for 'diſcourſe, on account of the publication of the exhorta- 'tory addreſs to the nobles of the kingdom, to guard a- 'gainſt the ſchiſm, which Optatus Gallus pretended was 'at their doors: for under that name the author concealed 'himſelf, who is otherwiſe very well known, if I had 'a mind to take off his maſk. He took occaſion to raiſe 'diſturbances from the publication of the book concerning 'the liberties of the Gallican church, which came out 'the year before by the care of the learned Peter Putea- 'nus; as alſo from the common report, that cardinal Ri- 'chelieu intended to ſhake off the Pope's authority, and 'eſtabliſh a patriarch in France. He ſaid farther, that 'the cardinal had gained over a great man by large pro- 'miſes, to write in defence of his proceedings thereup- 'on; nor is it doubted but he meant de Marca.' The king, underſtanding that an accuſation of this nature made him odious, by reaſon of the hatred, to which it expoſed the cardinal, gave orders to Mr de Marca to refute this Optatus Gallus, and to keep a certain Medium, which ſhould not prejudice the liberties of the Gallican church, and ſhould ſhew, that they did not leſſen the reverence due to the holy ſee. He accepted of this commiſſion, and executed it in the book, de Concordia ſacerdotii & imperii, ſive de libertatibus Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, which he publiſhed in 1641 (8). He declared in his preface, that he would not enter upon the diſcuſſion of the right, but only inſiſt upon matters of fact, that is, that he would only ſhew the bounds, which at all times had parted the two empires, viz. that of the temporal, and that of the ſpiritual prince (9). But, tho' he collected an infinite number of teſtimonies concerning the Pope's power; yet his book diſpleaſed the ultramontanes, who have very tender ears. Quorum aures teneritudine quadam plus trahuntur, ut ait Auxiliaris præfectus apud antiquum ſcriptorem vitæ ſancti Hilarii Epiſcopi Arelatenſis (10). The court of Rome ſhewed itſelf very backward to diſpatch the bulls, which were deſired for this author, who was lately nominated to the biſhopric of Conſerans. They acquainted him, that he muſt, in the firſt place, ſoften ſome paſſages of his work, which they cauſed to be examined with great exactneſs. Holſtenius, one of the examiners, declared that he found ſeveral things in it, which wanted explication, and ſome others, that ſecretly wounded the rights of the church. 'Hol- 'ſtenius quidem quamplurima in eo contineri retulit, 'quæ explicatione indigerent; quædam etiam eſſe 'quæ Romana jura violent, ſed in occulto. Tanto 'quippe ac tam ſingulari artificio librum hunc eſſe 'perfectum, ut diſtingui vix poſſit, quæ pars ejus 'Eccleſiæ Romanæ faveat, quæve noceat (11). - - - 'For that this book was ſo artfully written, that it 'was difficult to diſtinguiſh wherein it was favoura- 'ble, and wherein prejudicial, to the Romiſh church.' One of the other examiners gave it a better teſtimony; he affirmed that this book proved ſo ſtrongly the authority of the ſee at Rome, that the author of it deſerved to be rewarded. His approbation was concealed and Mr de Marca could never get a copy of it. After the death of Urban VIII, cardinal Bichi earneſtly ſollicited Innocent X, to grant the bulls to the biſhop of Conſerans; but the aſſeſſor of the holy office revived the complaints, which had been made againſt the book de concordia ſacerdotii & imperii, which made the Pope examine the book anew. 'Innocentius naturâ 'cunctator, & qui per imprudentiam nihil eorum præ- 'termitti volebat quæ ad dignitatem Sedis Apoſtolicæ 'pertinere exiſtimabat, librum hunc examinandum 'de integro commiſit Cardinalibus Barberino &c (12). 'Innocent, naturally given to delay, and who would 'have nothing omitted, thro' imprudence, which he thought 'for the honour of the apoſtolic ſee, ordered this book to 'be re-examined by the cardinals Barberini, &c.' Mr de Marca perceiving things thus drawn out to a great length, and hoping for no good iſſue, unleſs he made ſatisfaction to the court of Rome, publiſhed a book at Barcelona in 1646; wherein he explained his opinion according to the mind of the Ultramontanes, and wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the Pope, wherein he made great promiſes of fidelity. 'Quo editionis librorum 'de Concordia Sacerdotii & Imperii conſilium exponit, 'opus Apoſtolicæ Sedis cenſuræ ſubmittit, & Reges Ca- 'nonum cuſtodes, non vero auctores eſſe docet (13). 'In which he gives the reaſons of the publication of the 'book de Concordia, &c. ſubmits the work to the cenſure of 'the apoſtolical ſee, and declares, that kings are the guar- 'dians, not the makers, of the canons.' He confeſſed, that he had diſcharged in his book the duties of a preſident in the parliament, much better than thoſe of a biſhop; but it will be better to relate the very words which he made uſe of. 'Fateor eo in libro Principis 'partes pro muneris mei ratione foviſſe, Præſidemque 'potius impleviſſe quam Epiſcopum. - - - - & ne li- 'bri publicati invidia deſideriis meis obeſſet, libello al- 'tero Barcinone ed to, quem huic chartæ adjunxi, hal- 'lucinationes meas deprecatus ſum; Opus cenſuræ 'Beatitudinis Veſtræ ſubmiſi, quam prona mente am- 'plexurum voveo, & aſſertorem vindicemque libertatis 'eccleſiaſticæ futurum (14). - - - - - I confeſs, that I 'thought my ſelf in duty bound to ſide with my prince, 'and that I diſcharged the preſident's, rather than the 'biſhop's part: - - - - - and, leſt the publication of that 'book ſhould prejudice me, I begged pardon for my errors 'in another book, publiſhed at Barcelona, which is an- 'nexed to theſe papers: I ſubmitted the work to the cen- 'ſure of your Holineſs, which I promiſe to embrace with 'a ready mind, and for the future to aſſert and defend 'the liberties of the church.' He did not forget, in his book, the great ſervice he pretended to have done the Ultramontanes, by publiſhing the decretal of Pope Vigilius (15). The court of Rome, according to their uſual artifice, continued ſtill their delays, after this ample ſatisfaction: but at laſt Mr de Marca obtained his bulls in the month of January 1647. He was ordained prieſt at Barcelona in the month of April 1648, and conſecrated biſhop, at Narbonne, in the month of October following. In this year, he was put to the proof, and he made it appear, that he was ſincere in promiſing a great zeal for the intereſt of the Pope. They had a mind to know his opinion about a queſtion, which made a great noiſe (16), and he gave it ſuch as Innocent X, could wiſh. 'Mota erat temporibus il- 'lis gravis quæſtio, de duplici capite in Eccleſia, ple- 'riſque unicum tantum caput, videlicet B. Petrum, 'in ea conſtituentibus; quibuſdam vero cenſentibus 'Paulum quoque Eccleſiæ caput cum Petro fuiſſe. Cum 'hæc quæſtio diſtraheret in partes ingenia hominum 'eruditorum, atque interim dignitas Romanæ Sedis 'tentari videretur; Innocentius, qui apprime noverat 'Marcam in primis Eccleſiaſticæ antiquitatis peritum 'eſſe, ratus præterea eveniſſe occaſionem qua ejus a- 'nimum erga Sedem Romanam experiretur, aperire 'ſententiam jubet. Ille nihil cunctatus, Exercitationem 'Barcinone V. Kalendas Junii anno MDCXLVII. 'ſcripſit de ſingulari Primatu Petri, quæ nondum e- 'dita eſt: quam Innocentio, ad quem ſtatim miſſa 'eſt, valde placuiſſe ex eo intellectum eſt, quod eam 'publice legi juſſit, ac ſingularem quandam de Marcæ 'in Sedem Romanam propenſione accepit opinionem '(17). - - - - At that time, an important queſtion was 'ſtarted, concerning a two-fold head of the church; 'moſt people ſuppoſing there was but one head, namely 'St Peter, but ſome being of opinion, that St Paul like- 'wiſe was head of the church, together with St Peter. 'This queſtion dividing the learned, and it ſeeming to 'be an attack upon the dignity of the Roman ſee, Inno- 'cent, who very well knew, that Marca was ſkilled 'in eccleſiaſtical antiquities, and thinking this a pro- 'per opportunity of trying his fidelity towards the Roman 'ſee

(7) Id. ib. pag. 24, 25.

(8) Sic ſcriptionem ſuam temperavit, ut relicta diſcuſſione juris quod utrique Pontificati competit, ad ſolam ſacti inquiſitionem, quæ finis veterum poſſeſſorum demonſtrare poſſet, ſe contuleret; ut ipſe præfatur in Admoniſtione ad Lectorem. Id. ib. pag. 25.

(9) Ib. pag. 26.

(10) Ib. pag. 28.

(11) Ibid. pag. 37, 38.

(12) Ib. pag. 30.

(13) Ib. pag. 314

(14) Ib. pag. 324

(15) See the remark [M].

(16) That about the two heads of the Church, St Peter and St Paul.

(17) Ibid. pag. 37, 38.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

that the Catalans loved him to such a degree, as is scarce to be parallelled [D]. He went to take possession of his bishopric in August 1651. The next year, he was nominated to

' see, ordered him to give the world his opinion. He, ' without delay, wrote an Exercitation at Barcelona, ' the fifth of the kalends of June, 1647, concerning The ' singular primacy of St Peter, which is not yet pub- ' lished; which Innocent, to whom he immediately sent it, ' was very well pleased with, as appeared from his or- ' dering it to be publickly read, and conceiving an extra- ' ordinary opinion of Marca's affection for the see of ' Rome.'

Two things may be concluded from this narrative: I. That it is a great slavery for the court of France, to want the Pope's bulls for the making of bishops; for it hinders those, who are capable of maintaining the liberties of the Gallican church, and the interests of the king in his quarrels with Rome, from exerting all their strength: they aspire to bishoprics, and they see that they cannot arrive at them if they render themselves, too odious to the court of Rome; or at least that they must make a shameful satisfaction. It is not long (18), since this happened to some members of the assembly of the clergy in the year 1682. The second thing I conclude is, that Mr Sallo had no reason to take for an artifice, what was done at Rome, in 1664, against the new edition of Mr de Marca's book. It was pretended, that Baluzius had published that book ex retractatis scriptis Petri de Marca. This was not without ground. Did not this prelate make a recantation in the writing published at Barcelona? Did he not write to the Pope, to ask his pardon? Let us set down the very words of the decree, and the reflexion of Mr Sallo. ' Decretum sacræ Indicis congregationis, ' quo damnati, prohibiti, ac respective suspensi fue- ' runt infra scripti omnes libri. Romæ, 17. Novem- ' bris 1664. De concordia sacerdotii & Imperii, seu ' de libertate Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ liber, à Stephano Ba- ' luzio impressus Parisiis, anno 1663. Perperam ad- ' scriptus Petro de Marca, ex cujus retractatis scriptis ' aliorumque erroneis sententiis operâ præfati Baluzii e- ' ditus est (19). - - - - - - The decree of the sacred con- ' gregation of the Index, by which all the underwritten ' books were condemned, prohibited, and respectively sus- ' pended at Rome, November the seventeenth, 1664. ' De Concordia, &c. published by Stephen Baluzius, ' and printed at Paris, 1663; falsly ascribed to Peter ' de Marca, from whose recanted works, and the erro- ' neous opinions of others, it is published by the care of ' the aforesaid Baluzius.' ' The court of Rome having ' always their private views, it is not very safe to adhere ' scrupulously to their censures. Wherefore this de- ' cree ought not to hinder us from having always ' as great an esteem as we had for the book of the ' Liberties of the Gallican church, written by the late ' Mr de Marca. In effect, it contains nothing but ' very certain maxims, and which may pass for the ' fundamental laws of this monarchy. Likewise we ' ought not to have the worse opinion of the since- ' rity of Mr Baluze, altho' he is accused in this de- ' cree of having falsly attributed this book to Mr de ' Marca. For it is plain, that the congregation made ' use of this artifice, because they durst not directly at- ' tack the memory of this great archbishop, and they ' thought it would be more easy to cry down his book, ' by substituting in his place a person of less eminent ' dignity in the church (20).'

To conclude the history of this book, I must add further, that Baluzius has procured two editions of it since the death of the author; one in 1663, and the other in 1669. These editions are larger than the first, as it appears from these Latin words (21). ' Opus de concordia sacerdotii & imperii . . . . . altero ab ' ipsius obitu anno augustiori habitu adornatum, ite- ' rum emisit in lucem Baluzius, & non saltem priores ' quatuor libros recensuit, additionibus ab Auctore ' compositis auxit, ac suis notis, ubi occasio tulit, ' illustravit; sed & integrum Tomum alterum nunquam ' antea editum ex autographo summi Viri descriptum ' addidit, nonnulla Antiquitatis illustra monumenta ' adjecit, integrosque in eo Libros, quod Gallice essent ' scripti, in Latinam linguam vertit. Cumque Opus ' hoc tanto favore eruditorum fuerit exceptum & com- ' muni approbatione commendatum, ut intra breve ' tempus distracta exempla fuerint, istud anno ' MDCLXIX recognitum emendatius copiosiusque ' literato iterum orbi dedit. - - - - Within one year after ' his death, Baluzius published a more pompous edition ' of the work de Concordia, &c. and not only revised ' the four first books, augmented them with the author's ' additions, and illustrated them with his own notes, as ' occasion offered; but added another volume, never be- ' fore published, transcribed from the great author's ma- ' nuscript, added some illustrious monuments of antiquity, ' and translated whole books of it, which were in French, ' into Latin. And this work being so well received by ' the learned, and in so great esteem, that the copies ' were all sold off in a short time, he republished it, re- ' vised, corrected, and enlarged, in 1669.' He has caused it to be reprinted, with additions and corrections, in the year 1704 (22).

Deckherrus has committed some gross mistakes, in speaking of the writing of Optatus Gallus, and of the book of our Mr de Marca: they were criticised in a letter, added to the new edition of his book in 1686 (23).

Note, that the author of the famous book de libertatibus Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ, published in 1685, does not speak favourably of the conduct of the author of the concordia sacerdotii & imperii. ' He insinuates, that ' Mr de Marca does not act with sincerity, and that, ' tho' he wrote like a man who would make his court ' in France, yet he had a cautious regard for the ' court of Rome; for he seems, in certain places, by ' virtue of his citations, to have established the point; ' but, on a sudden, he gives the advantage to the o- ' other side, by citing examples and testimonies con- ' trary to the former, or by limiting the former with ' a thousand restrictions: and then, after all this, he ' lessens also the advantage of the second party. At first ' he grants all, and then he regains it insensibly, but ' in such a manner, that he makes the balance incline ' towards the secular power (24).'

[D] The Catalans loved him to such a degree, as is scarce to be parallelled.] This appears by the prayers and pilgrimages, which they made for his health, in 1647. The city of Barcelona made a public vow to our lady of Montserrat, and sent thither in their name twelve capuchins, and twelve maids. The latter travelled with their hair dishevelled, and bare-foot. Mr de Marca was persuaded, that so many vows and prayers obtained his health, and he would not leave Catalonia without going to offer up his prayers at Montserrat (25). He went thither in 1651, and there he wrote a little treatise, de origine ac progressu cultus B. Mariæ Virginis in Monteserrato, which he left in the archives of the monastery (26). It was lost, because perhaps the author did not admit all kind of traditions. He sent a copy of it, in 1660, to Francis Crespus, professor of Divinity at Lerida, who was writing a history of this convent of Montserrat. He advised him to use a little more discretion than the Spaniards do. ' Paucis ' agit de antiquitate loci; admonetque Crespum, ne in ' ea historia scribenda, falsis, uti Hispani solent, te- ' stimoniis utatur; quæ Gallis, inquit, fabularum istiusmodi detegendarum peritissimis, ludibrium debent, & ' reliquæ narrationi, licet alioqui veræ, auctoritatem de- ' munt (27). - - - - He briefly treats of the antiquity ' of the place; and advises Crespus not to use false te- ' stimonies in writing that history, as the Spaniards do; ' which, says he, the French, who are not easily im- ' posed upon by such fables, laugh at, and which take ' off from the credit of the rest of the narration, tho' ' otherwise true.' This dissertation was published in 1681, by the care of Baluzius. Note, that Mr de Marca, this great author, did not disdain to write about such things, as were more becoming a Monk than a counsellor of state: as when he wrote the history of our lady of Betaram (28), at the desire of a devout priest called Charpentier, who was the founder of that chapel, as he was afterwards of that of Mont Valerien, near Paris. This history was published at Barcelona (29).

(18) I write this on the 18th of December, 1695.

(19) See the Journal des Sçavans, Jan. 12, 1665.

(20) Sallo, Journal des Sçavans, ibid.

(21) Acta Eruditor. Lipsiens. ann. 1682, pag. 327.

(22) See the Journal des Sçavans, of the twelfth of January, 1705.

(23) See Deckherrus, de Scriptis adespotis, pag. 384. Edit. 1686.

(24) News from the Republic of Letters, July 1685, pag. 718. of the second edition.

(25) Baluzius, ubi supra, pag. 45.

(26) Ib. pag. 46.

(27) Ib. pag. 48.

(28) In Berne. in the diocese of Lescar.

(29) Taken from the Life of Mr de Marca, written by the abbot Faget, pag. 43.

[E] He

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to the archbiſhopric of Toulouſe, and wrote to the Pope a letter, which deſerves a remark [E]. He took poſſeſſion of the archbiſhopric of Toulouſe, without any pomp, in the month of March 1655. He aſſiſted the next year at the general aſſembly of the clergy of France, where he oppoſed the Janſeniſts [F]. He was preparing himſelf for reſidence

[E] He wrote a letter to the Pope, which deſerves a remark.] The tranſlation of a biſhop from one ſee to another, ſtands in need of a particular favour from the court of Rome: Wherefore Mr de Marca biſhop of Conſerans, being nominated to the archbiſhopric of Toulouſe, paid his reſpects to the Pope with the greateſt addreſs that was poſſible; and tho' he knew that Exuperius, biſhop of Toulouſe, was not the ſame Exuperius, who had commanded in Spain, yet he gave it out as a thing certain, in the letter he wrote to Innocent X. By this means he drew an agreeable parallel between Pope Innocent I, and Pope Innocent X, and between himſelf and this Exuperius. 'O me ſe-
'licem, quando veteris illius atque ſanctiſſimi Sacer-
'dotis Exuperii exemplo, (qui ex Præſidatu in Hiſpa-
'niis acto Cathedram illam ſuſcipiens, eam deinde
'rexit juxta pium atque prudens Innocentii primi ad
'ejus conſulta reſponſum) licebit per Innocentii X
'decretum poſt geſtos Magiſtratus Regios in Gallia &
'Hiſpania, Epiſcopatus quoque curis functo mihi,
'Toloſanæ Sedis adminiſtrationem capeſſere (30). - - - O
'happy me, when, after the example of that ancient and
'moſt holy biſhop Exuperius, (who, after having com-
'manded in Spain, took upon him that ſee, and governed
'it according to the pious and prudent direction of In- 'nocent the firſt,) I may, by the decree of Innocent the
'tenth, after having born offices under the king in France
'and Spain, take upon me the epiſcopal function, and go-
'vern the ſee of Toulouſe.' And therefore he made no ſcruple to vent this falſity, with which he thought proper to tickle the Pope, and to render him more favourable to himſelf. Some body obſerved, that this was a falſhood; but Mr de Marca being told of this criticiſm, laughed at it, and called ſuch a cenſurer a low wit, who did not ſee the difference between a letter of compliment and a hiſtory. Baluzius has given us ſo good a narrative of this, and in terms ſo well choſen, that it would be an injury to the judicious reader, not to ſet down his words. There he will find much more matter for reflexions than in the ſhort account I have given of it. 'Sciebat ſane
'vir eruditiſſimus diverſum ab Exuperio Epiſcopo To-
'loſano fuiſſe Exuperium illum, qui Præſidatum in
'Hiſpaniis egit. Quis enim ignorat? Verum eum ar-
'gumentum eſſet accommodatiſſimum ad rem quam
'tractabat, ſciretque præterea Principum aures ita eſſe
'formatas, ut nihil niſi jucundum lætumque accipere
'velint, vim aliquam inferre veritati non abnuit, ut
'Pontificem alioqui difficilem ac moroſum ſibi faven-
'tem ac propitium habere poſſet. Quod ideo retuli,
'ut eatur obviam ſcrupuloſæ cujuſdam ſcriptoris dili-
'gentiæ, qui in adverſariis ſuis adnotavit lapſam heic
'eſſe Marcam: de quo admonitus à me vir optimus
'paucis ante obitum menſibus, riſit hominis ſupinita-
'tem, qui non animadverteret cujuſmodi argumen-
'tum in ea epiſtola tractaretur. Neque enim hiſtoria
'ſcribebatur. Non diſplicet profecto hominibus eru-
'ditis, quod oratores veri limites nonnunquam exce-
'dunt in compoſitione verborum, aut auditorum au-
'res aliqua voluptate permulceant, & alliciant (31).
'- - - - No doubt, that learned man very well knew,
'that the Exuperius, who commanded in Spain, was
'not the ſame Exuperius, who was biſhop of Toulouſe.
'For who is ignorant of it? But finding it an argu- 'ment to his purpoſe, and knowing beſides, that the
'ears of princes are ſo formed, that they will receive
'nothing but what is pleaſing, he ſcrupled not to offer
'ſome violence to truth, to inſinuate himſelf into the
'good graces of a Pope, otherwiſe intractable and mo-
'roſe. I have related this, to obviate the ſcrupulous
'exactneſs of a certain author, who, in his adverſaria,
'has obſerved that Marca is here miſtaken: which
'when I informed the good biſhop of, a few months
'before his death, he laughed at the thoughtleſſneſs of the 'man, in not conſidering the ſubject-matter of that let- 'ter. Learned men, it is certain, are not diſpleaſed, that
'orators ſometimes exceed the bounds of truth, to tickle
'and pleaſe the ears of their auditors.'

(30) Baluzius, in lapsa, p. 53.

(31) Id. ib. pag. 54.

[F] In the aſſembly of the clergy, in 1656, he oppoſed the Janſeniſts.] It was an unhappy thing for them, that this great prelate met with ſuch great difficulties at Rome, when he wanted a bull to be biſhop of Conſerans. This taught him, that he muſt not loſe any opportunity of repairing the damage, which his Concordia Sacerdotii & Imperii had done him in that country. Now what more favourable occaſion could he expect, than that of ſeconding the court of Rome in the proceedings againſt the diſciples of Janſenius? Add to this, that he had been repreſented as a Janſeniſt beyond the Alps, and that this bad office had for a long time retarded the expedition of the bull, which was neceſſary for making him archbiſhop of Toulouſe. I do not know, whether among the many pieces, that have been written on calumny, it was ever thought fit to write one concerning the uſefulneſs of that crime. They who would employ themſelves on this ſubject, would be much to blame, if they forgot the advantage, that may be drawn from calumny in religious diſputes; for ſometimes an able and very active man would keep himſelf neuter, or endeavour to accommodate matters in a fair way, if he was not defamed as a favourer of heretics. Then, to clear himſelf, and to prevent the diſadvantage, that may ariſe from ſuch a report, he is obliged to ſet up for a perſecutor (32): Whatever might be the cauſe of Mr de Marca's zeal againſt the Janſeniſts, it is certain that they found him a terrible adverſary. Alexander VII thanked him heartily for it. Take the words of Baluzius. 'Cleri Gallicani Co-
'mitia Pariſiis habebantur. Illuc itaque Marca ſe
'conferens anno M. DC. LVI. perhonorifice in eo
'cœtu ſuſceptus XIII Kalend. Aprileis, deinceps in 'plurimis occaſionibus oſtendit quanta ingenii vi pol-
'leret, & quam præclara eruditione ac doctrina præ-
'ditus eſſet. Nam auctoritatem Romani Pontificis,
'quam per ſummum nefas aliqui deprimere conaban-
'tur, fortiter & ſtrenue vindicavit adverſus æmulos.
'Gnarum id Alexander VII qui poſt abſoluta de-
'mum Comitia, honorificas ad Marcam literas die
'XVII Novembris anni M. DC. LVII. ſcripſit:
'quibus ei grates egit, ob aſſertam Sedis Apoſtolicæ
'dignitatem, & ut deinceps pergeret in eadem reve-
'rentia, verbis amantiſſimis hortatus eſt. Janſeniſ-
'mum vero, tum maxime vires ſuas colligentem, ſic
'induſtria & auctoritate ſua repreſſit, ut ob hoc ipſum
'promeritus ſit iram hominum ejus ſectæ, qui ne
'mortuo quidem pepercerunt (33). - - - - The aſſembly
'of the French clergy was held at Paris. Thither Mar-
'ca repairing in 1656, and being very honourably re-
'ceived in that aſſembly, on the twentieth of March, he
'gave many proofs of his abilities and great learning:
'for he ſtrenuouſly defended the authority of the Pope,
'which ſome wickedly endeavoured to leſſen. Alexan-
'der VII was apprized of this, and did Marca the ho-
'nour of writing to him, the ſeventeenth of November,
'1657; thanking him for aſſerting the dignity of the
'apoſtolical See, and exhorting him in a moſt friendly
'manner to perſiſt in the ſame reſpectful ſentiments. He
'likewiſe ſo checked the growth of Janſeniſm, which at 'that time exerted all it's ſtrength, by his diligence and
'authority, that he drew on himſelf the reſentment of
'that ſect, which did not ſpare him even after his
'death.' He adds, that, before the concluſion of this aſſembly (34), there appeared a ſatire againſt Mr de Marca, which was followed by another ſome time after. 'Infauſtis auſpiciis prodiit libellus famoſus,
'ſub titulo Epiſtolæ ad Illuſtriſſimum Dominum de
'Marca Archiepiſcopum Toloſanum, quo ejus fama
'atrociter proſcindebatur, & auctoritas Romanæ Sedis
'per ſummam audaciam aperte violabatur. Libellum
'hunc ſecutus eſt alius, haud moderatior; & ipſe, ut
'prior, abſque auctoris nomine (35). - - - - - An infa-
'mous libel appeared under the title of, A Letter to the
'moſt illuſtrious Lord de Marca, Archbiſhop of Tou-
'louſe, in which his reputation was torn to pieces,
'and the authority of the Roman ſee very boldly and
'openly attacked. This libel was followed by another, not
'more moderate, and, like the former, anonymus.' Some of his friends adviſed him not to anſwer thoſe libels, and others adviſed him to do it. He conſidered with himſelf which advice he ſhould follow, and at laſt reſolved to be ſilent (36). He was contented to ſee the agreement

(32) Compare with this the article FERRIER, remark [L], towards the end.

(33) Baluzius, ibid. pag. 59.

(34) It ended in the month of March 1657.

(35) Ib. pag. 64.

(36) Id. ib. pag. 65. Yet he wrote ſomething againſt thoſe libels, which Baluzius publiſhed in 1681.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

residence in 1658; when, to remove all the scruples that might trouble him, if he had continued a long time at Paris, the king made him minister of state. He followed the court in its progress to Lyons, and then was present in the states of Languedoc, from whence he went to Toulouse in the month of April 1659. He presided in the states of that province in the same city, while the king was there, and presented the rolls to his majesty. The next year he went to Roussillon, to regulate the limits with the commissioners of the king of Spain. The conferences were of a very singular character; for he was obliged to make several critical remarks upon some words of Pomponius Mela and Strabo [G]. He made a journey to Paris in the month of September in the same year, and died there June 29, 1662, a little after he had obtained the bulls for the archbishopric of that city [H], to which he was named without making any interest, as soon as the king had accepted the resignation of cardinal des Rets. He left the care of his MSS to Baluzius, who had been in his family ever since the twenty ninth of June 1656 (g). He could not chuse a more worthy depositary; for Baluzius made it appear from that time, that he had a great zeal for the glory of the deceased, and all the capacity requisite for publishing such a deposit [I]. He promised the life of his Mæcenas, as a very large work, setting forth the particulars of the noble actions, and fine qualities of this prelate. I think he has not executed this design. The public hath lost much by it, although the letter, I have cited (b), and from which I have taken the chronological narrative, which I have set down, does very clearly, and pretty largely declare the virtues, merits, and actions of this archbishop. Some time after, his life appeared, written by the abbot Faget, with three or four dissertations; which raised a dispute between him and Baluzius [K]. There are in the work of this abbot many particulars, which may be read with pleasure, by those who love to know all that concerns great men. There we may see how Mr de Marca renounced all the pleasures of youth, out of love agreement of the empire and the priesthood with respect to those two libels; for they were condemned to be burnt, both at Paris and at Rome. Here follow the titles of three pieces that appeared against him. A Letter from the Author of the most important Rules to my Lord de Marca Archbishop of Toulouse, 1657. An Answer to the Letter of my Lord Archbishop of Toulouse about the Consultation of the Clergy, November 14, 1656. An Answer to a Letter lately published about what passed in the Assembly of the Clergy, November 14, 1656. The first of these three pieces was preceded by this; Very important rules drawn from two passages, one of the Council of France, and the other of Glaber, alledged by my Lord de Marca archbishop of Toulouse. This is not at all satirical.

(g) Taken from a Latin letter of Baluzius, written to Sorbiere, de Vita, Rebus gestis, Moribus, & Scriptis illustrissimi viri Petri de Marca, printed at Paris in 1663, in 8vo.

(b) It has been enlarged and prefixed to the book De Concordia Imperii & Sacerdotii, of the Edit. 1669.

I have just now cast my eyes upon a book (37), wherein I find something, which shews, that the resentment of the Jansenists is not yet over. In this book it is said, that the archbishop of Roan (38), had a mind to compose the disputes of Jansenism, during the general assembly of the clergy in 1657. 'This negotiation did not continue long. The archbishop of Roan had audience upon this subject, 'May 3d, of cardinal Mazarin; who, as this prelate the same day informed Mr de Bagnols, declared 'he had a mind to accommodate this affair, and 'that they had agreed, his eminence and he, to 'treat of this matter with Mr de Marca archbishop 'of Toulouse, who probably made no secret of it to 'F. Annat. After a second audience, which the 'archbishop of Roan had of the cardinal the next 'day, this prelate related, that, having been two 'full hours in conference with that chief minister, 'and with the archbishop of Toulouse, his eminence had shewn more firmness, than he had done 'before, and had made a greater opposition to the 'project of accommodation; and that the archbishop of Toulouse spoke vehemently against it, and 'called the distinction of the Jansenists of right and 'fact, a meer chimera. This is very probable; for 'this prelate, being a true Politician, was the father of the inseparability of right and fact, a 'true chimera which he was in love with, or seemed 'to be so, because it served his ends. This prelate would not give over his own designs, in order to follow those of the archbishop of Roan. 'He was better skilled than he, in matters of policy and intrigue. He had framed his scheme, and 'taken his measures with F. Annat, upon a different 'plan from this, which could not please that father. 'In fine, he had, for this kind of affairs and many 'others, the entire confidence of the cardinal, and 'the whole support of the court. Thus the archbishop of Roan took care not to push on this affair, 'upon better information (39).'

(37) Printed in 1700, and intituled, The Peace of Clement IX, &c.

(38) Francis Harly, who died archbishop of Paris.

(39) The Peace of Clement IX, pag. 144.

[G] He was obliged to make several critical remarks upon some words of Pomponius Mela and Strabo.] It was said in the treaty of the Pyrenees, that the limits between France and Spain, in the county of Roussillon, should be the same with those, which anciently separated Gaul from Spain. It was therefore necessary to examine where the ancient Geographers bounded Gaul on that side. The learning of our archbishop was a great help. You will find the particulars of all these conferences in a posthumous work of this author (40).

[H] He died at Paris . . . . a little after he had obtained the bulls for the archbishopric of that city.] The little time that he lived, after his nomination to the archbishopric of Paris, engaged some body to write an epitaph upon him, of six verses, which is known to every body.

(40) Intituled, Marca Hispanica. The Bibl. Universf. has an abstract of it, at the beginning of Tom. xv.

Cy git l'illustre de Marca,
Que le plus grand des Rois marqua,
Pour le Prelat de son Eglise:
Mais le mort qui le remarqua.
Et qui se plait à la surprise,
Tout aussi-tot le demarqua.

Here lies the illustrious De Marca, whom the greatest of kings nominated to be bishop of his church: But, death, who observed it, and who takes a pleasure in surprising men, on a sudden cancelled the nomination.

[I] Baluzius had a great zeal . . . . and all the capacity requisite for the publication of this deposit.] To be convinced of this truth, we need only see the prefaces, notes, additions, &c. wherewith he has enriched the posthumous pieces of his Mæcenas, as he published them. I have already spoken of the new editions, which he procured of that famous work, de Concordia Imperii & Sacerdotii. I must now add, that he published three or four dissertations of that learned man in 1669 (41). They concern the authority of the Pope, and that of the patriarchs and primates; a very difficult canon of the council of Orange, and the first establishment of the Christian faith in Gaul. He published several others in 1681, the subjects whereof you may see in the Journal of Leipsic (42). In 1688, he published a folio, with this title, Marca Hispanica, sive Limes Hispanicus, hoc est Geographica & Historica descriptio Cataloniæ, Ruscinonis, & circumjacentium populorum, auctore illustrissimo viro Petro de Marca. All the journalists make mention of it.

(41) See the Journal of Leipsic, 1682, pag. 327.

(42) Ib. p. 328. See also the Journal des Sçavans March 21, 1681 pag. 117.

[K] His life, composed by the abbot Faget . . . raised a dispute between him and Baluzius.] The abbot Faget, late agent of the clergy, and son of an aunt by the mother's side to Mr de Marca, published at Paris, in 1668, the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

love for his books, while he was a ſchool-boy. He foretold to his ſchool-fellows, who loſt their time in vain recreations, what a difference there would be one day, between their glory and his [L]. It was at Toulouſe, that he laid the foundations of his great knowledge. He neglected no means, whereby he might become a good Grecian [M]; which the life of this prelate, together with a treatiſe of the Euchariſt, another of the ſacrifice of the maſs, another about the erection of the patriarchate of Conſtantinople, another in French about the ſacrament of the Euchariſt, and ſome other ſacraments. He was the author of the life, but not of the diſſertations, added to it: theſe were written by Mr de Marca. He could never obtain the approbation of the faculty of Divinity, without conſenting, that the French treatiſe ſhould be left out, and that ſome leaves ſhould be re-printed, to alter ſeveral things in the others. The Printer, who was of the Reformed religion, knew very well, that ſome leaves were re-printed on purpoſe to omit ſome things, which favoured the Proteſtants. What does he do? He retains all the paſſages, which were to be changed, and ſo delivered a copy to Mr Claude, juſt ſuch as he had printed it, before the commiſſioners of the faculty of Divinity made theſe changes in it (43). From this copy, or ſuch another (44), an edition of the book was printed in foreign countries, as Baluzius had foreſeen (45). To this edition were added the letters, which Baluzius and Mr Faget wrote againſt each other: For you muſt know, that, Baluzius thought he ought not to be ſilent, when he ſaw, that the probity and orthodoxy of Mr de Marca were going to be called into queſtion. He wrote therefore, two letters to preſident de Marca (46). I will here give one paſſage of the firſt (47): 'You 'know, Sir, that his enemies have wickedly pub-'liſhed, that, in the affairs, which paſſed thro' his 'hands, he did not ſo much conſider truth and 'juſtice, as his own intereſt and ambition, having 'always endeavoured to riſe higher and higher in 'the church, and that theſe conſiderations were the 'reaſon, why he often betrayed the truth, to flat-'ter the court of Rome. We did what we could 'to ſtop theſe diſcourſes, and hinder them from 'making any impreſſion on the minds of rational 'men. But Mr Faget, with one daſh of his pen, 'has overthrown, if we may believe him, all that 'the true ſervants of the late archbiſhop were able 'to eſtabliſh in the ſpace of many years.' Let us ſee another paſſage, taken out of the ſecond letter (48). 'I think my ſelf obliged to acquaint you, 'that the book, which Mr Faget has publiſhed, makes 'a great noiſe in this city, upon the account of 'ſome expreſſions that have crept into it, which 'ſeem to favour the error of the Calviniſts and 'Lutherans concerning the ſacrament of the Eucha-'riſt; which is one of the moſt eſſential points of 'our religion, and at this day moſt controverted. 'If it be true, which I can hardly believe, that the 'late archbiſhop wrote the treatiſes, which Mr Faget 'has printed under his name, of which he boaſts 'in the preface, and in the life, to have the ori-'ginals, written with the author's own hand; we 'cannot hinder the late archbiſhop's being accounted 'by many people a heretic on the ſubject of the Eu-'chariſt, and conſequently his reputation will re-'ceive great damage. . . . . You cannot ima-'gine how this edition has given occaſion to all ſorts 'of people to talk of him. The Huguenots expreſs a 'great joy, it being a thing, which comes very ſeaſon-'ably to confirm their opinion, and the enemies of the 'late archbiſhop take occaſion from thence to blaſt his 'memory, and blacken his reputation.' The abbot Faget, being treated with the utmoſt contempt in theſe two letters, was enraged at it, and publiſhed two other letters full of rancour. I ſhall not dwell upon it, but only touch one point, which relates to a fact, I have mentioned in the body of this article. Mr Faget (49) denies, that Mr de Marca entruſted his MSS with Baluzius. Let us ſee what Baluzius did, when he found the lie given him upon this head. 'I will obſerve to 'you, ſays he to the biſhop of Tulle, that having cauſed 'him to be rebuked by a good prieſt of Roüergue, 'of his acquaintance, called Guibert, becauſe, to the 'prejudice of the truth well known to him, he has 'affirmed in that life, that I was guilty of forgery, 'when I publiſhed, that the late archbiſhop had given 'me his papers, when he was dying, and entruſted 'me with the edition of his works; he anſwered, that 'it concerned him in point of reputation to ſhew, that 'this was not true; becauſe, ſaid he, if this were be-'lieved, it would follow, that the deceaſed arch-'biſhop had not a good opinion of me, and did 'not think me capable of taking care of the edi-'tion of his works. And this he ſaid alſo, in general 'terms, to a perſon of great merit and virtue, whom 'you know, who did me the honour to tell me of it. 'This is, my lord, the fine principle, upon which he 'grounds his calumny and impoſture.' Without eſpouſing any party in this quarrel (50), I will only ſay in general, that that there are a thouſand falſhoods printed, which have no other foundation than the point of honour; for when once we perceive, that a naked declaration of the truth will do us a prejudice in the world, things are related quite otherwiſe than they happened.

(43) A letter of Baluzius to the biſhop of Tulle, printed at the end of the book, publiſhed by Mr Faget, Edit. 1669.

(44) Baluzius, in his ſecond letter to preſident de Marca, confeſſes, that Mr Faget had already made ſeveral of his friends ſee it, and that the Biſhop of Tulle had ſold ſome of them, before there was any thought of ſuppreſſing the edition.

(45) Provided there remain but one copy in the hands of a private perſon, ten thouſand ſhall be preſerved from that, wherever they have a mind to make it public, which I am certain they will not fail to do ſpeedily, in Holland and at Geneva. Baluzius's ſecond letter to preſident de Marca, at the end of the book of the abbé Faget, Edit. 1669.

(46) Son of the archbiſhop of Paris.

(47) It is dated at Paris April 22, 1668.

(48) Dated at Paris May 27, 1668.

(49) In Vita Petri de Marca, pag. 118.

[L] He foretold to his ſchool-fellows . . . . what a difference there would be one day between their glory and his.] A young man of your quality, would they ſay to him, ought not to ſhun company, nor to forſake play, dancing, and ſuch other diverſions. You are like one that is dead and buried. A time will come, anſwered he to them, when I ſhall make my name famous, but ye ſhall remain in darkneſs. Exprobrabant adoleſcentem genere clarum non decere, à virorum & mulierum nobilium civitatis colloquiis & ſocietate recedere, nec præſtantes animi dotes exercere, non ludos, nec ludicra, neque nocturnas hyemis choreas, ut aliis ſolitum erat, frequentare, poſſeque eum, virum abſconditum jure nominari. Ad quæ ille, quum veniſſet temporis occaſio, futurum ſe omnibus permotum, ubi latendum illis foret, peracute reſpondit (51). The event juſtified this anſwer. Mr de Marca became one of the greateſt men of his age, and appeared on the higheſt ſtages; and perhaps not one of thoſe, who gave him this reproof, was ever known two leagues from their own pariſh. This is a good leſſon for ſcholars that are ſtudious, and for thoſe that are debauched. It is good to ſet before their eyes ſuch an example as this; which was the reaſon why I made this remark.

(50) Note, that Baluzius, in the Life of Mr de Marca, Edit. 1669, refutes Mr Faget as to the depoſit, and many other things.

(51) Fagetus, in Vita Petri de Marca, pag. 9.

[M] He neglected no means to become a good Grecian.] He gave proof of this in 1642, by publiſhing a Greek MS which he found in the king's library (52), and which he tranſlated into Latin. It was the decretal epiſtle of Pope Vigilius, confirming the ſecond council of Conſtantinople: he added to it a learned diſſertation, the anathemas of the ſame council, a letter of Eutyches to this Pope, and this Pope's anſwer (53). Theſe anathemas, and theſe two letters, had never appeared before but in Latin. The Decretal had never been publiſhed in any language (54). He pretended to have done a great ſervice to the Pope by this work; for he obſerved, in the book he printed at Barcelona, in 1646, to remove the occaſion of complaint, which retarded the diſpatching of his bulls; he obſerved, I ſay, that the publiſhing of this Decretal ſerved very much to confirm the authority of the holy ſee above the œcumenical councils, which was much ſhaken in the ſchools of France. Quid de hac editione poſtea ipſe ſenſerit, accipe ex libello ejus Barcinone edito MDCXLVI cujus ſuprà mentionem feci: Sane explicari non poteſt, quantum hujus Epiſtolæ publicatio profuerit ad firmandum Apoſtolicæ Sedis auctoritatem erga Concilia Generalia; quæ apud Gallicanos Academiarum Magiſtros, majorum ſuorum decretis inhærentes, valde nutabat (55). See the margin (56). The diſſertation was inſerted in the edition of the councils, which was publiſhed at the Louvre, as alſo the diſſertation of the ſame author, De primatu Lugdunenſi & cæteris primatibus, cum notis ad Canones aliquot Concilii Claromontani ſub Urbano II celebrati (57). I cannot believe what the abbot Faget ſays, viz. that de Marca, coming from his ſtudies, and returning from Toulouſe to his father's houſe, did ſo confound ſome Huguenot gentlemen, who provoked him to diſpute in a baron's houſe, that they were forced to ſend for a miniſter of Pau, a man famous for his learning, to come to their aſſiſtance; who propoſed ſome ſophiſms, of which this young ſcholar

(52) Interdum codices manuſcriptos Græcos Bibliothecæ regiæ, ut erat linguæ Græcæ peritiſſimus, Marca pervolvebat. Faget, ibid. pag. 44.

(53) Id. ib.

(54) Baluzius, ubi ſupra, pag. 39.

(55) Id. ib.

(56) Here are the words of the abbot Faget, ubi ſupra, pag. 44. Eam (decretalem) non ſolum ut hactenus incognitam ille pluribus fecit, ſed etiam ad quod multum affirmandam Apoſtolicæ Sedis auctoritatem contra quorundam Theologorum ſententiam in Concilia generalia prodeſſet.

(57) Baluzius, ubi ſupra, pag. 40.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which very much diſtinguiſhed him from other learned men. One of his chief excellencies was, that he could explain the moſt intricate matters without ſtanding in need of a guide [N].

ſcholar diſcovered the weakneſs, by a paſſage of St Paul (58). The miniſter had nothing to reply, but that the text of St Paul was not ſuch as he alledged it. De Marca taking out of his pocket a Greek Teſtament, prepared himſelf to juſtify his citation; but the miniſter declared, that he underſtood nothing of that language. This ſtory of Mr Faget looks like a tale forged at pleaſure. Allatis quibuſdam argutiis, quarum aciem citato ex Epiſtolis Divi Pauli loco novus athletes omnino retudit. A tam expreſſo rei probandæ textu Ψευδοπροφήτην nullo alio modo explicare ſe potuit, quam aliter in Divo Paulo legi pertinaciter conteſtando. Marca vero confeſtim in Novi Teſtamenti Græci abſque interpretatione Latina, quem fere ſemper ſecum ferebat, codice, laudatum locum ipſiſmet, quæ attulerat verbis, conceptum indicavit. Sed cum ſibi penitus ignotam eam linguam profiteretur Pſeudominiſter, ſi non omnino cauſſa cecidiſſe, delufus ſaltem ab adoleſcente ſuis etiam viſus eſt (59).

(58) Faget, ubi ſupra, pag. 11.

(59) Id. ib. pag. 12.

[N] Without ſtanding in need of a guide.] Moſt learned men are only fit to cultivate the lands, which have been already tilled: they can ſmooth or enlarge a way, which has been already made. There are but a few, quibus arte benigna & meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan (60), that can plough up grounds that were never tilled, and make a way through a foreſt, where no man had ever paſſed. Mr de Marca was of this ſmall ſelect number. The rank, he held among the critics, was no leſs conſiderable in the commonwealth of learning, than that he had among the prelates in the church and ſtate (61). The author, from whom I borrow theſe words, relates the praiſes, which Father Combefis (62), and Father Labbe (63), have given to the great parts of this prelate, and he adds, That the certainty of his conjectures, and the liberty of ſpeaking his thoughts . . . . would have enabled him to carry his criticiſms much further, if he had not been reſtrained by conſiderations, which every one knows.

(60) Juven. Sat. XIV, ver. 34.

(61) Baillet, Judgments of the Learned, Tom. ii, num. 245.

(62) Combef. Recenſion. Auctor. Concionat. pag. 15.

(63) Labbe, Epiſt. Dedicator. Diſſertat. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. & Tomo xi, Concil. General. ad Concil. Claromontan.

MARCELLINUS (AMMIANUS) holds a very honourable rank among thoſe, who have written the Roman hiſtory. He was a Greek by birth, as he declares at the end of his laſt book [A], and a native of Antioch, as may be gathered from a letter of Libanius (a). This, together with the military life, which he followed, ought to make us excuſe the harſhneſs of his Latin. This defect, and that of ſome high-flown digreſſions, are abundantly compenſated by many excellent qualities, which are to be found in this author; as for inſtance, the little partiality he ſhewed againſt Chriſtianity, tho' he was a Pagan [B], and the exact enquires he made, that he might write nothing but what he was certain of, and whereby he has informed us of many things, which otherwiſe we ſhould not have known. His authority is alſo very conſiderable, becauſe he was an eye-witneſs of many things he wrote of. While he was yet very young he liſted himſelf a ſoldier, and was preſently enrolled among thoſe, who were called Protectores domeſtici; which may induce us to believe, that he was of a good family; ſince it was uſual for youths of the firſt quality to enter themſelves in that body (b); and he, who could be promoted to it, thought himſelf well rewarded for his long ſervices. This was our Marcellinus's firſt ſtep;

(a) See the preface of Henry Valeſius to Ammian. Marcellin. The Printers of Moreri have put Labienus inſtead of Libanius.

(b) Valeſius, ubi ſupra.

[A] He was a Greek by birth, as he declares at the end of his laſt book.] This paſſage will be cited elſewhere (1); I can now mention three others. One is in chap. viii, of the twenty ſecond book, εὐήθην, Græci dicimus ſtultum; The ſecond is in chap. xv of the ſame book; ad ignis ſpeciem, τὸ πυρὸς, ut nos dicimus, extenuatur in conum: The third is in chap. vi of the twenty third book, tranſire, διαβαίνειν dicimus Græci. Voſſius (2) makes uſe of the ſecond, which wants the clauſe that he has joined to it, nempe nos Græci. Had he remembered the other two places, in which the author has uſed the very word Græci, he would rather have cited them, than this. But we ſee the greateſt memories have not that always ready at hand, which they ſtand in need of.

(1) In remark [D], citat. (11).

(2) De Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 201.

[B] Although he was a Pagan.] It is ſo eaſy for thoſe, who weigh every thing exactly to diſcover that he was one, that we muſt needs think it very ſtrange, that ſuch able men as Petrus Pithœus (3), and Claudius Chifflетius (4) ſhould take him for a Chriſtian. Would a Chriſtian, who wrote his hiſtory under the emperors who reduced Paganiſm to the laſt gaſp, have been contented with ſpeaking honourably of the Chriſtian religion, and have never carried the matter ſo far, as to declare ſometimes, that it was the only good and true religion, and that the worſhip of the Pagan deities was idolatry? Under ſuch emperors, would a Chriſtian have been ſo inconſiderate, as to praiſe Julian the Apoſtate to the ſkies (5), and never declaim ſharply againſt his apoſtacy, and his hatred of JESUS CHRIST? Would he have ſpoken of Mercury, and the goddeſs Nemeſis, and the goddeſs Themis, and the augural ſuperſtitions of Paganiſm, as Ammianus Marcellinus ſpeaks of them? I know of no Chriſtian authors who did not, even in the hotteſt perſecutions, ſpeak contemptibly of the Pagan idolatry, and in ſome manner inſult over it; and it is incomparably more eaſy to conceive, that a Pagan ſhould uſe moderation, ſpeaking of the Goſpel, than that a Chriſtian ſhould do it, when he ſpeaks of the worſhip of falſe gods. The proofs, alledged by Chifflетius for the pretended Chriſtianity of Marcellinus, need no refutation, except that one paſſage of book 27, where, having cenſured the luxury of the biſhops of Rome, he oppoſes to it the auſterity of ſome country biſhops. 'Quos, ſays he, te-'nuitas edendi potandique parciſſime, vilitas etiam in-'dumentorum & ſupercilia humum ſpectantia, perpe-'tuo numini veriſque ejus cultoribus ut puros com-'mendant & verecundos. . . . . Whom their moderation 'in eating and drinking, the meanneſs of their garb, and 'down-caſt looks, recommended to the deity, and his true 'worſhippers, as men of purity and modeſty.' But all that can be inferred from theſe words, is only this, that, according to this author, ſobriety and humility recommend men to GOD, of whatſoever religion they be, and that the Pagans themſelves had a veneration for Chriſtian biſhops, who teſtified by their manner of living, that they did not ſeek any temporal advantage. As to the definition he gives us of martyrs, qui deviare à religione compulſi pertulere cruciabiles pœnas aduſque glorioſam mortem intemerata fide progreſſi (6), - - - - who, when they would compel them to abandon their religion, underwent torments, even to a glorious death, with unſhaken fidelity, it proves only, that the Pagans themſelves might admire ſuch a firmneſs of ſoul, as was not ſhaken by the moſt cruel torments. Intemerata fides is not oppoſed, in this place, to a falſe religion, but to changing ſides. What he had ſaid in the preceding page, that a biſhop (7), who turned informer, had forgotten, that his profeſſion adviſed him to nothing but what is juſt and gentle; profeſſionis ſuæ oblitus, quæ nihil niſi juſtum ſuadet & lene, ad delatorum auſa feralia deſciſcebat, proves only, that he knew what the Chriſtians made profeſſion of; and we ſhould ſay as much of the Chineſe

(3) Apud Hadrian. Valeſium, Præf. Edit. 1681.

(4) In Vita Amm. Marcellini. It is to be found in the edition of Valeſius 1681.

(5) The abbot de Billi, Schol. ad Greg. Nazianz. Orat. ii, in Julian, ſays thus, Hinc perſpicuum eſt Marcellinum Græcæ ſuperſtitionis cultorem plus gratiæ quam veritati tribuiſſe, cum ſcribit, nulla Juliani definitio litis à vero diſſonans reperitur. - - - - - Hence it is plain, that Marcellinus, who followed the Greek ſuperſtition, conſulted his intereſt more than truth, when he writes, that no deciſion of Julian in matters of law was diſagreeable to truth.

(6) Lib. ii, cap xi.

(7) This was George biſhop Alexandria, w periſhed in a pe pular ſedition, 362.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſtep; but we do not know whether he ever roſe higher [C]; only we find that, in this employment, he followed Urſicinus, general of the cavalry, in ſeveral expeditions. He was ordered to go with him into the eaſt, when the emperor Conſtantius ſent him thither in 350. Urſicinus, being recalled from thence in 354, and obliged to come to Milan, brought back with him Marcellinus into Italy. They went into Gaul the next year, and quickly reduced the tyrant Sylvanus to reaſon; after which Conſtantius ſent for Urſicinus to Sirmium, and ſent him back again into the Eaſt. The bad offices, which ſome did Urſicinus with this emperor, were the cauſe why he was recalled, and his office given to another. He obeyed; but, being arrived in Thrace, he found orders there, which obliged him to return immediately towards Meſopotamia, though the command was not reſtored to him, which had been given to Sabinianus. Nevertheleſs he did the emperor great ſervices. Marcellinus alſo, who always followed him, did the emperor much ſervice, both as a ſoldier, and as a manager of affairs, as he himſelf relates, without exceeding the bounds of modeſty. He did not quit the ſervice, when Urſicinus was utterly diſgraced, in the year 360; but, as I have already ſaid, it is not known, whether he was advanced, or whether he continued always in his poſt of Domeſtic Protector, even when he followed Julian in the war againſt the Perſians. It may be gathered from ſome places of his books (c), that he lived at Antioch under the reign of Valens. He afterwards ſettled at Rome, and there compoſed his hiſtory [D]. He recited ſeveral parts of it to his friends as he compoſed them (d), and they were received with great applauſe. It is not known when he died, but without all doubt he was alive in 390, ſince a conſulſhip, which fell in this year, was not unknown to him (e). He had ſome ſuits (f), which put him ſo out of humour with the practiſers in the Law, that he could not forbear making a long digreſſion againſt them. It is an invective almoſt as ſharp as the comedy intituled Grapinian.

(d) Epiſt. Liban. apud Valeſium, ubi ſupra.

(e) Neotherium poſtea Conſulem tunc Notarium ad eamdem tuendam ire diſpoſuit. Amm. Marcel. lib. xxvi, cap. v, That man was conſul with Valentinian II, in 390. Valeſius, ibid.

(f) Lib. xxx, cap. iv. See La Mothe le Vayer, Judgment about the principal Hiſtorians, pag. 247, of the third Tom. in 12mo.

(c) Lib. xxix, cap. i. where he ſpeaks that he ſaw the torments of many perſons, whom Valens put to death at Antioch in 371; and lib. xxx, cap. v, where he complains of the tricks that had been put upon him in the Eaſt.

Chineſe prieſts, if we knew, that their ritual obliged them to a great purity of life. Is it neceſſary to be a Chriſtian, may not a little reaſon ſuffice, to diſcern that an eccleſiaſtic, who ſets up for an informer to princes, as this biſhop of Alexandria did, apud patulas aures Conſtantii multos exinde incuſans ut ejus recalcitrantes imperiis, diſhonours his character? Theſe are the ſtrongeſt proofs of Chiffletius for the pretended Chriſtianity of Marcellinus. But if he be deprived of this happineſs, which is attributed to him, yet at leaſt this praiſe is due to him, that he ſpoke very honourably of a religion he did not follow. There are but few examples of ſuch a moderation. Father Poſſevin, who is not contented with it (8), ſeems to be too nice, and we need not fear, that our poſterity will diſpute concerning the religion of thoſe, who write hiſtory at this day (9). I confeſs, that Marcellinus wrote under the Chriſtian emperors; but that reaſon did not ſet bounds to the malice of Libanius and Zoſimus.

(8) Diligenter ſcripſit, ſed ea quæ pertinent ad Chriſtianos tradenda ac deteſtanda. . . . . He was a careful writer, but perverted whatever related to the Chriſtians. Poſſev. Appar. Sect. iii, cap. xi.

(9) See the News from the Republic of Letters, July 1684, pag. 687, of the ſecond edition.

[C] We do not know whether he ever roſe higher.] Moreri therefore hath too raſhly affirmed, that Marcellinus compoſed his hiſtory, after he had gone through the moſt honourable offices of the army. He tranſcribed this from la Mothe le Vayer (10).

(10) Judgment on the Hiſtorians, pag. 240, of Tom. iii.

[D] His Hiſtory.] This work contained, in thirty one books, what paſſed from Nerva till the death of Valens (11). The firſt thirteen are loſt, which brought down the hiſtory to the reign of Conſtantius, (for he enlarged leſs upon thoſe times, which he did not know but by the information of others) the eighteen, which remain have been very much abuſed, either by the ignorance of the tranſcribers, or the raſhneſs of the critics. Note, that Claudius Chiffletius maintains, upon pretty good reaſons, that this hiſtory contained thirty two books, and that there was a book between the thirtieth, and that which we now reckon the thirty firſt, which is certainly the laſt of all. He had heard that the firſt books which are now wanting of Marcellinus, were to be found in the library of cardinal Pole. Mr de Marolles publiſhed a French tranſlation of this Hiſtorian in 1672, with remarks; but the undertaking was too weighty for him.

(11) Hæc ut nulla quondam & Græcus à principatu Cæſaris Nervæ exorſus, ad Valentis interitum pro viribus explicavi memoriter. Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxxi, fub fin.

Valeſius the elder ſays (12), that the firſt edition of Marcellinus was that of Rome in 1474, which was prepared by A. (13) Sabinus a Poet Laureat; that the ſecond was printed at Bologna, in 1517, by P. Caſtellus, a man void of wit or judgment; that the next year John Frobenius reprinted at Baſil this edition of Bologna; that in 1533 there appeared two new editions, one at Augſburg, corrected by Mariangelus Accurſius, the other at Baſil by the care of Sigiſmond Gelenius (14); that the edition of Accurſius was augmented with the five laſt books which had never been printed before; that the edition of Gelenius had the ſame addition, except the laſt book, and the laſt page of the laſt book but one; that, in 1546, Jerom Frobenius who had printed the edition of Gelenius, publiſhed another with the laſt book; and that, all the editions which appeared afterwards in France and Germany, till that of the year 1609, which Frederic Lindenbrogius publiſhed with notes, ſeem to have been printed from this ſecond edition of Frobenius. That of Lindenbrogius is very good; but that which Valeſius publiſhed in 4to, in 1636, is incomparably better. We ſhall hereafter ſay ſomething of that of 1681. Mr Moreri could not tranſcribe the preface of Valeſius faithfully; for he ſaw ſeveral things in it which are not there: He ſaw there that Accurſius was the firſt that publiſhed the firſt five books of Marcellinus, and that Gelenius added the laſt book with the laſt page of the thirtieth which we had not. All this is falſe; Gelenius was ſo far from making this addition, that, on the contrary, what he publiſhed wanted juſt this book which was in Accurſius's edition; and it is ſo far from being true, that Accurſius publiſhed the firſt five books, that to this day all the thirteen are wanting, as Mr Moreri had ſaid a little before. Valeſius commends the edition of Accurſius, but beſtows mighty encomiums on that of Gelenius: which makes me wonder, that Voſſius, who ſpeaks with approbation of the former, ſays nothing of the latter. He is extreamly dry, for what reaſon I know not, upon the article of our Ammianus Marcellinus. Accurſius, who boaſts he had corrected five thouſand faults in this author, is commended by Claudius Chiffletius, but in ſuch a general way, that he ſays nothing of his chief excellency, I mean his publiſhing the five laſt books. Is it not ſtrange, that Chiffletius ſhould ſay nothing of this, and yet that he ſhould give Gelenius the glory of being the firſt who publiſhed the twenty ſeventh, twenty eighth, twenty ninth, and thirtieth books? He obſerves, that Sebaſtian Gryphius inſerted in his edition the end of the thirtieth book, and was the firſt who publiſhed it. Valeſius ſays nothing of the firſt of theſe two facts, and refutes the ſecond by ſaying, that Accurſius publiſhed the laſt five books. Toppi, in his Bibliotheca Neapolitana (15), falſly aſcribes the publiſhing of the ſixth book of Ammianus Marcellinus to Mariangelus Accurſius, and ſays nothing of his publiſhing the five books of this Hiſtorian, which had never appeared before. Valeſius the younger publiſhed our Ammianus at Paris in 1681, in folio. This ought not to have been omitted in the Dictionary of Moreri. In this edition there are added, I. Many new notes of Valeſius the elder: II. Thoſe publiſhed by Lindenbrogius, in 1609, and thoſe he afterwards added to them, which were found among his papers: III. The life of Ammianus Marcellinus by Claudius Chiffletius, profeſſor of Law at Dole. IV. Some corrections and obſervations of Valeſius the younger. Mr Gronovius reprinted this edition at Leyden in 1693 (16), and added good notes to it.

(15) Pag. 170.

(16) In folio, and in 4to.

(12) Hen. Valeſ. Præfat. ad Ammian. Marcel.

HISTORY of the editions of Marcellinus. Faults of Moreri, &c.

(13) Moreri takes this A. for Auſi, but according to Konig he ſhould have ſaid Angelo.

(14) Moreri having ſeen in Valeſius, Sig. Gelenius, believed, by a miſtake, that it meant Sigebert.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MARCELLUS (CHRISTOPHER), a noble Venetian, and archbiſhop of Corfu (a) in the XVIth century, was famous for his learning, his eloquence, his piety, and his manners; and he might have expected the higheſt dignities from Clement VII. Unluckily for him, he was at Rome, when the troops of Charles V ſacked it. He fell into the hands of the Spaniards, who, after having plundered his houſe, took him priſoner, and tormented him cruelly, becauſe he could not pay the great ranſom they demanded of him. To make themſelves amends for not getting from him the ſums they expected, they chained him to the trunk of a tree, in an open field near Gæta, and tore off his nails, one each day. He expired in this ſad condition, both on account of the torture he endured, as alſo by reaſon of the inclemency of the air, to which he was expoſed night and day, without ſleeping, and without taking any nouriſhment (b). He made a ſpeech to the council of Lateran, the tenth of December 1512. His Exercitationes in ſeptem priores Pſalmos were printed at Rome in 1525 (c). I have ſaid elſewhere (d), that he publiſhed a work, which, it is pretended, he only ſtole. Florimond de Remond has committed a very childiſh blunder in citing it [A].

(a) Pierius Valerianus, ubi infra, expreſſes this by primarius Corcyrenſium Flamen.

(b) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, lib. i, de Litterat. Infelicitat. pag. m. 10.

(c) Konig, Bibl. pag. 506.

(d) In the remark [D] of the article GRASSIS.

[A] Florimond de Remond has committed a very childiſh blunder in citing it.] 'I am contented, ſays he (1), 'to repreſent part of the ceremonies, which are obſerved at the election, coronation, and conſecration of the Roman Pontiffs, which are to be found in many places, and particularly in a book intituled, The Sacred Ceremonies, preſented to Pope Leo X, by M. Electus, and that following the council of Lyons, in 1273.' He believed that Electus was this author's family-name, and did not find out, that Chriſtophorus Marcellus electus Corcyrenſis meant Chriſtopher Marcellus, archbiſhop of Corfu elect. David Blondel has reproached him with this miſtake (2), which is certainly as groſs a one as that, with which La Mothe le Vayer has reproached Bodin. Read theſe words of the Hexameron Ruſtique. 'I will begin with putting you in mind 'of the inattention of Bodin, when, in order to 'prove, in the laſt chapter of the firſt book of his 'Republic, how this phraſe, by the grace of GOD, 'is not a mark of ſovereignty, he ſays, that we find 'in the records of France an Act, by which a meer 'biſhop of Meaux, deputed on a treaty of peace, calls 'himſelf, choſen by the grace of GOD. I have ſeen 'this act, which is in Latin, and I could not forbear 'laughing, to conſider that a man of Bodin's learning 'ſhould miſtake Electum Meldenſem for a perſon 'choſen, when it means a perſon nominated to the 'biſhopric of Meaux, and who was not yet conſecrated (3).'

(1) Florimond de Remond, chap. xviii, of the Anti-Papeſſe, (Anti-ſhe-Pope) ſub fin. fol. m. 412, verſo.

(2) Blondel, in the French treatiſe of the She-Pope, pag. 83, and in the Latin treatiſe, pag. m. 222.

(3) Hexam. Ruſtique, Journee I, pag. m. 24, 25.

MARCHE (OLIVER DE LA), ſon of a gentleman of Franche-Comté (a), was made page to the duke of Burgundy, Philip the Good, in 1439, at the age of about thirteen years (b) [A]. He ſerved this prince, and duke Charles his ſucceſſor, with great zeal, and was ſteward and captain of the guards to the latter (c). He incurred the diſpleaſure of Lewis XI when the baſtard de Rubempré was made priſoner in Holland in the year 1463 [B]. He was one of the knights (d), created by the count of Charolois (e) at the battle of Montleheri in 1465. He fell into the hands of the enemy at the unhappy battle of Nancy (f), where his maſter loſt his life in the beginning of January 1477. Having paid his ranſom he was ſet at liberty, and had the office of high-ſteward to Maximilian of Auſtria, who married the heireſs of Burgundy (g). He held the ſame office under the archduke Philip, ſon to Maximilian (h). He was ſent ambaſſador to the court of France to congratulate the new king on his acceſſion to the throne, after the death of Lewis XI (i). He wrote ſome memoires, which were publiſhed at Lyons in 1562 [C], in folio, by the care of Denys Sauvage, Hiſtoriographer of France. He died at Bruſſels February 1, 1501 (k).

(a) Oliver de la Marche's Memoires, book i, cap. i, p. m. 76.

(b) Id. ib. cap. iv, pag. 103.

(c) Id. in the preface of the firſt book, pag. 74.

(d) Id. ib. cap. xxxv, pag. 314.

(e) The ſon of Philip the Good.

(f) Memoirs, ubi ſupra, book ii, cap. viii, pag. 408.

(g) Id. ib. cap. ix, pag. 409.

(h) Id. in the preface, pag. 1, and in cap. xiii, of the ſecond book, pag. 423.

(i) Id. book ii, cap. x, pag. 415.

(k) Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 707.

[A] He was page . . . . at the age of about thirteen years.] This agrees with what he ſays in chap. i. of the firſt book (1), that he was between eight and nine years old, when, in 1434, his father put him to ſchool at Pontarli, but not with what he ſays in his firſt preface (2), that he was ſixty ſix years old when the archduke Philip was not ten. This archduke was born in 1478. Oliver de la Marche was then fifty two years of age, and ſo his ſixty ſixth year falls in with the fourteenth of the archduke. This is not the firſt time I have obſerved that authors ſpeak of their age with the utmoſt confuſion. Note here a groſs fault of Valerius Andreas. He aſſigns the year 1380, for that of the birth of our Oliver, and places his death in 1501 (3), without taking notice of ſuch an extraordinary old age. An author like this, who had lived one hundred and twenty one years, ought to be placed in the number of remarkable things. The truth is, as I have already ſaid, that the year 1426, was the year of his birth.

(1) Pag. 76.

(2) Pag. 2.

(3) Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 707.

[B] He incurred the diſpleaſure of Lewis XI, when . . . . the baſtard de Rubempré was made priſoner in 1463.] He was ſeized, becauſe he was ſuſpected of having a deſign to carry off the count de Charolois (4). Our Oliver de la Marche carried the news of this ſeizure to duke Philip who was then at Hedin, where he conferred ſometimes with Lewis XI (5). The duke hearing of this, departed in all haſte, and without the knowledge of that prince. A report was ſpread, that Lewis XI had a deſign to ſecure at the ſame time both the father and the ſon (6). He ſent embaſſadors to the duke to complain of this, and demand Oliver to be delivered up to him (7); for he looked upon him as the author of all theſe calumnies, and of what thoſe ſuſpicions had produced, and had a mind to puniſh him ſeverely. The duke anſwered, That Oliver was his ſubject and his ſervant, and that if the king, or any other perſon, had any thing to charge him with, he would do them juſtice (8). Read the firſt chapter of Philip de Comines.

(4) Oliver de la Marche book i, cap. xxxv, pag. 312.

(5) Id. ib.

(6) Mezer. Abridg. Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. 292, ad ann. 1463.

(7) Id. ib.

(8) Oliver de la Marche, ibid. pag. 313.

[C] His Memoirs . . . . were publiſhed at Lyons in 1562.] The manuſcript was taken from the library of the houſe of la Chaux in Franche-Comté (9). There was a ſecond edition of it at Ghent in 1567, in 4to, with notes and corrections in the margin, and a preface which informs us, that the author of theſe Memoirs was rather a calumniator than a hiſtorian, with reſpect to the civil wars of Flanders (10). As to the other books compoſed by this writer, printed and not printed, ſee the Bibliotheque of Du Verdier Vau-Privas (11). They have lately publiſhed in Dutch, the State of the houſe of Charles duke of Burgundy (12); which is a tranſlation of a treatiſe written by this author in French, and publiſhed at the end of his Memoirs in the edition of Louvain, 1645 (13). Gollut inſerted ſomething of it in his Memoirs of Burgundy (14). Du Cheſne will inform you that this ſtate of the houſe of duke Charles was written in 1474, and that it was printed at Bruſſels in 1616, in 4to, and that the Memoirs of the ſame author were printed at Lyons in folio, in 1612, and at Bruſſels in 4to, in 1616 (15).

(8) See the advertiſement to the readers.

(9) Valerius Andreas, ubi ſupra.

(10) At pag. 932.

(11) See the Viveris Æneæ Palæſta, publiſh by Mr Matthæus at Leyde in 1698.

(12) See the pr face to this wo of Matthæus.

(13) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. of the Hiſtorians of France, pag. m. 199.

(14) In chap. cix, book x.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MARCIONITES. So they call the disciples of the Heresiarch Marcion, who lived in the IId century [A]. He was born at Sinope, a city of Paphlagonia, on the Euxine sea, and had a good and pious bishop for his father. He applied himself first to a monastic life, but he observed very ill the laws of continency, for he debauched a young woman. His father exercised all the rigour of the discipline upon him; he excommunicated him, and would never yield either to his prayers or offers of penance. Then Marcion being exposed to the ridicule and contempt of the whole city, went secretly out of it and retired to Rome, where he could never be received to the communion (a), although he made use of the artifices of a woman who went before him to prepare the way (b). This denial obliged him in revenge to set up for the head of a party [B]. He became

(a) Taken from Tertullian, adverf. Hæref. pag. m. 302, 303.

(b) Romam præmisit mulierem, quæ decipiendos sibi animos præpararet. Hieronym. Tom. ii, Epist. ad Ctesiphontem, pag. 253.

[A] Marcion lived in the IId century.] This may be said for certain: but as to the year when he came to Rome, and the time when he began to vent his false doctrine, they cannot be cleared from the confusions which are found on this subject in the antient Fathers. According to St Epiphanius (1), he came to Rome after the death of Pope Hyginus, that is, according to the account of Baronius, after the year of our Lord 157. Tertullian pretends that he came to Rome under Pope Anicetus (2), that is, if we believe Mr Wetstein, under the empire of Antoninus Pius, Romanis tunc imperante Antonino Pio, unde Tertull. lib. i, cap. xix. adv. Marc. eum Antoninianum hæreticum, sub Pio impium vocat, id est circa annum Christi 154 (3). But since the two passages of Tertullian, the one in verse, the other in prose, are contrary to each other, we cannot confirm the one by the other, nor refer them both to the empire of Antoninus Pius. Consult the Annals of Baronius, and there you will find the death of this emperor under the year 163, and that of Pope Pius, and the promotion of Anicetus under the year 167; so that if it be true, that Marcion came to Rome under the pontificate of Anicetus, it is false that he came thither under Antoninus Pius, and consequently Tertullian could not speak the truth in his verse, without telling a falshood in his prose, and vice versa. He says in another place, that this Heretic was divers times expelled the communion of the faithful under Pope Eleutherius. 'Constat illos (Marcionem & Valentinum) neque adeo olim fuisse, Antonini fere principatu & in Catholicam primo doctrinam credidisse apud Ecclesiam Romanensem, donec sub Episcopatu Eleutherii benedicti ob inquietam semper eorum curiositatem qua fratres quoque vitiabant, semel & iterum ejecti, Marcion quidem cum ducentis sestertiis suis quæ Ecclesiæ intulerat, novissime in perpetuum diffidium relegati venena doctrinarum suarum disseminaverunt (4). . . . . It is certain that they (Marcion and Valentinus) lived not long ago, but about the reign of Antoninus; and that they at first professed the doctrine of the Catholic church, at Rome; till, under the pontificate of Eleutherius, for their ever restless curiosity, with which they also corrupted the brethren, they were diverse times expelled, and Marcion, with his two hundred sesterces which he had brought into the church, at last being separated, they begun to spread the poison of their doctrines.' This leads us far away from the empire of Antoninus Pius, for Eleutherius was created Pope in 179. Besides it is nowise probable that the excommunication of Marcion should have been delayed till the pontificate of Eleutherius, since he had rendered himself so abominable by his heresies, under the pontificate of Anicetus, that St Polycarp called him the eldest son of Satan. Consult St Irenæus (5), who tells us that St Polycarp coming to Rome in the time of Pope Anicetus, reclaimed many of the followers of Marcion, and repelled this Heretic with the encomium that I have related: which served as an answer to the question that Marcion put to him, Do not you know me (6)? Baronius observes, that Marcion begun to dogmatize in the reign of Hadrian (7); which he proves by Origen, who says, that the Philosopher Celsus, who wrote against the Christians under that emperor, speaks often of the errors of this Heretic. Philastrius seems to confirm this, when he says, that Marcion, before he went to Rome, was convicted of teaching false doctrines in Asia by St John, and driven away from Ephesus (8). Suppose as much as you please, that he was excommunicated several times, and that he made several journies to Rome; you can never excuse Tertullian's want of exactness in his account of him.

Let us see a passage of Lambert Danæus, in which there are some faults. 'Venit (Marcion) Romam 'quemadmodum lib. i. Adverf. eum scribit Tertull. 'sub Antonino Pio, circa annum à Christo passo 115, 'sub Hygino, ut ait Platina: Tertullian. sub Eleutherio. Cœpit autem post Cerdonem innotescere illius 'hæresis sub M. Antonino Philosopho imperatore, & 'Aniceto pontifice Romano, circa annum à passo 'Christo 133. quanquam Clemens lib. 7. Stromat. 'vult adhuc eo ipso tempore vixisse Romæ Valentinum hæreticum, quem jam senem Marcion juvenis 'viderit (9). . . . . Tertullian, in his first book against 'Marcion, says, that he came to Rome, in the reign of 'Antoninus Pius, about the year 115 after Christ's death, 'under Hyginus, as Platina says; under Eleutherius according to Tertullian: but his Heresy first began to be 'known after Cerdon, under the emperor Antoninus the 'Philosopher, and Anicetus Pope of Rome, about the year 133 after CHRIST's death: though Clemens will 'have it, that Valentinus the Heretic was living at this 'time still at Rome, being in an advanced age, and 'was known to Marcion, who was then but a youth.' In the Ist place it is an error, not to have seen that Tertullian would have been mistaken, if he had said, that the Popedom of Eleutherius and the empire of Antoninus Pius were cotemporary. II. It is a fault in Chronology to place the pontificate of Anicetus under Antoninus Pius; for Anicetus was not promoted to that see, till five years after the death of this emperor (10). III. Clemens Alexandrinus does not say, that Valentinus was still living under the emperor Marcus Aurelius; he says only that Basilides and Valentinus having begun to spread their errors under Hadrian, lived unto the reign of the first of the Antoninus's. IV. He was so far from affirming that Marcion in his youth saw Valentinus in his old age, that he says Marcion conversed with these other Heretics as an old man with young people. Μαρκίων γὰρ καὶ τὴν αὐτὴν αὐτοῖς ἡλικίαν γενόμενος, ὡς πρεσβύτης, νεωτέροις συνεγένετο. Marcion enim cùm natus esset eadem, qua ipsi, ætate, versabatur ut senex cum junioribus (11).

(9) Lambertus Danæus, in Comment. ad librum D. Augustini de hæresibus, fol. 58. Edit. Genevensis 1578, in 8vo.

(10) See Baronius, ad ann. 167.

(11) Clemens Stromat. lib. vii, pag. 764. D.

[B] He could never be received to the communion at Rome. . . . . This denial obliged him to set up . . . for head of a party.] I should deceive my readers, if I should leave these words without a commentary; and it would be in vain to say, that St Epiphanius having deceived them first, I need not scruple to do it after him: they would not approve so bad an apology: let us therefore show wherein the fault of St Epiphanius's account consists. None can read this Father but he must think, that the church of Rome never admitted Marcion to her communion, and that the governors of this church having told him, We cannot admit you into communion without the leave of your father, who has excommunicated you; he threatened them with a schism, and was as good as his word. Τί μὴ ἠθελήσαταί με ὑποδέξασθαι; τῶν δὲ λεγόντων, ὅτι ἐ δυνάμεθα ἄνευ τῆς ἐπιτροπῆς τῦ τιμίυ πατρὸς συ τῦτο ποιῆσαι. Μία γάρ ἐσιν ἡ πίστις, καὶ μία ὁμόνοια, καὶ ἐ δυνάμεθα ἑναγλιωθῆναι τῷ καλῷ συλλειτυργῷ, πατρὶ δὲ σῷ. Σπλώσας λοιπὸν, καὶ εἰς μέγαν ἀφθεὶς θυμὸν καὶ ὑπερηφανίαν, τὸ σχίσμα ἐργάζεται ὁ τοιῦτος, ἑαυτῷ τὴν αἵρεσιν προσηγάμενος, καὶ ἐιπών. Ὅτι ἐγὼ σχίσω τὴν Ἐκκλησίαν ὑμῶν, καὶ βαλῶ σχίσμα ἐν αὐτῇ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. Ὡς τἀληθῆ μὲν σχίσμα ἔβαλεν ἐ μικρὸν, ἐ τὴν Ἐκκλησίαν σχίσας, ἀλλ' ἑαυτὸν καὶ τὸς αὐτῷ πεσθένλας. Cur me, inquit, recipere noluistis? Responderunt illi. Nobis injussu venerandi Patris tui facere istud non licet. Una siquidem fides est, & animorum una consensio: neque contra spectatissimum Collegam patrem tuum moliri quippiam possumus. At ille vehementius excandescens, ac superbia invidiaque percitus Schisma conflavit, ac privatam Hæresin architectatus est: & Ecclesiam, ait, vestram ego dissociabo, in

(1) Epiphan. adv. Hæref. pag. m. 302.

(2) A quo Pio successit Anicetus ordine sextus, Sub quo Marcion hic venenum novæ Pontica pestis. Tertull. carm. lib. iv, adversus Marcion.

(3) Joh. Rodolphus Wetstenius, Not. in Origenis dial. contra Marcionitas, pag. 51. Edit. 1674.

(4) Tertull. de Præscript. cap. xxx.

(5) Iren. lib. iii, cap. iii. See also Euseb. lib. iv, cap. xiv.

(6) See the notes of Henry Valesius upon Euseb. lib. iv, cap. xiv, where these words are not taken for an interrogation but as plain sense.

(7) Baronius, ad ann. 146. num. vi.

(8) Philastrius, de hæred. cap. xlvi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

became the diſciple of Cerdon (c), and that he might be the better able to maintain the doctrine of two principles, which he had learned of this Heretic, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy [C]. He had a great number of followers; who not only ſupported themſelves after his death, but alſo ſpread into all parts, and formed churches in emulation of the Orthodox, wherever they could [D]. It was found neceſſary to employ the ſecular power againſt them, when the empire was devolved to the Chriſtians; and ſome ages paſſed before this good remedy put an end to this ſect. They boaſted of their pretended martyrs. This fact gave occaſion to a diſpute [E], of which it will not be needleſs in eam ſchiſma Sempiternum immittam. Quod ille revera nec mediocre quidem injecit: non ita tamen ut Eccleſiam, ſed ut ſe potius ac ſuos diſcinderet (12). ----- Why, ſays he, will not you receive me? They anſwered, we cannot do it without the conſent of thy reverend father; for the faith is one, and conformity of opinion one: nor can we attempt any thing againſt our worthy colleague thy father. But he being enraged and filled with pride and envy, raiſed a ſchiſm, and broached a hereſy of his own; and, ſays he, I will divide your church and bring an everlaſting ſchiſm among you. And indeed he was the author of a very great one; yet not ſo as to diſtract the church, but rather confound himſelf and his followers. If St Epiphanius had conſulted Tertullian, he would have known, that Marcion was ſeveral times driven out of the communion of the Orthodox (13); which is an evident ſign, that they were more than once ſatisfied with the Proteſtations he made of renouncing his errors, and that they had reconciled him to the church. Perhaps alſo, if death had not prevented him, he had endeavoured to perform the condition required of him the laſt time he appeared penitent, which was, that he ſhould undeceive thoſe whom he had perverted from the true faith. 'Poſtmodum Marcion pœnitentiam conſeſſus, cum conditioni datæ ſibi occurrit, ita pacem recepturus, ſi cæteros quoque quos proditioni erudiſſet, Eccleſiæ reſtitueret, morte præventus eſt (14)- - - Afterwards Marcion having manifeſted his repentance, and agreed to the terms which were propoſed to him, viz. that, in order to obtain his peace, he ſhould reſtore to the church thoſe whom he had ſeduced away, was prevented by death.' There are ſome (15) who ſay, that after he was turned out of the church with his money, he joined with the ſect of the Cerdonites; which they prove by ſome paſſages, wherein Tertullian and Philaſtrius affirm, that he was the diſciple of Cerdon. I believe they confound the times, for the expulſion they mention was the laſt, and it happened under Eleutherius (16); but it is no wiſe probable that Cerdon was then alive.

(c) Epiph. ubi ſupra, pag. 303.

(12) Epiphanius, adverſus Hæreſes, pag. 303.

(13) See, above, citat. (4), the words of Tertullian.

(14) Tertullian. de Præſcript. cap. xxx.

(15) Rodolphus Wetſtenius, ubi ſupra, pag. 4.

(16) See Tertullian above, citation (4).

[C] He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy.] In this I have followed the opinion of a learned commentator (17). 'Quo felicius hæreſin propagaret, Philoſophiæ ſe mancipavit, Stoicæ præſertim: Tertull. de præſcr. hær. c, 30. Unde idem Tertullianus, c. 7. ejuſd. libri Philoſophiam & Dialecticam exagitat, vel ut matrem hæreſeon, & Prudentius in Hamartigenia, Dialecticæ oſtentationem ei exprobrat, p. 192.

(17) Wetſtenius, ubi ſupra.

Hæc tua Marcion gravis & dialectica vox eſt.

'Norunt enim omnes à Zenone (18) Stoico dialectam eſſe inventam. ---- In order to propagate his hereſy the more ſucceſsfully, he applied himſelf to Philoſophy, eſpecially that of the Stoics: whence Tertullian inveighs againſt Philoſophy, & Logic, as apt to produce Hereſies, and Prudentius upbraids him with oſtentation of Logic.

(18) This is Zeno Eleates, who paſſes for the inventer of Logic. See Gaſſendus de Logicæ Origine, cap. i, Tom. i, Oper. pag. 37, 38.

This, Marcion, is thy grave and logical diſcourſe.

'Every body knows that Logic was invented by Zeno the Stoic.' But I do not blame thoſe who believe that he was already a good Stoic, when he was excluded from the communion of the church the firſt time.

[D] Theſe Sectaries formed churches in emulation of the orthodox, where-ever they could.] Let us cite again the ſame commentator (19). 'Poſt ejus obitum Marcionitæ Eccleſias, in æmulationem Eccleſiæ Catholicæ, ubique locorum erexere: unde Tertull. l. 4. c. Marc. c. 5. Faciunt favos & veſpæ, faciunt Eccleſias & Marcionitæ. ---- After his death the Marcionites built churches every where, in emulation of the Catholic church; whence Tertullian ſays, The waſps make honey-combs; and the Marcionites build churches.' St Epiphanius teſtifies, that the hereſy of the Marcionites continued ſtill not only at Rome, and the reſt of Italy, but alſo in Egypt, Paleſtine, Arabia, Syria, in the iſle of Cyprus, in Thebais, Perſia, and in other places (20). Is it not ſtrange that Lambertus Danæus, who makes uſe of this paſſage of St Epiphanius, to prove that this ſect had made a great progreſs, did not alſo uſe it to prove that it was ſtill very numerous in this Father's time. He cites Epiphanius, as to his own time, only to prove that there were then at Rome ſome Marcionites (21). If we ſhould make a collection of ill-choſen citations, the moſt famous authors would be found there very often. This part of criticiſm would be no leſs uſeful than the reſt: It might teach us how to diſcern between thoſe who are truly learned, and thoſe who only make a ſhow of it.

(19) Wetſtenius, ibid. pag. 5.

(20) Epiphanius, ubi ſupra, pag. 302.

(21) Denique Epiphanius ſcribit ſuo ſeculo adhuc quoſdam Marcionitas Romæ natos fuiſſe. Lambert. Danæus ubi ſupra, fol. 59.

[E] This ſect boaſted of their r- - - - martyrs. This gave occaſion to a diſpute]. Let us produce the ſeveral pieces of this proceſs, in their due order.

SEVERAL pieces of a controverſy put together.

I. The firſt ſhall be furniſhed by Mr Maimbourg, whoſe words are theſe (22). 'They (23) cannot be ignorant that the moſt famous of their doctors, who wrote that Heretics ought to be puniſhed, cauſed Michael Servetus, a Sabellian, who remained obſtinate until death, to be burnt at Geneva, and that according to the doctrine of the holy Fathers, who ſay it is not the ſuffering, but the cauſe that makes the martyr, he does not give him this illuſtrious title, no more than to the Marcionites, and many other antient Heretics, who ſuffered, with an incredible ardour, the moſt cruel deaths for their own ſect.'

(22) Maimbourg, Hiſt. of Calviniſm, book i, pag. 33.

(23) He means the Proteſtants.

II. Let us ſee what anſwer was given him (24) 'I do not know that ever there was an example of ſuch prodigious ignorance given by any man that undertakes to write, or of ſo great a boldneſs in an author, who knows that his book is to be ſeverely examined. The Marcionites, ſays he, expoſed themſelves to the torments of death for their ſect with an incredible ardour. Now in the firſt place we muſt know that the Marcionites prevailed in the ſecond and third century, at which time the Chriſtians were under perſecution; how then could they put the Marcionites, and other Heretics to death, when they had no judges, no tribunals, and they themſelves were every day condemned to death? We muſt moreover obſerve, that, in the age of the Marcionites, the morals of the church were ſo ſevere, that moſt Chriſtians did not think that they could, with a good conſcience, execute the office of a magiſtrate. They would not have condemned wicked men to death, how then could they ſentence Heretics to loſe their lives? But chiefly we muſt obſerve, that the Marcionites were a branch of the Gnoſtics, and that the general error of the Gnoſtics, was, That GOD did not thirſt for the blood of Chriſtians, and that JESUS CHRIST did not expect that we ſhould procure our ſalvation by our death. Wherefore they ridiculed the martyrs, and laughed at the folly, as they pretended, of thoſe who expoſed themſelves to death for their religion. And even Tertullian tells us, that the Gnoſtics, Valentinians, and other Heretics, in the time of perſecution, were the moſt forward to perſecute others, to ſave themſelves from being perſecuted *. Quum igitur fides æſtuat, & Eccleſia exuritur de figura rubi tunc Gnoſtici erumpunt, tunc Valentiniani proſperpunt, tunc omnes matyriorum refragatores ebulliunt calentes, & ipſi offendere, figere, occidere. ----- Thus when the faithful are condemned to the fire, and the church is in flames, like the burning buſh, then ſwarm the Gnoſtics, then the Valentinians creep out; then all the oppoſers of martyrdom give a looſe to their rage, and are themſelves found perſecuting, deſtroying, and burning. And upon theſe words, omnes martyriorum refragatores, Rigaltus makes this obſervation: he means the Gnoſtics, and other Heretics, who endeavoured to hinder every body from 'ſuffering

(24) Jurieu, Apology for the Reformers, cap. xii, pag. 171, of Tom. i, Edit. in 4*to.*

* Scorpiac. cap. 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

needless to give a particular account. For the rest, if we will judge charitably, Marcion died

'suffering martyrdom, and condemned it. Such 'were the Heretics, who, according to the learned 'Father Maimbourg, embraced torments and death 'for their sect with an incredible ardour. But that 'this declaimer may not escape us, we desire him, 'if he will quit the age of the Marcionites, to show 'us what Heretics suffered death in great numbers 'to maintain their Heresy, and when this happened. 'For as to us, who know nothing of History but 'what books teach us, we find no such ages, we meet 'with no such numbers of Heretics who died for their 'errors. We know only that in the fourth century 'some orthodox bishops prosecuted certain Spanish 'Heretics to death. . . . . It is very unhappy for a 'man to go out of his sphere. Father Maimbourg 'has been taken up of late years with copying modern 'histories; but if he had been wise, he would never 'have said any thing of antient history; for he 'can say nothing of it which does not discover his 'ignorance. And I must confess that these discoveries 'give us great satisfaction; for they show that this 'great author, who undertakes to write antient histo- 'ries, as, among others, that of Arianism, is only a 'poor transcriber, who knows nothing of antiquity.'

III. Let us now see what was replied on behalf of Mr Maimbourg (25). 'Whatever desire we may 'have, to discover the faults of an author by criti- 'cizing upon him, methinks we should never draw 'up a charge against him in a matter which is capa- 'ble of a good sense as well as of a bad one. What 'Mr Maimbourg has asserted about the Marcionites, is 'of this nature. It may be taken in a bad sense, by 'saying with the apologist, that the Marcionites were 'not forward to run in crowds to martyrdom, since 'the primitive Christians, were neither able nor wil- 'ling to put them to death for their sect, both be- 'cause they were under persecution, and had not courts 'of judicature, and also because they were averse to ex- 'ecute the office of a magistrate. But, on the other side, 'the Marcionites might run to torments, in order to die 'for their sect, if, to show that it was good, they suffered 'martyrdom for the cause of JESUS CHRIST, as well 'as other Christians who were not of their opinion. 'This sense is no less natural than the other, but rather 'more; and I doubt not but Mr Maimbourg had it in 'view, when he spoke of the Marcionites: what 'convinces me of it, is, that he only says, the Mar- 'cionites suffered death with an incredible ardour, 'and not that the Christians condemned them to it. 'The apologist has added this of his own head; but 'we may say, that his commentary is not agreeable 'to the meaning of the author whom he interprets. 'If this be so, as I believe it is, Mr Maimbourg 'has not shown a prodigious ignorance, supposing 'it may be proved, that there were pretended 'martyrs among the Marcionites. The apologist 'maintains, that these Heretics were so far from 'exposing themselves to martyrdom, that they were 'of the number of those who condemned it, and 'laughed at those who suffered it. If I did not 'profess to banish from this dispute all offensive 'words, I might say the apologist is fallen into 'that ignorance he objects to his adversary. But I 'retract the word ignorance, and will not only 'use a softer word, but I should be glad to find 'another expression than what I am obliged to use, 'by telling him that he is mistaken: which I prove 'thus†. Eusebius tells us, that one of those whom GOD 'raised up to write against the Phrygists, confuted in his 'third book, those who boasted of having had many 'martyrs among them. After they have been con- 'victed, says this anonymous author, of all the points 'I have mentioned, and have nothing to answer, they 'allege their martyrs, affirming, that they have many, 'and that this plainly proves the power of the prophetic 'spirit which they pretend to in their party. But, in my 'opinion, they are mistaken; for the followers of other 'Heresies boast also of having many martyrs; and yet 'we do not go over to their opinion, nor ever confess 'that the truth is on their side. The Marcionites say, 'that they have many martyrs of JESUS CHRIST, 'notwithstanding which they are of a religion contrary 'to that of JESUS CHRIST. I might observe further against this apologist, that the Marcionites did not prevail so in the second and third century, 'but that there were still some of them left in the 'fourth, since St Epiphanius ‡ tells us of a dispute 'he had with a Marcionite (26). But I pass over 'this as a trifle, that I may come to something more 'considerable . . . . (27). If it may be said, as cer- 'tainly it may, that one dies for Heresy, who ex- 'poses himself to martyrdom in hopes of promoting 'it, we shall easily find other martyrs besides those 'of the Marcionites; for instance, those of the Phry- 'gists, who are mentioned by the anonymous author 'in Eusebius. Several of these Heretics exposed 'themselves to martyrdom, and suffered it for the 'end I have mentioned, as appears by the nameless 'author who opposed their Heresy. St Augustin 'relates ‡, that in the times when idols were pu- 'blickly adored, great crowds of the Donatists 'would appear at the Pagan solemnities, and throw 'themselves head-long a-cross those idolaters, that 'they might be killed by the adorers of the idols. 'Here are Heretics who ran in crowds to death.'

IV. It is but just we should hear what Mr Maim- bourg himself replies (28). 'Mr Ferrand . . . . . 'does only tell him, with the greatest modesty in the 'world, that he is mistaken in all these heads: for, 'first, he shows him that I never said, nor pretended, 'that the Marcionites were sentenced to torments by 'the Christians, but only by the persecuting Pagans. 'Secondly, That the Marcionites were not only in 'the second and third centuries under the Pagan 'emperors, but also in the fourth, as he proves by 'St Epiphanius ††, and I say further, as I have 'alread proved in their history, that there were some 'also in the sixth under the Christian emperors, 'when, according to the Imperial laws †† and con- 'stitutions, Heretics were punished with death. In 'the third place he shows him, that the Marcionites 'and several other Heretics, ardently exposed them- 'selves to torments, to support and honour their 'sect by a pretended martyrdom, as I had said. This 'he proves to him by very convincing testimonies, 'and chiefly by that of Eusebius, that he may know, 'that what he boldly says does not appear in history, 'is very evident in it. For Eusebius tells us in his 'history, when he relates what was said by an antient 'author, whom GOD raised up to write against the 'Phrygists or Cataphrygians, Heretics who boasted 'they had among them several martyrs ‡‡. After 'they were convicted of all the points I have mentioned. 'They are the words of that nameless author, as they 'are related by Eusebius in Greek, and by Mr Fer- 'rand in French, and have nothing to answer, they 'allege, &c. . . . (29). What will the apologist say 'now? Here are the Cataphrygians, and many other 'antient Heretics, who are exposed to torments by 'suffering a pretended a martyrdom; and here are 'also Marcionites who suffer it, and they suffer 'from the Pagans, and not by the order of the Chri- 'stians, because, as he himself says, they had not at 'that time any judicature. Here then is a very au- 'thentic testimony of history which fully justifies me, 'and overthrows him, and perfectly destroys all that 'he has said against me on this subject . And if the 'confusion into which this ought to put him, would 'permit him to advance one step further, he might 'find, in what is cited to him from St Augustin †, 'great numbers of Donatists, who ran in crowds 'to death, and pretended to be martyrs, when they 'threw themselves head-long a-cross the Pagans, to 'suport their sect by receiving death from the hand 'of these Idolaters. But is it possible, that this 'apologist, who believes himself so learned a man, 'should be ignorant of that which almost every one 'knows, viz. that, upon occasion of the pretended 'martyrs of the Donatists, St Augustin has used, in 'more than one place of his works, this sentence, so 'good, and so common ‡; That it is not the torment, 'but the cause for which a man suffers that makes him 'a martyr. This he learned from St Cyprian, who 'had said it a long time before him, on occasion of 'the Schismatics and Heretics, who boasted of their 'martyrs ‡, He that is not united to the church, 'cannot be a martyr; he may be put to death, but 'he cannot be crowned. And does not our St Gregory 'produce to this purpose this fine sentiment of St 'Cyprian, using the words of St Augustin, to stop 'the

(25) Ferrand's Answer to the Apology for the Reformation, pag. 213, & seq.

† Baluz. cap. xv. pag. 182, C. D. pag. 183, A. Edit. Gr. Lat. Paris. 1658.

(26) Apply to Mr Ferrand what has been said above, concerning Lamb. Danæus, citat. (21).

(27) Ferrand, ubi supra, pag. 217.

(28) Maimbourg, Hist. of the Pontificate of St Gregory, book iv, pag. 427, Dutch Edit.

(29) Maimbourg, ubi supra, pag. 428.

† Hæref. 48. num. 2, pag. 403.

‡ Epist. L. ante med.

†† Cod. lib. i, leg. 5, 11, 12.

‡‡ Eusеb. lib. v, cap. xvi.

 Pag. 218.

† Aug. Ep. 50, lib. 3. cont. Ep. Parm. & alibi. Optat. lib. iii.

‡ Christi Martyrem non facit pœna, sed causa. Lib. iii, Contr. Crescon. cap. iv, insp. Psa. xxxiv, lxviii.

‡ Esse Martyr non potest qui in unitate non est; occidi potest, coronari non potest. Cypr. lib. de unit. Ep. 52, ad Antonian.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

died in a good disposition of mind, he was not so dogmatical in his Heresy as his disciples

'the presumption and pride of the schismatical bishops, who boasted that they suffered persecution 'as martyrs * ? You ought to know, says he to them; 'that, according to St Cyprian, it is not the torment but 'the cause that makes the martyr: And this being so, 'it is very unjust, and unreasonable, that you should 'dare to boast of that persecution which you suffer. 'Were there not then, in the times of these holy 'Fathers, Schismatics and Heretics, who pretended 'to have martyrs in their party, since they are told, 'that they are mistaken, and that it is neither the 'persecution nor the torment, nor death itself, when 'it is suffered, that makes the martyr, but the good 'cause, and the truth for which one suffers. After 'all that I have said, what credit can be given to 'people, who write so boldly, and even insultingly 'of things which are plainly proved to be false.'

* Debetis enim scire, sicut beatus Cyprianus dixit, quia Martyrem non facit pœna, sed causa. Dum igitur ita fit, incongruum nimis est de ea vos quam dictis persecutione gloriari. Greg. lib. ii, ind. x, Ep. xxxvi

V. There is yet one piece to be produced, and that is, the reply of the censurer of Mr Maimbourg, the reply, I say, which he made to Mr Ferrand: He 'accuses me of ignorance, because I did not 'know a passage of Eusebius, wherein it is said, 'That the Marcionites say they have several martyrs of 'JESUS CHRIST. I should not be ashamed 'to learn of Mr Ferrand in point of quotations; but 'I can assure him, that I both read, and observed 'this passage of Eusebius before he gave me notice 'of it. Neither do I apprehend that it will oblige 'me to retract the least thing I have said against 'Mr Maimbourg. For, I. The question is not what 'the Marcionites said, but what is the real truth of 'the matter. I doubt not but after the danger was 'over, and peace was restored to the church, the 'Marcionites would boast as others did, of their having martyrs. This honour they would assume to 'themselves when it cost them nothing. But it was false 'that they had any martyrs. Tertullian, and all the 'other antients, are more to be believed than the Marcionites themselves, who far from being persecuted 'were the foremost in the crowd of persecutors. II. 'Besides I would gladly know, if a few words spoken 'slightly, and by the by like these, The Marcionites 'say they have several martyrs of JESUS CHRIST, be 'sufficient ground to assert with great assurance, that 'the Marcionites run to the place of execution with incredible ardour, in order to die for their sect? One 'that reads this would be apt to think, that 'Mr Maimbourg had seen some martyrology of 'the Marcionites, wherein he had read the history and 'all the circumstances of the death of these martyrs, and among other things had observed their 'constancy and incredible zeal. Certainly, I may 'tell him once more, that if he had read Tertullian, 'he would not have asserted such a falsehood with so 'great assurance: and therefore, with Mr Ferrand's 'leave, we may say, that Mr Maimbourg is neither 'solidly nor universally learned. In what follows 'Mr Ferrand makes a long digression, and quotes a 'vast number of passages from the antients about the 'punishments of Heretics; whereof some would have 'them left to their own conscience; others would have 'them restrained, but not by inflicting a capital punishment on them; and lastly, others think fit that 'they should suffer death. He concludes his chapter 'with citing long extracts out of Optatus and St Austin, which prove this maxim, causa non pœna facit Martyrem. - - - - The cause not the suffering makes 'a martyr. It looks as if Mr Ferrand were under a 'vow to say nothing to the purpose: for what is all 'this to the point? Who denies that it is not the death 'but the cause of the death that makes the martyr? 'Who denies but there have been Heretics who died 'for their Heresy? The thing to be proved was, 'whether it is possible for Heretics to die for their 'Heresy, I. In great numbers: II. Persons of both 'sexes, &c (30).'

(30) Jurieu, True System of the Church, pag. 644, 645.

My readers have now the process as fully drawn as possible; for the parties have produced all they have to say: It remains only that sentence should be given, who is in the right, and who in the wrong, and I hope I may be allowed to give my opinion in the case.

In the first place it seems to me that Mr Maimbourg did not sufficiently weigh his words; his expressions are hyperbolical; for it is neither certain that the Marcionites had many martyrs, nor that those martyrs suffered death as Marcionites. It had been therefore more prudent to have said only, that this sect boasted of having martyrs. II. But if the expressions of Mr Maimbourg are hyperbolical, those of the censurer are much more so; for a man ought not, only for using expressions that are too strong, to be accused either of a prodigious ignorance, or of too great boldness. III. The censurer hath been so passionate, that did not we perceive a great air of moderation in the whole work of Mr Ferrand, the extraordinary modesty which he shows in this place, might pass for a malicious trick, designed to expose more effectually the hideous deformity of the criticism he refuted. When I read this page of his book, methinks I see fine pearls about the neck of an Æthiopian, the lustre of which is increased by the blackness surrounding them, whilst they add new degrees of obscurity to the blackness (31). IV. According to all appearance, the censurer knew nothing of this passage of Eusebius, when he published his apology for the reformers, and was ignorant that the sect of the Marcionites subsisted still in the fourth century. How then comes it, may one say, that he affirms he had read and observed this passage, before Mr Ferrand gave him notice of it? Does not he himself overthrow all his confutation, by confessing that he was not ignorant of this place in Eusebius? Since therefore this confession was prejudicial to him, we must conclude that he was sincere in it. I answer, that of two evils we must always choose the least. Now in comparing the prejudice which might happen to him by his confession with that which might happen by a conduct quite opposite, the damage is less which he suffers by the first than by the second: and therefore he boasted of knowing what Eusebius says concerning the martyrdom of the Marcionites. If he had confessed that he knew nothing of it, all his readers would have entertained the worse opinion of his learning; for the most stupid might have sense enough to conclude with a great deal of ease, that he was a meer novice in ecclesiastical History, and that it was very indecent in him to object this fault to his adversary with so much haughtiness. The evil was great; the danger unavoidable, and the prejudice not to be easily repaired. But what had he to fear in boasting that he was well acquainted with his Eusebius? I will tell it you here in two words, and more particularly hereafter. He might fear that the readers who reason well, and take the pains to compare exactly the objections with the answers, and to consider whether a proof that is good in itself does not lose it's force by supposing this or that, would perceive the weakness of his criticism. The mischief of this is not very great, for of a thousand readers there are scarce two who will trouble themselves with these enquiries, or are capable of making them; wherefore the danger is infinitely greater, when a person is exposed to be thought ignorant by every one that can read, than when he is in danger of being taken for a bad Logician by a small number of readers. Did he need a greater motive to act as he did? It was worth his while to boast that he knew very well the pretensions of the Marcionites related by Eusebius; to boast of it I say, being in such circumstances wherein he was exposed to the great inconveniences, which I shall now lay open. V. All the proofs made use of against Maimbourg, may be reduced to this: the Marcionites lived only in the second and third centuries, therefore they had no martyrs; for at that time the Christian church had not any courts of judicature, and besides they taught with the Gnostics, that it was a foolish thing to expose one's self to martyrdom. This reasoning supposes, that the followers of Marcion were neither persecuted by the Christians nor by the Pagans. Could any one be so bold as to say this, if he knew, 1. that an author cited by Eusebius, confesses, that they boasted of the multitude of their martyrs? Καὶ οἱ πρῶτοί γε ἀπὸ τῆς Μαρκίωνος αἱρέσεως Μαρκιωνισταὶ καλούμενοι, πλείστους ὅσους ἔχειν χριστοῦ μάρτυρας λέγουσιν· ἀλλὰ τὸν γε Χριστὸν αὐτὸν κατὰ ἀλήθειαν οὐχ' ὁμολογοῦσι. Primi certe qui Marcionis hæresim sequuntur, vulgo Marcionitæ cognominati, quamplurimos habere se dicunt martyres Christi. Et tamen Christum ipsum revera minime confitentur (32). - - - The first followers of the Heresy of Marcion, usually called Marcionites, boast that they

(31) Every knows this rism of the f. Contraria ju posita magis cescunt.

(32) Eusebius v, cap. xvi m. 182. D ciples were. We may say of his system the same thing as of that of the Manichees. He they had a great number who died martyrs for the testimony of JESUS CHRIST: and yet they do not confess CHRIST in reality. 2. That Eusebius does not deny the fact, but only denies, that the great number of the Marcionites, that were martyrs, was a proof of the goodness of their sect? VI. This passage of Eusebius utterly ruins the pretension of the critic, viz. that the followers of Marcion taught with the Gnostics, that none but fools would lose their lives for their religion, and that they were the most forward among the persecutors, in order to keep off persecution from themselves. How could they teach this, when they pretended to prove by their martyrs, that they were the true church? VII. It is impertinent to cite Tertullian, since he says nothing expressly of that sect, and it is ridiculous to pretend, that those who join the note of Rigaltius with the words of Tertullian, dare not mention any Marcionites that were martyrs. VIII. It is very true, that Marcion agreed with the Gnostics in some things, but nevertheless his sect was different from theirs; and so without express testimony and particular proofs, it is not just to ascribe to him the opinion of the Gnostics concerning martyrdom. For if so, it might be lawful to argue thus: the Arminians are a branch of the Protestants; therefore they believe the real presence like those of the confession of Augsburg, and absolute predestination like those of the confession of Geneva. IX. It is very strange, that one who presumed to insult Mr Maimbourg for his ignorance of antiquity, should not know that the sect of the Marcionites flourished very much towards the end of the fourth century, as St Epiphanius informs us (33). It flourished still in the time of Theodoret, who informs us, that he converted and baptized more than ten thousand Marcionites (34). Note, that Lambertus Danæus was not ignorant, that these sectaries boasted of their martyrs; but with St Cyprian he pretends, that such of them as suffered death for religion were not martyrs. 'Martyres etiam se 'habere jactant, ut scribit Eusebius lib. 5. cap. 16. 'inter quos recensetur Methodorum Smyrnæ crematum, 'lib. 4. cap. 16. sed falso, nam causa facit martyres, 'quemadmodum Cyprianus ait, non autem pœna (35). 'They also boast that they have martyrs (as Eusebius 'writes, among whom he reckons Methodorus burnt at 'Smyrna) but falsly, for it is the cause that makes 'martyrs, not the suffering, as St Cyprian says.' He speaks of a Marcionite priest that was burnt at Smyrna at the same time with Polycarp. Ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ δὲ περὶ αὐτὸν γραφῇ, καὶ ἄλλα μαρτύρια συνῆπτο κατὰ τὴν αὐτὴν Σμύρναν πεπραγμένα ὑπὸ τὴν αὐτὴν περίοδον τοῦ χρόνου τῆς τοῦ Πολυκάρπου μαρτυρίας· μεθ' ὧν καὶ Μητρόδωρος τῆς κατὰ Μαρκίωνα φλάνης, πρεσβύτερος δὴ εἶναι δοκῶν, πυρὶ παραδοθεὶς ἀνῄρηται. Sed & alia martyria sub idem tempus quo Polycarpus passus est, apud Smyrnam facta, in eadem epistola conjunctim leguntur. In quibus & Metrodorus quidam qui Marcionis sectæ presbyter dicebatur, flammis consumptus interiit (36). - - - - - Other martyrs are likewise mentioned in the same epistle, to have suffered at Smyrna, about the time with Polycarp, among which one Metrodorus, said to be a presbyter of the sect of the Marcionites, was burnt. X. I do not know whether I may not say, that these people reckoned those for martyrs among them who were perhaps killed in some popular commotion of the orthodox. It would be no great wonder if some did believe, that even before the emperors were Christians, the Heretics were exposed sometimes to the violence of the Catholics; for we learn from St Epiphanius, that Manes had like to have been killed by the common people in the city of Caschara, where he had publickly disputed with the bishop of that place. He had infallibly lost his life there, if a very honest man, called Marcellus, had not by his venerable presence, put a stop to the burning zeal of the people. Ἐντεῦθεν ὁ Μάνης ἀποδράσας, βαλομένων τῶν δήμων αὐτὸν λιθοβολῆσαι, εἰ μὴ ὅτι παρῆλθεν εἰς μέσον Μάρκελλος, καὶ τῷ αἰδεσίμῳ αὐτοῦ προσώπῳ κατεδυσώπησε τὸν δήμους, ἐπεὶ ἂν ὁ πάλαι νεκρὸς μένων πάλαι ἐτεθνήκει. Secundum hæc Manes fuga sibi consulit. Populus enim lapidibus illum obruere volebat; nisi Marcellus in medium prodiens vultu ipso venerationis pleno aspectuque repressisset. Quod nisi fecisset, jam dudum infelix ipse periisset (37).

This honest man had used the same moderation before, to hinder the bishop from causing Manes to be killed. This prelate was called Archelaus, he was in so great a rage, when he knew what Manes had writ to Marcellus, that he would immediately have seized this Heretic, had not Marcellus hindred him by his intreaties. Ὁ δὲ Ἀρχέλαος γνοὺς τὴν αἰτίαν, καὶ τὴν ἐπισολὴν ἀναγνούς, ἐβρυχε τὸν ὀδόντας, ὥσπερ λέων ὠρυόμενος, καὶ ζῆλον Θεοῦ ἀναλαβὼν ἐπειρᾶτο ὁρμῆσαι μᾶλλον ἕως αὐτοῦ, καὶ χειρώσασθαι τὸν τοιοῦτον. Archelaus re omni perspecta denibus fremens, rugientis leonis instar, ac divino quodam ardore percitus ad Manichæum potius proficisci cupiebat, hominemque capere (38). - - - - Archelaus being informed of the whole matter, raged like a roaring lion, being fired with a divine zeal, and resolved to go and seize him. Some days after he had occasion again for all his eloquence to restrain the zeal of this prelate. Manes having received the answer of Marcellus, went to him. Archelaus was of opinion that he should be killed like a wild beast, who ravaged the lord's sheep-fold. But Marcellus, by his wise discourses, inclined him to mildness, and made him agree to confer peaceably with this heresiarch. Perhaps I shall not be believed, unless I cite the Greek, which therefore I will do. Ὁ δὲ Ἐπίσκοπος Ἀρχέλαος ἔχων ἐν ἑαυτῷ μετὰ τὸν λόγον καὶ τὸ ζηλωτικὸν τῆς πίσεως, ἐβουλεύετο εἰ ἦν δυνατὸν, ἐξ αὐτῆς τὸν ἄνδρα ὥσπερ παρδαλιν ἢ λύκον, ἢ τι ἕτερον τῶν θηρίων ἀγρεύσας, θανάτῳ παραδῶναι, ἵνα μὴ λυμανθῇ τὰ θρέμματα τοιούτῳ θηρὸς, [ἐφ' ὁδὸ] τὴν εἴσοδον κατανοῶν. Ὁ δὲ Μάρκελλος τῇ μακροθυμίᾳ μᾶλλον ἤξίου, καὶ ἀνεξικάκειαν πρὸς αὐτὸν διάλογον ἀπ' αὐτῆ γενέσθαι. At Archelaus Episcopus præter doctrinam fidei insuper ardore præditus, author erat, ut si fieri posset, homo ille, pardi instar ac lupi, vel cujusvis alterius bestiæ interceptus morti traderetur, ne ejusmodi feræ incursione pecora læderentur, cum illius ingressum cognosceret. Marcellus contra patienter ac leniter potius illum in colloquio tractandum putabat (39). - - - - But Archelaus the bishop being not only sound in faith, but also very zealous; when he heard of his coming, was of opinion, that, if possible, he ought to be killed like a tyger, or wolf, or any other beast of prey, lest the flock should be hurt, by the ravages of such sort of creatures: Marcellus, on the other hand, advised that he should rather be discoursed with, and treated patiently, and mildly. This shows, that under pretence that the orthodox had not any courts of judicature for the first three centuries, one must not conclude so magisterially, that the Heretics could not boast of having martyrs. All communions agree in honouring with this title some of those who die for their religion by the wicked attempts of the common people. XI. Lastly I observe, that Mr Ferrand should not have been insulted for making long extracts out of Optatus and St Augustin which prove this maxim, Causa non pœna facit martyrem; for it was necessary for him to make them to answer the challenge of the apologist, and to show his rashness: once more here is the tenor of this challenge (40); 'but 'that this declaimer may not escape, we desire him, 'if he will quit the age of the Marcionites, to show 'us what Heretics died in crowds to maintain their 'Heresy, and when this happened. As for us, who 'know nothing of History but what books teach us, 'we find no such ages, we meet with no such crowds 'of Heretics, who died for their errors: we know 'only, that in the fourth century, some orthodox bi'shops prosecuted to death certain Spanish Heretics.' This challenge does plainly contain this assertion. In the first four centuries there were no other martyrs that were Heretics but some Priscillianists. The contrary to this was proved to him by long citations. What then can be more ridiculous, than to laugh at those long extracts, and to say they are impertinent, and that he does not deny that there were Heretics who died for their heresy, and that the question was not, whether it be possible for Heretics to die for their Heresy (41); but only whether it be possible in the circumstances alledged by him, which are five in number? It is manifest that this challenge contains nothing relating to those circumstances, and so this author is notoriously guilty of acting insincerely. He challenges a man to prove such a thing to him; and when he sees

(32) See the remark [D], cent. (30).

(33) Theodor. Epist. calvi, apud Baron. ad ann. 424, num. 19.

(34) Lambert. Danæus, ubi supra, fol. 59.

(35) Eusebius lib. iv, cap. xv, pag. m. 152. Compare it with what Mr Jurieu says. It was false that they had any martyrs. Caus. Baronius, ad ann. 424, num. 14, where he says, Facilius est invenire Marcionitam à Gentilibus olim occisum, quam à Christianis Ecclesiæ reddatum. - - - - It was heretofore easier to find a Marcionite killed by the Heathens, than one refused to the church by the Christians.

(36) Epiph. adv. Hæres. num. 66, pag. m. 627.

(37) Id. ib. pag. 624.

(38) Ib. pag. 625.

(39) Jurieu, Apology for the Reformers, Tom. I, pag. 172.

(40) Jurieu, System of the Church, pag. 645.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He did not know how to manage his principal point [F]: but entangled himſelf in a multitude ſees it proved demonſtratively, he complains of the length of the proof, and ſays, the queſtion was not about this, but about another thing. What is moſt aſtoniſhing is, that a man ſo much verſed in controverſy, ſhould dare to give ſuch a challenge as this; ſince almoſt all the Romiſh controverſial writers, in anſwer to any thing that is alledged from the martyrology of the Proteſtants, ſay, that the antient Heretics boaſted of the ſame thing. I ſhall only quote a Jeſuit, who wrote againſt Peter du Moulin, and whom this miniſter and Andrew Rivet have refuted. 'Vetus 'delirium hæreticorum eſt, ſays he (42), Eccleſiam 'Catholicam in Martyrum cenſu æmulari velle. Ita 'de Marcionitis & de Cataphrygibus ſeu Montaniſtis 'ſcribit ‡ Apollinaris Epiſcopus Hierapoleos, antiquiſ-'ſimus Theologus; ipſos, cum omnia quæ pro ſe at-'tulerant argumenta, fuiſſent rationibus conſentaneis 'rejecta, ad Martyres confugiſſe, & ad propheticum 'illorum ſpiritum. Invehuntur pariter tum ſanctus 'Cyprianus contra pſeudomartyres Novatianos, tum 'ſanctus Epiphanius contra Euphemitas: qui ob eo-'rum multitudinem ſe Martyrianos vaniſſime appella-'runt. Habuere ſuos Donatiſtæ; tantáque inſaniâ 'Martyrii eam larvam affectarunt, ut cum Eccleſiæ 'tyrannorum perſecutio deeſſet, ſe aliquoties dederint 'præcipites exanimaverintque; deque his Optatus Mi-'levitanus, divus Auguſtinus, & Theodoretus memi-'nerunt. Non caruerunt iis quoque Ariani & Priſcil-'lianiſtæ, quorum inſiſtere veſtigiis ſatagunt Sectarii 'noſtri temporis, & ideo ſuos habent Martyrologos, 'qui mendacia intexunt ineptiis dicerem lepidiſſimis, 'niſi jocari in re tanti momenti facinus eſſet. - - - - - 'It is an antient infatuation of Heretics, to rival the 'Catholic church in the number of their martyrs: ſo Apol-'lonaris, biſhop of Hierapolis, a very antient Divine, 'writes of the Marcionites, and Cataphrygians, or Mon-'taniſts; that they, when all their arguments were re-'futed by ſound reaſoning, uſed to take refuge in their 'martyrs, and their prophetic ſpirit. St Cyprian in 'like manner inveighs againſt the Novatian Pſeudo-mar-'tyrs, and St Epiphanius againſt the Euphemites, who, 'from the multitude of their martyrs, were vain enough 'to call themſelves Martyriſts. The Donatiſts had 'theirs, and to ſuch a degree of madneſs did their infatua-'tion carry them, that when at any time the church's free-'dom from the perſecution of tyrants, prevented their 'meeting their fates from the hands of others, they would 'ſeek it from their own, and would throw themſelves 'down headlong from precipices to obtain it; as is men-'tioned by Optatus Milevitanus, St Auguſtin, and Theo-'doret. Nor were the Arians, and Priſcillianiſts, 'without their martyrs; in whoſe ſteps our modern 'ſectaries are ſo anxious to tread, and therefore they 'have their martyrologiſts, who weave into their fictions, 'ſuch ridiculous tales, which one might call moſt enter-'taining, and diverting, but that it would be crimi-'nal to jeſt in a matter of ſuch importance.' Note, Petraſancta is miſtaken, as well as Baronius (43), in thinking that Apollinaris was the author whom Euſebius quotes. Rufinus and Nicephorus are guilty of the ſame error. See how they are refuted in the firſt tome of the Bibliotheque of Mr du Pin (44), agreeable to the reaſons which Henricus Valeſius (45) and Peter Halloix (46) have alledged.

(42) Silveſter Petraſancta, in notis in epiſtolam Petri Molinæi ad Balzacum, pag. 36, 37.

‡ Apud Euſeb. hiſt. lib. v, cap. xv.

(43) Ad ann. 173, num. 20, & ſeq.

(44) Pag. 68. Dutch edition.

(45) In Euſeb. lib. v, cap. vi.

(46) In notis ad vitam S. Apollin. cap. iii.

THE advantages of collecting the writings of ſuch controverſies.

It were to be wiſhed, that ſome good critic would take the pains to collect together all the pieces of ſuch like controverſies, and place them one after another, as I have done, in regard to the diſpute about the martyrs of the Marcionites. I have given here a ſpecimen of this work, to encourage thoſe who are able to undertake it. It would be a work of very great uſe, either to diſcover the diſingenuity of ſome diſputants, or to accuſtom authors to a greater exactneſs: for knowing that very few, if any, compare together the replies and rejoinders which are ſcattered in many volumes, they do not fear the conſequences of their diſingenuous practices; which they would certainly be afraid of, if they knew that ſome body would make ſuch a collection of the objections and anſwers, and of the replies and rejoinders, as will be moſt proper to ſhow in a moment the ſtrength and weakneſs both of the one and the other; which might be ſeen the more eaſily if there were added to it ſuch obſervations as I have made above. The beſt way of doing it, would be by ranging the whole in two or three columns. See the preface to the project of this Dictionary, towards the end.

[F] He did not know how to manage his principal point.] If a man of abilities equal to thoſe of Des Cartes had been to manage this affair, the ſyſtem of the two principles could not have been overturned ſo eaſily as it was by the Fathers, when they had none to oppoſe, but Cerdon, Marcion, Apelles, and Manes, who knew not how to make uſe of their advantages, either becauſe they admitted the goſpel, or becauſe they had not knowledge enough to avoid the explications, which perplexed them the moſt (47). It was the moſt ridiculous thing in the world, to maintain that CHRIST did indeed appear upon earth, but not with a true humane body, and to give this reaſon for it, becauſe the fleſh is not the work of the good principle but of the ill one. The Marcionites diſpute pitifully about this. In general, if we judge of their ſtrength by the objections they propoſe in the dialogue of Origen (48); we muſt think very meanly of them. We do not find that they preſſed home the difficulties about the origin of evil; for it ſeems, that after they were anſwered, that evil came from the bad uſe of the free-will of man, they knew not what to reply; or if they urged the fore-ſight of this miſchievous uſe, they were ſatisfied with the firſt anſwer, how weak ſoever it was. Origen (49) having anſwered, that an intelligent creature, if it had not enjoyed free-will, would have been immutable and immortal like GOD, ſtops the mouth of the Marcionite, for he has nothing to reply. Nevertheleſs it was eaſy to refute this anſwer; for he needed only to have aſked Origen, whether the bleſſed in paradiſe are equal to GOD in the attributes of immutability and immortality. He would doubtleſs have anſwered, they are not: And conſequently, might it have been replied, a creature does not become a GOD, becauſe it is determined to good, and is deprived of that which you call free-will. You do not therefore anſwer the objection; for the queſtion was, wherefore GOD, fore ſeeing that a creature would ſin, if it were left to its own free-conduct, did not determine it to that which was good, as he does continually determine the ſouls of the bleſſed which are tranſlated into paradiſe? You anſwer after ſuch a manner as ſhows, that you took the queſtion to have been, why GOD did not give a creature a being as immutable and independant as himſelf? But there was never any ſuch queſtion put to you. St Baſil has given another anſwer which has the ſame defect. GOD, ſays he, would not have us to love him by conſtraint, and we our ſelves do not think our ſervants well-diſpoſed to our ſervice, while we hold them in chains, but only when they obey us of their own inclination. Ὅτι καὶ σὺ τὺς οἰκέτας, ὐχ ὅταν δεσμὶυς ἔχῃς, εὖνυς ὑπολαμβάνεις, ἀλλ' ὅταν ἑκυσίως ἰδῇς ἀποπληρὦντάς σοι τὰ καθήκοντα, καὶ Θεῷ τοίιυν ὐ τὸ ἠναγκασμένον φίλον, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἐξ ἀρετῆς κατορθύμενον, ἀρετὴ δὲ ἐκ προαιρέσεως καὶ ὐκ ἐξ ἀνάγκης γίνεται. Quoniam & tu ſervos, non quando vinctos in cuſtodiâ tenes, benevolos eſſe tibi exiſtimas; ſed cum ſponte omnia, quæ erga te oportet, videris agere. Sic item Deo eum puta fore amicum, non qui coactus, ſed qui ſponte ſuâ virtuteque illi obtemperat. Virtus vero ex voluntate perficitur, non ex neceſſitate (50). To convince St Baſil that his reflexion is very falſe, we need only put him in mind of the ſtate of paradiſe: GOD is there loved and ſerved perfectly well, and yet the bleſſed do not enjoy free-will; they have no longer that fatal privilege of the power to commit ſin. Muſt we therefore compare them to thoſe ſlaves who obey only by force? What was St Baſil dreaming of? And ſince he anſwers the difficulties by the parallel we have produced, it is a ſign that the followers of Marcion and Manes made no reply, when they ſaw themſelves overthrown by this argument, and that they never thought to put their adverſaries in mind of the ſtate of glorified ſouls. If there were any Marcionites at this day, as able diſputants, as either the Jeſuits or the Janſeniſts in their diſputations againſt one another, they would begin where their anceſtors left off. They would firſt of all attack the laſt intrenchment of Origen, viz. free-will, and before they had

(47) Compare what was ſaid in the article MANICHEES, remark [B].

(48) I mean the dialogue againſt the Marcionites attributed to Origen, of which Mr Wetſtein, profeſſor at Baſil, publiſhed an edition in 1674, being the firſt in which the Greek appeared.

(49) A Dialogue againſt the Marcionites, Sect. iii, pag. 79, 80. Edit. Baſil. 1674.

(50) Baſilius Magnus, Tom. i, in homilia, Quod Deus non ſit auctor mali, pag. 369.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google multitude of ill-contrived explications; from whence it came to paſs, that the Fathers eaſily confounded the Marcionites. It ſeems they were overthrown by the firſt anſwer that was given them: for as ſoon as they were told of the inviolable privileges of human liberty, they were altogether ſilent and mute as fiſhes. Yet it was eaſy to reply to this [G]. I ſhall make a few obſervations againſt Moreri [H].

advanced three ſyllogiſms, would oblige the reſpondent to confeſs, that he did not underſtand what he affirmed (51), and that theſe are unſearchable depths of the ſovereignty of the Creator in which our reaſon is ſwallowed up, and nothing but faith can ſupport us. This is in reality our reſource. Revelation is the only magazine of the arguments, with which we muſt oppoſe theſe people: it is by this means only, that we are able to refute the pretended eternity of an ill principle. But when we go about to determine after what manner the Creator has acted, with reſpect to the firſt ſin of the creature, we find our ſelves very much entangled. All the hypotheſes laid down by Chriſtians, are not ſufficient to ward off the blows that are levelled at them (52). They are triumphant when they act offenſively; but they loſe all their advantage when they ſuſtain the attack. Our ideas in this matter are only juſt clear enough to make an eternal war; like thoſe princes, who cannot hinder others from ravaging their frontiers, tho' they are ſtrong enough to make incurſions into the enemy's country. It does not appear that Marcion and his followers did well underſtand the ſtrength and weakneſs of the orthodox.

Prudentius who wrote a poem about the origin of ſin, has not well anſwered the objection of thoſe heretics (53).

[G] Yet it was eaſy to reply to this.] I have already ſhown in the preceding remark, that to refute invincibly the anſwer of St Baſil, it was ſufficent to deſire him to conſider the ſtate of the bleſſed. I add here, that it was not neceſſary to put him upon ſo high a contemplation; for it was ſufficient to deſire him to conſider the ſtate of the juſt in this life. It is by virtue of the grace of the holy ſpirit that the children of God, while they are travellers, I mean while they are in this world, do love their heavenly father, and perform good works. Neither St Baſil, nor the other Greek Fathers, could deny this, tho' they did not aſſert the neceſſity of grace efficacious by itſelf ſo ſtrongly as St Auguſtin did. Does the grace of God reduce the faithful to the condition of a ſlave who obeys only by force? Does it hinder them from loving God voluntarily, and from obeying him with a good and ſincere will? If this queſtion had been put to St Baſil and the other fathers, who wrote againſt the Marcionites, would they not have been obliged to anſwer negatively? But what is the natural and immediate conſequence of that anſwer? Is it not to ſay, that, without infringing the liberty of the creature, God could infallibly determine it to good? And therefore ſin does not proceed from hence, that the Creator could not prevent it without deſtroying the free-will of the creature; but we muſt find out ſome other cauſe of it. I wonder that the Fathers of the church did not ſee the weakneſs of their anſwers, and that their adverſaries did not give them notice of it. I know very well, that theſe matters had not then paſſed thro' all the diſcuſſions which have appeared in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries; but it is certain the primitive church knew perfectly well the agreement of human liberty with the grace of the holy ſpirit (54). The moſt rigid Chriſtian ſects acknowledge at this day, that the decrees of God did not impoſe upon the firſt man a neceſſity of ſinning, and that the moſt efficacious grace does not deſtroy the liberty of a ſinful man. They confeſs therefore, that the decrees of preſerving mankind conſtantly and invariably in a ſtate of innocence, how abſolute ſoever they might have been, would have permitted all men to perform all their duties very freely. The Thomiſts maintain, that phyſical pre-determination perfects the liberty of our ſoul, far from deſtroying or weakening it; and yet they teach that this pre-determination is of ſuch a nature, that when it is given to produce an act of love, it is not poſſible in ſenſu compoſito, that the ſoul ſhould produce an act of hatred. I frankly confeſs, that I believe they do not very well underſtand, how the liberty of the creature is perfected by this phyſical pre-determining quality, which the firſt cauſe, ſay they, produces in the ſoul of a man before it acts; but whether they do underſtand it or no, it is certain, that they afford enough totally to overthrow the ſolution which St Baſil gave to the objections of the Manichees. As for the Moliniſts, they cannot make uſe of ſuch a ſolution, for they do not reject the grace of God, which infallibly ſecures a man's predeſtination; they do not deny but God, if he pleaſes, can ſecure a man who always acts freely from ever falling into ſin in the moſt dangerous temptations.

[H] I ſhall make a few obſervations againſt Moreri.] I. His remark, that Sinope, a city of Paphlagonia, had formerly been a city of Pontus, is very wrong ſince Sinope was at the ſame time both a city of Paphlagonia and a city of Pontus. II. It is not true, that Marcion was never received into the communion of the church of Rome (55). III. Nor that after he had followed a long time the errors of Cerdon, he invented new ones in 134. We have ſhown before that he came to Rome under Antoninus Pius, who did not begin to reign till 138. Baronius, building upon ſome paſſages of Tertullian, believed that Marcion began to publiſh his tenets at Rome in 146 (56); and yet there are other paſſages of this Father which teſtify, that Marcion did not come to Rome till the time of Pope Anicetus (57): which ſuppoſes that he did not arrive there till twenty years after the birth of his ſect. Tertullian was in the right when he ſaid (58), that he was not well informed of the time when this heretic began to dogmatize. IV. Since Cerdon went to Rome in Pope Hyginus's time (59), who was not created till the year 153, how was it poſſible that Marcion ſhould invent new hereſies in 134, after he had followed a long time thoſe which Cerdon taught him at Rome? V. It is falſe, that Marcion called himſelf Jesus Christ ſent to aboliſh the law as being wicked. Moreri ſlanders him in aſcribing this to him. If it be ſaid, that Moreri, in theſe words, He called himſelf Jesus Christ, does not refer to Marcion, but to one of the gods of this heretic, to him whom he owned for the author of the goſpel, and the redeemer of the univerſe; this will not clear Moreri, he will ſtill be guilty both of expreſſing himſelf ill, and of reporting amiis the opinion of this heretic. Marcion admitting two gods, one good and the other bad, ſaid, that one made the world, and the other was the father of Jesus Christ (60). Perhaps the confuſion with which Baronius ſpeaks of this, deceived Moreri. Duos poſuit Deos (Marcion) ſibi contrarios, quorum alter bonus, malus vero eſſe alter; alter legis veteris auctor, alter autem novæ . . . . . ab illoque malo mundum eſſe creatum, à bono autem reſtitutum atque redemptum, huncque fuiſſe Jeſum ſolventem legem atque Prophetas à Deo patre miſſum (61). Thus this paſſage is read in my edition of Baronius (62). I know not whether the Printers have omitted ſome words, or whether we muſt attribute to Baronius the contradiction found there, which conſiſts in ſaying, that Jesus Christ was the good principle, and that his Father ſent him into the world.

(51) They would pretend that ſuch a confeſſion, amounts to no leſs than being reduced to a non plus. ad terminum non hæret.

(52) See in the article PAULICIANS, remark [F], what I have cited from the Judgment of Mr Turrin about the true methods of explaining Grace. See alſo what a French miniſter anſwered to the Lutherans. Mr Beauval hath mentioned it in the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, Nov. 1695, pag. 105, & ſeq. but chiefly ſee the inſyncrisms of Bernardinus Ochinus.

(53) See the remark [F] of the article PRUDENTIUS.

(54) That is, of ſuch a grace as certainly produces it's effect.

(55) See the remark [B].

(56) Baron. ad ann. 146, num. 1.

(57) He was created biſhop of Rome in 167, according to Baronius.

(58) Adv. Marcion. lib. i, cap. xix, apud Baronium, ibid.

(59) Irenæus, lib. i, cap. xxviii, apud Baron. ibid. num. 2.

(60) See Danæus, ubi ſupra, fol. 36, citing Iren. lib. ii, cap. 1, and lib. iv, cap. lvii, and other Fathers.

(61) Baronius, ubi ſupra, num. 9, pag. 117.

(62) It is that of Antwerp, 1597.

MARESTS (John des) a Pariſian, Sieur de St Sorlin, was one of the fineſt wits of the XVIIth century; but he became at laſt viſionary and fanatical. He was very much beloved by cardinal Richelieu, and we may ſay that among other offices (a),

(a) He was comptroller-general of the extraordinaries of the war, and ſecretary-general of the marine of the Levant. Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. m. 342.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he had under his eminence an employment of wit [A]. He himſelf has left us a deſcription of his morals, which is not very much to his advantage; for he confeſſes, that to ſeduce the women who oppoſed him out of a concern for their ſalvation, he made no ſcruple to incline them to Atheiſm [B]. He was a member of the French academy at its firſt foundation, and one of its principal ornaments. He wrote ſeveral dramatic pieces (b), which were much applauded, and chiefly that intituled Les Viſionaires. He undertook an Epic Poem (c), which coſt him many years labour, and he believed he ſhould have taken a longer time to finiſh it, if Providence had not had a deſign to employ his pen in works of Devotion [C]. He alſo wrote romances, wherein he departed from thoſe ideas of virtue which were then repreſented in that kind of writings [D]. He died in 1676. He declared himſelf an enemy to the Janſeniſts, but certainly he had better never have meddled in that quarrel; for had it not been for this, his viſions which are ſo well deſcribed by theſe gentlemen [E], had lain concealed in darkneſs. He promiſed the king of France, by (b) See the titles of them and of ſeveral other pieces of his in the Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. m. 343.

(c) Intituled Clovis.

[A] He had under his eminence an employment of wit.] Hear what he ſays himſelf under the name of Euſebius in one of his books. ‘ (1) With the help ‘ of ſome, by whom I was ſupported to arrive at ‘ the height of the palace of fortune, I came at laſt ‘ to his apartment, who reigned in this high place. ‘ There I taſted a thouſand raviſhing pleaſures by the ‘ eſteem he had for me, by the careſſes both pub- ‘ lic and private, wherewith he honoured me, by the ‘ applauſes I received from all parts, and by the ‘ victories I often gained over my envious enemies ‘ . . . . (2) You will force me to give you a taſte of ‘ theſe delicacies whereby you may judge of the reſt, ‘ and which will ſerve to ſhow the indefatigable ‘ ſtrength of the genius of this great man, who ‘ could not relax from one labour of the mind, but ‘ by another labour of the ſame nature. Imme- ‘ diately after he had ſpent ſome hours in ſettling all ‘ the affairs of ſtate, he often ſhut up himſelf with ‘ a learned Divine, to handle with him the ſublimeſt ‘ queſtions of religion, and his wit gathered a new ‘ ſtrength in theſe changes of converſation. After ‘ this he commonly called me in alone, to divert ‘ himſelf about matters more gay and nice, in which ‘ he took wonderful pleaſure. For having obſerved ‘ in me a ſort of fruitful wit to bring forth ſudden ‘ thoughts, he confeſſed to me, that his greateſt ‘ pleaſure was, when in our converſation, he excelled ‘ my thoughts. And if I propoſed another thought ‘ beyond his, then his wit made a new effort with ‘ very great ſatisfaction. . . . . Now judge you, if I ‘ did not taſte in my turn the ſame pleaſure, which ‘ ſeemed to him ſo great, ſince it often happened, that ‘ I went beyond his thoughts.’

(1) Delices de l'Eſprit, pag. 4.

(2) Ib. pag. 105.

[B] He confeſſes that to ſeduce the women . . . . . he made no ſcruple to incline them to Atheiſm.] He does not only ſay, ‘ (3) That he ſtaid ſome time in the cot- ‘ tage of carnal and groſs pleaſures, which had but ‘ one ſign, coarſely painted, and whereon Bacchus and ‘ Venus were repreſented; and that finding that theſe ‘ pleaſures ruined his body and his fortune, he reſolved ‘ to ſeek after thoſe which were more ſublime. He ‘ adds, (4) That he ought to mourn with tears of ‘ blood for the bad uſe he made of his eloquence ‘ among the women; for I made uſe of nothing but ‘ diſguiſed lies, ſubtile tricks, and infamous treache- ‘ ries. I endeavoured to ruin the ſouls of thoſe ‘ whom I feigned to be in love with; I ſought ‘ out deceitful ſpeeches to diſturb, to blind, and ſe- ‘ duce them, that I might induce them to believe, ‘ that vice was virtue, or at leaſt a thing natural and ‘ indifferent. I betrayed even God himſelf, by in- ‘ terpreting his laws maliciouſly, and ſetting off the ‘ falſe and damnable reaſonings of the voluptuous and ‘ impious, ſuch as you are, and I employed all ‘ the efforts of my eloquence to extinguiſh the ‘ ſenſe of Virtue in a ſoul.’ It was proved to him (5), that ‘ He had denoted himſelf by thoſe individual and ‘ perſonal characters;’ ſo that what his Euſebius ſays, is his own hiſtory.

(3) Ib. pag. 3.

(4) Delices de l'Eſprit, pag. 73. See the new Critical Letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 746, 747.

(5) Meſſieurs of Port-Royal in their Viſionaires, Letter viii. pag. 456. Edit. of Cologne, 1683, in 8vo.

[C] He believed he ſhould have taken . . . . . a longer time to finiſh his Clovis, if Providence had not had a deſign to employ his pen in works of devotion.] It is he alſo who revealed this little myſtery; for he begins his Delices de l'Eſprit (6) with a kind of prodigy, which he pretends happened to him; which was, ſays he (7), ‘ That God did ſo ſenſibly aſſiſt him in finiſhing ‘ his great work of Clovis, thereby to bring him the ‘ ſooner to ſuch things as were more uſeful, more ‘ nice, and more ſublime, that he durſt not ſay in ‘ what time he finiſhed the nine books which re- ‘ mained, and poliſhed the others.’ The gentlemen of Port Royal make the following reflection upon this paſſage. ‘ Thus, according to Mr Des-Ma- ‘ reſts, it was the ſpirit of God which moved ‘ him to write theſe nine books, which aſſiſted ‘ him to poliſh the reſt, and which inclined him ‘ to publiſh this work. It was the ſpirit of Truth ‘ which aſſiſted him in publiſhing and divulging among ‘ Chriſtians ſo many impertinent and ridiculous fables. ‘ It was the ſpirit of God that moved him to tempt ‘ them by ſo many dangerous images, and the repre- ‘ ſentation of ſo many criminal paſſions. It was the ‘ ſpirit of God that induced him to write a romance, ‘ which differs in nothing from others, only that it ‘ is more extravagant (8).’ For the reſt, the abbot de Marolles informs us of one particular, from whence we may conclude, that our John Des-Mareſts ſet a high value upon his Clovis. He gave me his Delices de l'Eſprit, ſays the abbot (9), and ſome other of his works in proſe and verſe, at ſuch a time as I had no difference with him, as I have had ſince, becauſe he underſtood what I had written of his Clovis, in a ſenſe different from what I had intended. I had not preferred it above the Æneid, although I had an eſteem for it, and thought it not unworthy of him.

(6) Les Viſionaires, Letter i, pag. 256.

(7) Preface to the Delices de l'Eſprit.

(8) Viſionaires, ibid.

(9) Michael de Marolles, enumeration of the authors, who gave him their books.

[D] He wrote . . . . romances, wherein he departed from thoſe ideas of virtue, which were then repreſented in that kind of writings.] On this account he is pleaſantly expoſed in the Parnaſſe Reformé, which puts this complaint in the mouth of Ariana, his heroine. ‘ There ‘ are no places with me but what are infamous, each ‘ book furniſhes one at leaſt; and the heroes of the ‘ romance are ſo accuſtomed to frequent thoſe places, ‘ that one would take them for common ſoldiers or ‘ muſqueteers. To give me a viſit, and to go to, (you ‘ know my meaning) is but one and the ſame thing; ‘ the one is now confounded with the other. I am ‘ become the repertory of all good places. I do not ‘ wonder after this, if he makes me appear naked; it ‘ had been irregular to have uſed me otherwiſe; and ‘ ſince Aſtræa, who had not the advantage of place as ‘ I have, ſhows herſelf to Celadon in this condition, ‘ there was an indiſpenſable neceſſity, that I ſhould do ‘ the like (10). It is not therefore for the romance of Ariana, that Des-Mareſts can be concerned in the laſt part of the cenſure I am now to relate, and which is principally addreſſed to him. ‘ A writer of romances ‘ and plays is a public poiſoner, not of the bodies but ‘ of the ſouls of the faithful, who ought to be looked ‘ upon as guilty of an infinite number of ſpiritual ‘ murders, which he has either actually committed, ‘ or might have been the cauſe of by his pernicious ‘ writings. The more care he takes to cover with a ‘ veil of decency the criminal paſſions he deſcribes, ‘ the more dangerous he renders them, and the more ‘ capable of ſurprizing and corrupting ſimple and in- ‘ nocent ſouls. This ſort of ſins is ſo much the more ‘ dreadful becauſe they always ſubſiſt: for books re- ‘ main, and always infuſe the ſame venom in thoſe ‘ who read them (11).’ He cannot juſtly defend himſelf againſt the Parnaſſe Reformé, by ſaying he followed the precept of the ancient maſters, that romances ought to be probable (12); for there is a medium between a heroine that is not altogether virtuous, and one that is too much ſo, and this medium does not exceed probability. See what has been ſaid elſewhere concerning ancient romances (13).

(10) Parnaſſe Reformé, pag. 148, 149.

(11) Viſionaires, Let. i, pag. 253.

(12) Ficta voluptatis cauſa ſint proxima veris. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 338.

(13) Remark [C] of the article HYPSIPYLE, and remark [C] of the article LONGUS.

[E] His viſions which are ſo well deſcribed by the gentlemen of Port-Royal.] When I firſt read their letters, I

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by his expounding of the prophecies, that he ſhould have the glory of deſtroying the Mahometans was extreamly ſurpriſed: I could not ſufficiently wonder, that a wit, author of pieces of galantry and of plays, and ſuch as were fit for the ſtage, ſhould boaſt very ſeriouſly, That GOD of his infinite goodneſs had ſent to him the key of the treaſure of St John's Revelation, which was known but to very few perſons before him (14), - - - - and that by the order of GOD he was to raiſe 144000 fighting men, whereof part was already muſtered to make war againſt the wicked and the Janſeniſts (15). My ſurprize was increaſed when I reflected on the time and place where theſe chimeras were vented, and it was ſtill re-doubled when I took notice, that not only the management of his own eſtate was left to this pretended prophet, but alſo the office of an inquiſitor beſtowed on him; and that no body intrigued more than he, or was more active for the extirpation of Janſeniſm. If I had then known what I ſaw twenty years after, I ſhould not have been thus ſurprized; but certainly I was excuſable to think it ſtrange at that time, that one who publiſhed at Paris ſo many chimera's, ſhould obtain greater authority than ever he had before. Oh what irregularity! 'The archbiſhop of Paris makes uſe of him for his a-'pologiſt, admits him to his table, receives him into 'his houſe. The archbiſhop of Auch approves of the 'deſign of his army. He is permitted to be the 'founder of a new order, to ſet up, though he is 'wholly a layman, for the director of a great num-'ber of women and maids, to take an account of their 'moſt ſecret thoughts, to write for them letters of 'conſcience, ſtuffed with an infinite number of very 'dangerous and imprudent things, to ſay no more, 'and to frequent many convents of virgins, and pub-'liſh there his mad fancies and new ſpiritualities. 'And laſtly, the archbiſhop of Paris hath caſt his eyes 'upon him to help him to reform the monaſtery of Port-'Royal at Paris. His inſtructions are there greedily 'received, and they confer with him about mental 'prayer; they give him an account of the ſtate in which 'they are, whether of comfort or miſery (16).'

The book which he publiſhed, intituled, The advice of the HOLY GHOST to the king, has all the characters of fanaticiſm. He there explains three prophecies of Scripture, which he pretends are to be underſtood of the Janſeniſts; who are to be deſtroyed by the king of France with the pomp of a great army. This is one character, which is as the popular mark of fanatics, for if you conſider it well, how ſpiritual ſoever theſe people endeavour to appear, yet, their ſpirituality commonly aims at ſome external and ſenſible effect; and they are never ſatisfied till they have carried on their imaginations and allegories to ſome great event that is ſenſible, of which they fancy they are to be not only the ſpectators, but alſo the miniſters (17). The author from whom I have theſe words, proves this by ſeveral examples, and then continues his diſcourſe after this manner (18). 'The imaginations of 'the Sieur Des-Mareſts, being of the ſame kind 'with thoſe of other viſionaries, muſt alſo 'terminate in ſomething external, and he muſt be 'willing, like others, to enjoy in this world the 'fruit of his prophecies. It is true, he does not ſeem 'to come to that at once; for at firſt he did all he 'could to keep clear from it, by ſpiritualizing every 'thing, and reducing the moſt terrible beaſts in the 'Revelations into chimeras, or quinteſſences of myſti-'cal Theology. But at laſt he is grown weary of thoſe 'airy ſpiritualities, and the natural biaſs of a fanatical 'imagination carries him on, to frame, like others, 'a vaſt deſign in this world, for the execution where-'of he believes he was choſen by GOD. The idea 'of it is not altogether noble and ſublime. But leſt 'you ſhould think that I miſrepreſent him, I will 'ſhew it to you in his own words. This deſign 'then is to raiſe an army to combat and deſtroy impieties 'and hereſies every where. The number of thoſe who 'are to compoſe it, is to be, according to the prophecy of 'St John, 144000, who ſhall have the mark of the 'living GOD upon their foreheads; that is, who ſhall 'make it plainly appear by their lives, that GOD lives 'in their hearts. And becauſe every army has need 'of a general, he has provided one for that, by of-'fering this poſt to the king, that ſo the zeal and va-'lour of his ſacred perſon, who ſhall be the general 'of this brave army, as being the eldeſt ſon of the 'church, and the principal king of all Chriſtians, may 'encourage all the ſoldiers. As to the inferior offices, 'he declares to his majeſty, that they are deſigned 'for the knights of the order. Your royal hand, ſays 'he, of the knights of the HOLY GHOST, ought to 'march at their head, if they be as noble and valiant 'as they pretend to be. And to animate them with 'the deſire of honour, he adds, that they will gain a 'large ſhare, if they be as ready as the reſt of the holy 'army to do and ſuffer all things. As for the means 'to be made uſe of in this war, by this numerous army 'he does not as yet diſcover them, but reſerves the 'declaration of them to a proper time and place, As 'having learned them from the HOLY GHOST. He 'ſays only by the bye, that they are to extirpate all 'impieties, not by temporal but ſpiritual arms (19), accord-'ing to the heavenly means and methods which GOD 'hath appointed, and which ſhall be particularly de-'clared. But leſt it ſhould be thought, that this 'was only a chimera, and for fear the expectation of 'an event very remote, ſhould not make a ſufficient 'impreſſion upon the king's mind, he declares, that 'the greateſt part of this army is already raiſed. 'GOD, ſays he, Sir, hath already anticipated your 'deſign, and you have a long time had an army of ſuch 'perſons as are faithful to him, and who are devoted 'to him as victims of his wrath, which has been juſtly 'kindled by ſo many abominations, to pray to him with-'out ceaſing, and to ſuffer all things, that ſo it may 'pleaſe him to convert the falſe Chriſtians, and to ex-'tirpate, by your authority, ſo many ſects and deteſtable 'vices as now reign in France. This army is compoſed 'only of valiant and undaunted ſouls, who fight without 'ceaſing againſt Satan and his emiſſaries. And in the vow of union he affirms, that there are already ſe-'veral thouſand ſouls engaged. Nevertheleſs ſince it has not yet arrived to the prophetic number of 144000, the Sieur Des-Mareſts has a commiſſion from heaven to publiſh every where, that thoſe who have a mind to liſt themſelves, may do it by his means; and to this end the Advices of the HOLY GHOST are particularly deſigned. We muſt, ſays he, communicate theſe holy advices to all the world, 'that we may encourage ſeveral faithful ſouls to offer 'themſelves to GOD as victims, by liſting in this ho-'ly army. And as it is uſual to make ſoldiers take an oath, Mr Des-Mareſts has framed one for thoſe who ſhall compoſe this army, which he has print-ed at the end of theſe advices with this title, The 'League and Vow of each knight or ſoldier in the army 'of JESUS CHRIST. He has alſo preſcribed to them an exerciſe for every day, whereby it ap-'pears, that theſe people are all KNIGHTS OF THE 'INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPE.' He has foretold alſo all the exploits which this army is to perform for he expreſsly ſays, that they are to obtain a victory over the enemies of GOD by the deſtruction of impieties and hereſies, and that then an innumerable number of all ſorts of people and nations ſhall be openly united to the church, and ſhall pray before the throne of GOD within themſelves (20). And all this is to happen under the reign of Lewis XIV, who will be the Joſhua of this army, that is, the captain and general to lead on and animate the troops, and fight valiantly with them, under the inviſible conduct of the four princes of the heavenly hoſts, St Michael, St Gabriel, St Raphael, and St Uriel (21).

The Janſeniſt author has made a reflexion upon this, too judicious to be here omitted. 'I am willing 'to believe, ſays he (22), that the Sieur Des-Mareſts 'has not yet a deſign to make his victims take up 'rebellious arms, and that his army is as yet wholly 'ſpiritual and extatic; but he knows not what he will 'be for to-morrow, becauſe he knows not whither 'his imagination will carry him, not what it may 'diſcover in the Revelations. A man who like him 'takes all his thoughts for ſo many divine Revela-'tions cannot anſwer for himſelf. The figures of the 'Apocalypſe change often in his head, and ſignify 'ſometimes one thing, and ſometimes another, and 'always by inſpiration from GOD.' Then the Janſeniſt gives ſome examples of the variations which had already appeared in his prophetic doctrine. See his whole fifth letter; wherein he expoſes ſo many chimeras

(14) Deſcen de l'Eſprit, Part II, pag. 2, in the Viſionnaires, Letter I, pag. 241.

(15) Advices of the Holy Ghoſt to the king, pag. 242.

(16) Viſionaires, Letter II, pag. 287.

(17) Ib. pag. 279.

(18) Ib. pag. 280.

(19) Note, that the greateſt part of viſionaries begin thus; but they find afterwards that temporal arms ought alſo to concur: all the furies of war come into their plan, under the notion of pious actions.
Proh ſuperi, quantum mortalia pectora cæcæ
Noctis habent! ipſo ſceleris moliminе Tereus
Creditur eſſe
Pius: laudemque à crimine ſumit.
Ovid. Metam. lib. vi, ver. 472.
*You gods! how dark a blindneſs overſpreads
The ſouls of men! whilſt to his ſin
he climbes,
They think him good; and praiſe him for his crimes.*
SANDYS.

(20) Viſionaires, Letter II, pag. 282.

(21) Ibid. pag. 283.

(22) Ibid. pag. 286.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mahometans [F]. We ſhall elſewhere ſhow his conduct againſt one Morin (d), who called himſelf the Son of GOD. Des-Mareſts wrote ſomething againſt the ſatires of Mr Boileau (e) in his later years. I ſhall ſay ſomething of his elder brother in a remark [G].

(d) In the article of this MORIN.

(e) See the remark [R] of the article MACEDONIA.

meras of the Sieur Des-Mareſts, that it is no otherways accountable how a man could fill his head with ſo many viſions, without loſing that part of common ſenſe, which hinders people from running about the ſtreets, but on this conſideration, which a great wit has inforced with examples. It is one of the miſeries of mankind, ſays he (23), that reaſon and good ſenſe are ſometimes overthrown and dethroned, if I may ſo ſay, in one of their provinces, and continue maſters in the others, wherein a violent imagination does not prevail. The viſionary mentioned by Horace was of this ſort; he did not run about the ſtreets, he was even reaſonable in ſeveral things.

(23) Peliſſon, Chimeres de Mr Jurieu, Part ii, Sect. ii, pag. 69. Dutch edition.

Cætera qui vitæ ſervaret munia recto
More, bonus ſane vicinus, amabilis hoſpes,
Comis in uxorem, poſſet qui ignoſcere ſervis,
Et ſigno læſo non inſanire lagenæ:
Poſſet qui rupem & puteum vitare patentem (24).

(24) Horat. Epiſt. II, lib. II, ver. 131.

In all things elſe he ſhew'd a ſober mind
A loving neighbour and an honeſt friend;
Kind to his wife, and gen'rous to his ſlave,
Nor when he ſaw the barrel broach'd wou'd rave.
Would ſhun a precipice, and dang'rous pits,
And ſeem a perfect man, and in his wits.

CREECH.

Conſult the article TULENUS. Let us now ſee ſome other inſtances of St Sorlin's Fanaticiſm.

[F] He promiſed the king of France, the glory of deſtroying the Mahometans.] 'The excellency of prophets conſiſts, firſt, in the greatneſs of the events 'which they foretel; and ſecondly, the clearneſs 'wherewith they expreſs the particular circumſtan'ces, which ſhew them to be true prophecies, and 'not diſcourſes at random, among which we may 'by chance meet with ſomething that is agreeable to 'the event. This is what the Sieur Des-Mareſts takes 'care to avoid above all things. His language is 'neither obſcure nor enigmatical; he is the moſt in'telligible of all prophets. He ſeems to be telling us 'a ſtory of times paſt. He ſets down the time, place, 'and circumſtances, in poſitive and intelligible terms. 'He does not refer us to a time very remote, to veri'fy his prophecies; and yet they are the greateſt 'things that any man can ever propheſy. Let us 'hear him ſpeak, for he expreſſes himſelf very clear'ly. This valiant prince, foretold, according to him 'in Jeremiah, under the denomination of the Son of 'the Juſt, which words unfortunately are not to be 'found in this prophet, is to deſtroy and drive out of 'his dominions impiety and hereſy, and to reform the 'eccleſiaſtics, the adminiſtration of juſtice and the finances. 'And then by common conſent, he, and the king of Spain, 'ſhall call together all the princes of Europe, with the 'Pope, to re-unite all Chriſtians to the true and only 'Catholic religion. He ſhall ſend for the Pope to Avig'non, that there they may confer together about the means 'neceſſary for ſo great a good, becauſe otherwiſe, (ſee 'how circumſpect he is) he would, ſays he, be obliged 'to go to Rome with a great army worthy of a king of 'France, to confer there in perſon with him, and the Pope 'will rather chooſe to come to Avignon, than to be bur'dened at Rome with a great army. Theſe are great 'things, and very particular, the deſtruction of all 'impieties, the Heretics and impious perſons driven 'out of France, the eccleſiaſtics, adminiſtration of 'juſtice, and the finances reformed, the aſſembly of 'the princes and Pope at Avignon, the re-union of all 'Chriſtians to the Catholic religion. But theſe which 'follow are ſtill greater. After the re-union, ſays he, 'of all Heretics under the holy ſee, the king will be 'declared head of all Chriſtians, as being the eldeſt 'ſon of the church, and with the forces of Chriſtendom 'he will go and deſtroy by ſea and land the empire of 'the Turks and the law of Mahomet, and propagate the 'faith and kingdom of JESUS CHRIST all over 'the world; that is, in Perſia, in the empire of the 'Great Mogul, in Tartary and China. What can 'be deſired more, except that all theſe great things 'ſhould be particularly mentioned in the prophecies? And of this the Sieur Des-Mareſts does confidently aſ'ſure us. All this, ſays he, is ſpecially foretold by the 'propheſies, as will be made appear to the king, to 'whom alone GOD hath given the power to bear ſo 'great a ſecret, and ſo important a diſcovery, and the il'luſtrious proſpect of a Life ſo glorious, during which the 'kingdom of GOD, which is to laſt unto the end of all 'ages, will be eſtabliſhed every where. And to make 'theſe events the more credible, he has ſet down the 'means of compaſſing them (25).' He gives alſo the reaſons why other people cannot bear theſe great diſcoveries. 'The queens themſelves, adds he (26), 'would not be able to endure at firſt, that the king 'ſhould talk of quitting Paris, and going to Avignon, 'whither he is called by a ſpecial prophecy, to ſtay 'there ſome time with the Pope, that he may re'unite all Chriſtendom by common conſent with the 'king of Spain, as is ſet forth by an expreſs pro'phecy.'

(25) Viſionaires, Letter o, pag. 395, 396.

(26) Viſionaires, ibid. pag. 398.

The reflexion of the Janſeniſt is very fine; it is a picture that reſembles a great many people, and ſhows the univerſal ſpirit of the makers of predictions. 'There is doubtleſs ſomething difficult in theſe words; 'as the minority of the king of Spain makes him for 'a long time incapable of conſenting to this great 'deſign; ſo that the Sieur Des-Mareſts ſeems to 'have had in view the late king of Spain, who died, 'notwithſtanding this expreſs prophecy. But per'haps if Mr Des-Mareſts was preſſed upon this point, 'he would extricate himſelf after the ſame manner, 'as another prophet very like him did, from an ob'jection of the ſame nature. He was called the pro'phet John, and waited upon the queen of Poland 'when ſhe was at Paris, and had retired to the mona'ſtery of Port-Royal. He endeavoured to apply to 'her by the Apocalypſe, that the empire of the Turks 'was to be deſtroyed under the reign of Lewis XIII, 'and the Pontificate of Urban VIII. She made an 'objection to this, which was very natural, viz. That 'both of them were already dead. But the prophet, 'without troubling himſelf about this difficulty, an'ſwered gravely, that he never diſputed; and there'upon he left the princeſs. The Sieur Des-Mareſts 'will find ſome ſuch anſwer to the difficulties of his 'prophecy, and will tell us, that he meant the queen 'regent of Spain, who acts in the name of the king. 'For to put us off to the time of the king of Spain's 'being of age, would be attended with too great in'conveniencies, ſince he could not begin too ſoon, 'who is to conquer the whole world, and to finiſh 'his conqueſts during his life (27).

(27) Ibid.

[G] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his elder brother in a remark.] He was called ROLAND DES-MARESTS. He was born at Paris in 1594, and pleaded at the bar for ſome time; but being diſguſted with the noiſe and clamours attending the profeſſion, he conſecrated himſelf to a quiet life. Being neither covetous of riches, nor ambitious of honours, he applied himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of polite literature, and ſought his happineſs in the boſom of the Muſes, and the ſhades of his retirement. 'A cupiditate gloriæ, reique ſtudioſius augendæ deſiderio 'prorſus alienus, ſuæ animi conſcientiæ teſtimonio ac 'domeſticis copiis contentus, ſe modeſte exhibere, 'quam operoſis fortunæ famæque bonis avide captan'dis imminere maluit (28). ---- Being entirely averſe 'to the ſearch of glory, or the labour of increaſing his 'fortune, and content with the teſtimony of a good con'ſcience in his paternal eſtate; he choſe rather to live 'privately, than ſpend his time in the laborious toil 'of increaſing his wealth and fame.' Yet he cultivated a friendſhip with learned men, and conferred with them about his ſtudies. He became a very good critic, inſomuch that his friend Nicolas Bourbon, a man of an excellent taſte, feared no man's cenſure ſo much as that of our Roland's (29). He publiſhed ſome letters in Latin, which were judged to be very well written, and therefore after his death they, together with ſeveral others, written by him afterwards, and found among his papers, were publiſhed by

(28) Petrus Halæus, ubi infra, citat. (32).

(29) Tantum exiſtimationis in operibus aliorum examinandis tibi quæſiverat, ut eundem Borbonium, ſe ſibi magis ab uno Mareſio, quam à cæteris omnibus cenſoribus timere, ſæpe aſſirmantem audiverim. Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by Mr De Launoi, and the two Valeſius's at Paris, in 1655 (30). They were re-printed in Germany, in 1687. He was never married: he employed ſome of his leiſure hours in the education of a niece, whom he found fit for ſtudy, and taught her the Latin and Greek tongues. Per otium Mariam Prætam, ſororis filiam, quæ in tenera ætate domeſtici vim ingenii & acumen haud obſcure exprimebat, Latinis Græciſque literis non infelici ſucceſſu informavit (31). There was all along a ſtrict friendſhip between him and John Des-Mareſts, his brother. His health was very good, but by ſtudying too much he ſo weakened his conſtitution, that he fell into a languiſhing diſtemper, which waſted him by degrees, till at laſt he died at Paris, about the end of December, 1653 (32). The Gentlemen of Port-Royal took advantage of the approbation he gave to their method of teaching the Latin tongue; for they printed the letter containing this approbation at the beginning of their book. It is the XVIth letter of the firſt book.

The obſervations on the letters of Rolandus Mareſius, in the Mélanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, written by Vigneul Marville (33), are curious and judicious.

(30) Jacobi Rolandi Mareſii epiſtolarum philologicarum libri duo.

(31) Petr. Halæus, ubi infra.

(32) Taken from his Elogy compoſed by Petrus Hallæus, and placed before the letters of Rolandus Mareſius.

(33) At pag. 171, and 172, of the firſt edition at Roüen.

MARESTS (ROLAND DES-) See the laſt remark of the preceding article.

MARESIUS (SAMUEL), in French Des-Marets, a miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity, was one of the moſt famous Divines of the XVIIth century. He was born at Oiſemond in Picardy, the ninth of Auguſt 1599, and from his infancy diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to ſtudy (a). When he was thirteen years old, he was ſent to Paris, where he improved much in the Belles Lettres and Philoſophy. Three years after he was ſent to Saumur, where he ſtudied Divinity under Gomarus, and Hebrew under Lewis Capel. He returned to his father in 1618, and then went to Gevena to finiſh his ſtudies of Divinity. He came back to France the next year, and to fit himſelf for preaching he went to Paris. The probation-ſermons he made at the houſe of Mr Durant, one of the greateſt preachers of that time, pleaſed that miniſter very much, who adviſed him to betake himſelf early to the holy miniſtry. His youth and his low ſtature [A] made him averſe to this advice; nevertheleſs he followed it, and preſented himſelf before the ſynod of Charenton in the month of March 1620; and although the examination was then very ſevere, yet he gave full ſatisfaction. The church given him was that of Laon. The circumſtances of the time and Place rendered the exerciſe of his miniſtry very difficult; yet he diſcharged his duty very well. The anſwer he wrote to a lady who had changed her religion, provoked his adverſaries ſo much, that it is thought Father de Aubigni the Jeſuit ſuborned an aſſaſſin, who gave him a ſtab with a knife on December

(a) See the remark [A] towards the end.

[A]. His youth, and his low ſtature.] There are but few perſons who at twenty years of age have not attained to the full ſtature by nature deſigned for them. Mr Mareſius was none of thoſe; he was a very Zaccheus at the age of twenty one, and was always called the little Probationer. But he grew after that till he was twenty five years old, and then he was of a moderate ſtature. ‘ Mareſius qui eum (Durantium) ‘ ſibi maxime imitandum delegerat, nonnullas in ‘ ipſius ædibus habuit Propoſitiones, quæ ipſi adeo ‘ placuêre; ut hic author fuerit operam ſuam Eccleſiis offerendi; à quo alias conſilio ut abhorreret duo ‘ efficiebant, nempe & quod ætate valde juvenis eſſet; ‘ & quod ſtaturâ & vultu, majorem adhuc præ ſe ‘ ferret juventutem: Etſi enim nunc ſatis ſit procerus, ‘ tamen ita parvus manſit uſque ad annum 21, ſuæ ‘ ætatis, quo demum uſque ad 25, celerrime crevit, ‘ ut vulgo parvi Proponentis nomine deſignaretur (1). ‘ Mareſius, who had choſen Durant for his pattern, made ‘ ſome probationary diſcourſes at his houſe, which pleaſed ‘ him ſo well, that he adviſed him to offer his ſervice to ‘ the churches; to which reſolution he was otherwiſe ‘ averſe for two reaſons; firſt, that he was at that ‘ time very young; ſecondly, that his ſtature and counte- ‘ nance made him appear ſtill younger than he was: ‘ For tho' he is now of middle ſtature, yet he was ſo ‘ little at twenty one years of age, from which time he ‘ grew a-pace till twenty five; that he commonly went ‘ by the name of the little Probationer.’ I will remark another thing very ſingular, which may ſerve to comfort fathers and mothers who have infirm children: this is not always a certain argument, that they ſhall not attain to old age, nor that they ſhall never be ſtrong. Samuel Mareſius, who was ſo weak in his infancy, that they were obliged to feed him with milk and butter, and let him lie in his bed for ſeveral days together, becauſe his legs could not ſupport him, lived to the age of near ſeventy four, and was ſo vigorous, that the ſtrongeſt men could hardly endure the fatigues and exerciſes which he endured, without ever being ſick. When he firſt fell ſick at Groningen, he had, for the ſpace of thirty years, diſcharged there a very laborious profeſſion, and had continually been publiſhing ſeveral books (2). The Latin I ſhall here ſubjoin will give a more particular account of the infirmities of his infancy. ‘ Infantiam habuit ‘ imbecillem & ita teneræ conſtitutionis, ut fere lacte ‘ & butyro fuerit educandus; Puer carne elixâ veſci ‘ non poterat, nec jure, nec ullis oleribus: & ſemper ‘ occulta quadam antipathia poma, pyra, ceraſa, fraga ‘ & id genus delicias puerorum, ita eſt adverſatus, ut ‘ in hunc diem nihil ex illis queat deguſtare. Quamvis autem pueritiam haberet languidam & valetudinariam, ex qua eum non fore vitalem augurabantur plurimi, ſæpius ex oculis, aliiſque fluxionibus laborans, aliquando ex genuum debilitate per 15 dies ‘ affixus lecto; unde metuebant parentes, eum ſi vir ‘ fieret, futurum podagricum, licet huc uſque nihil ‘ tale Dei beneficio ſit expertus; non ſemel ex lapſu ‘ aliiſque caſibus puerilibus in præſens vitæ diſcrimen ‘ adductus; tamen animo erat erecto, tenacis memoriæ, & ad ſtudia tam proclivis, ut ante ſeptennium ‘ exactum, non modo legere poſſet & literas accurate pingere, ac jam rudimentis Linguæ Latinæ operam daret, ſed etiam bis univerſa Biblia à capite ad ‘ calcem evolviſſet, ut difficilius fere ab illis occupationibus abduceretur luſus ergo, quam alii ſolent à ‘ luſu ad illa magis ſeria revocari (3). - - - - In his infancy he was ſo weak, and of ſo tender a conſtitution, ‘ that for the moſt part they were obliged to feed him ‘ with milk and butter: when a boy, he could not eat ‘ boiled meat, nor broth, nor any herbs, and always had ‘ ſo utter an antipathy to apples, pears, cherries, ſtraw- ‘ berries, and the like things, which children are uſually ‘ fond of, that to this day he cannot taſte any of them; ‘ but notwithſtanding he was ſo weak and ſickly in his ‘ younger years, that few people thought he would be long ‘ lived, being often troubled with ſore eyes, and other ‘ defluxions, ſometimes confined to his bed for fifteen days ‘ together by a weakneſs in his knees, which made his ‘ parents apprehenſive, that if he lived to be a man, he ‘ would be ſubject to the gout, tho' hitherto, by GOD's ‘ grace, he has not felt any thing of it, and was more ‘ than once in immediate danger of his life, by falls, and ‘ other accidents which children are liable to, yet he was ‘ cheerful, had a ſtrong memory, and ſo great an inclina- ‘ tion to ſtudy, that before ſeven years of age, he had ‘ not only learned to read and write a fair hand, and ‘ made ſome progreſs in the Latin tongue, but had read the ‘ whole Bible twice from the beginning to the end; that it ‘ was even more difficult to draw him from theſe employ- ‘ ments to play, than it commonly is to bring other children ‘ from play to theſe ſerious employments.’ You ſee in theſe laſt words the proof of what I ſaid concerning the inclination which appeared early in him to his ſtudies. It was harder for him to leave them, to divert himſelf

(1) Effigies & Vitæ Profeſſorum Groning. pag. 138.

(2) I have read this in his funeral oration, in Mſ.

(3) Effigies & Vitæ Profeſſorum Groning. pag 135.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ber the 13th, 1623 [B]. But although the wound was dangerous, yet it was cured in a ſhort time; and then it was thought fit to diſengage him from a church, which he could no longer ſerve without great danger, and to lend him for a year to the faithful of Falaiſe (b). This was ordered in a ſynod of the Iſle of France in the month of March, 1624. In a little while after he accepted the call of the church of Sedan, and was inſtituted in the room of James Capel in the month of October the ſame year. He was to be miniſter and profeſſor of Divinity; but he was excuſed from the duties of this laſt office, till he had recovered the ideas of his ſcholaſtic ſtudies (c). He obtained alſo leave to go into Holland to take his degree of doctor of Divinity, which he did at Leyden the eighth of July 1625. Having made a ſmall tour into England, he returned to Sedan, and there began to exerciſe his profeſſion of Divinity on the twenty fourth of November in the ſame year: and continuing in that place he met with a great deal of trouble; for he had ſome ſtorms to weather, which he endured with great reſolution, by the favour of the duke of Bouillon, and the affection of the church. But he judged that one of the ſtrongeſt barriers he could oppoſe againſt his enemies, was to marry [C]. For that reaſon he married a widow, who had fled to Sedan for religion with her firſt huſband in 1622. The marriage was celebrated the ſecond of May 1628: In this year alſo he publiſhed his firſt book (d), which was afterwards followed by a multitude of others

(b) Upon the frontiers of Champagne.

(c) Petito tamen quoad profeſſionem ſpatio aliquo ad ſtudia ſua ſcholaſtica recolligenda, quo paratior illam capeſſeret. Vitæ Profeſſorum Groning. pag. 142.

(d) Intituled, A preſervative againſt Apoſtacy. Note, that in 1623, there was printed, without his knowledge, and without his name, one of his ſermons about Predeſtination, upon 2 Tim. ii, 12. It was reprinted ſeveral times.

ſelf with the plays of infancy, than it is for others to leave their play, and apply themſelves to ſtudy. This is a proof that the application of the mind is not always hurtful to weak conſtitutions, and an example that affords comfort to thoſe parents, who are afraid, leſt their ſtudious and weak ſons ſhould die ſoon.

[B] An aſſaſſin . . . gave him a ſtab with a knife, on December the 13*th*, 1623.] Mareſius having heard that the wife of the governor of la Fere had changed her religion, after the example of her huſband, who turned Roman Catholic, in order to keep his government (4), wrote a letter to her full of exhortations to return to the ſheepfold. She wrote a large anſwer to him to juſtify her conduct, and ſent him a printed relation of her converſion. This relation being ſtuffed with falſhoods, he thought it his duty to refute it, and at the ſame time to anſwer the reaſons alledged by the lady. The Jeſuits had been employed to gain her over, and found the anſwer of this miniſter too bold, and threatened to puniſh him for it. This made people imagine, that the wound he received ſome time after, was the effect of this menace; and if Father d' Aubigni was chiefly ſuſpected, it was becauſe he had been the converter of this lady, and was then preaching the Advent ſermons at Laon. ‘ Nec ‘ dubitatum redemptum fuiſſe Sicarium, ob literas ‘ ſupra commemoratas, à Monachis, præſertim ab ‘ Albinio Jeſuita, illo eodem, qui duodecennio ante ‘ Ravaillaci parricidæ Henrici IV Confeſſarius fuerat, & coram Ampliſſimo Senatu dixerat, ſe dono ‘ oblivionis pollere poſt auditas Confeſſiones, excuſaturus quod Regii parricidæ Confeſſionis non amplius ‘ meminiſſet. Is enim & Hurtebizianæ defectioni ‘ fuerat obſtetricatus, & tum Laoduni ſolemnes Adventus habebat conciones. Nec aliud totâ urbe, ‘ maxime inter Reformatos, perſuaſum fuiſſe, univerſa ‘ Laodunenſis Eccleſia comprobavit adhuc non ita ‘ pridem, ſolemni ſuo Teſtimonio, conſcripto à R. & ‘ Doct. Viro D. P. GEORGIO illius Paſtore anno ‘ 1647, 18 Auguſti, paullo priuſquam ad Deum evocaretur (5). - - - - It was not doubted but the aſſaſſin was hired, on account of the letter abovementioned, by the monks, particularly by D'Aubigni the Jeſuit, who twelve years before had been confeſſor to Ravaillac the murderer of Henry IV; and to excuſe himſelf from diſcovering the murderer's confeſſion, told the parliament, that he had the gift of forgetfulneſs after hearing confeſſions, and that he did not remember what the king's murderer ſaid. He was the perſon who drew Madam Hurtebize to change her religion, and at that time preached the Advent ſermons at Laon; and this was fully believed throughout the whole city, eſpecially among the Reformed, as appears by the teſtimony of the whole church of Laon; written by the reverend and learned D. P. GEORGE their paſtor, in the year 1647, the eighteenth day of Auguſt, a little before his death.' The aſſaſſin eſcaped, and the magiſtrates did not think fit to enquire further into this affair. He waited for Mareſius in the ſtreets, when he was returning home from ſupping with his uncle, and ſtruck the knife in his breaſt: by good fortune the blow did not hurt his lungs. ‘ Vulnus erat profundum & quod in thoracis capaci- ‘ tatem, illæſo tamen pulmone, penetraret. . . . . ‘ Quamvis autem vulnus periculoſum valde fuerit, & ‘ ex quo candelam ei objectam poterat Mareſius extin- ‘ guere, brevi tamen tempore ex eo convaluit (6). - - - The wound was deep, and entered into the cavity of the thorax, but without hurting his lungs; but notwithſtanding, the wound was very dangerous, inſomuch that he could blow out a candle held to it, yet he recovered in a very little time.'

(4) Uxor nobilis cujuſdam cui Hurtebizio nomen erat, & qui ut ſibi conſervaret Feræ præfecturam, jam ante biennium defecerat, maritum ſuum tandem ſequuta fuerit, circa finem anni 1622. Ib. pag. 140.

(5) It. pag. 140, 141.

(6) Id. ib.

[C] He judged, that one of the ſtrongeſt barriers he could oppoſe againſt his enemies, was to marry.] He thought that he was expoſed to the ſtorm, only becauſe he had no wife, and had refuſed one. This thought obliged him to marry, and preſently the tempeſt was calmed, and after it halcyon-days ſucceeded, and he lived in peace with all his colleagues. ‘ Cum hos fluctus decumanos ſibi videretur pati quod ‘ cœlebs eſſet, & nonnullis, ut credebatur, maneret

- - - - - - - - alta mente repoſtum
Judicium Paridis ſpretæque injuria formæ;

‘ vita cœlibe relicta tandem vitæ ſociam ſibi adſcivit ‘ Abigalem le Grand, natam Aquiſgrani honeſtiſſimo ‘ loco, patre Jaſpare le Grand Tornacenſi, Mercatore ‘ Magnario . . . . Ab eo tempore Mareſius Alcyonia ‘ Sedani obtinuit, & cum Reverendis ſuis Collegis omnibus, in ſuo munere, tranquille & pacifice verſatus ‘ eſt (7). - - - Being of opinion that he was expoſed to theſe ſtorms, only becauſe he was a bachelor; and ſome perſons believed that

(7) Vitæ Profeſſor. Groning. pag. 144.

Deep graven in her heart, the doom remain'd
Of partial Paris, and her form diſdain'd.
DRYDEN.

‘ he reſolved to live no longer ſingle, and at laſt married ‘ Abigail le Grand, born at Aix-la-Chapelle, of a very ‘ reputable family, ſhe was daughter of Jaſper le Grand, ‘ an eminent Merchant of Tournay . . . From that time ‘ Mareſius enjoyed halcyon-days at Sedan, and lived ‘ peaceably in his office with all his colleagues.' There is in this narrative one thing eaſy to be underſtood, and another, that is very obſcure. It is eaſy to conceive, that a man who has refuſed a woman, is expoſed to the ill offices of the relations of that perſon whom he refuſed to marry. It is an injury which the fair one will not pardon, and if ſhe have any intereſt, or be capable of managing intrigues, ſhe may give a great deal of trouble to a miniſter and a profeſſor. Theſe gentlemen have their friends, and their enemies, and from hence ariſe factions and diſcords, which the family that is angry for the contempt of the affinity they would have contracted, may take advantage of to ſatisfy their reſentment. It was no wonder therefore that Samuel Mareſius endured at Sedan ſeveral troubleſome perſecutions, after he had provoked a family by a judgment ſomething like that of Paris, ſpretæque injuria formæ, - - - for her form diſdain'd. But it is ſtrange, that by marrying a widow, whom he had never refuſed, he ſhould calm that ſtorm, and be reconciled to all his enemies. This is what I cannot comprehend. The marriage with the widow was a new occaſion of anger to the party deſpiſed. If Mareſius had always lived a bachelor, it might have been thought that his refuſal proceeded from a general indifference for the ſex, which was a kind

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

others [D]. He attended the duke of Bouillon into Holland in 1631, to be his chaplain in the army. The next year he returned into the same country, with that prince's mother, and engaged in the service of the States, who appointed him minister to the church of Maestricht. He opposed, both by word of mouth and by writing, the efforts made by the ecclesiastics of Liege, to hinder the establishment of the reformed churches in that country; and he had a thousand difficulties more to overcome, after the duke of Bouillon had married a Catholic [E]. He endeavoured, but in vain, to retain him in the profession of the reformed church, and by this means incurred the hatred of the duchess; which, being added to his other troubles, made him look upon the call which the church of Boisleduc gave him in 1636, as a piece of good fortune, and therefore he did not refuse it. The next year he became professor in the illustrious school of the same city, and discharged that office with so much application and success, that he was called to Franeker in 1640, and to Groningen in 1642. He refused the first call and accepted the second. He made his inaugural oration at Groningen the twentieth of January 1642 (e). And from that time to his death, he did so great services to this university, that it passed for one of the most flourishing in the Low-countries. The magistrates of Bern being well informed of his great parts, offered him with great advantages a professor's chair of Divinity at Lausanne kind of comfort to the fair one refused: but after she saw him married, she could only look upon it as a peculiar indifference, and a contempt of herself: this is a vexatious thing, which must needs increase her anger, and bad offices. Here is therefore something kept in the dark: the narrative is not exact; there are many things wanting here, which I would not relate, tho' I knew them. I know part of them.

(e) Taken from his Life, printed in the work intituled, Effigies & Vitæ Professorum Academiæ Groningæ. Printed at Groningen, in 1654.

[D] He published his first book, which was followed by a multitude of others.] You will find a chronological catalogue of his works at the end of his System of Theology (8). The number of them is prodigious, and the variety of the subjects shows that his mind was not confined. We may say, that he was both very laborious, and wrote with great ease and much quickness of thought and learning. He had a mind to collect into one body all his works, as well those that were printed as those that were not. He revised them for this end, and made additions to them. They would have made four volumes in folio. His death hindered the execution of this project. The first volume was to have contained all that he had published before he went to Groningen; among which would have been several pieces in Latin which had been published before only in French. The second volume would have contained his Opera Theologica didactica; the third his Opera Theologica polemica; the fourth was to have had this title Impietas triumphata, and was designed to contain Hydra Sociniamsmi expugnata, and Biga fanaticorum eversa, and Fabula Præadamitarum refutata. These three books had been printed at different times. The System of Theology of this author was found so methodical, that it was used in other academies, and was several times re-printed. 'Hinc primum mihi 'nata est hæc Synopsis Theologica, non tam aliis, quam 'mihi & meis discipulis primitus destinata: etsi favorabilius publice excepta fuerit quam putassem, 'adeo ut sæpius recudi debuerit, & in omnibus scholis 'Reformatis vel publice explicari, vel privatim proponi sibi à viris clarissimis in cynosuram suorum 'Collegiorum mos fere constans fuerit (9). - - - Hence 'rose this Synopsis of Theology, not designed at first so 'much for others as for my self and scholars: tho' it 'was more favourably received by the public than I 'expected, and was publickly explained in all the Uni'versities of the Reformed, or read by private men in 'their colleges. The last edition was enlarged with a great number of notes, wherein the author explains his sentiments, and refutes, with his ordinary warmth, the censures of his enemies. It was printed at Groningen in 1673. If I observe that Grotius was one of those whom he attacked, it is only that I may have an opportunity to undeceive those, who having read the Acta Eruditorum, might think that he durst not do it without a disguise. We find in the Journal of Leipsic, that Mr Ittigius censured Matthew Pool, who had said, that Claudius Salmasius, under the name of Simplicius Verinus, refuted Hugo Grotius's explication of some passages of the New Testament which relate to Antichrist. Ittigius pretends, that it was our Maresius, who under the name of Johannes Simplicius, refuted this explication of Grotius. Lapsum deprehendit in Matthæo Polo, qui Hugonis Grotij Commentationem ad loca quædam Novi Testamenti à Salmasio sub Simplicii Verini nomine refutatam scribit, cum tamen à Maresio sub Johannis Simplicii nomine refutata fuerit (10). I have three things to say against this. I. It is very certain, that Salmasius did assume the name of Simplicius Verinus in two works he published against Grotius, in 1646; but these works have no relation to the treatise of Antichrist: One of them is concerning the discussion of the apology of Andrew Rivet, with whom Grotius had been engaged in a long controversy about the re-union of Christians. The other is concerning Transubstantiation. The title of the first is this, Simplicii Verini ad Justum Pacium epistola, sive judicium de libro posthumo H. Grotii. II. Maresius did not disguise his name when he wrote against Grotius about Antichrist, for he put all this in the title of his book. 'Dissertatio de An'tichristo, quâ expenditur & refutatur nupera Com'mentatio ad illustriora eâ de re Novi Testamenti 'Loca, II. V. Hugonis Grotii credita; simulque Ec'clesiarum Reformatarum sententia de Antichristo Ro'mano defenditur & confirmatur; authore Samuele 'Maresio, S. S. Theol. Doctore & Professore, in Scho'la Illustri Sylvæducensi, nec non ibidem Ecclesiæ 'Gallo-Belgicæ Pastore (11). - - - - - - A dissertation 'concerning Antichrist, wherein a late commentary on 'some remarkable passages of the New Testament con'cerning that matter, supposed to be written by the fa'mous Hugo Grotius is examined and refuted, and the 'opinion of the reformed churches, concerning the Roman 'Antichrist is defended and confirmed: by Samuel Ma'resius, Doctor and Professor of Divinity in the illustrious 'school of Boisleduc, and pastor of the Walloon church 'there.' III. Jonas Schligtingius the Socinian disguised himself under the name of Johannes Simplicius to write against Grotius's treatise de Antichristo. This appears by the Bibliotheque of the Antitrinitarians, at page 128. This was doubtless the original of the error of Matthew Pool, who was not rightly censured by Mr Ittigius. You may observe by the by, that the work of this Socinian author was put in the vast collection called the Great Critics. Note, that Grotius was not silent with respect to Maresius; for he published an 'Appendix ad interpretationem 'locorum Novi Testamenti quæ de Antichristo agunt 'aut agere putantur. - - - Appendix to the interpretation 'of the places in the New Testament, which treat or 'are supposed to treat of Antichrist;' where he uses him very ill. He did not vouchsafe to name him, but denoted him only by the reproachful name of Borborita, in allusion to the French word Bourbe, (that is dirt) which suits the word Marais (Bog) in allusion to Maresius. This Appendix was vigorously refuted by a book printed in two volumes in8vo, in 1642, with this title, 'Concordia discors & Antichristus revela'tus: id est, Ill. Viri HUGONIS GROTII 'apologia pro Papa & Papismo: quam prætextu Con'cordiæ inter Christianos sarciendæ, exhibet illius Ap'pendix ad Interpretationem Locorum Novi Testa'menti de Antichristo, modeste refutata duobus Li'bris, per Samuelem Maresium S. Theol. Doctorem '& Professorem in Scholâ Buscoducensi & Eccl. Gallo'Belgicæ ibidem Ministrum. - - - - - - The disagreeing 'Concord and Antichrist revealed, that is, the apology 'of the illustrious Hugo Grotius, for the Pope and Po'pery, which is set forth on pretence of restoring unity 'among

(8) It is not in the last edition, nor in the two first. It reaches to the year 1654, in the Lives of the Professors of Groningen.

(9) Mares. in Præfat. Edit. 1673.

(10) Acta Eruditor. Lipsi. 1690, pag. 313.

(11) This work was printed in 1640, in 8vo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Lausanne in 1661, for which he thanked them. The university of Leyden desired him for the like profession in the month of March 1673 (f). He accepted it, but had not time to go and take possession of it. He died at Groningen the eighteenth of May the same year, leaving two sons, of whom I shall say something below [F]. I shall also say something

(f) And not in 1675, as Mr Hofman, and after him Konig affirm.

'among Christians, in his appendix to the interpretation of 'the places of the New Testament concerning Antichrist, 'modestly refuted in two books by Samuel Maresius, &c.' It was objected to Grotius among other things in this reply, That he had not been careful enough of the rights of kings. 'Id præsertim tolerari non po- 'test in Grotio, quod satis aperte negat Reges esse 'institutionis divinæ; quando-quidem judicibus illis 'eximiis, quorum institutio à Deo, ut apparet Num. 'xi. 16. opponit Reges, quos voluntas primum populi 'reperit (12). - - - - This in particular cannot be ex- 'cused in Grotius, that he manifestly denies kings to be 'of divine appointment, since in opposition to those 'eminent judges, whose institution appears to have been 'from GOD, Numb. xi. 16. he places kings who were 'first made by the will of the people.' This surely is singular, for Grotius is every day refuted, because he hath too much subjected the people to the royal power (13). How can they say after this, that the Lutherans are the only persons who approve the maxims of Grotius (14), since here is a Calvinist minister, who thinks that Grotius has not spoke favourably enough of monarchy. The bishop of Meaux (15) has observed the same thing, and many inconsistencies in the hypothesis of Grotius.

(12) Sam. Maresius, in Antichristo revelato, Tom. i, pag. 345.

(13) See the History of the Works of the Learned, Nov. 1695, pag. 127.

(14) Important Advice to the Refugees, pag. 216, 217.

(15) See his fifth advertisement against Mr Jurieu.

[E] He had a thousand difficulties to master after the duke of Bouillon had married a Catholic.] This marriage cast Maresius into a thousand troubles (16). The duke had promised to abjure the Protestant religion when he married Mademoiselle de Berghes (17), but he thought fit for many reasons to delay the performance of his promise. That people might think his change proceeded from a motive of conscience, he proposed a thousand doubts to his minister, and put off the thing for four or five years. Maresius drew up a relation of this affair; I know not why he did not print it: There would appear several curious things in it. 'Dum altius in consilia & astu- 'tias Jesuitarum penetrat, quam voluissent, sibi ac- 'cersivit novæ Conjugis odium satis vehemens, & 'sensit DUCEM pedetentim ad publicam Pontificio- 'rum communionem gradum sibi struere, in quo mo- 'liendo per mille fraudes Jesuiticas, annos 1634, & '1635, transacti sunt. Interesset Ecclesiæ, specialem 'Historiam istius defectionis, à Maresio diligenter col- 'lectam, publici juris fieri, ut constaret quibus arti- 'bus Egregius alias ille Princeps, Reformatam Com- 'munionem deseruit, & ab illo tempore, non sine oc- 'culto Dei judicio, in illas incidit calamitates con- 'tinuas, quibuscum quoad vixit, luctatus est (18). '- - - - By entring deeper into the designs and crafts of 'the Jesuits than they desired, he drew upon himself 'the hatred of the new duchess, and he perceived the 'duke was paving his way by degrees publickly to pro- 'fess the Popish religion in the management, of which 'by a thousand Jesuitical frauds, the years 1634, and '1635, were passed. It would be of use to the church 'to have the particular history of this defection, which 'was carefully collected by Maresius, made public, that 'it might appear by what arts this otherwise excellent 'prince was induced to forsake the Reformed commu- 'nion, and from that time not without the secret 'judgment of GOD, he fell into those continual cala- 'mities which he had to struggle with as long as he 'lived.' Mr de Puysegur informs us, that this prince became a Catholic in January 1636, and that for some time it was known only to few (19)

(16) Ex conjugio Ducis Bullionæi cum Berghensi Comitissa, eximiæ formæ & sublimis ingenii fœmina, sed supra modum Pontificia, nova fuerunt certamina illi sustinenda. Vitæ Professor. Groning. pag. 148.

(17) Quam deserturum harum nuptiarum gratia jam antea clam receperat. Ibid.

(18) Vitæ Professor. Groning. pag. 149.

(19) Puysegur's Memoirs, Tom. i, pag. 135, Dutch Edit.

[F] Leaving two sons of whom I shall say something.] The eldest was born at Sedan, and was presented to baptism by Elizabeth of Nassau, duchess of Bouillon, who gave him the name of Henry, which was that of the prince whose widow she was (20). He studied the Civil Law, and after he had taken his Licentiate's degree, he begun to prepare himself for the studies of the bar in the house of Charles Des-Marests, his uncle, a famous advocate in the parliament of Paris. He pleaded some causes with good success, and yet he abandoned all on a sudden this profession, to consecrate himself to the study of Theology, and to the ministry of the word of GOD. What follows is what his Father says to him in an epistle dedicatory: 'Tu 'quidem, Henrice, tyrocinia posueras sacræ facundiæ 'in Augustissimo Parisiensi foro, ubi post Licentiæ in 'utroque Jure gradum susceptum, cœperas Advocati 'munere defungi, sub Auspiciis Consultissimi & Am- 'plissimi fratris mei. Et belle tibi prima illa publice 'dicendi initia processisse, audivi ipse ex ore Illu- 'strissimi Præsidis Bellevræi, cum ad Celsissimos Or- 'dines Generales Legatum extraordinarium Regis 'Christianissimi ageret, siquidem ipso Præside & Ju- 'dice in aliqua causa peroraveras & triumphaveras: 'adeoque postquam tuopte nutu, nec sine Numine, 'me ab initio ob causas sæculares (quid dissimulem?) 'dissuadente, & Domino Patruo tuo tandem consen- 'tiente, animum appulisti ad sacra studia, & corpus 'Juris cum corpore Scripturarum permutasti, exem- 'plo plerorumque virorum magnorum in veteri & re- 'nascente Ecclesia, omnia faciliora expertus es (21), '- - - You, Henry, had begun the study of Eloquence in 'the illustrious parliament of Paris, where, after taking 'a Licentiate's degree in both laws, you had taken upon 'you the profession of an advocate, under the auspices of 'my eminent and learned brother, and I my self have 'heard, that you had good success in your first attempts in 'pleading, from the mouth of the illustrious Bellievre 'when he was ambassador-extraordinary from the most 'Christian king to the States-General, for you have pleaded 'in some causes where he was president and judge, 'and gained the victory: And after that, of your own 'accord, but not without the will of GOD, I, from the 'beginning for worldly causes, (for why should I dissem- 'ble) dissuaded you from it, and your uncle at last 'consenting, you turned to the study of Divinity, and 'changed the body of the law for the body of the 'scriptures, after the example of several great men in 'the ancient, and in the reviving church you found every 'thing more easy.' He was admitted minister in 1652, and his first employment was to preach in French in the academical church of Groningen. In the same year he was called to Cassel, to be minister there to the French church. He had a call the next year from the Walloon church of Boisleduc, and accepted it, tho' he was very well satisfied with the court of Hesse, where he received great testimonies of their goodness and esteem. Sylvæ ducenses . . . . te Henrice ad se evocarunt Cassellis, ubi in aula Serenissimi Principis Lantgravii (à quo & ægre dimissus es, nec sine specialibus benevolentiæ & beneficentiæ suarum Serenitatum testimoniis) linguâ Gallicâ fungebaris ministerio sacro, ferme à tempore tuæ hîc ad illud ordinationis (22). He served the church of Boisleduc, until he accepted that of Delft in 1662. From that time to this (23) he has been fixed at Delft, where he has acquired the esteem of every body. He refused in 1669, the call he had from the Walloon church of Leyden. Daniel DES-MARESTS, his younger brother, was born at Maestricht in 1635. After he was admitted to be a minister, he was colleague to his father in the French church of Groningen, until the year 1656, after which he was called to Middleburg, and served the French church there, until he had a call from that to the Hague in 1662. His wit, eloquence, and judgment, and, in a word, his great merit, procured him so much esteem at the court of the prince and princess of Orange, that one might properly say, he was in favour. The throne of England, to which their highnesses were advanced in 1689, added a new lustre to the favour this minister continued to enjoy, and which he still enjoys to this day in the glorious and agreeable retirement of Hontslaerdyke. His health not permitting him to continue in the exercise of his ministry, he retired to this fine house, where he spends his time in such employments as are useful and agreeable to H. B. M. These two gentlemen have been concerned in the edition of the Bible which is called Maresius's, wherein the Bookseller, Elzevir, spared no cost for the beauty of the letter and paper. Their father, on his part, undertook with great labour to adorn this edition with notes, wherein he was assisted by his two sons. I add, that they published (24) 'A curious history of the life, behaviour,

(20) Sam. Maresius, Epist. Dedicatoria, 3 Editionis Systematis Theologici.

(21) Id. ib.

(22) Id. ib.

(23) I write this the fourth of February 1696.

(24) At the Hague in 1670, and in 12mo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google something of his anceſtors [G]. We muſt not forget that in the year 1652, he was appointed ſole miniſter to the Walloon church of Groningen, where, till then, he had preached once every Sunday, to eaſe the paſtor of that church, though he was not obliged to it (g). The academy of Montauban deſigned to call him after the death of Garriſſoles; and likewiſe the univerſity of Marpurg, when it began to be reſtored (h). Among all the diſputes he was engaged in, there was none longer and hotter than that which he had with Voëtius [H]. He had one with Mr Daillé, which was very hot, but it laſted not

(g) Vitæ Profeſſor. Groning. pag. 153.

(h) Ibid. pag. 152.

'and true ſentiments of John Labbadie, with a 'modeſt refutation of the declaration, publiſhed in 'form of a manifeſto by the ſaid Labbadie, to juſtify 'his deſigns and ſchiſmatical reſolutions, which were 'the cauſe of his being juſtly depoſed.'

[G] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his anceſtors.] They had conſiderable poſts in Picardy. 'Mareſii inter 'ſuos Majores, Depenſes Præfectos, Gamachienſeſque 'Caſtellanos, poſſunt numerare; nec ita pridem Da-'vidis patruelis, Breſtæ in Armorica, Sardinio Gu-'bernatore, Propræfectum egit: Vaucquetiorum vero 'familia, totâ Picardia nota eſt. Verum in eo potiſ-'ſimum ſolet Mareſius gloriari, quod ex parentibus ſit 'ortus piis & probis, ac Religioni puriori ἀπὸ βρέ-'φους addictiſſimis (25). - - - - The family of Mareſius 'may reckon among their anceſtors, governors of Diepe 'and Caſtellans of Gamache; and not long ſince Da-'vid's uncle was deputy-governour of Breſt in Bretagne, 'when Mr Sardigne was governor; and the family of 'the Vaucquets is noted thro' all Picardy. But Mareſius 'uſed to glory in this chiefly, that he was deſcended of pious 'and honeſt parents, who adhered to the true religion 'from their infancy.' The titles and offices of David DES-MARETS the father of Samuel, were as follows. 'Pater ei fuit Ampliſſ. & Conſultiſſi-'mus David Des-Marets Dominus du Feret, Avimon-'tii ejuſque Commendæ Prætor ſive Juridicus ordina-'rius, Baronatus item Chepienſis, Sancti Maxentii 'aliorumque pagorum Judex Civilis & Criminalis; 'in Regia Præfectura Vimacenſi Juriſconſultus & 'cauſarum Actor eximius, & Notarius Regius, Re-'giſque Chriſtianiſſimi, Rerum Maritimarum in Occi-'duo Mari Commiſſarius; eoque nomine gaudens ea-'dem immunitate à Tributis ordinariis quâ Nobi-'les (26). - - - - - His father was the honourable and 'learned David Des-Marets, Sieur du Feret, juſtice in 'ordinary of Aumont and its appendages, and alſo Judge 'civil and criminal of the barony of Chept, St Maixant, 'and other towns, counſellor, and an eminent pleader in 'the government of Vineux, and notary royal, commiſſa-'ry to the moſt Chriſtian king for maritime affairs in 'the weſtern ſea; and, on that account, enjoying the ſame 'immunity from the ordinary taxes as the nobility.' He married in 1588 Magdalen Vaucquet, the daughter of a noted man, and very zealous for the reformed church (27), and died in 1649. His widow was living in 1654. Lambert DES-MARETS, the father of David, was very zealous for the ſame religion. Lambertus Davidis pater, Civis Blangiacenſis honoratus & opulentus, Senior fuit in Eccleſia Domeſtica Principis Porciani, ſub auſpiciis Reformationis (28).

(25) Vitæ Profeſſor. Groning. pag. 134.

(26) Ibid.

(27) Johannes Vaucquetius Magdalenæ pater, Prætor Sanmauritii Fontiumque, & Juris patrii conſultiſſimus in Præfectura Vimacenſi, atque Regius Notarius, itidem columen fuit inter ſuos Eccleſiæ Reformatæ; quem Mareſius recordatur & admodum parum vidiſſe, venerandâ canitie (ætem, natum 93 vel 94 annos, integris mentis & corporis viribus ſacra noſtra frequentantem. Ibid.

[H] The diſpute . . . . be had with Voëtius.] It began in 1642. Voëtius had publiſhed a diſputation de idololatria indirecta, wherein he blamed the conduct of the magiſtrates of Boiſleduc, concerning a fraternity of the Virgin ſettled in their city for ſome ages. They had obliged the Roman catholics to admit the Proteſtants into it, after they had taken away the ceremonies, which the reformed church could not allow (29). Voëtius maintained, that the Proteſtant magiſtrates ought not to tolerate ſuch fraternities, and that private perſons who entered themſelves into them did very ill. Mareſius, who was at this time profeſſor in the Schola Illuſtris of Boiſleduc, was deſired to write an apology for the magiſtrates who tolerated the fraternity of the Virgin, and entered themſelves into it. His book was printed in 1642, with this title, Defenſio Pietatis & Sinceritatis Optimatum Sylvæducenſium, in negotio Sodalitatis quæ à B. Virgine nomen habet, teſtibus veritate & charitate (30). A little while after there appeared a book of Voëtius, intituled, Specimen aſſertionum partim ambiguarum aut lubricarum, partim periculoſarum, ex tractatu nuperrime ſcripto pro ſodalitatibus B. Mariæ inter Reformatos erigendis aut interpolandis, titulo, Defenſio pietatis & ſinceritatis, &c. Theſe were the firſt acts of hoſtility on both ſides, and after this there was no means of getting off; for the combatants had not only joined battle, but there was alſo blood ſpilt between them.

(28) Ibid.

(29) See the Life of Mr Des Cartes, written by Mr Baillet, Tom. ii. pag. 180, & ſeq.

(30) It is in quarto.

Ubi ſanguine bellum
Imbuit, & primæ commiſit funera pugnæ,
Deſerit Hiſperiam, & cœli convexa per auras,
Junonem victrix affatur voce ſuperba:
En perfecta tibi bello diſcordia triſti:
Dic, in amicitiam coëant, & fœdera jungant:
Quandoquidem Auſonio reſperſi ſanguine Teucros (31).

The fury bath'd them in each other's blood.
Then having fix'd the fight, exulting flies,
And bears fulfill'd her promiſe to the ſkies.
To Juno thus ſhe ſpeaks; Behold, 'tis done,
The blood already drawn, the war begun;
The diſcord is compleat, nor can they ceaſe
The dire debate, nor you command the peace.
Now ſince the Latian and the Trojan brood
Have taſted vengeance, and the ſweets of blood.
DRYDEN.

(31) Virgil. Æneid. lib. vii. ver. 541.

The battle grew hot, and the combatants often renewed the charge. Mareſius who had only ſkirmiſhed (32) in the years 1643, and 1644, gave battle in 1645. This is the title of the book he publiſhed. Samuelis Mareſii Theologi Ultima patientia tandem expugnata à D. G. Voetio Ultrajectino Profeſſore & quibuſdam illius aſſeclis; ſive Modeſta & Neceſſaria defenſio tripartita, tum ſui ipſius, tum eâ occaſione cauſæ Procerum Sylvæducenſium & Decretorum Synodicorum circa illam, ipſa extorta variâ ac longâ contumeliarum ſerie, ac præſertim nupero libello famoſo, Belgicè edito, & inſcripto, Kort ende oprecht verhael, &c. The profeſſor of Utrecht ſcarce appeared in the field of battle (33), but ſent thither either his ſon or his friends: But the profeſſor of Groningen would not be ſo put off, but continued to ſtrike directly at the father. You may underſtand how things ſtood, after the war had laſted as long as the ſiege of Troy; I ſay, you may underſtand it by the book which Mareſius publiſhed in 1652, with this title, Auctarium primum Bibliothecæ Theologicæ D. Giſberti Voetii nuper recuſæ cum virulentâ præfatione; continens, 1. Summariam deductionem litis decennalis quæ ipſi cum Samuele Mareſio, licet pacem & amneſtiam ſemper deprecante, hactenus interceſſit. 2. Vindicias Conditionum Amneſtiæ & Reconciliationis partibus oblatarum à R. R. Deputatis Synodi Groning. Omlandicæ, ab hoc admiſſarum & ab illo rejectarum. 3. Conditiones iniquiſſimas & impracticabiles, ab ipſo D. Voetio pro imperio præſcriptas; Ad ejus pertinax odium & animum invincibiliter irreconciliabilem toti Belgio demonſtrandum. - - - - The firſt ſupplement to the Theological library, of Giſbert Voëtius, lately reprinted with a virulent preface; containing, 1. A ſummary deduction of a ten years controverſy; which he has had with Samuel Mareſius, who all the while ſued for peace and amneſty. 2. A vindication of the conditions of the peace and amneſty, offered to both parties by the reverend deputies of the ſynod of Groningen and the Omlands, which were accepted by the latter, but rejected by the former. 3. The moſt unjuſt and impracticable conditions, preſcribed by D. Voëtius himſelf; to ſhew to all the United Provinces, his unrelenting hatred and implacable temper. It is a book in 8vo. It is believed, that this quarrel which laſted eighteen years, would never have ended but with the death of the parties, had not a common intereſt induced them to come to an agreement, that they might unite all their forces againſt a party of Divines (34), who were as odious to the profeſſor of Groningen as to him of Utrecht. It was obſervable in this diſpute, that on the one ſide the curators of the univerſity of Groningen, and on the other, the magiſtrates of Utrecht, (32) See thoſe ſkirmiſhes in the Appendix of the Tribunal iniquitatis, pag. 151, 152.

(33) He appeared perſonally in it in 1648, at the beginning of his firſt volume of Theological Diſputations, (See the long preface to that volume,) and in the year 1651, in the preface to the ſecond edition of the Bibliotheca Studioſi Theologiæ.

(34) Thoſe who are called Cocceians. Mareſius, de Statu afflicto Studii Theologici, pag. 3, calls it Factionem Carteſio-Loveſteniano-Remonſtrantinam.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google not long. I ſpeak of it elſewhere (i). If I be not miſtaken the laſt adverſary whom he wrote againſt, was Wittichius, a great Carteſian and profeſſor of Divinity. Our Mareſius cannot be ſufficiently commended for his zeal againſt the Enthuſiaſts, and the foretellers of great revolutions. We have ſeen how he baffled Comenius (k), nor did he ſhow Labadie and the Millenarian Serarius any better quarter. The extracts I ſhall give out of the book wherein he refuted this Millenarian, will be acceptable to men of good ſenſe [I]. He trecht offered their mediation to the parties, and that they having accepted it, it was immediately ordered, that there ſhould be a ceſſation of all acts of hoſtility during the treaty of peace. After this, they conſulted about the preliminaries, the mediators diſpatched courier after courier to agree about the time when, and place where, the conferences ſhould be held, and on the choice of the deputies plenipotentiaries. All this was labour in vain, becauſe during theſe preliminaries, the party of Utrecht broke the truce, by publiſhing a very injurious book againſt Mareſius. The forcible carrying away of the prince of Furſtemberg did not more diſſolve the conferences about the general peace which was treating, at Cologne in 1674, than this book did the project of peace between theſe two profeſſors. If you would ſee my proofs in the original, you need only read what follows (35). ‘ Caduceum injicere conati ſunt Nobiliſſi-

(i) In the article DAILLE', remarks [K] and [L].

(k) See the remarks [F] and [G], of the article COMENIUS.

‘ mi & Ampliſſimi hujus Academiæ p. t. Curatores
‘ . . . . Scripſerunt eum in finem Ultrajectum, &
‘ ſtipulati ſunt ut interim dum ipſi convenirent cum ‘ Delegatis quibuſdam ex N. N. & A. A. illo Magi-
‘ ſtratu ad totum negotium componendum, armiſtitium
‘ bonâ fide ſervaretur, nec quicquam directe vel indi-
‘ recte, mediate vel immediate ultra emitteretur. Sed
‘ vix dum in has conditiones N. N. & A. A. Magi-
‘ ſtratus Ultrajectinus, re communicatâ cum D. Voetio
‘ & ſuis bonâ fide conſenſerat, & adhuc de loco, tem-
‘ pore & perſonis conventus præliminariter agebatur
‘ per Tabellarios hinc inde inter Proceres utroſque
‘ miſſos, cum ecce novus interim libellus convitioſus
‘ & famoſus, ſub nomine Chabanæi, contra fidem
‘ publicam in me Ultrajecti prodiit. - - - - The cura-
‘ tors of this univerſity endeavoured at a reconciliation
‘ . . . . To this end they wrote to Utrecht, and agreed,
‘ that till ſuch time as they ſhould meet with deputies,
‘ from the magiſtrates of Utrecht, to compoſe the difference,
‘ an armiſtice ſhould be faithfully obſerved on both ſides,
‘ and nothing further ſhould be publiſhed either directly or ‘ indirectly, mediately or immediately. But no ſooner
‘ the magiſtrates of Utrecht conſented to theſe propoſals,
‘ after communicating them to D. Voëtius, and his friends,
‘ while yet they were treating by couriers, ſent to and fro,
‘ between the reſpective magiſtrates, on the preliminaries
‘ of the time, place, and perſons of the convention, when
‘ a new book full of ſcurrility and railing, under the ‘ name of Chabanæus, is publiſhed at Utrecht, in breach
‘ of public faith.’

(35) Mareſius, in Præfatione, Theologi paradoxi retecti & refutati. This book was printed at Groningen in 2649.

This quarrel (36) being one of the moſt remarkable that has been known between two Proteſtant Divines, and having produced more books than can be imagined, I deſigned to have given the whole Hiſtory of it, with a chronological catalogue of all the writings it produced; but I found that this undertaking required fuller inſtructions, and deeper inquiries than I could afford, and that it would fill up too many pages; and therefore I leave it to thoſe that write the Eccleſiaſtical Annals, or the Hiſtoria Literaria of the XVIIth century, and ſhall conclude this remark with a thing which I know not well how to circumſtantiate. I have heard in France from many people, that a Jeſuit (37), publiſhed a book, which contained nothing but the reproaches which theſe two famous profeſſors divulged one againſt another, and that he concluded after this manner: ‘ altho' it were ſuppoſed, that two thirds ‘ of theſe accuſations were falſe on both ſides, yet
‘ the other third being true, renders theſe two wri‘ ters worthy of corporal puniſhment, who yet pro-
‘ teſſed, during the progreſs of this quarrel, that they ‘ wiſhed a good reconciliation.’ I could find no body in Holland who knew of ſuch a book; and ſome people, worthy of credit in theſe matters, told me, that there never was any ſuch book. But at laſt Mr Grævius informed me, that a Jeſuit of the Low-Countries had publiſhed a collection of that nature.

(36) Concerning it's origin, ſee Letter ccclxiii of Voſſius.

(37) Some ſaid he was called James Tirinus; but that is falſe. He died before the beginning of this quarrel. Thoſe who ſaid ſo, ſeemed to have this ground for it, that Mareſius having publiſhed two volumes againſt James Tirinus, had probably provoked him.

If Mr Grævius only meant the Munus adventitium, publiſhed by a Jeſuit under the feigned name of W. Gutherthoma in the year 1643 he by no means proved that the book which I had in ſome ſort denied the exiſtence of, was ever printed; for this Munus adventitium, contains only the foul language that Voëtius uſed in his firſt book againſt Mareſius. The latter did not anſwer that ſatire before the year 1645. It was doubtleſs a very diſagreeable thing for him to find himſelf painted by a Jeſuit, in the black colours borrowed from the work of a Reformed Divine. Thus he ſpeaks of it in a book publiſhed in the year 1652. ‘ Quin etiam cum eadem illâ æſtate prodiiſſet in ipſum
‘ Satira quædam Jeſuitica ſub titulo Muneris adventitii
‘ quam Author corraſerat ex Specimine Voetii, & illo au-
‘ thore laudato ac Speciminis paginis citatis verbiſque
‘ recitatis, Mareſium deſcribebat & traducebat, tanquam
‘ falſarium, vulneratæ exiſtimationis hominem, ſcandaloza-
‘ rum ſcriptionum authorem, heterodoxum, pſeudologum, ca-
‘ lumniatorem, mendacem, pietati & Religioni contume-
‘ lioſum, Pacis Eccleſiæ & Reip. turbonem, Veritate, Cha- ‘ ritate, & Prudentia deſtitutum, &c. (his enim jam e-
‘ logiis à Voetio fuerat inſignitus Mareſius priuſquam
‘ vel vocula durior in ipſum illi excidiſſet) nihil ei voluit ‘ reponere Mareſius (38). - - - Nay, altho' a ſatire had ‘ been publiſhed againſt him, that ſame ſummer, by a Je- ‘ ſuit, under the title of Munus adventitium, which the ‘ author, had compiled from Voëtius's ſpecimen, and com-
‘ mending that author, quoting the pages, and reciting the ‘ words of the ſpecimen, deſcribed and traduced Mareſius as
‘ a cheat, a man of a blemiſhed character, author of ‘ ſcandalous books, heterodox, an inventer of falſities
‘ a calumniator, a lier, a reviler of piety and religion,
‘ a diſturber of the peace of the church and ſtate, deſti-‘ tute of truth, and charity, and prudence, &c. (for
‘ with theſe elogiums had Mareſius been complemented by ‘ Voëtius, before he had dropt the leaſt hard word a- ‘ gainſt him) Mareſius refuſed to give any anſwer.’

(38) Sam. Mareſius, Auctario primo Biblioth. Theol. Giſb. Voëtii, pag. 6.

[I] The Millenarian Serarius. The extracts I ſhall give . . . . . will be acceptable to men of good ſenſe.] Peter Serarius (39) publiſhed a book in 1663, wherein he declared, that the conjunction of the planets in the ſign Sagittarius foretold great revolutions. The ſame news was publiſhed in many other Latin and French books. Mareſius refuted this pretenſion in ſome Theſes which he cauſed to be maintained. Serarius wrote againſt thoſe Theſes, which obliged Mareſius to publiſh (40) a book which he intituled Chiliaſmus enervatus, and which contains, beſides thoſe Theſes, three diſſertations againſt one part of the anſwer of Serarius. He dedicated this book to his adverſary, and prudently repreſented to him, that the doctrine of the Chiliaſts rendered the Reformed Religion odious to the ſupreme powers; for ſince they pretend, that the proſperity of the church depends upon the deſtruction of all temporal powers, they excite the people to inſurrections that they may bring in the golden age of Chriſtianity, or the reign of a thouſand years. He repreſents to him the ſeditions that had been raiſed in England by the doctrine of the fifth monarchy men, and the mortification the Chiliaſts had lately ſuffered, by ſeeing all the hopes they had grounded upon the difference between France and the Pope, vaniſh into nothing by the peace of Piſa. The affront offered to the duke of Crequi at Rome in the year 1662, very much provoked his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: he ſent ſome troops into Italy, and then the credulous people, chiefly the Millenarians, doubted not but the beaſt in the Revelation was then certainly to be deſtroyed, and they could not refrain from publiſhing their hopes: wherefore the treaty of Piſa, which ended this difference, without any effuſion of blood, or any real damage to the court of Rome, was like a clap of thunder to them. Mareſius takes care to put his adverſary in mind of this terrible mortification. He obſerves, that it had been publiſhed at London in the year 1656 that Rome would be deſtroyed in 1666, and that the day of judgment ſhould happen in 1711. Many people flattered themſelves, that the war which was deſigned in France againſt Alexander VII, to revenge the affront done to the duke of Crequi, embaſſador of

(39) I ſhall ſay ſomething of him at the end of this remark.

(40) In the year 1664.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He did a great injury to the Janſeniſts, without deſigning it [K], by declaring that their opinions were the ſame with thoſe of the Reformed. His Reputation gave him great authority that crown, would verify the firſt article of the prediction: judge then whether the peace of Piſa was acceptable to them. What he ſays concerning the conjunction of the planets in Sagittarius, is curious; it happened on the eleventh of December 1662. A Dutch author, following the obſervations of the Aſtrologer Theodorus Hoen, affirmed, that the like conjunction had not been ſince that which was in the ſign Aquarius in the time of Noah's deluge (41). Serarius building on this Dutch book, and another that appeared in High-Dutch, wrote a Latin diſſertation to ſhow, that the conjunction of the planets in Sagittarius, the laſt ſign of the fiery trigon, igneæ triplicitatis, being well conſidered with all it's circumſtances antecedent and concomitant, foretold the approaching coming of JESUS CHRIST for the converſion of the Jews, the ruin of the Pope, and the eſtabliſhment of the millenary kingdom. Mareſius refutes him ſolidly, and obſerves, that, according to Alſtedius, this monarchy ſhall begin in 1694, and according to Theodorus Hoen, the conjunction in Sagittarius, was to produce the univerſal conflagration. He laughs at this, and ſays, that Sagittarius cannot paſs for a fiery ſign, unleſs it be becauſe it obliges people to keep good fires in their houſes to preſerve them from the cold; and he obſerves that at the time of this conjunction, it was a terrible froſt for many weeks. And whereas Serarius ſaid, that the conjunction which was in the ſame ſign, October 9, 1603, did ſtill continue it's bad effects; Mareſius anſwers him pleaſantly, that it is very ſtrange it has not yet diſcharged all it's poiſon, mirum eſt ejus virus nondum deferbuiſſe. He adds, that Serarius was a good friend to Paul Felgenhawer, who printed a book in 1655 (42), wherein he aſſumes to himſelf more than once a prophetic ſpirit, and promiſes the Jews all ſorts of good news. But he does not agree with the author of a piece intituled, Judæorum excitabulum matutinum, ſive Judæus redux, wherein it is affirmed, that the converſion of the Jews ſhall begin in 1664, and that it ſhall quickly after be followed with their return into Paleſtine, where they ſhall live moſt deliciouſly.

When I conſidered this multitude of Chriſtian doctors, who have foretold for ſo many ages a great revolution of the faith, I was curious to know whether there were not ſuch kind of people in other religions; and among other things I find that there are ſome Mahometans who leave legacies to an unknown prophet, who is to come and deliver the world from the tyranny of Anti-Chriſt (43). And the Perſians believe, that Mahomet Mahadi, the ſon of Hoſſen, ſecond ſon of Ali, is not dead, but lies hid in ſome place, from whence he ſhall come forth one day and refute all errors, and re-unite all men in the ſame belief. He will preach on horſe-back, and begin to do it in the city of Mazadel, where there is always a horſe kept ready for him (44). This in ſome things reſembles the opinion of ſeveral Chriſtians concerning the prophet Elias. We need not wonder that the Mahometans believe ſuch chimeras, ſince the prince of Baſſora can perſuade them that he is the chief favourite of Mahomet, and that his credit is ſo great with that prophet, that, by his bills of exchange, he can procure the bearers ſuch or ſuch a place in Paradiſe. There is a bank in his houſe for the diſpatch of theſe bills; he ſigns a policy, by which the poſſeſſion of a certain place in heaven is acquired, that is more or leſs advantageous, in proportion to the ſum payed him. Il prencipe di Baſſora pretende eſſer de' Confidenti di Mahometto e haver maggior autorita degl' altri, in vertu della quale concede à gente ſimplice pezza di cielo, ſegnando polize di cambio di tanto e tal ſito nel Paradiſo, ſecondo il dinaro che ne riceve (45).

We will in a few words acquaint the reader who this Petrus Serarius, or Serrurier, was, againſt whom Mareſius wrote. I find at p. 297, of a book (46) printed in 1670, that he was lately dead, and that above forty years before he was depoſed from the miniſtry for the fanatical errors of Swenckveldius, to which he was wholly addicted; that he publiſhed a ſmall piece in favour of Labadie, in 1669, and intituled it Examen Synodorum, and addreſſed it to the Walloon ſynod; and in the title of this book he called himſelf a miniſter of the Goſpel of the univerſal church, and that he was a man who communicated with no church.

[K] He did a great injury to the Janſeniſts, without deſigning it.] In the year 1651, he publiſhed a book in 4to with this title, Synopſis veræ Catholicæque doctrinæ de Gratia & annexis quæſtionibus; propoſita partim libello qui anno ſuperiori à Janſeniſtis in Communione Romana Gallice prodiit ſub hoc titulo, Catechiſmus Gratiæ, & poſtea recuſus fuit ſub iſto, Elucidationes quarundam difficultatum de gratia; partim brevibus ad illam Scholiis Theologicis. The next year there was publiſhed at Paris a little book written by the Jeſuits and intituled, The Janſeniſts owned for Calviniſts by Samuel Mareſius, doctor and chief profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Groningen, and miniſter in ordinary of the academical church, in his Latin verſion of the Catechiſm of Grace of the Janſeniſts, printed at Groningen in 1651. The author of this book inſerted the preface which Mareſius put before his Synopſis, and took advantage of all that he has obſerved, to ſhow that in the doctrines about Grace, and thoſe that relate to them, the opinions of the Janſeniſts are the ſame with thoſe of Calvin. From that time few books appeared againſt the Janſeniſts, wherein this agreement, which the profeſſor of Groningen had owned between them and his ſect, was not objected to them. As this gave a great deal of trouble, and did great prejudice to theſe gentlemen, they writ bitterly againſt him. Mr Daillé put him in mind of it in the defence of the apology for the national ſynods of Alençon and Charenton (47). 'Hoc ne neſciat, 'narro illi iſtos, quos tantopere prædicat Janſenianos, 'quos cordatos dicit, quos graviſſimos argumentatores 'cenſet, hos inquam ipſos narro jam ante quadriennium 'tres libellos longe ſacerrimos ac nequiſſimos, convi- 'tiis & maledictis prodigioſis refertos, contra ipſum 'edidiſſe; in quibus, quod credo, auſus eſſet iis male 'palpari ita ferociter recalcitrant, ut nihil mitius co- 'gitaſſe videantur quam ut laudatorem hunc ſuum 'miſere diſcerperent ac laniarent. Scin' tu quas ei 'pro ſuis laudibus grates reddant? Quibus elogiis vi- 'rum talibus pro meritis exornent? * Virulentiſſimum 'ſcriptorem vocant; artis diabolicæ multoties convictum, 'hominem frontis ad omne mendacium proſtitutæ, Theolo- 'gaſtrum, Sophiſtam, Sycophantam dira calumniandi libi- 'dine citra modum ac legem efferatum, proter-vum, eminen- 'ſum convitiatorem, audaciſſimum impoſtorem, fanaticum 'vatem. Piget plura de teterrimis iſtorum convitia- 'torum venenis dicere. Hos ſuos rabioſiſſimos ac 'maledicentiſſimos obtrectatores, pro laudibus, quibus 'immerentes affecerat, turpiſſima probra rependentes, '& plenis in eum plauſtris effundentes habet tamen 'Epicrita pro cordatis, gravibuſque diſputatoribus '(48). - - - - Leſt he ſhould be unacquainted with this, 'I tell him, that thoſe Janſeniſts, whom he ſo highly 'extols, whom he calls judicious, whom he thinks to be 'very ſtrong reaſoners: thoſe very men, I tell him, 'have publiſhed now four years ago, three moſt execra- 'ble and wicked books againſt him, abounding with 'moſt prodigious reproaches and reviling; in which, 'becauſe as I believe he dared to ſtroke them injudici- 'ouſly, they kick again ſo furiouſly, that they ſeem to have 'thought of nothing kinder than beating to pieces and 'deſtroying this their panegyriſt. Would you know what 'thanks they return him for his praiſes, with what elo- 'giums they extol the man for his merits? They call 'him a moſt virulent writer, often convicted of diabo- 'lic arts, a man of a front hardened to all manner 'of lies, a Theologaſter, a Sophiſter, a Sycophant, ra- 'ging with a curled deſire of ſlander beyond mea- 'ſure or rule, a froward fellow, an ominous reviler, 'a barefaced impoſtor, a fanatic prophet. I am loth 'to repeat any more of the venom of theſe revilers. Yet 'the approbator reckons theſe his mad and moſt abuſive 'detractors, who, for the commendations he beſtowed up- 'on them undeſervedly, return him the baſeſt reproaches 'and pour them upon him by cart-loads; he reckons them 'I ſay judicious and ſolid diſputants.' The ſame apology informs us (49). I. That David Blondel wrote to Mareſius, and blamed him for meddling with the diſputes between the Janſeniſts and Jeſuits. II. That the Janſeniſt (50) who treated Mareſius ſo very ill, had forged a lye, viz. that the miniſters of Charenton had induced him of Groningen, to own the diſciples

(41) According to Serarius, who built upon the fame Hoen, and upon the tables of conjunctions, it happened in Piſces.

(42) At Amſterdam. It was intituled, Bonus Nuntius Iſraëli.

REVOLUTIONS of religion hoped for by the Mahometans.

(43) Ne teſtamenti ſi fanno legati à certo profeta incognito, che dee venir liberar il mondo dalla tirannide del Antichriſto. Giornale de Letterati, March 31, 1673, pag. 33, in the extract of the Voyage to the Eaſt Indies, by Father F. Vincenzo Maria of St Caterine of Siena, procurator-general of the barefooted Carmelites.

(44) Ibid.

(45) Ibid.

(46) Intitulé, Modeſte Réfutation de la Declaration en forme de Manifeſte, publiſhed by Jean Labadie.

(47) Dallæus, in Vindiciis Apologiæ pro duabus Synodis, part 1, cap. vi, pag. 130, 131.

* Hier. ab Angelo ſorti. Epiſt. 1, a. D. 1654. edita, pag. 14, 15.

(48) Mr Daillé, at pag. 428, of the ſame book, ſpeaks thus: Ex his ſuis laboribus nihil ad eum pro expectatis triumphis redijſſe videmus, quam à Romanis quidem librorum cenſoribus eam notam, de qua non erat, quod hic tantopere gloriaretur, Janſenianis vero tria convitiorum & maledictorum plauſtra, quæ in eum ab Hieronymo illo perſonato, de quo alibi ſupra diximus, tota plaudente Lutetia effundi inviti ac dolentes ſpectavimus. - - - From theſe his labours we do not find that he has gained any of the triumph he expected, except that mark from the Romiſh cenſors of books, of which he has no great reaſon to boaſt; here we ſee the Janſeniſts have thrown three cart-loads of ſlander on him by the feigned Hieronimus, whom we have mentioned above, with the applauſe of the whole city of Paris, and to our great ſorrow.

(49) Pag. 428.

(50) It is Mr Hermant, who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Hieronymus ab Angelo ſorti.

diſciples

Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

authority even in foreign countries; insomuch that one who had written a very severe book against him, in Germany, was ordered to suppress it [L].

disciples of Jansenius for orthodox, on purpose to render them odious to the Jesuits, and to be revenged for the reproaches the Jansenists had published against Labadie. Mr Daillé answers, that those who are accused of this trick, are so innocent of it, that they would have advised their brother of Groningen with all their heart, never to engage in that quarrel, but to leave the two parties to dispute it out. Quæ quam falso, quamque mendaciter conficta sint, nemo scire vel testari melius atque certius potest, quam Epicrita, qui sui in edenda illa Jansenianæ catecheseos censura consilii unus sibi optime conscius est. Nos quidem, quos fabulator totius rei auctores fuisse fingit, tantum ab eo quod iste comminiscitur, abfuisse novit Deus, ut Epicritam, si nos ille consuluisset, etiam à scribendo deterrituri fuerimus, suasurique ut bene compositos cum suis Bitis Bacchios inter se digladiari, dignisque utrimque Romano supercilio iris ac ictibus bacchari sineret; neve quos certandi rixandique æstus atque libido tam commode commiserat, eos intempestivo alloquio divulsos in se provocaret, atque converteret (51).

(51) Dallæus, ibid. pag. 133, 134.

[L] A man who had written a severe book against him, was ordered to suppress it.] It was intituled, Ismaël Gallus. The Author, called Steinbergius, lived at Herbron, and was subject to the counts of Nassau, who obliged him to suppress his book (52).

(52) See the fifth tome of the works of James Altingius, pag. 393.

MARGARIN (Cornelius) abbot of mount Cassin, and Archivist general of the order, was one of the greatest compilers that lived in the XVIIth century. He was born in 1605, and died February 11th, 1681 (a). The works which he published give but an imperfect idea of his indefatigable industry. To make a true representation of it, we must join to that which is printed, that which is not as yet published [A].

(a) Prosper Mandosius, in Biblioth. Romana, Centur. v, num. 66.

[A] To make a true representation of his application, we must join to that which is printed, that which is not as yet published.] These are his works of the first kind. Justinianus magnus Aniciæ familiæ restitutus. Discorso Apologetico in corroborazione della verita di un instrumento concernente la famiglia de Capizucchi. Bullarium Casinense in two tomes. Inscriptiones antiquæ Basilicæ sancti Pauli de Urbe. Dictionarium Longobardicum. His unprinted works are a large undigested collection of papers, which make eight volumes, that are kept in the Vatican. The title of them is this, Thesaurus Historicus sacræ & politicæ veritatis in S. R. E. Agro ipsis Autographis monumentis à vetustissimis antiquitatum latibulis per diurna sæcula absconditus, in tomos octo distributus, & ad sanctissimos Innocentii XI. P. M. pedes ea qua decet veneratione & alacritate humillime depositus, per Cornelium Margarinum Abbatem Casinensem, ad certam Chronologiæ normam juxta Indictionum rationem ipsa testante veritate expositus (1).

(1) Prosper Mandosius, Bibl. Romana, Centur. v, num. 66, pag. 332.

MARGARET, queen of Navarre. See NAVARRE.

MARGUNIUS (Maximus), bishop of Cythera (a), was a native of Candia. He lived many years at Venice, and died about the end of June 1602 (b). He had a fine library, which he bequeathed to the monks of Candia; and, as if he had foreseen his dissolution, he sent thither, a little before his death, nine trunks full of books (c). He had sedulously collected a great number of Greek manuscripts which were scarce and curious.

(a) An island of the Archipelago, now called Cerigo.

(b) Velserus, Epist. xx, ad Scaligerum.

(c) Id. ib.

MARIANA (John) born at Talavera, in the diocese of Toledo, entered into the order of the Jesuits January 1, 1554. He was then a student at Complutum, being seventeen years old. He became one of the ablest men of his age; a great Divine, a great Humanist, one of a profound skill in ecclesiastical and prophane history, a good Grecian, and learned in the holy tongue. He went to Rome in 1561, and there taught Theology. Four years after this he went into Sicily, and taught there for two years. He came to Paris in 1569, and there explained Thomas Aquinas for the space of five years. His health would not suffer him to continue, and obliged him to follow such studies as were less laborious. He returned to Spain in 1574, and spent the rest of his days at Toledo. He died there February 17th, 1624, being eighty seven years of age [A]. He was employed by the Inquisition in several important affairs; but for himself he stood in need of patience [B], and of great courage to bear with constancy the severe trials of adversity (a). What is observed of his chastity, is altogether singular [C]. He published several

(a) Taken from Nathan. Southwell, Bibl. Script. Societ. pag. 477.

[A] He died February the 17th, 1624, being eighty seven years of age.] Don Nicolas Antonio, who had read all this in Alegambe, does affirm (1), that Mariana died February 17, 1623, aged ninety years. As to this, I trust more to two Jesuits, who compiled the Bibliotheque of their order, than to him, or even to Bernardin Giraldi (2), who affirms, that Mariana died in 1632, aged ninety six years. 'Jesuitarum quos ætas 'nostra vidit annosissimus, qui abhinc biennium pie 'obiit diem suum nonaginta sex annos natus. - - - - - 'The oldest Jesuit of this age, did, two years ago, piously depart this life, being ninety six years old.'

(1) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hispan. Tom. i, pag. 561.

(2) Bernardinus Giraldus Patavinus, in Apolog. pro Senatu Veneto, dated at Padua Dec. 1, 1634.

[B] For himself, he stood in great need of patience.] If I could have consulted his life, (3) written by Thomas Thomaius (4) de Vargas, Historiographer to the king of Spain, I could doubtless have given here some particular account of the persecutions which Mariana endured; but I can only now transcribe the words of the two Bibliographers of the Jesuits. 'Ipse 'vicissim multa perpessus adversa, admirabili animi 'æquitate, & omnium virtutum documento se malis 'superiorem esse probavit. Exercitam senectutem To'leti produxit usque ad diem xvii Februarii anni Do'mini MDCXXIV (5). - - - He himself endured much 'adversity with admirable patience, and as an example 'of all virtues shewed himself to be above the shocks of 'fortune. He protracted his labouring old age at 'Toledo, to the xviith of February MDCXXIV.' Add to this passage what they will tell us hereafter, when I shall speak of the book about the alteration of money.

(3) Alegambe and Southwell, mention it in the article of MARIANA. Don Nicolas Antonio does not mention it in the long be printed. He p. 308, and 385, catalogue he has given of the writings of Thomaius, printed and to calls him Tamajus.

(4) Mr Teissier, Biblioth. Bibliothecar, calls him Tamæus.

(5) Alegambe, pag. 258. Sotuel, pag. 477.

[C] What is observed of his chastity, is altogether singular.] Those who have read the new letters of the animadverter upon Mr Maimbourg, have there seen this singularity expressed after this manner (6): 'You 'will not believe this, nor perhaps what F. Alegambe 'says of the Jesuit Mariana, who died in 1624, 'after he had lived almost ninety years in the 'most exact chastity; from whence perhaps it came 'to pass, adds the historian, that his hands ‡ were as 'supple and pliable after his death, as if he had been

(6) See the New Letters, pag. 685.

‡ Castitatis cultor studiosissimus, cujus aliquis effectus esse potuerit quod mortuo manus fuerint ita tractabiles ac flexibiles.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſeveral books (b), and among others a hiſtory of Spain, which many look upon as a maſter-

(b) See the titles of them in Moreri.

' been alive. I confeſs freely that I ſee no connexion ' between theſe two things.' I believe with him, that it would be a difficult thing to give a natural reaſon of ſuch an effect of chaſtity; and as to miraculous reaſons, I know not by what reſemblance or analogy they can be ſupported. Perhaps they may be grounded upon an argument from contraries, and that in conſequence of a monkiſh tradition, which lays it down for a certain truth, that all thoſe who have had to do with Nuns, are accuſed after their death, and convicted of this action by a certain ſtiffneſs, which is obſerved in that part which had been made uſe of to commit the ſin. ' Notabile ' eſt quod Mariani (7) dicunt, eum qui ſpurium ex ' moniali precrearit, ſingulariſſime à Deo poſt mortem ' puniri, uti celeberrimus Medicus Leonellus Faventi- ' nus, c. 7. ſecundæ partis Practicæ Medicinalis hoc ' myſterium naturæ aperuit, Qui coit, inquiens, cum ' Monachâ vel moniali, quando talis moritur, remanet ' virga ejus tenſa, Unde dicitur in carmine apud vul- ' gares:

Qui monacha potitur, virgâ tendente moritur.

' Cujus & meminit Wolfgangus Hildebrandus Mag. Nat. ' l. 1. c. 31. p. 34. Erford. impreſſ. 16. 22. Et for- ' tean etiam moniales ſtupratæ poſt mortem peculiari ' ſigno notantur, quod honoris & pudoris ergo retice- ' tur. Certe ſi miracula hæc quotidie contingerent pau- ' ciores ſpurii invenirentur (8). - - - - What is aſſerted ' by the Papiſts is remarkable, that he who begets a ' baſtard upon a Nun, is, after death, puniſhed by GOD ' in a moſt ſingular manner; as the moſt famous phyſician ' Leonelius Faventinus, c. 7. of the ſecond part of ' his Medicinal Practice has diſcloſed this ſecret of na- ' ture, He, ſaith he, who hath had criminal conver- ' ſation with a Nun, when he dieth, the offending ' part remains erected; which is alſo mentioned by Wolf- ' gangus Hildebrandus. And perhaps the Nuns who ' have been defloured are alſo diſtinguiſhed by ſome parti- ' cular mark, which, for honour and modeſty's ſake, is ' concealed. Aſſuredly, there would not be ſo many ' baſtards, if theſe miracles ſhould daily fall out.' The words of Leonellus Faventinus, which I have tranſcribed, were cited by Henry Korman in chap. lxvii, part iv, of the Miracles of the Dead.

(*) Thus this author calls the Roman Catholics, as if they held the Holy Virgin for the head of their religion.

(7) Lyſer. Polygamiæ triumphat. pag. 314.

PARTICULARS concerning the chaſtity of ſome Jeſuits.

I will obſerve upon this occaſion ſome very notable ſingularities which are to be found in Alegambe, concerning the chaſtity of certain Jeſuits. He ſays, that Father Gil, who died in 1622, aged ſeventy-three years, knew not any woman by ſight, ſuch a ſtrict watch did he keep over his ſenſes that they ſhould not fix upon theſe objects. He was afraid of himſelf: he could ſcarcely bear to touch himſelf; and he thanked GOD that he had a bad ſight, becauſe that had afforded him great aſſiſtance to chaſtity. Erat ſeveriſſimus ſuorum ſenſuum cuſtos: nullam tot annis feminam de facie noverat: ſe quoque ipſum attingere quodammodò horrebat. Agebat Deo gratias pro hebetata ſibi acie oculorum; ex quo multa commoda caſtimoniæ perſentiſceret (9). Father Cofterus declared, that his chaſtity was never overcome by any irregular motion, nor by any obſcene imagination (10). Father Coton, who was confeſſor to a very leud prince, whoſe court followed the maxim, Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis, died a virgin, and preſerved his inward purity in ſuch a manner, that he had a horror for every thing that might be offenſive to this virtue; and he had ſo nice a ſmell in this reſpect, that perſons who came near him after having violated the laws of chaſtity would excite in him the ſenſation of an intolerable ſtink. Caſtitatem impenſe coluit, & Viginitatis decus ad extremum uſque obtinuit. Senſus frænabat accuratâ cuſtodiâ, & horrore quodam impuritatis; quam etiam in iis qui ſe illa fædaſſent, ex graveolentiâ neſcio qua diſcernebat (11). Father Spiga, who died in the year 1594, aged ſeventy-four years, was accounted a virgin, he had never looked upon any woman, and could not diſtinguiſh his own nieces one from another, altho' he had been their confeſſor; and nothing could induce him to enter into their houſe, when he knew they were alone. Caſtitati tuendæ, nunquam fœminas intuitus eſt. Neptes ſuas, quas crebro confitentes audierat, inter ſe diſtinguere neſciebat; ad illas, ſi domi ſuæ eſſent non poterat induci ut intraret, quanticunque, momenti negotio urgeretur. Opinio conſtans fuit, Virginitatis illi decus uſque ad extremum conſtitiſſe (12). I am ſurprized, that Alegambe ſhould not know what is related of Poſſevin the Jeſuit, ' That being to read Tibullus, ' upon account of his fine Latin, he prayed to GOD ' kneeling on the ground, that the verſes of this poet ' about love might not inſpire him with love.' Mr Menage, who relates this (13), had ſaid juſt before, ' That he heard Father Sirmond ſay, that having ' read the judgment, which Photius gave of the ' romance of Achilles Statius, whereby it appeared, ' that this romance was full of obſcenity, he would ' never read it.' To this purpoſe I will add, that Melchior Canus, who was no friend to the Jeſuits, made himſelf merry one day at their coſt, at the king of Spain's court. He ſaid, that they carried about them an herb which mortified nature in ſuch a manner, that by the efficacy of this ſimple they could ſafely converſe with women. Philip II taking this in a literal ſenſe, had a mind to know what this herb was, and having given order, that the Jeſuits ſhould be preſſed to name it, he learned that it was called the Fear of GOD. ' Feſtivum eſt quod refert Nico- ' laus Orlandinus libro quinto hiſtoriæ Societatis JESU. ' Petrus Faber & Antonius Araozius aulam Philippi ' ſecundi Hiſpaniarum Regis adierant, & tum primum ' in illud regnum Societatis nomen invexerant. Qui- ' buſdam autem inſtar erant miraculi, quod cum omni ' genere ſexuque promiſcuo tam verſarentur innoxii. Nec ' dubitavit in media curia Melchior Canus belle jocari, ' Patres Societatis JESU herbam quandam ſecum ſoli- ' tos circumferre, quæ vim haberet interimendæ libi- ' dinis: eaque velut antidoto tuto poſſe inter fœmi- ' narum verſari greges, & confitentibus puellis aurem ' ſalva integritate præbere, &c. Ea vox, &c. ſenſim ' ſparſa per curiam ad Principis pervenit aures. Qui ' rei auditæ curioſus inveſtigator Johannem de Zuniga ' (is erat ei velut morum magiſter ac cuſtos) ad Patres ' miſit ſciſcitatum quod herbæ genus illud eſſet, &c. ' Non negavit Araoſius hujus virtutis herbam ſe ha- ' bere: & cum Johannem aliquandiu ſuſpenſum re- ' ſponſi ambiguita e tenuiſſet, quo majorem audiendi ' cupiditatem accenderet, Hæc, inquit, herba commu- ' ni ſermone Timor Dei nuncupatur, &c. hoc igitur prin- ' cipi, velim, narres, hoc fideliter referas (14). What ' Nicolaus Orlandinus relates in his Hiſtory of the Society ' of JESUS, is pleaſant enough. Petrus Faber and ' Antonius Araoſius had come to the court of Philip the ' ſecond, king of Spain, and had then firſt brought into ' that kingdom the name of the ſociety. But by ſome it ' was looked upon as a miracle, that they could inno- ' cently converſe with all ſorts and ſexes of people. ' Whereupon Melchior Canus pleaſantly ſaid before ' all the court, that the fathers of the ſociety of JESUS ' uſed to carry about them a certain herb, which had ' the virtue of extinguiſhing luſt: and thereby, as ' with an antidote, might ſafely frequent the company ' of women, and lend an ear to the confeſſing virgins, ' without violating their integrity, &c. This ſpeech, ' &c. being by degrees ſpread over the court came ' to the ears of the prince. Who being a curious ' inquirer into the truth of what he heard, ſent Jo- ' hannes de Zuniga to the fathers of the ſociety, to ' aſk what kind of herb that was, &c. Araoſius did ' not deny that they had ſuch an herb; and when by ' the ambiguity of his anſwer he had for ſome time ' held him in ſuſpenſe, that he might heighten his de- ' ſire of hearing it, The herb, ſaid he, in common ' ſpeech, is called the Fear of GOD, &c. This I ' deſire you would faithfully report to the prince.' Jarrige does not faithfully report the circumſtances of this ſtory. ' Philip II, ſays he (15), their great ' protector, and a prince of fine wit, jeſting, aſked ' them one day, how they could be chaſte, having ' private and familiar converſations with all the fine ' ladies of his magnificent court, We have, ſaid ' they, as it is reported by their hiſtorian, an herb ' which we carry about us, by which we avoid the ' danger of uncleanneſs, and reſiſt all its attacks. ' Being preſſed by the monarch to name it, they an- ' ſwered, that it was the Fear of GOD; but I aſſure you, ' if they had it then, I am very certain they have loſt

(8) Alegambe, pag. 369, col. 1.

(9) Virginitatem nulla unquam cogitatione aut indecoro motu oppugnatam ſe ferviſſe ſibi ipſe aſſeverando. Idem, pag. 118.

(10) Idem, pag. 379, col. 2.

(11) (12) Idem, pag. 401, col. 1.

(13) Menage, Anti-Baillet, cap. cxliv, quoting Nicius Erythræus in the Elogy of Poſſevin. This Elogy is not in the three Pinacothecæ of Erythræus.

(14) Nicol. Abramus, Comm. in Orat. Ciceronis, Tom. ii, pag. 599, col. 1.

(15) Jarrige, Jeſuites ſur l'Echafaud, cap. vi, pag. m. 65.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google master-piece [D]. It is he who publiſhed a book of Lucas Tudenſis (c), on the life to come, and againſt the Albigenſes. His treatiſe of the Alteration of Coin brought him into trouble at the court of Spain [E], and expoſed him to a puniſhment which is ill related

(c) Thus we muſt call him, and not Tridentis with Alegambe and Southwell.

'the ſeed of it now, and that it does not grow in 'their garden.'

This herb of Melchior Canus brings to my mind the Indian hermits, who practiſe a ſevere penance all their life-time, and renounce even the ſight of the other ſex. They hold in their hands a cane, by which they drive away all impure thoughts and temptations, as if they were chaſing away a dog. I Ruxis ò Hiobioli abitano ne' deſerti paſcendoſi di foglie, e frutti ſalvatici, occupati quaſi ſempre nelle meditatione de' lor dii, profeſſano perpetua verginita, fuggendo la viſta delle donne, portano una canna in mano con la quale dicono tener lontano i diletti, tentationi, e travaglii (16).

(16) Giornale de Letterati, March 31, 1673, pag. 35, in the extract of the Voyage to the Eaſt Indies, by F. Vincenzo Maria di S. Caterina da Siena.

[D] A hiſtory of Spain, which is looked on by many as a maſter-piece.] It is divided into thirty books, after which follows an appendix. The firſt twenty were printed at Toledo, in folio, in 1592. He added to them the ten other books ſome time after (17). He tranſlated this hiſtory himſelf out of Latin into Spaniſh, and publiſhed this verſion at Toledo in 1601. It hath been often reprinted (18). He ſometimes departs from the original, as if he were writing, not a tranſlation, but a new book (19). The appendix contains only a little ſummary of ſome events from 1515, to the time it was written; for the author having finiſhed his great work at the death of Ferdinand of Arragon, in 1516, thought it would be more for his intereſt to publiſh a meer hiſtorical Index of matters ſince that time, than exact narratives of them, which he could not do without departing from that fidelity he had hitherto followed, or offending ſome perſons ſtill alive. Wherefore he took the ſureſt and honeſteſt way, and that which wiſe men have always moſt approved if (20). He would not write of what happened in his own time, or a little before. Let us ſee the encomiums which Father Rapin has beſtowed upon this hiſtory. 'None of the modern 'hiſtorians has written more judiciouſly than Mariana 'in his hiſtory of Spain. It is a maſter-piece of theſe 'laſt ages for this ſingle property. There ſhines in 'all the work a wiſdom which never ſuffers him to 'dwell too long on noble exploits, nor to neglect 'thoſe that are not ſo. This equality ſo judicious, 'which is always the ſame in the inequality of mat'ters which this author handles, is little known to 'the hiſtorians of theſe times (21).' To underſtand the full force of this encomium, we muſt add to it this deſcription. 'To write judiciouſly, according 'to Father Rapin (22), is to purſue our end on 'whatever ſubject we write, without wandring or 'amuſing our ſelves by the way: It is to expreſs 'things with a kind of wiſdom and reſervedneſs, 'without giving way either to the heat of our ima'gination, or the briſkneſs of our wit. It is to know 'how to ſuppreſs what is ſuperfluous in the expreſſion, 'as thoſe adverbs and epithets are which diminiſh 'things by heightning them; to leave nothing in it 'that is idle, languiſhing, and uſeleſs; to leave out 'generouſly what ought not to be uttered how fine 'ſoever it be; to take always leſs care of the * or'naments than of ſolid truth; not to ſhow heat or 'warmth where a man ought to be cool and ſerious; 'to examine one's thoughts, and meaſure one's words, 'with that juſtneſs of ſenſe, and accurate judgment, 'that nothing may paſs but what is exact and ju'dicious. It is to have the power of reſiſting the 'temptation we naturally have to diſcover our wit '... It is to leave room for thoſe who read hiſtory, 'to imagine what ought not always to be ſaid. 'Laſtly, It is well to underſtand how to avoid con'tradictions, and to lay down probabilities in all 'that is ſaid. And this judicious ſpirit, this cha'racter of wiſdom which hiſtory requires, is a kind 'of watchfulneſs over one's ſelf; which allows of 'no exaggaration, and uſes continual precaution 'againſt thoſe bold imaginations to which a man is 'ſubject, when he has a wit too bright, or too luxu'riant; to the end that he may expreſs great mat'ters in a few words, as Salluſt does.' Father Rapin does not ſtop here, but he adds further, 'That Mariana 'is one of the moſt accompliſhed writers among the 'modern hiſtorians, becauſe he is one of the plain'eſt (23) That nothing gives the hiſtory of Mariana ſo 'much of that air of grandeur it hath, as the art of this 'author in bringing into it, by way of digreſſion, 'all the conſiderable things that have paſſed in the 'world, all that's admirable in the fabulous times; all 'that was remarkable in Greece, in Sicily, in the 'Roman empire; a particular account of the repub'lic of Carthage, which is no where better done 'than there; the ſieges of Saguntus and Numantia; 'the paſſage of Hannibal into Italy; the ſucceſſion 'of the emperors; the birth of Chriſtianity; the 'preaching of the goſpel; the conqueſt of the Ara'bians, and many other great tranſactions. He is a 'genius who treats of nothing but great matters, which 'always have ſome relation to the hiſtory of Spain. 'Upon which account never did any hiſtorian do 'ſo much honour to his country by any work; 'for he has attributed to his nation the greateſt 'actions that have ever been done in the world (24). 'Among the moderns, continues Father Rapin (25). 'I find Mariana, Davila, and Fra Paolo admirable 'for hiſtory. Mariana had the talent of thinking, 'and expreſſing nobly what he thought and ſaid, 'and of imprinting a character of greatneſs upon any 'thing he conſidered .... (26) None of the moderns 'exceeds Mariana, either for the greatneſs of his de'ſign, or the nobleneſs of his ſtile. He is more exact 'than others, and judges ſolidly of every thing.' Let us add to ſo many encomiums, not what is ſaid by another Jeſuit in favour of Mariana (27), but what a Proteſtant ſays of him. 'Inter Latinos omnibus 'palmam præripit Johannes Mariana Hiſpanus, re'rum Hiſpanicarum cognitione nemini ſecundus. Va'luit vero Mariana inſigni eloquentia, prudentia, & 'magna libertate dicendi: hinc & libertatis ſtudioſiſſi'mus in Reges ſuos ſæpe eſt mordax (28). ----- 'Amongſt all the Latin writers of hiſtory Johannes Ma'riana may be reckoned the chief, being inferior to none 'in the knowledge of the Spaniſh affairs. Mariana 'was a perſon of mighty eloquence, prudence, and great 'liberty of ſpeech: Hence it was that he is often very 'ſevere upon his own kings.'

(23) Rapin, Ibid. num. 5, pag. 236.

(24) Ibid. num. 22, pag. 280.

(25) Ibid. num. 26, pag. 293.

(26) Ibid. ſub fin. pag. 305.

(27) Quid Mariani gravem & decoram conſtructionem, ſonantia verba, ſplendorem, narrandique ſublimitatem, copioſum ingenium in non impari materia, quæ ætas non reverebitur? Clarus Bonarſcius, in Amphitheatro, honoris, lib. ii, cap. xiii, pag. m. 192.

How excellent ſoever this book of Mariana be, yet it has ſeveral faults which have been partly cenſured by a ſecretary of the Conſtable of Caſtile. This cenſurer calls himſelf Pedro Mantuano. He publiſhed his critical remarks at Milan in 4to, in 1611 (29), and intituled them Advertencias à la Hiſtoria de Juan de Mariana. He was then but twenty ſix years of age. Thomas Tamaius de Vargas, who anſwered in behalf of Mariana, relates a thing that is very wonderful; which is, that Mariana would never caſt his eyes upon the work of his cenſurer, nor on that of his apologiſt; tho' this latter offer'd him his MS. before he gave it to the Printer, and deſired him to correct it. Noluiſſe Marianam legere, nec Mantuani cenſuram, nec Tamaji amiciſſimi capitis apologiam, etiam ante editionem ſibi ab authore ad pervidendum, & emendandum oblatam, quod credet vix poſteritas (30). There was publiſhed in the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, at p. 139, of the month of November 1693, the deſign of a French tranſlation of Mariana, with good notes. The public ought to wiſh they may quickly enjoy this work. There was printed in Holland, in 1694, a chronological abridgment of the Hiſtory of Spain, taken chiefly from Mariana, which is attributed to a gentlewoman of Rouen (31), now a Refugee in England for her religion.

(28) Herm. Conringius de regno Hiſpan. apud Pope Blount, Cenſura Autorum, pag. 614.

(29) And ſince at the Royal Printing-houſe an edition more correct. Nicol. Anton. ubi infra, Tom. ii, pag. 170.

(30) Nicol. Anton. Bibliot. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. i, pag. 561.

(31) Called Madam de la Roche.

[E] His treatiſe of the alteration of coin (32) brought him into trouble at the court of Spain.] Alegambe only tells us, that this work diſcovered the frauds of the times, and that at the requeſt of the ambaſſador of Spain, it was ſtopped by Paul V, but that the ſequel ſhewed, that Mariana being perſecuted for this book, was a lover of juſtice and truth. 'In tractatu 'de Monetæ mutatione cum acrius corruptelam ſui 'temporis perſtrinxiſſet, gravem in ſe concivit pro'cellam; & tractatus ipſe poſtulante Catholici Regis 'Oratore, à Summo Pontifice Paulo V tantiſper ſu'penſus fuit, donec invidia & cum ea tempeſtas con'quievit; docueruntque poſteriora tempora veri recti'que amantem fuiſſe Marianam (33). ---- He occa-

(32) It was printed in folio, at Cologne in 1609, with ſix other treatiſes of Mariana.

(33) Alegambe, pag. 258, col. 2.

(17) The thirty books with the Appendix are in the edition of Mentz, 1605, in 4to.

(18) At Madrid in 1616, and 1600, in folio, & alibi Nicol. Anton. ubi infra.

(19) See Nicolas Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hiſpan. Tom. i, pag. 560.

(20) See the remark [D] of the article BONFADIUS, and the remark [E] of the article HAILLAN.

(21) Rapin, Reflexions on Hiſtory, num. 3, pag. m. 232.

(22) Ibid. pag. 230.

* Delectus verborum habendus & pondera ſingulorum examinanda. Fab. lib. x, cap. iii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google related by Mr Varillas [F]: but there had been more reaſon to moleſt him upon the account of another book, which Spain and Italy ſuffered to go abroad, and which was burnt at Paris by a decree of the parliament, becauſe of the pernicious doctrine it contained. There is nothing more ſeditious, nor more capable of expoſing kingdoms to frequent revolutions, and even the lives of princes to the knife of aſſaſſins, than this book of John Mariana [G]. It expoſed the Jeſuits, and chiefly in France, to a thouſand bloody

' ſtirred unto himſelf great troubles, by having ſeverely in-
' veighed againſt the corruptions of his own time, in a trea-
' tiſe upon the alteration of the coin; and the treatiſe itſelf
' was kept from being publiſhed, at the deſire of the
' ambaſſador of the Catholic king, by Pope Paul V, till
' ſuch time as the malice of his enemies, and the conſe-
' quences of it were over; and the times following made
' it appear, that Mariana had been a lover of truth
' and juſtice.' Nicolas Antonio in ſome reſpects ſpeaks more generally, tho' he declares, that the chief miniſters of ſtate accuſed Mariana of having cenſured the government. ' Nec tamen, ſays he (34), vir tot me-
' ritis ad famæ immortalitatem nitens effugere valuit
' læväe famæ diſcrimina, interpretantibus quædam ejus
' ſcripta principibus in Curia viris tanquam iniqua exer-
' teque injurioſa ſibi ipſis, ac publicæ adminiſtrationi.
' Cujus rei nomine ſolemniter accuſatus non niſi poſt
' agitatam diu cauſam ægreque ſtatui priſtino fuit re-
' ſtitutus. - - - - Nor could he, tho' a man that was
' ſtriving by his merits to attain an immortal fame, eſcape
' the danger of infamy, the prime nobility of the court
' blaming ſome of his writings as falſe and injurious to
' themſelves, and the adminiſtration of the government:
' upon which account he was accuſed in form, and was
' not, but, after a tedious defence of his cauſe, reſtored to
' his former eſtate.' But here is an author who ſpeaks out more clearly: he aſſures us, that Mariana diſcovered ſo plainly the waſting of the treaſury, by ſhowing the robberies that were committed in the coining of money, that the duke of Lerma, who found himſelf plainly pointed at, could not reſtrain his anger. It was not difficult for him to vex the author, becauſe king Philip III was clearly cenſured in this work, as a lazy prince, who left the great affairs of his kingdom to the diſcretion of his miniſters. Princes who are much governed by a Favourite, are eaſily provoked againſt thoſe, who expoſe them to public contempt by a juſt and free cenſure of this ſlavery. Mariana was caſt into priſon, and did not come out till a year was expired; but the event ſhowed that he was not miſtaken, in foretelling, that the abuſes which he reproved, would throw Spain into great confuſion. The writer who gives an account of this is called Bernardin Giraldus, whom I have cited once before. ' Quarum
' (Diſſertationum) una fuit, (ſays he 35) de Monetæ
' mutatione in Hiſpania, quâ quidem fraudes, & im-
' poſturæ Miniſtrorum Regiorum Monetas publicas
' adulterantium detegebantur, oſcitantia, & dormita-
' tio Philippi III, Regis Catholici perſtringebatur, in-
' gentia denique damna in univerſam Hiſpaniam ex
' improbiſſimo Regiorum peculatu certo exoritura præ-
' nuntiabantur: quem librum qui legat, & hodiernum
' Hiſpaniæ ſtatum non ignoret, abeſſe haudquaquam
' poſſit, quin Marianam divinum hominem fuiſſe ag-
' noſcat (qui ea, quæ hodie Hiſpania experitur mala,
' tanto ante ut vates occinerit) vel certe prudentiam
' genus divinationis eſſe intelligat. Verum vehementer
' ea res Lermæum Ducem, Regiæ Hiſpanicæ Sejanum,
' pupugit: quippe qui fundi Hiſpanici calamitas eſſet,
' ſeque à Mariana deſignari ſatis intelligeret. Homi-
' nem ergo in vincula poſcit, in iiſque annum verten-
' tem amplius continet. - - - Of which Diſſertations,
' one was (ſays he) concerning the alteration of the coin
' in Spain, wherein the frauds and impoſtures of the mi-
' niſtry in adulterating the current money were expoſed,
' and the negligence and indolence of Philip III was cen-
' ſured, and, in fine, the great miſchiefs to the whole king-
' dom, from the moſt unjuſt robberies of the public by the ' courtiers were foretold: which book whoever reads, and
' is not unacquainted with the preſent ſtate of Spain, muſt
' needs acknowledge that Mariana (who could, ſo long before
' they happened, foretel the evils which Spain at this day
' labours under) was a true prophet, or at leaſt that
' prudence is a kind of prophetic ſpirit. This affair did
' vehemently exaſperate the duke of Lerma, the Sejanus of
' the Spaniſh court: he being the cauſe of the miſeries of
' that kingdom, and well knowing that he was the perſon
' intended by Mariana. Wherefore he prevailed to have ' him put in priſon, where he detained him more than a
' year.'

[F] . . . . . and expoſed him to a puniſhment which is ill related by Mr Varillas.] This Hiſtorian pretends that Ribadeneira ' durſt not write in Spain under the ' reign of Philip II, what Charles V had contributed ' to oblige the court of Rome to proceed to the laſt ' extremities againſt Henry VIII. One muſt have as ' little knowledge of the court of Spain as Dr Burnet ' has, continues he, who knows not that the ſame ' Philip II baniſhed Mariana into Sicily for fifteen ' years, upon a leſs important occaſion than ' that of writing againſt Charles V, ſince it was ' only for writing a treatiſe about money, which ' did not ſo directly concern the majeſty of the Catholic kings, as the conduct of Charles V, with ' reſpect to Henry VIII (36).' There are three falſhoods in theſe words: I. Mariana was never baniſhed into Sicily; much leſs did this pretended baniſhment laſt fifteen years. II. Philip II was dead when this Jeſuit wrote about money. III. This treatiſe offended much more the king of Spain, who then reigned (37), than the book of Ribadeneira would have offended Philip II, if he had deſcribed in it the conduct of Charles V towards Henry VIII. I take no notice of the abſurdity that is in his remark upon Ribadeneira; this matter has been ſolidly refuted by the learned man who replied to him (38).

[G] There is nothing more ſeditious . . . . than this book of Mariana.] The title of it is, de Rege & Regis Inſtitutione, and it was printed at Toledo in the year 1598, with the king's licence, and the uſual approbations. The author having propoſed, in the ſixth chapter of the firſt book, to conſider whether it be lawful to kill a tyrant, enters on this ſubject with a narrative of the tragical end of Henry III. He admires the courage of James Clement, and ſays, there were different opinions about the action of this young monk: ſome commended it, and thought it worthy of immortality; others blamed it, becauſe they were of opinion, that it is never lawful for a meer private man to kill a prince declared king by the nation, and anointed with the ſacred oil according to cuſtom, altho' this prince becomes a wicked man, and a tyrant. De facto monachi non una opinio fuit, multis laudantibus atque immortalitate dignum judicantibus: vituperant alii prudentiæ & eruditionis laude præſtantes, fas eſſe negantes cuiquam privata auctoritate Regem conſenſu populi renunciatum, ſacroque oleo de more delibutum ſanctumque adeo perimere, ſit ille quamvis perditis moribus, atque in tyrannidem degenerarit (39). We may clearly perceive, that Mariana is one of thoſe who approved the action of James Clement; for he rejects the principle, upon which wiſe and learned men condemned it. Beſides, he affects to extol the courage and undaunted ſteddineſs of this aſſaſſin, without dropping one word that tends to render him odious to the reader. This obſervation does admirably diſcover the whole venom of the doctrine of this Jeſuit; for it is certain, that he only begins with the example of Henry III, that he might deſcend from the theſis to the hypotheſis, and to ſhow the people a notable caſe of tyranny, that ſo at all times, when they ſhould find themſelves in the like condition, they might think that their circumſtances did warrant them to make uſe of the knife againſt their monarchs. But if it be once lawful to do this, when people live under ſuch a prince as Henry III, I know not what monarchs ought not to fear that they ſhall be aſſaſſinated or dethroned: for oftentimes the good and evil of two conditions are counterbalanced when they are compared together. If the faults of government are not the ſame as they were under Henry III, yet it will be ſaid, that all things duly conſidered, they are equal, and from thence people will conclude, that they are in the ſame condition which the Jeſuit has deſcribed. However let us go on with the explication of his ſyſtem.

(34) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. I, pag. 560.

(35) Bernardin. Giraldus Patavinus, pro Senatu Venetо apologia, ſive de juſtitia decreti, quo Senatus Venetus adoleſcentes dictoni ſuæ ſubditos ad Jeſuitarum ſcholas accedere interdixit: deque conditionibus quibus Jeſuitæ reditum ad Venetos vidcntur impetrare poſſe. This piece is in a collective intitled, Arcana Secretaria Jeſu, printed at Geneva in 1635, in 8vo.

(36) Varillas's Anſwer to the Criticiſms of Dr Burnet, pag. 84, Dutch Edit.

(37) See, in the preceding remark, the words of Bernard. Giraldus.

(38) See the Defence de la Critique de Mr Varillas, pag. 65.

(39) Mariana, de Rege & Regis Inſtitutione, lib. I, cap. VI, pag. m. 54.

Mariana

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google bloody reproaches [H], and to very mortifying insults, which are repeated every day, and

Mariana relates the reasons of those who blamed James Clement, that is to say, according to him, the reasons of those, who teach, that every one must patiently submit to the tyrannical yoke of his lawful sovereign; and before he answers them (40), he produces the arguments of the contrary party, built upon this fundamental principle, that the authority of the people is superior to that of kings (41). This is his beloved position, for proof of which he spends two whole chapters (42). Having alledged the reasons of each party, he declares, I, That according to the opinions of Divines and Philosophers, a prince who, by main force, and without the general consent of the people, is possessed of the sovereign power, is one whom every private person has a right to kill: 'Perimi à quocunque, vita & principatu spoliari 'posse (43). . . . . May be killed by any one, and de- 'prived of his life and crown.' II. That if a prince, who is lawfully created, or who is a lawful successor to his ancestors, overturns the religion, and public laws, without hearkening to the remonstrances of the nation, he must be made away by the safest and surest method. III. That the shortest and surest way of doing it, is to assemble the States, and in this assembly to depose him, and there to order that an army be raised against him, if it be necessary for removing his tyranny. IV. That such a prince may be lawfully put to death, and that each private person, who shall have the courage to attempt to kill him, has a right to do it (44). V. That if an assembly of the States cannot be held, and it appears nevertheless to be the will of the people that the tyrant should be dispatched, there is no private person but may lawfully kill this prince, to satisfy the desire of the people; 'Qui votis publicis favens eum perimere tentavit, 'haud quaquam inique eum feciste existimabo (45). 'He who to accomplish what is wished by the people, 'shall attempt to kill him, I shall not judge him to have 'acted at all unjustly.' VI. That the judgment of a private person, or of many, is not sufficient; but one must be governed by the voice of the people, and also consult grave and learned men (46). VII. That, indeed, it shows greater courage to rise up openly against the tyrant; but there is no less prudence to attack him secretly, and destroy him in the snares that are laid for him. Est quidem majoris virtutis & animi simultatem aperte exercere, palam in hostem reipublicæ irruere: sed non minoris prudentiæ, fraudi & insidiis locum captare, quod sine motu contingat minori certe periculo publico atque privato (47). He advises therefore, either that he should be attacked in his own palace with open force, or that a conspiracy should be formed against him; he will have it that open war, crafty devices, frauds, and treacheries, are equally lawful: and if the conspirators, adds he, are not killed in the attempt, they ought to be admired as heroes all their life-times: if they perish in it, then they fall victims acceptable to GOD and men, and their efforts deserve immortal praises. Aut in apertam vim prorumpitur seditione facta armisque publice sumptis . . . aut majori cautione, fraude & ex insidiis pereunt, uno aut paucis in ejus caput occulte conjuratis, suoque periculo reipublicæ incolumitatem redimere satagentibus. Quod si evaserint, instar magnorum Heroum in omni vita suspiciuntur: si secus accidat, grata superis, grata hominibus hostia cadunt, nobili conatu ad omnem posteritatis memoriam illustrati. Itaque aperta vi & armis posse occidi tyrannum, sive impetu in regiam facto, sive commissa pugna in confesso est. Sed & dolo atque insidiis exceptum (48). VIII. That altho' there seems to be no difference between an assassin who kills with the stab of a knife, and one who poisons; yet because Christianity has abrogated the laws of the Athenians, which ordered criminals to drink a poisoned cup; Mariana does not approve that a tyrant should be killed by poison mixed with his meat; but if any would make use of poison, he would have it applied to his cloaths, or to his saddle. Ergo me auctore neque noxium medicamentum hosti detur, neque lethale venenum in cibo & potu temperetur in ejus perniciem. Hoc tamen temperamento uti, in hac quidem disputatione licebit, si non ipse qui perimitur venenum haurire cogitur, quo intimis medullis concepto pereat: sed exterius ab alio adhibeatur nihil adjuvante eo qui perimendus est. Nimirum cum tanta vis est veneni, ut sella eo aut veste delibuta vim interficiendi habeat (49).

Such is the system of this Jesuit. The last part of it is very absurd; it is a ridiculous distinction: for he who drinks poison without knowing it, and believing it to be good food, does not any ways contract the guilt of those who destroy themselves; and yet to preserve a tyrant from so great a crime, Mariana would not have him made to drink or eat poison (50). Moreover, if it were true, that in drinking off the poison, without knowing of it, he would be guilty of his own death; he would be no less guilty in putting on a poisoned shirt: and yet Mariana makes no scruple to consent, that his cloaths should be poisoned, his saddles, or any other things which act from without upon the inward parts. I say therefore, that the eighth article of this Jesuit is unworthy of a man who understands reasoning; and I am surprized, that a man who had so much good sense, and so much Logic, should trifle so childishly. Abating this, many people are persuaded, that his system is finely contrived, that the parts of it are well connected together, and that he proceeds naturally from one consequence to another. Suppose once say they, that a king holds of the people, as being his supreme judge, and that he is accountable to them, all the rest will follow of course. And therefore the author who refuted Mariana, laid down a principle quite opposite to this, viz. That Sovereign princes depend only upon GOD, to whom alone it belongs to call them to an account (51): I shall not enter upon the discussion of this question; but shall only observe, that as the doctrines of Mariana are very destructive of the public good: it had been better that he had argued inconsequently, than to follow, like a good Logician, the consequences of his principle. See above remark [δ] of the article LOYOLA.

[H] It exposed the Jesuits . . . . . to a thousand bloody reproaches.] The Catholics and Protestants thundred upon them, out-vying one another, upon occasion of these doctrines of Mariana, and chiefly after the execrable attempt of Ravaillac: for it was said, that the reading of Mariana had inspired this cruel assassin with the infamous design of stabbing Henry IV. Wherefore Father Coton published a letter which he wrote to Mary de Medicis, the widow of that prince, wherein he quotes some famous Jesuits who taught the contrary to what Mariana had maintained: he did more, for he asserted, that the book of this Spanish Jesuit was condemned in 1606, in one of their congregations. I shall set down his own words (52). 'Such 'therefore being the judgment, and such the decrees 'of these grave and eminent doctors of our society; 'how can the private opinion of Mariana prejudice the 'reputation of the whole order, which, according 'to it's institution, being extreamly careful of holding fast the holy ordinances of the church, and respectful to the power and authority of kings, who 'as to temporals depend upon GOD only, has of a 'long time disowned the rashness of a bold pen, and 'particularly in the provincial congregation of France, 'held in this city of Paris, in 1606, wherein, moreover, the reverend Father Claudius Aquaviva, general of our society, was requested, that those who 'had written to the prejudice of the crown of France, 'should be restrained, and their books suppressed; 'which the said reverend Father did afterwards very 'carefully and exactly, being very sorry, that, thro' 'inadvertency, in his absence, and without his having 'seen the work, they had made use of his approbation. The words which he used in his answer are 'these (53): we have approved the judgment and 'the care of your congregation, and are very 'much troubled, that this was not perceived before 'the printing of such books; which however we 'have commanded forthwith to be corrected, and 'we will take most diligent care for the future, 'that such things shall not happen. One copy of 'Mariana would scarce be found now, were it not for 'the pernicious liberality of the heirs of Wechelius, 'who are known to be of the pretended reformed religion, and who printed it at their own charges, not 'out of any desire to serve the public, as may be 'easily presumed, but from a particular design to

'prejudice

(40) He refutes them at the end of this sixth chapter.

(41) A republica, unde ortum habet regia potestas, rebus exigentibus Regem in jus vocari posse, & si fanitatem respuat principatu spoliari, neque ita in Principem jura potestatis transtulit, ut non sibi majorem reservarit potestatem. Mariana, ubi supra, pag. 57.

(42) The eighth and ninth of the first book.

(43) Ibid. pag. 58.

(44) Principem publicum hostem declaratum ferro perimere, eademque facultas esto cuicunque privato, qui spe impunitatis abjecta, neglecta salute in conatum juvandi rempublicam ingredi voluerit. Ibid. pag. 60.

(45) Id. ib.

(46) Neque enim id in cujusquam privati arbitrio ponimus, non in multorum, nisi publica vox populi adsit, viri eruditi & graves in consilium adhibentur. Id. ib.

(47) Ibid. cap. vii, pag. 65.

(48) Ib. pag. 64.

(49) Ibid. pag. 67.

(50) Crudele existimarunt, atque à Christianis moribus alienum, quantumvis flagitiis coopertum eo adigere hominem, ut sibi ipsi manus afferat pugione in viscera adacto, aut lethali veneno in cibo aut potu temperato. Perinde enim est, neque minus humanitatis legibus, jurique naturæ contrarium: quo in vitam suam sævire vetatur omnibus. Negamus ergo hostem, quem fraude dedimus perimi posse, veneno interfici jure. Mariana, ibid. pag. 66.

(51) Rousel, in chap. xvii of his Anti-Mariana.

(52) Coton, Letter declaratory of the Doctrine of the Jesuits, pag. 8, 9.

(53) See the following remark.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and will never be ended; which historians will in passion transcribe one from another; and

'prejudice our society.' As to what concerns Ravaillac's reading of Mariana, it is asserted in the same letter, that the parliament knew 'by the repeated deposition 'of this wretch, that Mariana contributed nothing to 'the execrable parricide, and could not influence him, 'since the wretch had not sufficient knowledge of 'the language wherein his book was written. Which 'discovers, adds Father Coton, the uncharitable intention of those who go on still to say, that he had 'it all by heart (54).' In another book Father Coton repeats and inforces this. 'The Heretics of France, 'says he (55), will have Mariana to have induced Ravaillac to give that unhappy and execrable blow, as 'having learned his book by heart. To which it 'will be replied a hundred times, on peril of honour 'and life, that Ravaillac did never see nor read it, 'and did never so much as hear the name of Mariana, except when he was asked whether he had read 'his book; and he answered no, and that he did not 'know what it was; witness the reverend Father 'Coëffeteau, witness also the verbal process which 'was made of the matter: from whence we may infer what shameless calumny will do; for there being 'nothing more false than to say, that this wretch saw 'even the cover of Mariana's book frequently, yet 'some of the common people will believe, by hearing 'it reported, that he knew it by heart, from one end 'to the other, as has been said. I will add, that 'tho' Ravaillac had read it, yet it is most false that 'Mariana taught the murder and parricide this wretch 'committed; which yet in this place and through his 'whole book the calumniator endeavours to persuade. 'Nay, in some respect, it were to be wished, that 'Ravaillac, had read Mariana in case he could have 'understood him; for Mariana teaches expressly, as 'Gretserus shows, that a lawful prince ought not to 'be killed by a private person upon his own private authority.' Father Coton is mistaken, the book of Mariana was very fit to inspire one with the attempt of assassinating Henry IV, for that Jesuit says, that the action of James Clement was good, and that if the voice of the people, and the counsel of some learned men concur to declare that the prince oppresses religion, a private person may kill him. By joining these two things together, we may conclude the justice of assassinating Henry IV. For if Henry III, a Catholic, to the highest degree, was an oppressor of catholicism, because he laboured for the rights of an heretical prince who was to be his successor, one may believe in general, that every prince who is favourable to Heretics designs to oppress religion. Now if it be lawful to kill an oppressor of religion, it is lawful doubtless to kill him who has a mind to oppress it as soon as he can: for prudence will not permit that we should suffer evil to encrease till it be come to such a height that it is difficult to put a stop to it; but we ought to prevent it and attack it whilst it is weak. Besides, by the voice of the people we must not understand the judgment of all private persons; it is sufficient that in every city there are several persons who join their voices for certain things. Now it is past all doubt, that the kingdom was full of people who suspected that Henry IV had a mind to make the Reformed religion triumphant as soon as he could, and that he undertook a war against the house of Austria only upon this prospect. Thus Ravaillac reasoning upon the principles of Mariana, and joining to them, according to custom, a sense of accommodation, might very well believe, that he had no less a right than James Clement. There were but too many learned men, and in his judgment very prudent, who confirmed him in his pernicious design, and that for the good of religion. See in the remark [K] his answer to them who asked him why he had committed this assassination, and remember that he declared before the judges, that his 'resolution 'to kill the king was because that prince had not 'endeavoured (as he had power) to reduce those of the 'pretended Reformed religion, to the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman church (56), and because he had 'heard that the king intended to make war against 'the Pope, and translate the holy see to Paris (57); 'for making war against the Pope, said he (58), was 'to make war against GOD, in as much as the Pope 'was GOD, and GOD was the Pope.'

(54) Coton, Letter declaratory, pag. 13.

(55) Apologetical Answer to the Anti-Coton, pag. 30.

(56) The French Mercury, Tom. i, fol. 440. See also fol. 442, verso.

(57) Ibid. fol. 442, verso.

(58) Ibid. fol. 443.

A Catholic writer, who refuted the declaratory letter written by Father Coton, in a book intituled Anti-Coton (59), informs me of some things which deserve a place here. 'This book of 'Mariana, says he (60), having been first printed at 'Toledo, was brought into France about eight years 'ago, and presented to the king; and the seditious 'clauses of this book being represented to his majesty, 'he called for Father Coton and asked him, whether 'he approved of this doctrine. But the said Jesuit, 'who complies with occasions, and suits himself to 'the times, said, that he did not at all approve it. 'According to which answer, his majesty, by the 'advice of Monsieur Servin his advocate general, 'commanded Coton to write against it; but he excused himself, knowing very well, that he could 'not write against it without contradicting the general of the order, and the provincial of Toledo, 'and a great body of Jesuits who had approved this 'book. And now he sees that by the death of 'this king, the Jesuits are loaded with an universal hatred, and that he is urged by the court of parliament, 'and by the Sorbonne, he has written an epistle declaratory, wherein he condemns Mariana, but in 'terms so soft and doubtful, that it plainly appears he 'is afraid of offending him, saying only, that it is the 'rashness of a bold pen, whereas he ought to have accused the person of Heresy, and perfidious and barbarous treason, and the doctrine of impiety and enmity to GOD and men. And if he had reproved 'Mariana, as he deserves, it had been too late; but 'he should have written when the king commanded 'him, and not have suffered this opinion to take root 'in the minds of the people, which cost the king 'his life a few years after.' Father Coton found eight lyes in this narrative. See his apologetical answer to the Anti-Coton (61). For the rest, if the Jesuits of France were troubled upon the account of their brother Mariana, those of Germany had likewise a share in this storm, as appears by the apology which James Gretserus was obliged to publish (62). Let us add this passage of Conringius. 'Prodiit & alius ejus '(Marianæ) libellus de Institutione Regis, multa præclara continens, in quo liberrime judicat quo modo 'Reges instituendi sunt: Non dubitavit autem & aperte quoque docere, si Rex vel anathemate tactus, 'vel excommunicatus, ac nonnihil recessit à Romana 'Ecclesia, licere in illum gladio, igne scilicet animadvertere. Ea tamen pietate videri voluit, ut dixerit 'Regem veneno tolli non licere, quasi vero. Combustus vero hic est liber ob talem horrendam doctrinam Parisiis, & coacti fuere Jesuitæ dissensum profiteri. Non dubitavit & Mariana Sicarium Henrici 'quarti Regis Galliæ inter Sanctos memorare (63). 'Another little treatise of (Mariana) was published, intituled de Institutione Regis, containing many remarkable things, wherein he very freely gives his judgment how kings are to be instructed: and makes no scruple, to affirm, that, if a king is either excommunicated, or hath at all differed from the church of 'Rome, it is lawful to destroy him, yet he would appear so pious forsooth, as to say, that it is unlawful 'to poison him. This book, for such execrable doctrine, 'was burnt at Paris, and the Jesuits were obliged to disown it. Mariana did not hesitate to reckon amongst 'the saints, the assassin of Henry IV king of France.' I think that Conringius commits two mistakes: Mariana did not affirm that it is is lawful to kill a prince who departs never so little from the Romish communion, or who is meerly excommunicated: and since his book was printed above ten years before the death of Henry IV, he could not mention Ravaillac in it. If he had spoken of this monster in other books, as of a saint, doubtless this had been objected to the Jesuits, every time that the seditious maxims of Mariana were represented to them, since the impression of those other books; but I do not think that it was ever done. There has always been a great difference put between Ravaillac and James Clement. The latter had some persons that publickly approved him, nay, some that commended him highly; but the other never had any such that I know of. The reason of this is plain, Henry III was excommunicated when he was killed; but Henry IV had been for a long

(59) This work was falsly ascribed to the minister Peter du Moulin.

(60) Anti-Coton printed in 1610, pag. 22, 23.

(61) Pag. m. 3. See also the answer of Eudæmon Johannes, to the Anti-Coton, pag. 54.

(62) See his Vindiciæ pertilio Hæreticæ Politicus. Father Coton speaks of it in his Letter Declaratory, pag. 7, and in his Apologetical Answer, pag. 33.

(63) Herman. Conring. de regno Hispan. apud Pope Blount, Censura Autorum, pag. 614.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and which appear the more plauſible, becauſe the book was printed with good approbations [I]. It was affirmed that Ravaillac took from it the abominable deſign he executed againſt the life of Henry IV, and that he confeſſed it in his anſwer to his interrogatories.

a long time reconciled to the Pope when he was killed.

Let us upon this occaſion make a critical remark upon Mr Seckendorf. He pretends that the doctrine of Mariana conſiſts in this, that a meer private perſon, being excited either by his own zeal or the Pope's orders, may attempt the Life of an heretical king. (64) Seckendorf, Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 332. num. 68. Dudum quoque, male audiit, ſays he (64), Jeſuitarum Societas propter doctrinam Joh. Marianæ, itidem Jeſuitæ Hiſpani, aliorumque, qui ſtatuerunt, licitum, immo laudabile eſſe, ſi quis, privatus licet aut ſubditus, Regem aut Principem hæreticum, mandato Pontificis, vel etiam ex zelo religionis quovis modo è medio tollat. But it is certain that Mariana laid down his poſition in general terms, and ſaid nothing in particular, either of heretical princes, or the permiſſions and diſpenſations of the court of Rome; his maxims reſpect all nations and all tyrants: he excludes not from his rules the Proteſtants, who ſhould live under a tyrannical government; he excludes not from them the Mahometans nor the Pagans: he treats this queſtion altogether as Ariſtotle would have done; neither do I ſee in what Milton, and ſuch like writers, who are ſo numerous, can blame the hypotheſis of this Spaniard, unleſs they ſhould condemn the preamble which he made uſe of in favour of James Clement: but this preamble is not exactly his doctrine; it denotes only by way of conſequences, the application the author would make of his maxims (65).

(65) See what has been ſaid above, in the remark [G]; and note, that James Gretſer has ſhown, that there are books more pernicious than that of Mariana. See alſo the book intituled, A Collection of Pieces concerning the Romiſh Doctrine and Practices of depoſing kings, and the Deſtruction of their Life and State which enſues. Printed at Geneva, 1627, pag. 251, & ſeq.

[I] . . . . . It was printed with good approbations.] Peter de Onna, provincial of the regulars for the redemption of captives, having read and examined it by order of the king of Spain, praiſed it and judged it worthy to be printed. The author obtained a licence of his Catholic majeſty for ten years. Stephen Hojeda, a Jeſuit, viſitor of the province of Toledo, and authorized by the general of the ſociety, permitted the impreſſion of the work, after he knew the good teſtimony which ſome learned and grave Jeſuits gave of it. The author of the Anti-Coton took advantage of this to aſcribe the doctrine of this author to the whole ſociety. And that you may know, ſays he (66), that this is not the opinion only of a few Jeſuits, in the frontiſpiece of Mariana's book, there is an approbation and permiſſion to print it, from the general of the order Aquaviva, and from Stephen Hoyeda, viſitor of the ſociety of JESUS, in the province of Toledo. Moreover, in the ſame permiſſion to print it, it is ſaid †, that before the permiſſion was granted, theſe books of Mariana were approved by learned and grave men of the order of the Jeſuits. From whence it follows, that though the general Aquaviva had been impoſed upon, (as Father Coton would make us believe, by forging letters at his pleaſure from this Aquaviva) yet the viſitor and Jeſuitical doctors, who examined the book before it was printed, could not be impoſed upon. I ſhall here add the anſwer of Father Coton, which contains ſomething very ſurprizing. The calumniator calls in queſtion the anſwer of the R. Father general Claudius Aquaviva; but the tenor of it, here inſerted in the margin ‡, will ſhow that I do not impoſe upon the reader as he does. And as to the doctors, of whom he makes ſo great a noiſe, who approved Mariana, they are no more than three; which is a much ſmaller number than that of thirty or forty, who have approved the thirteen or fourteen books of thoſe of our ſociety, who have taught and maintained the contrary to Mariana, agreeably to the council of Conſtance. And if the authority of the reverend Father General is to be alledged to this purpoſe, is it not more conſiderable in the permiſſion he gave to a great number of authors, to print the aforeſaid books, than in that ſingle permiſſion he gave to Mariana, which is nowobjected (67)?

(66) Anti-Coton, pag. m. 11, 12.

† Quippe approbatos prius à viris doctis & gravibus ex eodem noſtro ordine.

‡ Ad ea quæ Congregatio Provinciæ Franciæ proponenda cenſuit: reſpondeo, Probamus judicium ac ſtudium Congregationis: & ſane doluimus vehementer, ubi aliqua hujuſmodi poſt librorum tantum editionem obſervari cognovimus, & ſtatim emendari juſſimus, & in poſterum ut caveantur ſerio monuimus, ac monituri porro ſumus.

(67) Coton's Apologetical Anſwer, pag. 35, 36.

That which is ſurprizing in theſe words is, that Father Coton confeſſes, that the general Aquaviva approved the book of Mariana, and licenſed the impreſſion of it. But this does not appear at the beginning of this book, where we find only that the Father Viſitor, having a ſpecial commiſſion from the general, permits the book of Mariana to be printed. This proves only that the general Aquaviva had entruſted this viſitor with the office of permitting or forbidding the impreſſion of ſuch books as were written by the Jeſuits; in conſequence whereof this viſitor allowed that Mariana ſhould publiſh this book. But, this does not prove, that the general knew either that Mariana had written de inſtitutione principis, or that this book contained a pernicious doctrine. There are cenſors of books in all countries, who exerciſe this office by authority from the prince, or from the biſhops, &c. If they approve a Hereſy, does it follow that the prince, or the biſhop, from whom they received their commiſſion, does alſo approve that Hereſy? By no means, unleſs it be known, either that they communicated the MS to their maſter, before it was approved, or that their approbation was ratified by him. It is very ſtrange, that neither Father Coton, nor Father Richeome (68) did ever uſe this reaſon. Their brother Eudæmon Johannes had not ſuch a miſt before his eyes in this reſpect. See what he anſwers to the author of the Anti-Coton: ‘ p. 15. Affirmas ‘ Marianæ librum à Generali Societatis atque à Pro- ‘ vinciali Toletano approbatum fuiſſe: pag. 23. A- ‘ pologiam meam pro Henrico Garneto editam eſſe ‘ cum approbatione Præpoſiti Generalis. Utrumque ‘ mendacium eſt. Nam moderatores noſtri libros non ‘ recognoſcunt ipſi, ſed aliis tradunt recognoſcendos ; ‘ qui ſi eos probaverint, tum demum poteſtatem eden- ‘ di faciunt. . . . . Neque difficilis eſt forma diplo- ‘ matis, quod legitur in libro Marianæ, cujus edendi ‘ poteſtatem Generalis non fecit, ſed Viſitator, non, ‘ ut tu ſcribis Provincialis, cui partes in ea re ſuas Ge- ‘ neralis delegarat, ut ſi liber is deſignatis eam ad ‘ rem Theologis probaretur, imprimendi ejus facultа- ‘ tem dare poſſet (69). - - - You aſſirm that the book of ‘ Mariana hath been approved by the general of the ſocie- ‘ ty, and by the provincial at Toledo: pag. 23. that my ‘ defence of Henry Garnet was publiſhed with the appro- ‘ bation of the general. Both are falſe, for our gover- ‘ nors do not themſelves reviſe books, but deliver them to ‘ others to be examined; by whom, if approved, they are ‘ allowed to be publiſhed. . . . . Nor was it difficult to ‘ obtain the licence, which is prefixed to Mariana's book ‘ which was not given by the general, but the viſitor ‘ (not the provincial, as you ſay) whom the general ‘ had deputed, that, if the book had been approved by the ‘ examiners, he might give leave for it's publication.’ The true way of rendring Aquaviva an accomplice to the abominable doctrine of Mariana, would be to prove that after he knew what his ſubdelegate or commiſſary had licenſed, he was content with it, and he conſented that Mariana ſhould leave in his book all that was in it. But the Jeſuits took care not to be catched this way: they acquainted the public (70), that their father-general, being advertiſed by Richeome in 1599, and by their Fathers in France, ordered that the book of Mariana ſhould be corrected, and the public never had ſeen, ſay they (71), any copy without correction, had not the Heretics, who thought it would be for their advantage, preſently re-printed it. They publiſhed a fragment of Aquaviva's letter upon this occaſion (72), and alſo the general order he ſent to all the colleges of the Jeſuits, wherein he forbids them to publiſh and teach any doctrine, which tends any wiſe to the ruin of ſovereigns (73). ‘ Præpoſitus Generalis cum de Maria- ‘ næ libro à Patribus Provinciæ Franciæ accepiſſet, ‘ reſpondit; Primum collaudare ſe ſtudium, judicium- ‘ que, Provinciæ; deinde ægerrime tuliſſe, quod libri ii ‘ ante emiſſi eſſent, quam ejus rei quicquam ad ſe defer- ‘ retur. Cæterum, & ubi primum rem accepiſſet, man- ‘ daſſe uti corrigeretur, & ſedulo daturum operam, ne ‘ quid ejuſmodi in poſterum accideret. Neque eo con- ‘ tentus (cogit enim me importunitas tua eſſerre in ‘ vulgus ea, quæ Societatis legibus vulgari non opor- ‘ teret) decretum etiam addidit vehemens & grave; ‘ ne quis è noſtris hominibus aut publice quicquam ‘ ſcriberet, doceretve; aut privatim conſilii cuiquam ‘ daret, quod in principum perniciem ulla ratione ‘ vergeret. Quod, quia vulgandi ejus Præpoſitus Ge- ‘ neralis mihi poteſtatem fecit, ipſis ejus verbis ad- ‘ ſcribam (74). - - - - The general, when he heard of ‘ Mariana's book, from the Fathers of the province of ‘ France, anſwered; that in the firſt place he commended

(68) Richeome, a categorical examination of the libel Anti-Coton, chap. xix, pag. 168, 169.

(69) Eudæmon Joannes, in Confutatione Anti-Cotoni, pag. 52.

(70) Richeome, ubi ſupra, pag. 163.

(71) Id. ib.

(72) See, above, citations (53), and ‡.

(73) Eudæmon Joannes, in the confutation of Anti-Coton, cap. i, pag. 39.

(74) After this we ſee in the book of Eudæmon Joannes, the decree of the general of the Jeſuits.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gatories. This was publickly contradicted [K]. Another treatise of the same Jesuit has made a great noise. It is that wherein he discovers the faults in the government of his society [L]; but his brethren do not acknowledge that he is the author of such a book [M]. His scholia upon the Scripture have deserved the approbation of Father

' mended their care, and judgment, but was exceedingly displeased that this book had been published before he was acquainted with that affair. But, that so soon as he had been informed of it, he gave orders that it should be corrected; and that he would take care that no such thing should happen for the future. Nor with this was he satisfied, (for your importunity forces me to utter those things, which, by the rules of the society, ought to be kept from the knowledge of the vulgar) but made a strict and severe decree; that none of our fraternity, should either publickly write or teach, or privately advise, what might in any manner tend to the destruction of princes. Which, because the general hath given me leave, I will subjoin in his own words.' See the reflexions which are made upon all this by George Hornius, professor at Leyden (75).

(75) In Dissertation. Histor. & Politic. pag. 116, & seq.

[K] It was affirmed that Ravaillac took from it . . . and that he confessed it in his answer to his interrogatories. This was publickly contradicted.] The passages of Father Coton related in the remark [H] are a sufficient proof of this text; nevertheless I will add something to them. The interrogatories of Ravaillac are in the Mercure François (76) but not a word of Mariana. We find that the two days he was kept at the Hotel de Raiz, he answered to those who asked what moved him to this attempt? ' The sermons which I have ' heard, by which I learned the causes for which it was ' necessary to kill the king. Likewise, as to the question, ' whether it was lawful to kill a tyrant; he knew all ' the evasions and distinctions about it, and it was easy ' to perceive, that he had been carefully instructed in ' this matter; for in all other points of Theology he was ' ignorant and wicked, sometimes saying a thing, and ' sometimes denying it?' This is no proof that he had read Mariana's book; for he might have learned either by word of mouth, or by reading several other books, whether printed, or in MS, all the principles of this Spanish Jesuit. It is very possible that this propositon may be true, Such an one knows perfectly the maxims of Mariana, and yet he knows not that there was such an author as Mariana. To prove therefore that Ravaillac had read this Jesuit's book, there must be stronger reasons than this, he knew the doctrine of this writer; there must be other arguments than this passage of the Mercure François (77). ' The day of this exe- ' cution (78), because Ravaillac in all his answers to ' the questions which the archbishop of Aix, the ' preacher Coëffeteau, and several others put to him ' during his imprisonment, about the parricide he had ' committed, helped himself out very subtly, by the ' maxims of Mariana, and others, who have written, ' That it is lawful to kill tyrants: Before they pro- ' ceeded to a new prohibition of such books, the ' court defired the consultation of the faculty of The- ' ology, and enjoyned the dean and syndic, &c." Note, That altho' they had been most certain, that the assassin had never read Mariana; yet the remonstrance might very reasonably be made to the Jesuits, which the abbot du Bois made to them from the pulpit. They complained of it to the queen, and accused this abbot: ' That during the octaves of ' the Holy Sacrament, when he preached at St ' Eustachius's church, in handling the question, whe- ' ther it is lawful to kill tyrants, and refuting the ' book of Mariana and others, he had made an ex- ' hortation to the Fathers Jesuits, That they should for ' the future take great care, that the author who might ' give offence to France, should come forth with the name ' of their society, and the approbation of their superiors, ' unless they had a mind designedly to expose themselves to ' dangers, which all their prudence, supported by the au- ' thority of their friends, could not avoid. These are ' the principal points of accusation, upon which they ' told the queen, that these words had almost excited ' an insurrection against the Jesuits. The bishop of ' Paris was ordered to examine the same abbot, who ' told him in his vindication, that it was neither enmity ' nor malice against the Jesuits, or others, that moved ' him to preach as he had done, but the dreadful ' horror and unspeakable grief he had for the sur- ' prising death of his very good master, and the pro- ' bability of danger to which the king and queen ' were exposed, as long as the cursed books of Ma- ' riana, and others, were spread among the people: ' which being understood by the bishop, he dismissed ' him, after he had given him a gentle admonition to ' live in amity with all the other servants of God, ' and chiefly with the Jesuits; and to continue to ' preach the obedience due to the king and queen, ' and to praise the high merits of the deceased ' king, without offending any body (79).'

(76) Tom. i, fol. 440, & seq.

(77) Mercure François, Tom. i, fol. 457.

(78) That is, of Ravaillac.

(79) Ibid. fol. 493.

[L] The book wherein he discovers the faults in the government of his society.] While the duke of Lerma detained him prisoner for the causes above mentioned (80), all his papers were rigidly examined by Francis Sosa, bishop of Osma, and counsellor of state, who had orders to destroy all the MSS he should find there, wherein the negligence of the king, and the tricks of the duke of Lerma were censured. This bishop found a book written with Mariana's own hand del Govierno de la Compania de Jesus, (of the government of the society of Jesus) wherein the author represented the deadly mischiefs wherewith the society was threatned, unless they corrected the faults in their government; concerning which he offered very good advices. The bishop of Osma made no scruple to give this MSS to his friends to read, and to permit them to take copies of it. Hence it came to pass, that this book fell into the hands of some person (81) who sent it into France, Germany, and Italy. A French Bookseller printed it not only in Spanish, which was the language of the original, but also in Latin, French, and Italian. As soon as it was carried to Rome, the Jesuit Floravanti, confessor to Urban VIII, read it and cryed out, Heu! heu! actum est de nobis Jesuitis, quando nimis vera sunt quæ liber hic cantat. Alas! alas! we Jesuits are undone, since it is too true what is said in this book. The general of the Jesuits spared no pains to obtain the condemnation of this book, which at last was granted in 1631 (82). The author I cite alledges some passages of this book of Mariana. You may find it intire in Spanish and French in the second tome of the Mercure Jesuite, printed at Geneva in 1630, and you may see the whole sixth chapter of it in the Arcana Societatis Jesu, printed at the same place in 1635. Father Alegambe could not pass over in silence this book of Mariana; which he mentions after this manner. ' Circumfertur præterea Hispanicè, Gallicè, Ita- ' licè, Latinè, excusus, Discursus de erroribus, qui ' in forma gubernationis Societatis Jesu occurrunt, constant ' 20 captibus. Burdigalæ per Joannem de Bordeos ' 1625, in 8vo, & alibi. Sed is clam illi subductus à ma- ' levolo quopiam ad conciliandam societati invidiam, ' extrusus in lucem est; adjectis etiam fortasse non pau- ' cis, ut prorsum est existimare, ab ipsius observationi- ' bus atque animo alienis (83). Moreover there is handed ' about, a discourse of the errors in the manner of the ' government of the society of Jesus, in Spanish, French, ' Italian, Latin, consisting of twenty chapters, printed at ' Bourdeaux by Johan. de Bordeos, in 8vo. 1625, and ' elsewhere. But being taken from him by stealth, by some ' malicious person, it was published to procure hatred to ' the society, with not a few additions, perhaps, as may ' readily be judged foreign to his observations and opinion.' ' Conringius is greatly mistaken, when he says that Mariana himself published the book. Tantam liber- ' tatem sibi assumpsit ut & libellum ediderit de membris ' (84) societatis, quem licet supprimerent Jesuitæ, ' tamen in media Roma editum esse constat: rarissimus ' hodie est inventu (85). - - - He assumed such liberty ' to himself, as to publish a small piece concerning ' errors of the society, which though suppressed by the ' Jesuits, yet it is known to have been published in Rome: ' it is rarely now to be found.' I can hardly believe that it was printed at Rome, though Conringius affirms it.

(80) In the remark [E].

(81) And particularly into the hands of Nicolas Ricardius, a Dominican, surnamed the Monster, upon the account of his great wit and learning. Bernardin Giraldus, ubi infra.

(82) Taken from Bernardin Giraldus, Apologia pro Senatu Veneto, pag. m. 104, & seq.

(83) Alegambe, pag. 258, col. 2.

(84) Perhaps it should be Moribus, or Morbis.

(85) Conringius, de Regno Hisp. apud Pope Blount, Cens. Autor. pag. 614.

[M] The Jesuits do not acknowledge that Mariana is the author of such a book.] This appears from the affair wherein they were concerned in 1697, which made a great noise. The archbishop of Reims published

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Father Simon [N]. I had forgot to obſerve, that his ſpeaking ill of Henry III, was partly the cauſe that his book of the Inſtitution of a Prince was condemned at Paris [O].

I queſtion

liſhed a very learned decree the 15th of July in that year, againſt two Theſes which had been maintained by the Jeſuits of Reims, and made uſe of the treatiſe of John Mariana, of ſuch things which require amendment (§ a) in the ſociety of the Jeſuits (86). He ſays (87), that the Spaniſh author, who lived in the time of the congregations de auxiliis, informs us of the ſad conſequences that followed, from the liberty which Molina, and ſo many others, took to publiſh their viſions . . . . . Marina ſays therefore in chap. 4. ‘ That from the liberty every one took in teaching his own opinions, there followed many contentions with the Dominicans, and he declares, that the Jeſuits had better have owned them for their maſters. He adds, That upon occaſion of a book which Father Molina wrote about Grace and Free-will, theſe Fathers were ſo much offended, that they had recourſe to the Inquiſition, and from thence to Rome, where he ſays, That at the time of his writing, the proceſs ſtill continued, and was managed with great obſtinacy and paſſion; and that though the Jeſuits ſhould come off victorious, which was very doubtful, yet it would coſt them many great ſums, beſides the vexation of many years.’ I paſs by the other extracts out of the ſame book, which are to be found in the decree of this prelate. But let us ſee the Jeſuits anſwer to him. They alledged at firſt two or three arguments, and then they proceeded after this manner (88). ‘ But, My Lord, without ſo much arguing, I ought to tell you, that this book did not deſerve the honour to be cited in a great archbiſhop’s Paſtoral Letter. This, is, in few words, the hiſtory of it, as it is related by our adverſaries, the truth of which I do not, however, pretend to vouch. This MSS, ſay they, was taken from Mariana, when he was put in priſon at Madrid, for another book he wrote about the alteration of coin, and wherewith the miniſters of Spain, and chiefly the duke of Lerma, were much offended. The thing happened in 1609, or 1610. By this it appears, that the enemies of the Jeſuits kept the MS for the ſpace of fifteen or ſixteen years; that is, during all the remainder of the life Mariana, who might have diſowned it, either as a ſuppoſititious or falſified book. It was not printed till 1625, immediately after the death of this Father, who died in 1624, being about ninety years of age. This ſingle circumſtance renders this book much ſuſpected, and ſome books have been accounted ſuppoſititious for weaker reaſons. It was printed only to defame our ſociety; and can it be doubted, that they did not at leaſt alter and add many things in it? But that which puts the cheat out of all doubt, is this, that the original was never produced, nor the place named where it was, although the Jeſuits at that time preſently complained of it as a forgery. In effect, the very place which is cited in the Paſtoral Letter, is ſo contrary to the notions of Mariana, in the matter de Auxiliis, that we muſt believe him mad, if we believe it to be his. For he is made to ſay in this place, that the Jeſuits had done better, as to the controverſy about Grace, ‡ to own the Dominicans for their maſters, than to contend with them. * And Mariana in his book intituled, De morte & immortalitate, which he wrote in the greateſt heat of theſe diſputes, as he himſelf obſerves, ſhowed ſo ſtrong a byaſs againſt the doctrine of the Thomiſts, that Molina himſelf could not have done more.’ See the margin (89).

[N] His ſcholia upon the Scripture have deſerved the approbation of Father Simon.] ‘ The ſcholia, or notes of Mariana, upon the Old Teſtament, may alſo be very uſeful for underſtanding the literal ſenſe of the Scripture, becauſe he chiefly applies himſelf to find out the proper ſignification of the Hebrew words. Thus at the beginning of Geneſis, he has judiciouſly obſerved, that the Hebrew word bara, which is commonly tranſlated to create, does not properly ſignify to make out of nothing, as is commonly believed; and that even the Greek and Latin authors, who invented the word to create, could not uſe it in this ſenſe, for as much as that which is now called creation, the production of a thing out of nothing, was altogether unknown to them. Although theſe notes are ſhort enough, yet he might have avoided ſome remarks, which ſerve only to ſhow his learning, and not to explain the text. Yet this ſort of digreſſions happen to him but ſeldom, and we may ſay, that Mariana is one of the ableſt and moſt judicious ſchollaſts that we have upon the Bible. It is true, that he had but a moderate knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew tongues; but the penetration of his wit, and his great application, ſupplied in ſome meaſure this want. He commonly made choice of the beſt ſenſe, neither is he tedious in the different interpretations he relates (90).’ In another book Father Simon ſays (91). ‘ As for Mariana, his notes upon the new teſtament are true ſcholia, wherein there appears no leſs judgment than learning . . . . (92) It were to be wiſhed, that the obſervations of this learned man had not been ſo ſhort. Nevertheleſs, he ſays much in a few words.’ See alſo what the ſame author (93) ſays about the book of Mariana for the vulgar edition.

[O] His ſpeaking ill of king Henry III, was partly the cauſe that his book of the Inſtitution of a Prince, was condemned at Paris.] This is manifeſt by the tenor of the decree of parliament. ‘ The court having ſeen . . . the book of John Mariana, intituled de Regia & Regis inſtitutione, printed at Mentz (94), and other places, containing ſeveral blaſphemies againſt the deceaſed king Henry III, of moſt happy memory; the perſons and ſtates of ſovereign kings and princes, and other propoſitions, contrary to the ſaid decree . . . The ſaid court hath ordained, and doth ordain . . . That the ſaid book of Mariana ſhall be burnt by the publick executioner, before the church of Paris . . . Done in parliament, June 8, 1610.’ If Mariana had only ſaid, that Henry III, in his elder years, had ſtained all the glory he acquired in his youth, he could not have been blamed; for it is certain, that no prince ever became more unlike himſelf than he was. ‘ Felix futurus, ſi cum primis ultima contexuiſſet, talemque ſe principem præſtitiſſet, qualis ſub Carolo fratre rege fuiſſe credebatur adverſus perduelliones copiarum bellique dux: qui illi gradus ad regnum Poloniæ fuit procerum ejus gentis ſuffragio. Sed ceſſerunt prima poſtremis, bonaque juventæ major ætas flagitio obliteravit. Defuncto fratre revocatus in patriam, rexque Galliæ renunciatus, omnia in ludibrium vertit (95). - - - - - Happy would he have been, if the latter part of his life had been anſwerable to its beginning, and had he ſhewn himſelf to be ſuch a prince, as he was believed to be a general, under the reign of his brother king Charles againſt the rebels: upon which account it was that he was elected king of Poland by the votes of the nobility. But the virtues of his youth were obliterated by the wickedneſs of his more advanced age. His brother being dead he ſucceeded, and turned all things into confuſion.’ There was not a greater difference between Hector victorious over Patroclus, and his carcaſe, dragged by a chariot (96), than between the duke of Anjou victorious at Moncontour, and Henry III beſet by monks and minions, and forced to quit Paris to the duke of Guiſe. Debauchery firſt began to enervate his courage; but bigotry made him perfectly effeminate

(96) In ſomnis, ecce, ante oculos mœſtiſſimus Hector
Viſus adeſſe mihi, largoſque effundere fletus;
Raptatus bigis, ut quondam, aterque cruento
Pulvere, perque pedes trajectus lora tumentes.
Hei mihi, qualis erat! quantum mutatus ab illo
Hectore; qui redit exuvias indutus Achillei,
Vel Danaûm Phrygios jaculatus puppibus ignes!
Virgil. Æneid. lib. ii, ver. 270.

When Hector's ghoſt before my ſight appears:
A bloody ſhroud be ſeem'd, and bath'd in tears.
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
Swoln were his feet, as when the thongs were thruſt
Through the bor'd holes, his body black with duſt.
Unlike that Hector, who return'd from toils
Of war triumphant in Æacian ſpoils:
Or him, who made the fainting Greeks retire,
And launch'd againſt their navy Phrygian fire.
Dryden.

His

(§ a) Read therefore mendis in Conringius, and not moribus nor morbis. Rem. Crit.]

(86) The Ordonnance of Charles Maurice Tellier, page 55, Delft Edit. 1698.

(87) Ib. pag. 57.

(88) A remonſtrance to the lord archbiſhop of Reims, pag. m. 157, &c.

‡ Pag. 57.

* Marianæ Opuſcula, pag. 415, 416, 430, 431, &c.

(89) Colomiés, Biblioth. Choiſie, pag. 174, of the ſecond edition obſerves, that Augustin de Mauleon, Sieur de Granier, tranſlated into French, The Treatiſe of Father Mariana about the Reformation of the government of the Jeſuits. See concerning this Mr Granier, Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. 225.

(90) Critical Hiſt. of the Old Teſtament, book iii, cap. xii, pag. m. 426.

(91) Critical Hiſt. of the principal commentators of the New Teſtament, cap. xlii, pag. 637.

(92) Ibid. p. 639.

(93) Critical Hiſt. of the Old Teſtament, book iii, cap. xviii, pag. 463.

(94) By Balthazar Lippius, 1605. That which I uſe is of the year 1611. Typis Wechelianis apud hæredes Joannis Aubrii.

(95) Mariana de Rege, lib. i, cap. vi, pag. m. 54.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I queſtion whether he wrote the book de Republica Chriſtiana, which a German writer praiſes very much [P].

His fraternities of Penitents, and their ſack-cloths bring to my mind this place of Mr Deſpreaux:

Dans ce ſac ridicule où Scapin s'envelope,
Je ne reconois plus l'Auteur du miſantrope.

I cannot any longer, under this ſack-cloth, under this Equipage of a falſe penitent, diſcern that brave warriour who triumphed over the Proteſtants at Jarnac and Moncontour, and who deſerved the ſuffrages of the Polanders for a great kingdom. Ultima primis obſtant, diſſimiles hic vir & ille puer. But Mariana did not confine himſelf to the obſervation of this change.

Note, however, that it is falſly aſſerted in the laſt edition of Moreri's Dictionary (97), that he publiſhed the book de Rege & Regis inſtitutione, to juſtify the aſſaſſination of Henry III, king of France. That was not his deſign. He treated the matter according to the extent of the title of his book. What concerns the authority he gives to ſubjects over tyrannical kings, is but a very ſmall part of this Book, and he does not ſpeak of Henry III but occaſionally, and in few words.

(97) That of Paris, 1699.

[P] I queſtion whether he wrote the book de Republica Chriſtiana, which a German writer praiſes very much.] He ſays, that it is an excellent work publiſhed by John Mariana in Spaniſh, in 1615, and dedicated to Philip III king of Spain; and that after ſeveral other things ingeniouſly invented, and wiſely propoſed (98), he gives a deſcription of the head of a good prince, with the lawful uſe of his five external ſenſes. If the Jeſuit Mariana had publiſhed ſuch a book, would the Bibliographers of the ſociety, and Don Nicolas Antonio have paſſed it over in ſilence?

(98) Poſt multa alia ingenioſe excogitata cordateque prolata. Andreas Carolus, Abbas Sangeorgianus in Ducatu Wirtembergico Memorab. Eccleſ. ſæculi xvii, lib. ii. cap. xxvi, pag. 388. He cites Selenian. Aug. J. V. A. pag. 393, & ſeq. 449 pl. Note, that the book he cites is the ſame I have cited above, remark [D] of the article DURER, citation (12).

MARY, or MIRIAM, the ſiſter of Aaron and Moſes, makes no inconſiderable figure in the Scripture twice or thrice at leaſt. She was the cauſe why her mother was choſen by the daughter of Pharaoh to be nurſe to Moſes [A]. She put herſelf at the head of all the women of Iſrael after the paſſage through the Red-Sea, in order to ſing the ſame ſong that the men had ſung [B]. She joined with her brother Aaron in murmuring

[A] She was the cauſe that her mother was choſen to be nurſe to Moſes.] The ſcripture relates, that after he was expoſed, his ſiſter kept at a diſtance to ſee (1) what would become of him, and that ſhe ſaid to Pharaoh's daughter, who had the child brought to her, Shall I go and call to thee a nurſe of the Hebrew women, that ſhe may nurſe the child for thee (2). And that after ſhe had received an anſwer, ſhe fetched her mother, who had orders to nurſe him. Joſephus thinking that this ſtory was not ſufficiently circumſtantiated, ſuppoſes that the daughter of Pharaoh employed at firſt Egyptian nurſes, but that the infant would not ſuck any of them; and that Mary feigning to come there only out of curioſity, repreſented to the princeſs, that it was to no purpoſe to fetch any nurſe but one of the Hebrew women, and that it would be well done to try whether it would be more tractable with a woman of that nation. The young maid had orders to ſeek out one, and ſhe fetched her mother, and becauſe the child ſucked her freely, ſhe was appointed his nurſe (3). This ſupplement of circumſtances is not ill contrived, although it multiplies miracles a little. Note, that there are ſome commentators, who think, that even according to the relation of holy Scripture, there is a lie in the words of this infant's ſiſter; for ſhe feigned that ſhe would go and ſeek out another woman than her mother. Upon this occaſion they relate to us all the examples of officious or pious frauds that we read in the ſacred writers, that of Rebecca, Rachel, Michal, &c. and conclude, that there are ſubtile tricks that are commendable, and a deceitfulneſs that is of neceſſary uſe, not only in the profeſſion of arms, and the political adminiſtration, but alſo in domeſtic affairs (4). This you will find in the commentary of the Franciſcan John Nodinus on the ſecond of Exodus, and he grounds it upon the authority of St Baſil, and St John Damaſcen. But this is altogether impertinent; for our Mary did nothing contrary to ſincerity, ſhe denied not that the woman ſhe would fetch was her mother: She only did not confeſs it, becauſe ſhe was not aſked about it, nor obliged upon any account to tell what ſhe knew. The defenders of equivocations cannot find any thing here that favours them.

(1) Exod. ii, 4.

(2) Ib. ver. 7.

(3) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. ii, cap. v.

(4) Ex Joanne Nodino, Comment. in priora xv Capita Exodi, pag. 67, Edit. Lug. 1611.

[B] She put herſelf at the head of all the women of Iſrael . . . . . in order to ſing the ſame ſong that the men had ſung.] When I ſpeak thus, I confine myſelf to the order of the narrative in the ſcripture. You ſee in the fifteenth chapter of Exodus, the whole ſong which Moſes and the children of Iſrael ſung, after the deſtruction of the army of Pharaoh, and then you read this: And Mary the propheteſs, the ſiſter of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Mary anſwered them, ſing ye to the Lord, &c (5). The word præcinebat in the vulgar Latin, ſeems to me better than the word anſwered in the Geneva and Engliſh verſions; for it is very probable that Mary begun and ſet the ſong and led the dance of the women. Conſult Philo who ſuppoſes that Moſes appointed two choirs, one of men, and the other of women, and that himſelf directed the muſic in the former, and gave the management of the other to his ſiſter, and that theſe two chorus's anſwered one another. There are ſome who think, that Moſes, either alone, or with the men, ſung the ſong, and that the others ſung only the beginning of it, which they repeated from time to time like the chorus of it. 'Oleaſter hæc ſcribit. Crediderim equidem, Moſen & viros Hebræos Canticum hoc incæpiſſe, fœminas vero reſpondiſſe: ita quod Moſes aut ſolus, aut ſimul cum viris Canticum proſequebatur, fœminæ vero reſpondebant ſeu repetebant illud exordium Cantici Cantemus Domino, ut conſtat ex fine hujus Cantici, ubi talia verba repetuntur à Maria. Hoc enim ſolebat in aliis etiam Canticis fieri, ut patet in Pſal. cxxxv. ubi unus aut duo dicebant: Confitemini Domino, quoniam bonus, quoniam in æternum miſericordia ejus. Et deinceps proſequebantur alios verſus: Cœtus autem aliorum repetebat ſemper illud: Quoniam in æternum miſericordia ejus. Idem quoque obſervare licet in primo libro Samuelis capite decimo octavo. Solebant enim Prophetæ choros canentium ducere, dum laudes Dei celebrarent. Sic Oleaſter. Philo tamen in libro tertio de vita Moſis, ait, Moſen diſtribuiſſe omnem populum in duos choros, unum virorum, in quo ipſe viris præibat Carmen: alterum, in quo ſoror ejus Maria præcinebat fœminis. Ergo Moſes prior quemlibet verſum hujus Cantici canebat, & deinde populus eundem verſum cantabat. Sed enim idem Philo in libro de Agricultura, ſcribit, factos eſſe duos choros: unum mulierum: alterum virorum, è diverſo ſtantes, & alternis carminibus ſibi invicem reſpondentes (6). - - - - - Thus Oleaſter writes: I ſhould indeed have thought, that Moſes and the Hebrew men began this ſong, and the women anſwered: and that Moſes, either alone or together with the men, proceeded with the ſong, the women anſwering or repeating that beginning, Let us ſing unto the Lord; as appears by the end of this ſong, where ſuch words are ſpoken by Mary. For thus it was uſual in other ſongs to do, as may be ſeen in the cxxxv Pſalm, where one or two ſaid; O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever. And then they went on with other verſes: But the other company repeated always that; for his mercy endureth for ever. The ſame alſo may be obſerved in the eighteenth chapter of the firſt book of Samuel. For it was the cuſtom of the prophets to lead up the company of dancers ſinging the praiſes of GOD. Thus far Oleaſter. But Philo, in his third book of the life of Moſes, ſays, that Moſes divided all the people into two choirs, one of the men, in which he himſelf did ſet the ſong; another wherein his ſiſter Mary did the like among the women. Moſes therefore firſt ſang every verſe, and the people after did the ſame. This ſame Philo, in his book of Agriculture, further writes, that there were two choirs appointed, one

(5) Exod. xv, 20, 21.

(6) Pererius, in cap. xv, Exodi Diſput. i, pag. m. 484.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

muring againſt Moſes [C], and was ſeverely puniſhed for doing it; for ſhe became leprous

‘ of men, the other of women, ſtanding apart, that ‘ anſwered one the other ſinging by turns every other ‘ verſe.’ A modern Poet (7) fancies, that this great prophet placed himſelf in the middle of the two chorus's, and diſtributed the parts of the ſong, and beat time with his rod. You may ſee a deſcription of the habits and geſtures of Mary, I ſay you may ſee it in this paſſage of Father Menetrier (8) ‘ After ‘ the paſſage thro' the red ſea, Moſes and Mary his ‘ ſiſter, to thank God for the preſervation of his people, ‘ and the deſtruction of the Egyptians, who were ‘ drowned in the purſuit of them, made two great ‘ chorus's ſeparated from one another, the one of ‘ men and the other of women, and danced to the ‘ tune of a ſong, wich makes the fifteenth chapter ‘ of Exodus, a ſong of thankſgiving. A modern ‘ Poet has elegantly deſcribed this dance in the ſixth ‘ book of his Poem intituled, Moſes Viator.

(7) It is a Jeſuit of Lyons, called Antonius Milliæus. See Alegambe, pag. 40.

(8) Menetrier, des Ballets anciens & modernes, pag. 9, & ſeq.

Nunc igitur memores animos ad Carmina mecum
Adjicite; alternis ſubſultent caſtra choreis;
Littora divinas referant ad ſidera laudes.
Sic fatus jubet in partes diſcedere turmas
Adverſiſque choris medius, geſtumque, modoſque
Dividit, & virga modulans præit Enthea verba.
Hæc poſtquam ſaltata Viris, modulataque Vate
Chironomo, paribus ſtimulis agit impetus idem
Hebræas cantare nurus, Diamque Pronæam
Tinnula concuſſis ad tympana pſallere ſiſtris.
Proſiluit ſancto Moſis ſoror excita Phœbo,
Prætexta lambente pedes, cinctuque modeſto
Caſtigante ſinus: volat alto à vertice Sindon
Carbaſina & Zephyros Zona retinente coërcet,
Subtileſque tument telæ pellentibus auris,
Cœrula jam niveos compeſcit tænia crines,
Saltibus extremæ volitant per tempora vittæ.
Aſſultant digitiſque pedes, pulſuque moventur
Ora, pedes, digitique pari, non mollia ceſſant
Brachia, non humeri, aut cervix, à corpore toto
Vox ſonat, & cunctis loquitur Symphonia membris.
Exiliunt paribus ſtudiis examina matrum
Virgineique greges, hæ ſiſtra ſonantia pulſant
Hæ citharas & plectra movent, hæ nablia carpunt:
Nec vultus torſiſſe pudor, caſta omnia caſti
Obſequii decorat pietas. Jocabethia virgo
Inchoat, & geſtu cantum comitante figurat *.

* Anton. Milliæus, lib. vi, Moſis Viatoris.

Now therefore join in grateful ſong again,
And whilſt alternate meaſures mark the plain,
Let diſtant ſhores reſound the praiſe of GOD.
He ſaid; the hoſt divided at his nod;
Plac'd in the midſt, the prophet marks the bounds
Of graceful motions, and alternate ſounds;
His ruling rod the words divine precedes,
Directs the ſacred ſtrain, the meaſure leads:
Taught by the ſeer, the men firſt raiſe the ſong,
And to the notes divine the dance prolong,
With equal warmth the Hebrew matrons ſtrove,
Urg'd by their grateful zeal to ſing their love:
But chief the heav'n-inſpir'd MIRIAM tries
With voice and cymbal to aſcend the ſkies;
Fill'd with her GOD, the ſiſter prophet ſprings,
Whilſt at her feet her flowing robes ſeem wings;
Her garb in decent folds her form contains;
High o'er her head the flying lawn reſtrains
Zephyr's ſoft breath, that ſwells the floating veil
Far as the Zone admits the ſportive gale.
Her ſilver locks, in azure fillets bound,
Wave as ſhe leaps, and ſport her temples round;
Her artful fingers and her active feet
Vye with her looks in a diſpute ſo ſweet:
Not tender arms, nor neck, nor waiſt, ſhe ſpares;
Her ev'ry part breathes muſic's ſofteſt airs:
Such ſweet conſent in all ſhe does is found,
Motion ſeems harmony, and geſture ſound.
Intent on the ſame arts the matron-throng,
And virgin-tribe, repeat the dance and ſong.
Some ſtrike the ſounding cymbal, ſome the lyre;
Theſe the ſoft lute, and thoſe the harp inſpire;
Nor bluſh, whilſt ſinging, the diſtorted face,
Duty their charm, and piety their grace.
The ſacred virgin, ſprung from Jacob's line,
Leads the ſoft choir, inſtructs it when to join,
And ſuits her motions to the ſtrain divine.

Here follows another paſſage of the ſame writer, which contains many things that do not relate to Mary; but ſince the whole is curious, I will not ſeparate what concerns the ſong in which ſhe bore a part from the reſt. ‘ It is the moſt ancient ſong (9) we have, and ‘ the greateſt part of the interpreters of this ſong are ‘ of opinion, that it is the firſt compoſition in Muſic, ‘ which appeared three hundred years before the ‘ birth of Linus and Orpheus, whom the Grecians ‘ make the fathers of their Poetry (10). This ſong ‘ is a meer narrative; but that which we have in the ‘ thirty-fecond chapter of Deuteronomy, has all the ‘ beauties of Poetry and of ſublime Eloquence. God ‘ commanded Moſes to write this ſong the day before ‘ his death, to ſerve for the condemnation of the ‘ people of the Jews, whoſe ingratitude was exceed- ‘ ing great. This faithful miniſter of the will of ‘ God, did not only write but ſing it: And as the ‘ author of the book of the wonders of the Scrip- ‘ ture, which is inſerted among the works of St ‘ Auſtin, thought that God wrought a miracle with ‘ reſpect to the firſt of theſe ſongs, having inſpired ‘ all the people to ſing it with a juſt harmony, and a ‘ regular conſort of ſo many voices without any confu- ‘ ſion; ſo ſome interpreters are of opinion, that God ‘ wrought another miracle with reſpect to the ſecond, ‘ by giving Moſes a voice ſo ſtrong and extenſive, ‘ as to be heard by all the people, how diſtant ſoever ‘ a great part of that prodigious multitude was from ‘ him (11).’

(9) He ſpeaks of that which was ſung after the paſſage through the Red-Sea.

(10) Here is what Pererius ſays, ubi ſupra, pag. 485, 486. Inter alias porro hujus Cantici excellentias, illa profecto perinſignis eſt, quod eſt primum omnium Canticorum, quæ fuiſſe unquam facta vel cantata, ſive in ſacris, ſive in profanis literarum monumentis proditum ſit, nam Lini, Muſæi, & Orphei, qui ante bellum Troianum fuerunt, hymnos, carmina, & cantus, plus trecentis annis poſt hoc Canticum Moſis eſſe factos, certa temporum obſervatione compertum eſt.

Note, That there is ſome probability, that Mr Herſant is not altogether of the ſame opinion with the Jeſuit Menetrier. He hath printed a little book with this title, the ſong of Moſes in the fifteenth chapter of Exodus, explained according to the rules of Rhetoric. He pretends that this piece which was written in Hebrew verſe, exceeds all that is moſt beautiful in this kind in prophane authors, and that Virgil and Horace, the moſt perfect patterns of fine poetry, have nothing that comes near it. This we read in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for the month of March 1700, p. 353, with this circumſtance, that Mr Herſant is at preſent with the abbot de Louvois, and that he was before profeſſor of Rhetoric in the college of Pleſſis. There is reaſon to believe that he looks upon the ſong of the fifteenth chapter of Exodus, as more beautiful than that in chap. xxxii of Deuteronomy. And this is not the opinion of the Jeſuit Menetrier. We ſhall conclude with cenſuring a miſtake of Mr Simon, who ſays that the ſong in chap. xv of Exodus was compoſed by Mary (12).

(11) Menetrier, Repreſentations en Muſique, pag. 9, 10.

(12) Simon's Dictionary of the Bible, pag. 514. Note, that this Simon is different from him who wrote the Critical Hiſtory of the Bible.

[C] She joined with her brother Aaron in murmuring againſt Moſes.] The ſcripture relates this in theſe words: And Miriam and Aaron ſpoke againſt Moſes, becauſe of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married; for he had married an Ethiopian woman: And they ſaid, hath the Lord indeed ſpoken by Moſes? hath not he alſo ſpoken by us (13)? In our age many readers complain, that a thing is not written ſhort enough, and accuſe all authors of prolixity, who do not leave the beſt of their thoughts to be gueſſed at. Such readers would find theſe two verſes of Moſes admirable, tho' they ſhould not believe them inſpired by God; for things are expreſſed there by halves, and parted from one another by a great gap. There are many connections wanting, which they muſt ſupply, and ſince they love this exerciſe, they may here find matter for ſuch an agreeable employment. The words of the ſacred author, which I have related, are equivalent to theſe: Mary and Aaron ſpoke ill of Moſes, becauſe of his marriage with an Ethiopian woman, and their evil-ſpeaking was expreſſed after this manner, Does none propheſy but he? If he is a prophet we are ſo too. We do not ſee at firſt how

(13) Numb. ch. xii, ver. 1, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

leprous, and was ſeparated from the camp for the ſpace of ſeven days (a). She would not have been delivered from this affliction, if Moſes had not implored the mercy of GOD. She died before her two brethren (b), and in the ſame year with them, and was interred with pomp, and at the expence of the public in the mountain of Sin (c). It is believed that ſhe lived a hundred and thirty years, or thereabout. The Rabbins make a ridiculous remark, becauſe the ſacred text does not contain the ſame clauſe concerning the death of Mary, as concerning that of her two brothers [D]. He that would know the reſemblance there is between this ſiſter of Moſes, and the Pagan goddeſſes needs only read Mr Huet's demonſtration (d).

(a) Numb. chap. xi.

(b) Ib. chap. xx.

(c) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. iv, cap. iv, pag. m. 109.

(d) Huet. Demonſtrat. Evangel. prop. iv, cap. x, pag. m. 252, & ſeq. & in præfat. fol. C. ii, verſo.

how the wife of Moſes was the cauſe of theſe interrogations? The leap is a little too great from the principle to the conſequence, and the mind is divided into divers conjectures to find the connexion or relation between theſe things. I think the famous Toſtatus did not conjecture amiſs, who ſuppoſes that Sephora, the wife of Moſes, was proud of the glory and prophetic authority of her huſband, and from thence took occaſion to inſult her ſiſter-in-law, and affected to exalt the merit of her huſband above that of Aaron. The ſiſter-in-law, and the brother-in-law, having no better way to humble her pride, criticized upon the marriage of Moſes with a woman of another nation, and boaſted that they had a ſhare in propheſy as well as he. 'Veriſimile eſt, quod ait 'Abulenſ. Sephoram more muliebri (hic enim ſexus, 'cum ſit imbecillis ingenii & judicii, ambitioſus eſt, '& ſui honoris ſtudioſus) voluiſſe ſe præferre Mariæ, 'eo quod uxor eſſet Moſis, Moſenque ſuum, quaſi 'populi ducem, verbis extuliſſe, ac præpoſuiſſe Ma'riæ & Aaroni: qua re primum concitata Maria, de'inde Aaron, ſe erigere cœperunt, volentes ſe non 'tantum Sephoræ, ſed & Moſi æquare, jactitando ſe 'tam nobiles eſſe prophetas, quam erat Moſes. Id 'ita eſſe, colligitur tum ex v. ſeq. tum ex v. 6. ubi 'Deus hanc murmuris cauſam indicat, & præſcindit, 'docetque eos in ambitione ſua falli; eo quod Moſes 'præſtantiſſimus, fideliſſimus, Deoque familiariſſimus 'ſit propheta, cui nec quis alius comparari poſſit (14). '---- It is probable, that Zipporah (as is the cuſtom 'of her ſex, who are of weak underſtanding and 'judgment, and ambitious of honour) would prefer 'her ſelf to Mary becauſe ſhe was the wife of Moſes, 'whom ſhe extolled as being the leader of the people, 'and more honourable than Mary and Aaron: whereby 'firſt Mary and then Aaron being ruffled, began to ſhew 'their reſentment, equalizing themſelves, not only to Zip'porah, but even to Moſes himſelf; boaſting that they 'were not leſs excellent prophets than was Moſes. 'That this matter was as now repreſented, may be 'collected both from the following, and from the ſixth 'verſe, where GOD takes notice of the cauſe, re'proves their ambition, and tells them that Moſes was 'the moſt excellent and moſt faithful prophet, whom 'he admitted to the greateſt familiarity with himſelf, 'and to whom no other was to be compared.' This ſuppoſition of Toſtatus connects the disjointed pieces, and diſpels the obſcurity in the reaſoning of the ſacred hiſtorian. Note, That there are ſome commentators who maintain, that Sephora might be called an Ethiopian, tho' ſhe was of Arabia (15): But others pretend (16), that the ſeventy interpreters, and the author of the vulgar Latin, did not underſtand the true ſenſe of the Hebrew word, which they have tranſlated an Ethiopian woman. Note alſo, that this chapter of the book of Numbers is proper to prove, that the title of a propheteſs, which is given to Mary in chap. xv of Exodus, did belong to her properly, and according to the higheſt ſignification of the word; that is, that ſhe had a ſhare in the divine inſpiration (17).

(14) Corn. à Lapide in Exod. cap. xii, ver. 1. pag. m. 356.

(15) See Cornelius à Lapide, ib.

(16) See Mr le Clerc upon this place of the book of Numbers.

(17) See Rivet. in Exod. cap. xv, ver. 20. Oper. Tom. i, pag. 963.

[D] The ſame clauſe concerning the death of Mary, as concerning that of the two brethren.] This clauſe in the verſion of Geneva ſignifies, that Aaron and Moſes died according to the command of GOD; but the Jews pretend it ſignifies by the mouth of GOD, as if the breath of GOD had gently drawn out their ſoul. They add, that Mary died not after this manner, which is not fit for the feminine ſex, and that the worm has no power over thoſe who die ſo. What impertinence is here! De Moſe quidem, Deut. cap. xxxiv. ver. 5. De Aharone autem, Numb. cap. xxxiii. ver. 38. dicitur, quod mortui ſint על פי יהוה ad os, i. in oſculo, Domini, quaſi anima eorum ipſius Dei halitu ſuaviſſime rapta fuerit. De eorum ſorore Mirjam dicunt, eam mortuam quidem בנשיקה ſed non על פי יהוה ad os Domini, quaſi hæc locutio ſequiori ſexui non conveniat. In hos vero vermem non habuiſſe poteſtatem in libro Jalkut legitur (18). The Pagan ſuperſtition is well known, which made kinſmen apply their mouths to that of dying perſons. See the commentators of Virgil upon theſe words of Dido's ſiſter:

(18) Lomeier. genial. dierum decad. i, pag. 337, 338. I have twice corrected the numbers; there is in the original xxxii inſtead of xxxiv, and xxiii for xxxiii.

----- & extremus ſi quis ſuper halitus errat,
Ore legam ----- (19).

(19) Virgil. Æneid. lib. IV, ver. 684.

------ while I in death
Lay cloſe my lips to her's, and catch the flying breath.
DRYDEN.

All thoſe who treat de funeribus (20) ſpeak of this cuſtom.

(20) See among others Kirchmannus de Funeribus Romanorum, lib. i, cap. v.

MARY the Egyptian, a famous proſtitute, and a famous convert. When ſhe was twelve years old, ſhe went out of her father's houſe, into the city of Alexandria, where ſhe ſpent twenty ſeven years in leud practices, and then ſhe went to Jeruſalem to continue there the ſame kind of life. But an inviſible power having hindered her from entering into the temple on the day of the exaltation of the Holy Croſs, ſhe felt ſuch a remorſe of conſcience as obliged her to proſtrate her ſelf before an image of the Holy Virgin, and to promiſe that ſhe would forſake her leud courſes. After that ſhe entered into the temple, and having adored the croſs, ſhe enquired of the holy Virgin what ſhe ſhould do to pleaſe God. She heard a voice which ordered her to go into the deſert; which ſhe obeyed, and did penance forty ſeven years, without ſeeing any body. She was there waited upon by angels for the laſt thirty years. The author (a) who furniſhes me with theſe materials, ſays nothing of the payment ſhe would have made to the mariners for her paſſage [A]. The confeſſion of Sancy has too much abridged the hiſtory of this woman

(a) Paul Boyer, Eſq; Sieur de Petit-Puy, in his Dictionary ſerving for an univerſal library, printed at Paris in 1649, in folio, p. 254. (wherein he cites Sophronius biſhop of Jeruſalem. Nicephorus Calliſtus, book viii, ch. v, of his Hiſtory. St John Damaſcen, in his third oration of Images) and pag. 323.

[A] Of the payment ſhe would have made to the mariners for her paſſage.] Having no money to give them for her paſſage, ſhe offered to give them leave to uſe her body as they pleaſed. This made the famous Peter de Moulin ſay, that the authors of the Legends had no judgment, and managed the matter ſo, as if they deſigned to ridicule the ſaints they write of. Vitas Sanctorum ſic deſcripſerunt Pontificii, quaſi propoſitum iis fuiſſet eos differre populo, & exhibi-
landos proponere. Mariam Ægyptiam perhibent cum non haberet unde naulum ſolveret, voluiſſe facere nautis corporis ſui copiam, ut quod non habebat in ære lueret in corpore (1). I ſhall eaſily be believed, when I affirm that I will not take the part of the Legendary writers; nevertheleſs I will ſay, that a judicious writer might relate what Mr du Moulin alledges as a proof of indiſcretion: For if it were true, that Mary the Egyptian would have proſtituted her ſelf

(1) Petrus Molinæus, in Hyperaſpi- te adverſus Sir eſtrum Petra- nclam, pag. 46.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google man [B]: It is in the chapter wherein there is a fraud concerning St Dominic, and a nun called Mary [C]. This name will make my remark not altogether impertinent; but since to the mariners for what she owed them, because she had no money; I do not see why any historian should suppress it: Is it not very proper to exalt the mercy of GOD, and the efficacy of his spirit? The more enormous the extravagance of a debauched woman has been, the more we ought to admire her conversion, and the long austerities of her penance: and therefore discretion does not oblige an author to say nothing of the singular circumstances of the leudness of the convert. Moreover it cannot be objected to the Legendary writers, that they transgress the rule of probability; for these creatures, which are the victims of public impurity, as Tertullian calls them, are sometimes reduced to the last farthing; or else they had rather gratify their creditors with the use of their body, than discharge the debt by paying the money.

[B] The confession of Sancy has too much abridged the history of this woman.] Here follow the words of d'Aubigné (2): 'The legend of the saints is the 'garden of the soul: ..... in this garden are 'herbs, which at least give ease, if they do 'not cure. A spark who complies with the ne'cessity of the times, knows what the country people 'call robbing. If he finds that his dissolute soul can'not change it's life, there is in the legend, in the 'chap. of the annunciation, an example of a knight, 'who robbed, without pity, both poor and rich, and 'was cleared for saying once every day, Ave Maria. 'And as to the soldiers of these days, it is what they 'commonly practise. If a lady of the court feels in 'her dissolute soul, that she cannot leave her great, 'catholic, and universal leudness, has she not Mary 'the Egyptian to comfort her, who from the age of 'twelve years, till she became contemptible for 'old age, never refused a man? And have not 'we, the example of St Magdalen, so famous in 'antient chronicles? The writers of the legend have 'afterwards taught us, how she, by her charms, 'made many men of good families sell their goods 'for her; many valient men cut their throats thro' 'jealousy, and then she was no sooner tired, but 'presently she was canonized.' The omission of this author, with respect to St Mary the Egyptian, and St Magdalen, is inexcusable; for he supposes that these two prostitutes were immediately advanced from infamous places, to the rank of canonized saints, and by this supposition he pretends to prove, that the legend is very fit to let loose the reins to those ladies, who have a boundless desire to spend their time with men. If he had dealt candidly, he should have told us of the long penance of these two saints; but since this would have spoiled the rallery he intended in the objection against the legendary writers, he thought it would be better to say nothing of it, or even to deny it (3). Let us learn from hence, that satirical writers are the people in all the world, against whom a reader should most guard himself. These are the men who reason the worst of any, and by the pleasantness of their wit, hinder us from enquiring into their sophistical arguments. But let us remember, that if they can dispense with several rules, yet they ought to be no less subject to the laws of reasoning than grave authors (4).

[C] ... wherein there is a fraud concerning St Dominic and a Nun, whose name was Mary.] I make this remark only to set in a clearer light what was said just now; and therefore it ought not to be condemned as being foreign to this place. 'When I was an Hu'guenot, they are Sancy's words, I found nothing 'that made me laugh so much as the legend of Bro'ther Jacopon. There is also a book in our house, 'on which I have made fine annotations, as particu'larly upon making his brother confess his sins by 'signs. Madam de Villeroy enquiring, how he con'fessed his whoring, had also the curiosity to ask, 'how they called in Greek, that light oil which St 'Dominic spilt between the Nuns thighs, and called 'it the oil of love (5).' It is certain, that d'Aubigné falsifies the legend, that he may give the story a more diverting air; but I think that neither the laws of rallery, nor even of satire, do allow of this. The legend of St Dominic (6) says, That a Nun being in an extasy, thought she saw him come into her chamber, accompanied by two Friars, and that he took out from under his garment an ointment of a very good smell, wherewith he rubbed her leg, and called it the sign of charity. Maria sanctimonialis in Ectasi rapta vidit Dominicum cum duobus fratribus ante lectum ejus intrantem, qui de sub cappa unguentum miræ fragrantiæ proferens, tibiam ejus inunxit, quam unctionem dilectionis esse signum dixit (7). By comparing these words with those in the confession of Sancy, what falsifications do we not find? The legend does not say, that Dominic applied an ointment to the Nun's leg, but it says, that the Nun being in an extasy, thought she saw this saint who rubbed her leg with the ointment; and so it was only a dream, or a vision. At least d'Aubigné should have stopped at the Nun's leg, and not have corrupted the text, by the false gloss of spilling light oil between the thighs. If the question was about the trunk of a tree, it would be a small mistake; a little near to, or farther from, the earth, would make no difference; but in such a subject as this the difference is capital. Mr du Moulin, in his answer to Petrasancta, promises to speak elsewhere of this unction of St Dominic (8). I do not know whether he kept his word; but his brother-in-law Andrew Rivet, answering the same Jesuit, does very candidly stop at the literal sense of the legend; he owns, that this anointing of the leg was only a dream; but he declares, that these extatic visions were ridiculous and justly suspected (9). It was at this, as he pretends, that du Moulin scoffed, and not meerly at the use of ointments for healing of the sick, a thing practised by the Apostles (10). 'Accusat 'Molinæum, quod riserit Dominicum sanantem muli'erem oleo, & Franciscum aviculis concionantem. 'Primum illud non potuit simpliciter irridere Moli'næus, qui noverat initio Christianismi Apostolos 'unxisse ægros oleo, & sanasse, Marc. vii. Sed risit '& merito, quod in legenda Dominici legitur, quod 'Maria Sanctimonialis, &c (11). ..... He accuses du 'Moulin of mocking St Dominic's curing of a woman 'with oil, and St Francis's preaching to the birds. The 'first he could not absolutely ridicule, knowing, that in 'the beginning of Christianity, the Apostles anointed with 'oil, and cured the sick, Mark vii. But he scoffed, and 'deservedly, what is to be read in the legend of St Do'minic, that Maria Sanctimonialis, &c.' Observe that Petrasancta knowing that in the library of Sedan, they had laughed at this action of Dominic, did not make use of the answer which the legend could have furnished him with, viz. that it was a dream; for he was ignorant of this circumstance: but he answered very seriously, that they might as well make such a rallery at JESUS CHRIST, who anointed a dumb man with his spittle. Sedani, dum Bibliotheca, his qui mecum advenerant, ostenderetur, nihil ferme auditum est, præter Sanctorum irrisiones. Risit aliquis sanctum Dominicum, persanantem oleo mulierem ægram. Rideat perinde Christum Dominum aut saliva utentem, aut luto, dum os muti aperiret, & dum oculis unius cæci nati explicaret lucem & diem (12). This is a bad answer, for this is to own the fact. After all, the ralleries of d'Aubigné must needs be false, since they are founded upon a lie. And this should teach the readers, that if they would be well instructed in controversy, they must neither consult satires, nor burlesque pieces: this were to sit in the seat of the scorners, an action condemned in the first Psalm. Such people, when they have a mind to divert themselves, spare not their best friends (13), but they care little for truth (14). See, below, the remark [D]. Thus when the Poet, whom I cite, asks this question; 'Can any thing hinder one who jests from speak'ing the truth (15)? He might be answered, you 'will find an answer to this in your fourth satire, 'where you say, that a jester gives no quarter to his 'best friends, much less does he regard the circum'stances of a story.' Nevertheless the question put by Horace is reasonable; for it signifies no more but that it is possible for one in rallery to speak the truth, and this is incontestable.

But the injury done by d'Aubigné will be better discovered, if we consider, that, in all probability,

(2) Confession Catholique de Sancy, book i, cap. ii, pag. m. 329.

(3) This d'Aubigné does in these words, She was no sooner tired, but she was presently canonized.

(4) See the article COLOMIES, remark [C].

(5) D'Aubigné, Confession of Sancy, book i, cap. ii, pag. 328.

(6) In Jacobus de Voragine.

(7) Jacob. de Voragine, in Aurea Legenda, apud Rivetum in Castigat. notarum in epistol. Molinæi ad Balzacum, cap. vi, num. 7, Oper. Tom. iii, pag. 511.

(8) De Dominico confricante femur puellæ unguento amoris suo loco acceptur. Molinæus ubi supra, pag. 47.

(9) Ecstases illæ monialium quæ monachos SOMNIANT ingredientes & earum ungentes tibias unguento dilectionis de sub cappa, & ridiculæ sunt & suspectæ. Rivet. Oper. Tom. iii, pag. 511.

(10) Rivetus, in Tom. iii, pag. 511.

(11) You will find what follows, above, in citation (7).

(12) Petrasancta, Nat. in Epistol. Molinæi ad Balzacum, cap. iii, pag. 32.

(13) Fenum habet in cornu, longe fuge, dummodo risum Excutiat sibi non hic cuiquam parcet amico. Horat. Sat. IV, lib. I, ver. 34, 35.

(14) Compare the article BROSSIER, remark [B].

(15) - - - ridentem dicere verum Quid vetat? - - - Horat. Sat. I, lib. I, ver. 24.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google since it is moreover designed to oppose the bad inclination men have to trust too much to satirical writers [D], I hope I shall not be charged with irregularity for placing it here.

If

the apology for Herodotus was his original: in which book I find these words (16). 'I will not forget 'another act of the same St Dominic, related towards 'the end of his legend, an act truly of a good com- 'panion, at least related in such a manner as will make 'good companions laugh; and afford them matter of 'jesting; which was this; that a Nun called Mary, 'having a pain in her thigh, endured it for the space 'of five months, and despaired of curing it. Then 'she said to herself, that she was not worthy to pray 'unto GOD, nor to be heard by him, and therefore 'she desired St Dominic to be a mediator between 'GOD and her, to obtain for her the blessing of 'health. And after this request, being asleep, she 'saw near her St Dominic, who took from under his 'garment an oil of a good smell, wherewith he 'anointed her thigh. And when she asked how the 'ointment was called, St Dominic answered, that it 'was the Ointment of Love.' Thus you see that even by the confession of Henry Stephens the Nun was asleep.

(16) Henry Stephen's Apology for Herodotus, cap. xxxiv, pag. m. 367, 368.

[(§ a) This might perhaps be more the negligence than malice of d'Aubigné, how satirical soever he may elsewhere be. He trusted to his memory when he wrote this; and having, in all probability, forgot the word signum of the legend, he could scarcely otherwise translate unctionem dilectionis, than by the oil of love, which precedes. REM. CRIT.]

Mr Jurieu confesses the same thing; but, according to his custom, he takes little care to speak exactly. His words are these (17). 'The same legend 'says, that a Nun, called Mary, having for the 'space of five months a great pain in the parts next 'to those which I dare not name, St Dominic ap- 'peared to her in a dream, and pulled from under 'his habit an ointment of a very good smell, 'wherewith he rubbed the part affected, and being 'asked by the maid what it was, he answered, that 'it was called unguentum amoris. This is as chast as 'the amours of Francis for St Clara, and his passion 'for friar Massus, whom he embraced, and raised 'from the ground in his arms. Which put Father 'Massus in so great a heat, that he was like one in 'the midst of a fire, says the book of the Conformi- 'ties'. Note, that he puts in the margin this summary; The abominations of St Francis and St Dominic; and thence you may conclude, that he treats the controversy as if he were playing at blind-man's-buff. I leave it to those who believe it is not lawful to act deceitfully in favour of religion, that is, to transgress the duties of religion for the sake of religion; I leave it to them, I say, to judge, whether honour and conscience can permit, that the word tibia should be translated by the parts next to those which we dare not name. It is a circumlocution which would be absurd in all sorts of subjects; for, in short, the word leg, which answers that of tibia, has nothing in it which obliges a man to use any periphrasis: but to make use of it on purpose to give one an idea of impurity, is to carry the matter beyond absurdity, and is a criminal fraud. The cheat does no less appear in the change of these terms, signum dilectionis, into those of unguentum amoris. But what will you say of a writer, who rather than lose the comparison he had found in the apology for Herodotus (18), compares the vision of a Nun in an extasy, with the embraces of two men full of vigour? Tho' it were certain the Nun had dreamed that St Dominic came to bed to her, and committed uncleanness with her, must we therefore conclude that he is guilty? Are we answerable for the dreams of another person? Did the mother of Julius Cæsar lose any thing of her merit, because her son dreamed that he had to do with her (19)? Here is a controversist, who calls the application of an ointment the abomination of St Dominic, which was only an apparition in a dream, as he himself says.

(17) Jurieu, Prejug. part i, pag. 394.

(18) Chap. xxxiv, pag. 368.

(19) Sueton. in Cæsare, cap. vii.

[D] The bad inclination men have to trust too much to satirical writers.] These writers are like those jesters who sacrifice every thing to the pleasure of putting off their jests. Horace has very well described this passion in the verses cited above (20). Quintilian makes use of the same colours for drawing the picture of such sort of people, and for giving a distaste of their chartacter. Let us beware, says he, of the maxim of those, who had rather lose their friend than their jest. Ludere nunquam velimus, longeque absit propositum illud, potius amicum quam dictum perdidi (21). Cicero observes, that they slight all the considerations of decency, and have no regard either to persons or occasions, and could more easily keep fire in their mouths than a jest. Parcebat (Crassus) adversarii dignitati, in quo ipse servabat suam, quod est hominibus facetis, & dicacibus difficillimum, habere hominum rationem, & temporum, & ea quæ occurrant, quum salsissime dici possint, tenere. Itaque nonnulli ridiculi homines hoc ipsum non insulse interpretantur. Dicere enim ajunt Ennium flammam à sapiente facilius ore inardente opprimi quam bona dicta teneat: hæc scilicet bona dicta quæ falsa sint. Nam ea dicta appellantur proprio jam nomine (22). We must not wonder that they do not spare their friends, for they do not spare themselves: They make themselves merry at their own cost; and their character is like that of those buffoons, who strike indifferently themselves and others. Aristotle describes them by this. Ὁ δὲ βωμολόχος ἥτ]ων ἐστὶ τῆ γελοίᾳ καὶ ὅτε ἑαυτῦ, ὅτε τῶν ἀλλων ἀπεχόμενος εἰ γέλω]α ποιήσει. Scurra autem ridiculo moderari non potest, cum nec sibi nec aliis parcat, dummodo risum moveat (23). They spare neither GOD nor men; and the religion of their heart does not escape their poignant wit (24). It is too weak a barrier to keep off the irruption of a flash of wit. Judge then, whether the religion which they believe to be false can restrain such sallies of wit. The glory and satisfaction which they expect from the boldness of a jest, transports them beyond all other considerations; and those who have said that a poetic vein is a vomiting potion, whose operation cannot be stopped without great danger of choaking (25), have given us a lively image of the passion of these people. We may add, that when they have their pen in their hand, they quit all things to run after some satirical thoughts; and when they have any glance of them, tho' at never so great a distance, they throw themselves on that side: and lest they should digress to no purpose, they force in, and wind any matter till they have adjusted it to their purpose; and if they find it too long and too gross, they contract and smooth it as much as their interest requires. These writers may be compared to Procrustes, who made all his prisoners equal to the measure of his bed (26). These words of Montagne agree to them exactly (27). 'There are some fools 'who turn out of their way a quarter of a league to 'hunt after a fine word, aut qui non verba rebus 'aptant †, sed res extrinsecus arcessunt, quibus verba 'conveniant. And that other passage ‡, Qui alicujus 'verbi decore placentis vocentur ad id quod non propo*sue-* 'rant scribere.'

(20) Cicero, (21).

(21) Quintil. lib. vi, cap. iii, pag. m. 288.

(22) Cicero de Orat. lib. ii, cap. lix, fol. m. 81. C.

(23) Arist. de morib. ad Nicomach. lib. iv, cap. xiv, pag. 42, 43.

(24) See, before, the article DIOGENES, remark [N].

(25) I have read this in a romance intituled, The Queen of Æthiopia, printed in 1670, or 1671.

There is more or less in all this, and I do not put together all these ideas to prove, that all those who delight in rallery and satire, do equally, and without exception, use these excesses. But it is a matter of moment to expose the character of wit, by which men are so easily seduced, by shewing it's deformed side. A writer of controversies, who has a good wit, very much diverts the readers of his party, when he turns things maliciously, and with an air of rallery, satire, and burlesque; and the more he diverts them, the more he persuades. Now, since the method he adopts, engages him into a thousand cheats, and a thousand falsifications, it is necessary one should know that he is a dangerous impostor. This will enable us to stand upon our guard; we should read him as one we must distrust, take nothing upon his word, examine what he says, and confront his words with the originals; and if we find he has changed signum delectionis into unguentum amoris, we shall tell him, I am not your fool, address yourself to others.

(26) See in the Critique Generale de l'Histoire du Calvinism of Maimbourg, Letter v, pag. 95, of the third edition, what use has been made of this parallel. See also in pag. 517, of Menage's Etymologies of the Italian tongue, and chap. lxxxvi, of his Anti-Baillet, another comparison between Procrustes and the sonnet.

(27) Montagne, Essays, book i, chap. xxv, pag. m. 261.

† Who do not fit their words to things, but make things to suit their words. Quint. lib. viii.

‡ Who by the allurement of a word which pleases them, are carried away to that which they had no desire to write. Seneca, Epist. lix.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

If I could have conſulted the work, which is intituled S. Maria Ægyptiaca, muſca de extremo fluminum Ægypti, ſibilo Domini evocata [E]. I might have enlarged very much in this ſecond edition the article of St Mary the Egyptian; but not being able to get it, I can only make this addition. This ſaint lived without food, and without cloaths, the laſt thirty years of her ſolitude, and was ſo disfigured with heat and cold, that ſhe might have been taken for an Æthiopian (b). Two loaves and ſome herbs ſufficed her for the firſt ſeventeen years of her penance (c).

(b) Veſtibus conſumptis nuda frigore & æſtu toſta ut videretur Æthiopiſſa. Cornel. à Lapide in Deuteron. cap. viii, ver. 4, pag. m. 1010.

(c) Taken from Cornelius à Lapide, ibid.

[E] The work intituled S. Maria Ægyptiaca, &c.] Theophilus Raynaudus is the author of it. I have ſeen in another of his books, that he ſuppoſed the truth of the Hiſtory of this ſaint, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the centuriators of Magdeburg (28), who look upon it as a fable, that ſhe lived on two loaves ſeventeen years; that ſhe was taken up into the air; that ſhe went over the river Jordan without ſwimming, and without a boat, and that ſome lions took care of her burial. I have ſeen alſo, that Nicolas Harſfield, under the name of Alanus Copus (29), has refuted on this ſubject the centuriators, and that there is in the book of Theophilus Raynaudus, an Appendix concerning the women who left their leudneſs and became ſaints. Porro hujus operis Mantiſſa eſt, Tractatio de mulieribus Sanctis è cœno turpitudinum emerſis (30).

(28) Centur. iv, cap. x, pag. 1334.

(29) Dial.. ii, cap. i, and xiv.

(30) Taken from Theophilus Raynaudus, Syntagm. de libris propriis, num. 24, pag. 42, 43. Apopompæi.

MARILLAC (CHARLES DE) archbiſhop of Vienne, was born in Auvergne, about the year 1510. He was advocate in the Parliament of Paris, when perceiving himſelf ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm, he followed John de la Foreſt embaſſador of Francis I to Conſtantinople. Thus he avoided the terrible perſecution, which was to be feared from the inquiſitors. He was made ambaſſador to the Sultan after the death of la Foreſt, and afterwards was entruſted with ſeveral other embaſſies (a) of which he acquitted himſelf very well. He was abbot of St Pere (b), archbiſhop of Vienne, and a counſellor in the privy-council, when the aſſembly of the Notables was called at Fontainebleau in the month of Auguſt 1560. In it he delivered an harangue, wherein learning and eloquence did no leſs appear, than his zeal for the reformation of the diſorders in the church and ſtate [A]. There he adviſed, among other things, the calling of a national council, and a meeting of the ſtates general [B]. The Guiſes were offended at his harangue, and

(a) In England and Germany, &c.

(b) Near Melun.

[A] He . . . . delivered an harangue, wherein learning and eloquence did no leſs appear, than his zeal for the reformation of the diſorders in church and ſtate.] You will find it entire in the preſident de la Place, in the third book of the ſtate of religion and the republic; and in the Hiſtory of Francis II, written by Lewis Regnier. Theſe two writers agree in ſaying, that the archbiſhop of Vienne, who gave his opinion after the other counſellors of the privy-council, carried away the prize of honour. For as he was a perſon endowed with ſingular gifts and graces, and had been employed for a long time in embaſſies of great importance far and near with great applauſe; ſo he did not only deliver his opinion very learnedly, as was believed, but alſo gave ſatisfaction to the greateſt part of the company (1). Theſe words of Lewis Regnier precede the harangue of Marillac, and theſe are the words that follow it: Such was the learned, wiſe, and Chriſtian ſpeech of this great perſon, who lived not long after it, being as it is ſaid intimidated by thoſe whom he had diſpleaſed. Others ſay, that ſeeing how things grew worſe and worſe he died of grief (2). Mr Varillas gives us an abſtract of this ſpeech, but not without ſome falſifications, of which this is one: he ſuppoſes, that Marillac repreſented, That the antient affection of the French for their king was notably diminiſhed, and that there was no other way to reſtore it but by an aſſembly of the States, that this was the only tribunal appointed to hear the complaints of the whole nation, and to ſatisfy them, as the other tribunals were for ending differences between private perſons: that the ancient founders of the French monarchy had only reſerved to themſelves this place, wherein they might ſhare with the king in the abſolute authority they had given him; where they might be admitted to a kind of equality, which was neceſſary for repairing what the prince had uſurped over his ſubjects, and what the ſubjects had uſurped over their prince; and laſtly, where the ſupreme and unlimited power, wherewith they had inveſted him, ſhould not hinder them from negotiating and concluding treaties with him, which ſhould be obligatory on both ſides: that this moderate liberty had maintained the crown for eleven hundred years, by the wonderful counterpoiſe wherewith power and ſubmiſſion were balanced (3). It is certain that the archbiſhop of Vienne ſaid nothing that contained theſe maxims, either formally or virtually, if I may uſe this word. How can we truſt the abſtracts which this Hiſtorian makes of MSS, when we ſee that he corrupts printed ſpeeches? You may ſee in the next remark, how far he took the liberty to alter and falſify them.

(1) Lewis Regnier, Hiſtory of Francis II, pag. 523, 524.

(2) Id. ib. pag. 553.

(3) Varillas, Hiſt. of France II, book ii, pag. m. 230.

[B] He adviſed . . . . . the calling . . . . . of the ſtates general.] He made uſe of the moſt ſolid reaſons that could be alledged, and anſwered very well the objections, and particularly that which was taken from this, that the authority of the king would be diminiſhed. Thoſe who ſay this, anſwered he (4), ſeem to me not to know the hearts of the French, who have always done for their king what lay in their power; and to require more were an unjuſt exaction and an impoſſibility. And therefore to propoſe to kings things that are juſt, is to eſtabliſh their authority, and not to diminiſh it, ſince they cannot do otherwiſe without violating the name of a king; and by that means the king may expect to obtain every thing he has a mind to, ſince he has ſo good a people that they will refuſe him nothing. And if it be replied, that the king ſtints himſelf who has nothing without the conſent of the people; I anſwer that ſince without aſſembling the States, and hearing the reaſons which moved the prince to increaſe the ancient offices, the people have formerly obeyed, without contradiction; what will not they do when they believe, that the reaſons of the demand, made to the States, will be found juſt? If it be urged, that this is to make the people judges, whether what the king demands is juſt. It may be replied, that, among many people aſſembled, the greateſt part of them will ſeek the public good, and that the people are capable of underſtanding what is for their own advantage, and ſo of conſenting to it, ſince the voice of the people is commonly that which is approved by GOD. Can any thing be more unlike, than this diſcourſe of the archbiſhop of Vienne, to the words of Varillas related before? But the better to diſcover that this Hiſtorian did not apprehend the deſign of what he undertook to abridge, I muſt here ſet down another paſſage of Marillac's ſpeech. We ſhall there ſee what were his thoughts, as well with reſpect to politics as to religion: and we ſhall find that as to the latter he reſembled Eraſmus; for he would have abuſes reformed, but not to make uſe of arms, either to ſupport the reformation of the church or to oppreſs the reformers. The fourth preparative, ſaid he, is (5). 'That until the aſſembling of the council, 'the ſeditious be checked and reſtrained, ſo that 'they may not diſturb the tranquillity and peace of 'men, and to take this for an undoubted maxim, that 'it is not lawful to take up arms on any pretence 'whatſoever, without the will, command, and permiſſion, of the prince, who has the ſole diſpoſal of 'them. This I ſay, becauſe of the ſad examples that 'have lately happened, and whereof we have daily 'new informations. On one ſide we have ſeen the 'tumult

(4) Lewis Regnier, ubi ſupra, pag. 548.

(5) Ib. pag. 557.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and obstructed all the good effects of his counsels. He endeavoured to take good measures to prevent the mischiefs wherewith the kingdom was threatened (c); but seeing no probability of succeeding in it, he fell into a melancholy, which brought upon him a disease, whereof he quickly after died (d), on the second of December, 1560, at his abbey of St Pere. GABRIEL DE MARILLAC, his brother, died advocate-general in the parliament of Paris in 1551, and was an able understanding man, and of an exemplary probity: consult Thuanus (e). You will find in Moreri's Dictonary, a very long article of our Charles de Marillac, and a long account of several persons of this family; but you will find nothing there about FRANCIS DE MARILLAC, advocate in the parliament of Paris, under Henry II. I shall say something of him in my commentary [C]. I do not think that the advocate I have mentioned in another place (f), was a different

(c) See, above, the article LONGVIC, remarks [A] and [B].

(d) Unde Viennensis in profundum mœrorem & ex mœrore in letalem morbum incidit, ex quo paulo post decessit. Thuan. ubi infra.

(e) Thuan. lib. xxvi, init. pag. m. 520, ad ann. 1560. See the remark [E].

(f) In citation (85) of the article HENRY III.

'tumult of Amboise, under colour of presenting a 'confession, whereas it ought to have been brought 'with all humility: on the other side, several preach-'ers have endeavoured to raise up the people for 'the extirpation of the Protestants, under colour of a 'holy sedition; as if religion allowed, that either for 'the planting or preserving of it, it was lawful to make 'use of sedition. Thus on both sides there was a fault: 'for as before men were killed on pretence that they 'were Protestants; so, on the contrary, the judges were 'forced, and the ordinary courts were assaulted, to 'make them deliver up the Protestant prisoners: 'and thus under the mask of religion, several usur-'ped the authority of the magistrate, and took up 'arms, which was in no wise lawful, but rather forbid-'den to them all. For the design of the law is to live 'godly, and not to offend any body: and the design 'of arms is to cause the law to be obeyed. The king 'therefore being the conservator of the law, and for 'that end ordained by GOD, is consequently the sole 'disposer of arms, which are given him to punish 'those that transgress the law. Wherefore to conclude, 'he makes himself king, who takes up arms by his 'own authority, and is not ordained by GOD to be 'one. And hence it follows, that every body should 'oppose him, as being one that resists the ordinance 'of GOD, which has appointed a king.

WHETHER the meeting of the states general is advantageous to France.

How wise soever the advices of this archbishop were concerning the convocation of the States, they were much censured by a famous Civilian: for Stephen Pasquier writes thus upon this subject (6). 'He who 'first gave this advice of holding a meeting of the 'States, was Charles Marillac. He, in the assembly 'at Fontainbleau (either because the affairs of France 'were not governed according to his mind, or upon 'some other occasion) by a sudden impulse of nature 'made a strong remonstrance, wherein after he had 'considered all sorts of advices he could think of, 'he declared that he found no remedy more effectual 'for the present evil, than to call together the States. 'It is an old folly, that runs in the mind of the 'wisest French, that nothing can so much relieve the 'people, as such assemblies: Whereas, on the contra-'ry, nothing does them greater prejudice, as I could 'prove by an infinite number of reasons, but that I 'should exceed the bounds of a letter. This opinion 'at first troubled a little the cardinal of Lorrain, 'who was afraid lest it should give a check to the 'king, and destroy the authority which he and the 'duke of Guise had in the government during the 'minority of the young king their nephew. And 'indeed from that time this archbishop was never 'looked upon by him with a good eye, and volun-'tarily banished himself from court. Nevertheless 'after he had consulted with his servants, of what con-'sequence this convocation of the States might be, 'and finding that it could be no prejudice to the 'king, whom he and his brother had made the most 'powerful, he was so far from rejecting this opinion, 'that he embraced it very heartily, as thinking it 'might prove a means for exterminating with the 'greater assurance and solemnity all the Protestants of 'France.' Pasquier observes, that the death of Francis II spoiled in an instant the designs of this cardinal; and having related part of what was enacted in the meeting of the states of Orleans, he adds (7): But for a general conclusion, they have granted for five years to the king, a subsidy of five sous, for each barrel of wine that is brought into the walled towns. This is for the most part the end and conclusion of such assemblies, to draw money from the people, by an honest bargain between the king and his three estates. Note, I pray you, that Pasquier boasted that he had an infinite number of reasons, to prove, that nothing is more pernicious to France, than the meeting of the states general. I do not doubt but he could have produced many reasons upon this subject, and I believe also that our Charles Marillac could have replied to them all, and that it is a matter which men may dispute eternally pro and con. But if we appeal to experience, it is apparent, that the opinion of Pasquier must prevail: for it would be very difficult, to show any advantage France has drawn from these assemblies, and easy to prove, that they only served to encourage confusions (8). The English have reason to say, that the frequent meeting of parliaments is necessary for the good of their country; but France cannot say the same thing of the meeting of her states general. They were often called together under the reign of the sons of Henry II, and France was never more embroiled and harassed than at that time; and instead of finding a remedy by these meetings, the grievances were made worse by them. No man ought more freely to own this truth than those of the Reformed religion, for in these assemblies their enemies got new strength. There are some who compare the meeting of the states general with the councils. They are, say they, assemblies that bode ill; they signify that the public evils are great, and that men begin to despair of curing them. It happens then, as in diseases that are almost desperate, many Physicians are called for and sent for from remote places; they consult, they dispute, they seldom agree, and at last they must come to a majority of votes, and so manage the matter that the sick man may say, The multitude of Physicians has killed me (9). Fine harangues are not wanting in these assemblies, and much less cabals and intrigues; and for the most part the conclusion is not the effect of justice and truth, but of the most powerful faction.

(6) Pasquier's Letters, book iv, pag. 192, 193, of the first tome.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 195.

(8) This is one of the reasons which Charles de Marillac had to oppose. He denied not the fact. Some, says he, Hist. of Francis II, ubi supra, pag. 550, have set forth, what happened in the time of king John, when the states obliged the dauphin to take several indecent courses.

(9) Hinc illæ circa ægros miseræ sententiarum concertationes, nullo idem censente ne videatur accessio alterius. Hinc illa infelicis monumenti inscriptio, TURBA SE MEDICORUM PERISSE. Plin. lib. xxix, cap. i, pag. m. 667. Compare this with what has been said above, citation (28) of the article HADRIAN.

[C] I shall say something of Francis de MARILLAC . . . . in my commentary.] He and Peter Robert were appointed council to the prince of Condé, in 1560, in the prosecution for a capital crime, which made so much noise, and which, as was thought, would have made him lose his head upon a scaffold. 'Cum præcipiti Guisianorum violentia, amputatas 'omnes moras videret Condæi uxor, libello supplice à 'rege petit & impetrat, ut marito homines spectatæ 'eruditionis ac prudentiæ darentur, quorum consilio 'uteretur: Nominati à Rege Petrus Robertus & Fran-'ciscus Marillacus celeberrimi in foro patroni (10).' I cite these words of Thuanus, because they discover the reputation of Francis de Marillac. He had been not long before advocate to Anne du Bourg. They have put in the Index to the History of Francis II, that Marillac the advocate betrayed du Bourg in pleading for him. This ought to be explained, for otherwise it might be inferred from it, that this advocate was a traitor and a prevaricator, and this would be a great injury done to him, since there was nothing in all his management but an officious lie, which was designed to save his client's life. The matter of fact is thus related by the Sieur de la Planche (11). 'His 'causes of recusation (12) were by a decree pronounced 'by Olivier, declared admissible, and it was ordered 'that he should have counsel, which had been before 'denied him, so that the cardinal was confounded. 'The advocate Marillac was assigned him for counsel, 'and he used all his endeavours to make him depart 'from his confession, alledging, that without this he 'could not avoid death; but not being able to prevail 'with him to do it, he persuaded him to let him 'plead without interrupting him, and then he might 'say

(10) Thuan. lib. xxvi, pag. 522, col. 1.

(11) Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planche, History of Francis II, pag. 53. Bena has transcribed all this passage word for word in the Ecclesiastical History of the Churches, lib. iii, pag. 222.

(12) That is, those which du Bourg had alledged.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a different man from that CHARLES DE MARILLAC, of whom la Croix du Maine ſays, that he was a gentleman of Paris, a kinſman of the archbiſhop of Vienne, an advocate in parliament, &c. a young man very learned in Greek, and well verſed in many ſciences, and that he died at Paris in 1581, or thereabouts, to the great grief of all his friends (g). I find in Father Anſelme (b) one CHARLES DE MARILLAC, who died counſellor in the parliament of Paris, April 10, 1580, and who was ſon to WILLIAM DE MARILLAC, brother to the archbiſhop of Vienne. There is no difference between that advocate and this counſellor [D]. Note, that la Croix du Maine obſerves that this prelate wrote ſeveral books, of which there are but few printed, and that thoſe that are in print, are not licenſed, there being a reaſon for it (i). GILBERT DE MARILLAC, baron of Puiſac and St Geneſt, eldeſt brother to our archbiſhop of Vienne (k), writ a hiſtory of the houſe of Bourbon, and, among the reſt, the life and great actions of the conſtable Charles de Bourbon, till the month of March 1521, when he began his revolt. Antony de la Val, the king's Geographer, and captain of the caſtle of Moulins — has inſerted this hiſtory in his works printed in 1605. The true name of this family was Marlhac [E].

(g) La Croix du Maine, pag. 46.

(b) Anſelme, Hiſt. of the great Officers. pag. 252.

(i) La Croix du Maine, ubi ſupra.

(k) Vigneul Marville Melange d'Hiſtoire & de Literat. Tom. ii, pag. 17, Dutch Edit. 1700.

ſay what he thought fit. Being therefore come before the judges, the advocate remonſtrated the merits of the cauſe, the manner of the impriſonment, which was ſuch as never had been practiſed, and much leſs the manner of Bertrand's proceeding; who, being void of all ſhame and modeſty, had acted two or three parts in preſiding and aſſiſting at the three preceding judgments. Whereby the error did not only moſt evidently appear, but alſo the nullity of the ſentences and decree; ſo that it was neceſſary to begin the proceſs anew, to null and make void all the proceedings, ſince no forms of the courts of juſtice had been obſerved. But inſtead of concluding with his appeal, he ſubmitted, and had recourſe to the mercy of the king and the court; confeſſing that his client had grievouſly offended GOD and holy mother the church, provoked the king, and had been diſobedient to his biſhop, to whom, and the holy Roman church, he deſired to be reconciled. Whereupon du Bourg, who was preſent, endeavouring to oppoſe what had been ſaid, Marillac made a ſign to the preſidents, deſiring that his life might be ſaved by this means, who, inſtead of giving him a hearing, to know whether he acquieſced in what had been ſaid by his counſel, ſent him preſently back to his priſon. But while they were conſulting to depute two among them, to acquaint the king with his converſion, and to beg his pardon, a paper written and ſigned by du Bourg came, wherein he diſowned the concluſions of his advocate, perſiſting in his appeal, and in his confeſſion of faith made before the king.'

We ſee in a dialogue of Antony Loiſel, that the chief advocates of the parliament of Paris (13) were Mr James Canaye of Paris, Claudius Mangot of Loudun, and Francis Marillac of Auvergne, who was more eſteemed than the other two, becauſe he made very good replies, but he was taken away in the prime of his years, ſo that his houſe hath been reduced to nothing, at leaſt if compared to thoſe of Canaye and Mangot. Note, that he was of the ſame family with the other Marillacs (14).

(13) Loiſel Dialogue des advocats du Parlement de Paris, pag. 520.

(14) Loiſel's Opuſcul. pag. 707.

(15) Ibid. pag. 551.

[D] There is no difference between that advocate and this counſellor.] We will ſee what is ſaid of him in the ſame dialogue of Antony Loiſel (15). Mr Charles Marillac ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence; for he acquired as much honour in that little time he was at the bar, as others do in all their lives. It is true, anſwered Mr Paſquier, he was one of the moſt ſenſible and learned men that then were; but you know the times in which we live, and the ſmall value that is ſet upon advocates, in compariſon of the counſellors, as we complained at the beginning, and not without cauſe. His relations did not give him time to ſhew his ſufficiency, and the ſtrength of his parts as an advocate, nor death, what he promiſed as a counſellor *; for he was taken off in the flower of his age †. I would ſay more of him, if he had not learned of me.

[E] The true name of this family was Marlhac.] It was thus, that Gabriel de Marillac, advocate-general of the parliament of Paris, ſigned in all the public acts and in his private letters (16). The author whom I quote aſſures us (17), that he learned this from an antient counſellor of ſtate, who knew very well the illuſtrious houſes and families of France. After which he brings two paſſages to prove, that this advocate-general, was as famous for his profound knowledge at his rare probity; one is from Thuanus, and the other from the ſuppplement to the chronicle written by John Carion. He ſuppoſes that in the latter it is Gabriel Marillacus, but in my edition (18) it is Gabriel Marliacus. This might have ſerved him to confirm what he had advanced. We may add to theſe two paſſages, what Maludan writ to Denys Lambin (19). 'Mariliacus Regius Patronus, a. d. ix. Kal. 'Maias horâ quartâ pomeridianâ exceſſit è vitâ admodum Chriſtianè. Poſtridie funus duxerunt amici '& propinqui ſine ullâ pompâ, ut moriens juſſerat: 'ſed non ſine omnium bonorum lachrymis. Deſi- 'derant etiam inimici nunc ejus, λόγως ἐπιχειρηματικὰς καὶ βιαίους, καὶ χρεωδεῖς. Eo Patrono 'fiſcum nemo unquam dicere potuit, lienem: ut loque- 'batur olim Trajanus. In demortui locum ſuffectus 'eſt Ridens (20). - - - - Marillac, the king's advocate departed this life in a moſt Chriſtian manner, on the twenty third of April at four in the afternoon. The next day he was interred, as he had deſired, without any pomp, his friends and relations accompanying the funeral, as himſelf had ordered: but not unlamented by all good men. Even his enemies now found the want of his free, forcible, and uſeful ſpeeches. When he was of counſel, none could ever call treaſure a grievance, as Trajan of old was wont to ſay. Into his place a gentleman of mirth was appointed.' But nothing is more proper to confirm what was ſaid by a counſellor of ſtate to Mr de Vigneul Marville, than the marginal note which is in the 504th page of Antony Loiſel's ſmall pieces. Here it is entire. 'He (21) is called Marlhac by Miraumont, and by Co- 'quille, who in his Commentaries on the Cuſtom of 'Nivernois, chap. 1, art. 5. relates from him a 'maxim of the French law, with great praiſe, in 'theſe words: and as that very learned and good 'man, Mr Gabriel Marlac ſaid, who was the king's 'advocate in parliament, and a good model for the 'young advocates who uſed to be at the pleadings in the 'ſaid parliament, every fraud deſerves in France ex- 'traordinary and corporal puniſhment, tho' it be 'managed as a civil affair.'

* Blanchard names two Charles de Marillacs, counſellors; one in 1541, who was ... at laſt archbiſhop of Vienne; the other was admitted the twentieth of March 1576, and is the advocate of whom we are ſpeaking.

† In 1580, Blanchard.

(16) Vigneul Marville Melange. Tom. ii, pag. 16. Dutch Edit.

(17) Ibid.

(18) That of Paris, ex Officina Puteana, 1563, in 16mo.

(19) Maludan Epiſt. ad Lambinum, pag. 367, Epiſto'. clarorum Virorum Edit. Lugd. 1561. I found this paſſage in Mr Joly's notes on Loiſel's Opuſcula, pag. 707. See there in the 630th page, a paſſage of the Ciceronianus of Peter Ramus.

(20) That is Denys Riant made the king's advocate in 1551.

(21) That is to ſay, Gabriel Marillac who was made the king's advocate in 1543.

MARILLAC (LEWIS DE) marſhal of France, ſon to WILLIAM DE MARILLAC, who was brother to the archbiſhop of Vienne, was a poſthumous ſon, born in 1573 (a), or, according to others, in the month of July, 1572 (b). You will find in Moreri's Dictionary (c), the employments that he had ſucceſſively, till he was ſeized in Italy by the king's order in 1630. He was tried and condemned to loſe his head, and was executed at Paris May the 10th, 1632. The curioſity of the Pariſians was ſo great, that a hundred thouſand perſons were witneſſes of the execution, and that

(a) Anſelme, Hiſt. of the great Officers, pag. 251.

(b) The Paris Gazette, May 17, 1632.

(c) Correct what he ſays in it, that he ſerved Henry III on divers occaſions. He ſhould have ſaid Henry IV.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſome windows were let for eight piſtoles (d). The opinion moſt common is, that he was an innocent victim, ſacrificed to the reſentment of cardinal Richelieu; but this can hardly be believed by perſons who are not governed by prejudices, and ſubmit only to certainty [A]. I ſhall make ſome obſervations thereupon (e), and I imagine I ſhall not be [A] The common opinion is, that he was an innocent victim . . . . . but this can hardly be believed by perſons who . . . ſubmit only to certainty.] The remark [F] in the article of Lewis XIII, might ſuffice for a commentary upon this text. Nevertheleſs I ſhall add to it many things. And firſt I ſhall obſerve, that it is at preſent (1) much more difficult to diſcover the truth, than at the time when the cauſe againſt Mr Marillac was pleaded, for then one might have been informed of matters by an infinite number of perſons who knew this marſhal. One might then have enquired in the places where he commanded, and have learned the names, the titles, the intereſts, and reputation, of the witneſſes, and the practices that were uſed on both ſides to put them on, either to depoſe or to retract. All this, and a hundred other things which at the time of the proceſs were eaſy, are now impoſſible to be known; that generation is now wholly paſſed and gone, and we can only make uſe of the prejudice, or the books, which remain of that time. Let us enquire a little what the favourers of this marſhal might ſay, to thoſe whom they would perſuade of his innocence, and whom they perceive to be fully reſolved to admit nothing but upon good proof.

(d) The Paris Gazette, May 17, 1632.

(e) See the remark [A].

(1) I write this in Octob. 1700.

In the firſt place they might ſay, that the public was then perſuaded, and is ſtill, that he was guilty of nothing but diſpleaſing the cardinal. II. That it is notoriouſly known, that the cardinal was ſo revengeful, that he ſpared nothing to ſatisfy his reſentment. III. That he was a perſon of ſo great credit, that he could compaſs his deſigns, either by promiſes or threatenings. IV. That the proceedings were attended with ſo many irregularities, all unjuſt, and fit to oppreſs the moſt innocent perſons, that this alone is ſufficient to ſhow that the marſhal was not guilty. V. That his ſentence was reverſed by a decree of the parliament of Paris, after the death of cardinal Richelieu. The greateſt part of the people do ſo little diſpute the grounds on which they are made to believe ſome things, that they would eaſily acquieſce in the five reaſons now propoſed: but there are others who have ſo little faith, and are ſo very hard to be perſuaded, that they would not think them ſufficient grounds for their belief.

How much cardinal Richelieu was hated.

I. To the firſt reaſon they would anſwer, that the public opinion cannot be more ſuſpected on any occaſion than on this. Cardinal Richelieu was become ſo odious through all France, that all the evil that could be ſaid of his conduct, was eaſily believed without any enquiry. He was in ſuch a poſt wherein moſt men are expoſed to calumny, and the hatred of the people, and therein he behaved himſelf in ſuch a manner as to draw upon him an infinite number of enemies; for he daily encreaſed the ſovereign authority, and puniſhed great men who durſt riſe up and cabal. This was to force them from an evil cuſtom which was very pleaſing, and had been often profitable to them. He oppreſſed the people much more than had been done in other reigns. In a word, the yoke of the royal authority, which had always been too heavy in the people's opinion, was become more inſupportable than ever, under his miniſtry. The people therefore were much diſpoſed to ſpeak ill of his perſon, and they ſwallowed down with joy, and as a kind of reſtorative, all the ſatires, complaints, and murmurings, which were ſpread againſt his reputation. France was then full of malecontents; what was formerly called the Catholicon, and which cauſed ſo many miſchiefs, had left ſome roots that remained ſtill. The greateſt part of the devout people, and all the bigots, were enraged becauſe the cardinal ſupported the Proteſtants of Holland and Germany, and hindred the houſe of Auſtria from ſubduing them. If he did good to ſome perſons, they were thought unworthy of it: if he perſecuted ſome, his enemies complained, and bewailed their being unworthily uſed (2). What relations were made of the laſt moments of thoſe whom he got condemned? What care was taken to collect all their pious diſcourſes, all their acts of love of GOD; it ſeemed as if they had a deſign to ſwell the martyrology, or to imitate that Fannius, whom I have mentioned in another place (3). The execution at Lyons was never mentioned, but in a ſtyle of complaints. This was very reaſonable, as to Mr Thuanus; but as to Mr de Cinqmars, it was not enough to pity him; but they ſhould alſo have deteſted his vanity, ingratitude, and rebellion. Now ſince the public was thus diſpoſed towards cardinal Richelieu, thoſe who will believe nothing but what is ſupported with good proofs, can never be gained by this argument: The general opinion is, that marſhal de Marillac was only guilty of diſpleaſing the cardinal, therefore he was guilty of nothing elſe.

(2) See, above, citation (41) of the article LEWIS XIII.

(3) Above, remark [A] of the article FANNIUS.

II. The ſecond reaſon has nothing in it that is convincing, ſince the experience of all tyrannic reigns ſhows, that wicked men fall ſometimes into diſgrace under a bad prince, or a very unjuſt favourite, who ſacrifices to his revenge every body, who has the misfortune to diſpleaſe him. Read attentively Tacitus, and the other relations of the ſame time, and you will find ſome wicked men among thoſe that were puniſhed under Tiberius, and under Nero. The informers attacked ſometimes perſons of a bad life, and who could eaſily be convicted of the crimes they were accuſed of. For any one therefore to conclude, becauſe ſuch an one loſt his head upon the ſcaffold under a bad reign, therefore he was innocent, is to admit a deceitful conſequence, and to run the hazard of being deluded by a manifeſt ſophiſm. Much more ought we to take heed of this kind of reaſoning, when we ſpeak of Lewis XIII, who was a very good king, and whoſe chief miniſter, how violent and revengeful ſoever he was, was obliged to obſerve better meaſures than are obſerved in a tyrannic reign.

III. To the third reaſon the ſame anſwer may be given as to the ſecond. Thoſe, whoſe power was ſo great, that they could find witneſſes and judges enough to take away the lives of innocent men, have had ſometimes enemies who were wicked men, and whom they puniſhed with death without doing any thing that is unjuſt and unreaſonable. Thus, tho' cardinal Richelieu had been a hundred times more unjuſt and more powerful than he was, yet we cannot thence infer the innocence of any one of thoſe whom he got condemned: for perhaps this concluſion might be drawn in favour of thoſe guilty perſons, who periſh ſometimes in the courts of tyrants. We muſt therefore lay aſide all prejudices, and examine each proceſs in particular. This is the only expedient, for diſcovering whether ſuch and ſuch are innocent victims ſacrificed to the reſentment of cardinal Richelieu.

IV. Now we are come to the great and only expedient. The perſons whom I ſpeak of, who carefully enquire into the truth of what is propoſed to them to be believed, would deſire that the monſtrous irregularities might be proved, which are alledged to be in the proceedings of the commiſſioners who condemned our marſhal: and if they were anſwered, that all thoſe, who might witneſs the truth of it, are dead; they ought to reply, how then do you know this? They would undoubtedly then be referred to two printed pieces, whereof one is intituled, A true relation of what paſſed at the tryal of marſhal Marillac, and of the execution of the ſentence given againſt him by the commiſſioners of the court of juſtice, eſtabliſhed at Ruel, and of his laſt words and actions juſt before his death; and the other is intituled, The happy ſoul of marſhal de Marillac, to the unhappy ſoul of cardinal Richelieu. It is true, will the others reply, we ought to examine theſe two pieces; but withal we muſt examine a printed piece, which appeared at the ſame time with this title, Obſervations on the Life and Condemnation of Marſhal de Marillac, and upon the libel intituled, A Relation of what paſſed at his tryal, and at the execution of the ſentence given againſt him, &c. The author of thoſe two firſt pieces is not known; but it is certain the third was written by Mr du Chaſtelet, a man remarkable for his birth and his offices (4); for he was advocate-general in the parliament of Rennes, maſter of the requeſts, counſellor of ſtate in

(4) See the Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. 246, 247, Edit. of Paris, 1672.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be blamed, if I ſet down part of the things which Mr du Chaſtelet publiſhed to the diſadvantage of this marſhal. Every one may believe as he pleaſes, and ſince he was his enemy, I am willing that he ſhould paſs for a very ſuſpected witneſs. I ſhall not offer theſe things but as detractions which he publiſhed, not in that Latin ſatire in rhimed proſe (f), wherein the flights of imagination might have too large a ſhare, but in a ſerious and grave piece, wherein he refutes the Apologiſts of his enemy. He ſays therefore (g), that the father of marſhal Marillac, 'was advanced from the office of maſter 'of the accounts, to that of comptroller-general of the finances, and left a very ſmall 'eſtate to his children. He was born with a handſome body, and a ready wit, and 'employed himſelf chiefly in learning his exerciſes, which he attained to perfection. 'Being not rich enough to ſubſiſt of himſelf, he lived commonly with the marquis de 'Cœuvre, who being highly in favour with the ducheſs of Beaufort, had much a-do to 'ſave

(f) See the Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. m. 247.

(g) Du Chaſtelet's Obſervations on the Life and Condemation of marſhal de Marillac, p. 770. of the Collection of ſeveral Pieces uſeful for hiſtory, Edit. 1643, 4to.

in ordinary, and intendant of juſtice in the royal army. His piece therefore ought to be eſteemed of greater weight than the anonymous writings, which are to be ſeen in the collection of what was publiſhed in defence of the queen-mother. Now we ſee that Mr du Chaſtelet denies and refutes all that had been alledged about unjuſt and irregular proceedings; and maintains, that the moſt exact formalities were obſerved in the tryal of marſhal Marillac: unleſs therefore you prove that he has aſſerted ſome facts that were falſe, and denyed others that were true, we cannot acquieſce in thoſe two anonymous pieces. One thing which he does not deny, and we know moſt certainly, is, that Mr Marillac was not tryed by the parliament of Paris, but by a court of commiſſioners. This is a very ſtrong prejudice to the diſadvantage of the cardinal; it is very well known what judges extraordinarily created are capable of, when they are choſen by ſuch as are enemies to the party accuſed (5). However ſince we now ſeek for inconteſtable proofs, or ſuch at leaſt as are ſtronger than great preſumptions, we do not pretend that this can determine us to believe the marſhal innocent. We have ſome inſtances under that reign, which prove, that ſome commiſſioners, choſen by Cardinal Richelieu, did all that could be expected from a court of the greateſt integrity. Thoſe who judged Mr de Cinqmars followed the practice in criminal cauſes with the greateſt exactneſs (6). Mr de Laubardemont, who was thought to be entirely devoted to the paſſions of the cardinal, was the reporter of the proceſs. His report hath been printed (7), which is as clear, exact, and agreeable to the rules, as ever was ſeen. The fact was proved by clear and full evidence, and after this no good judge in the kingdom could judge otherwiſe than the commiſſioners did who condemned Cinqmars. There was an extraordinary court appointed in the next reign for judging Mr Fouquet, and none had reaſon to ſay that it oppreſſed the innocent: much leſs could any ſuch thing be ſaid of that which prepared the proceſs of the duke of Luxembourg and judged him. If we inſiſt upon prejudices, they will be found to favour the cardinal Richelieu, as to the commiſſioners of marſhal Marillac. The chief man of the long robe, the keeper of the ſeals, was placed at the head of them: the others were either maſters of the requeſts, or preſidents, or counſellors in the parliament of Burgundy, &c. They referred to the council of ſtate the greateſt part of the matters that came before them, and proceeded no further in them, but by virtue of the decrees of that council: ſo that if we will ſuppoſe that marſhal Marillac was an innocent victim, we muſt ſuppoſe that his judges, in number twenty three, and the greateſt part of the counſellors of ſtate, had conſpired the ruin of an innocent man. This is hard to ſuppoſe; for common ſenſe inclines us rather to believe, that a military man has been guilty of evil practices, than to ſuppoſe that ſo great a number of ſuch magiſtrates ſhould agree to condemn an innocent man (8). Note, I pray you, that though ten of the judges did not think him worthy of death, yet all of them thought him guilty: and for this I refer my ſelf to the narrative of Mr du Chaſtelet. After each of the judges had, with an equal affection to juſtice, proved his opinion by the beſt reaſons the ſubject could afford, and the laws and proofs had been well canvaſſed for the ſpace of two hours, all their votes were reduced to theſe two opinions. Thirteen judged him worthy of death, and ten of them were for depriving him of his honour, his offices, and eſtate, and changing the ſentence of death into perpetual baniſhment, or elſe imprisonment, at the choice of the king, and in ſuch a place as his majeſty ſhould pleaſe to keep him, as had been often practiſed with ſuch perſons (9).' One of the apologiſts for Mr Marillac confeſſes, that the cardinal mixed among the new commiſſioners three or four perſons of great integrity, which he did, as he adds, the better to conceal his deſign, when he believed that his party was ſo ſtrong, that they would carry it for his condemnation, againſt thoſe who were for acquitting him (10). Is not this to acknowledge that three or four perſons of great integrity judged him worthy of perpetual baniſhment, or perpetual impriſonment? And would any good man vote againſt him, whom he believes to be innocent? In fine, I obſerve, that among ſo many people, whom cardinal Richelieu perſecuted, baniſhed, and impriſoned, there were but few whom he tryed in courts: which is a ſign, that he did not think himſelf ſtrong enough to find witneſſes and commiſſioners to his mind. He did not therefore appoint commiſſioners, but when he was ſure that the behaviour of an enemy, ſuch as that of St Preuil was for inſtance, would furniſh ſufficient proofs to the commiſſioners.

(5) See the remark [F [of the article GRANDIER.

(6) See, at the end of the Memoirs of Montreſor, the advices and inſtructions which cardinal Richelieu gave concerning this proceſs, and the way how the judges managed it.

(7) See the ſame Memoirs of Montreſor.

(8) Note, that this is not given for a rule; for it is well known that many judges have been corrupted: but here I inſiſt upon the circumſtances of this particular trial.

(9) Chaſtelet's Obſervations, ubi ſupra, pag. 806, 807.

(10) L'Eſprit bienheureux du Marêchal de Marillac, pag. m. 60.

V. As to the fifth reaſon, ſee hereafter the remark [K].

Here two objections do offer themſelves, which deſerved to be diſcuſſed. It may be alledged: 1. That we muſt not conſider the writing of Mr du Chaſtelet, and the two anonymous pieces I have cited as being of equal weight. 2. That the injuſtice of the cardinal is viſible at leaſt in this, that he cauſed a marſhal of France to be put to death, for ſuch crimes as did not deſerve ſo great a puniſhment; and which he left unpuniſhed when people had not diſpleaſed him.

As to the firſt of theſe two difficulties, I muſt obſerve, that it is not without reaſon I pretend, that the writing of Mr du Chaſtelet is of equal weight with the two anonymous pieces. I know very well, that being appointed one of the judges, he was excepted againſt as the author of a very bitter ſatire againſt Meſſieurs Marillac, and that the marſhal, when he was at the bar, did very much provoke him by his reproaches (11). I know alſo that he owned himſelf to be juſtly excepted againſt, and that he did not aſſiſt at the judgment, and that he made in priſon thoſe remarks I have mentioned, to reconcile himſelf to the court, and to procure his own liberty (12). He was therefore one, you will ſay, who wrote on one ſide to ſatisfy his hatred, and on the other, to gain the favour of cardinal Richelieu. But pray, upon what motives did the other write the two pieces, which I ſet againſt Mr du Chaſtelet's? Had not they an extreme hatred againſt the cardinal, and a paſſionate deſire to favour marſhal Marillac? Ought we to diſtruſt leſs a writer of invectives, than a flattering writer? Do you think that thoſe fugitives who wrote at Bruſſels for the queen-mother (13), thinking to make their court to the Spaniards, by defaming the cardinal, and being exceeding angry to ſee, that the advantages they expected by adhering to the intereſt of this queen, were all vaniſhed away, by the ſuperiority of the cardinal's party: do you think, I ſay that theſe writers were more credible than thoſe that were hired by this chief miniſter and flattered him. It ought not to be accounted partiality, if the one be ſuſpected as well as the other.

(11) See the relation of the proceſs and condemnation of marſhal Marillac, pag. 7.

(12) See the Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. 248.

(13) Note, that the two anonymous pieces I have mentioned are printed in the Collection of the Pieces for the Defence of the Queen-Mother.

Satire and flattery are the two plagues of hiſtory, two ſources that poiſon the relations of human events; but we may ſay, that the contagion of a detracting writer, who is governed by hatred and reſentment, is more pernicious to hiſtory, than the contagion of thoſe who write panegyrics. One of the moſt celebrated hiſto-

WHETHER flatterers corrupt the truth of Hiſtory more than ſatirical writers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'save his life, and obtain his pardon, after the murder of Caboche, whom he had killed 'upon a small provocation, and when he was not in a condition to defend himself. 'These great obligations engaged him more closely to serve his benefactor, who en- 'trusted with him the secret of his amours, and because he was not faithful in that affair, 'he broke off all further conversation with him. He lived afterwards in the court upon 'his good mein, and under the name of handsome Marillac, seeking all opportunities 'of showing his address and fine shape in public, and of making himself agreeable to 'the deceased king, who nevertheless treated him always as a mean person, and one day 'at Zamet's house turned him out from the table where he sat, with many others. All 'these

'rians of antiquity observes, that the histories they had of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, were not faithful, because they were written, either in their life-time, or little after their death: the former by persons whom fear made to falsify the truth, the latter by such as hatred, still recent, did equally influence (14). He observes in another place, that the truth had been corrupted on one side by the flatterers of princes and on the other side by the malecontents of the government, and that both of them took little care to inform posterity right; for the readers must either choose an historian that is officious to please, or one that is an enemy. But one can more easily secure himself from the imposture of a flatterer, than of a censurer: mercenary pens soon disgust, and men greedily swallow detraction and malice. Flattery is looked upon as a vile slavery, and the malice of a writer as a generous love of liberty. It is impossible to think of these things more justly, and therefore I shall give you the original of so judicious an observation (15). Postquam bellatum apud actium, atque omnem potestatem ad unum conferri pacis interfuit; magna illa ingenia cessere. Simul veritas pluribus modis infracta, primum inscitia Reip. ut alienæ mox libidine assentandi, aut rursus odio adversus dominantes. Ita neutris cura posteritatis, inter infensos vel obnoxios. Sed ambitionem scriptoris facile adverseris: obtrectatio & livor pronis auribus accipiuntur, quippe adulationi fœdum crimen servitutis, malignitati falsa species libertatis inest. It is certain, commonly speaking, that the praises of flatterers sink with those to whom they are given, and that posterity is not deceived by them; but a critical history of great men, written with a well-governed malice, is never lost. This kind of falsehood does more easily impose upon succeeding ages than the other, for its activity is eternal. The flatterers themselves gather up this like manna several ages after, and make use of it to set off the merit of their heroes. They praise without any bounds, and to make you believe that they do not love flattery, they revile, without mercy, those that are dead; and herein they are the very reverse of old men (16). Mr le Laboureur discovered this trick in some writers, of his time. If I pursue, says he (17), each good or bad hero to his cradle, I will also examine his private actions, as well as those which appeared great in the eyes of his cotemporaries; because this is the only way to destroy all the unjust monuments that flattery has erected, and to break off or disgrace the wretched trade of many writers, who are devoted to a servile and dishoneſt interest, and are so indiscreet, as to address that to posterity, which they have written only to serve a turn. We have many examples of it, but I find none that deserves more to be blamed than that of some of the modern writers, who to make it appear, that they were forced by the truth to write in commendation of some persons that are odious, or whose merit is very doubtful, and have nothing in them more commendable, but that that they are still alive, and have it in their power to do the writer good, I say, to make this appear, they affect to defame the most accomplished men, from whom they have nothing to hope or fear, and treat them rather in the style of a satire than of a history, and freely bespatter their memory with all the foul things, that a base and mercenary detraction can inspire.

Let us say something of the second difficulty, and let us grant, that it is very probable, that if marshal Marillac had not endeavoured to ruin the cardinal, he would have had nothing to fear from a court of justice; and that if he had adhered to the interest of the cardinal, his embezzling of the publick money, and extortion, had not hindered the advancement of his fortune. He was not perhaps less guilty than such and such, who did not only commit the same crimes with impunity, but were amply rewarded for their services by the recommendation of his enemy. He represented to his judges, 'that all his accusations con- 'sisted in facts so inconsiderable, that they might be 'objected to every one that had the least command in 'the army (18); and he said on the day of his execu- 'tion, That it was a strange thing he should be pro- 'secuted as he had been, when the process was only 'about hay, straw, stones, wood, and lime, and that 'there was nothing in all this for which a lacquey 'would be whipped (19).' Mr du Chastelet refutes this by very strong reasons (20); but it is certain, that the commanders of the troops at that time did commonly make use of a thousand unjust ways to enrich themselves. He makes a remark to this purpose, which is, that the marshal's faults had passed unpunished, if he had not incurred, upon other accounts, the indignation of the court. Weigh well these words (21). The most rigorous states have allowed, that commom crimes should be passed over in the chief persons: their splendor and eminent station, together with the favour of their master, which is commonly annexed to it, covers common faults: but if it happen that malice and ungratefulness destroy the favour they enjoy, they are then levelled with the meaneſt of the kingdom, their faults appear equal, and they become subject to the penalties appointed against other subjects. All men employed in great offices, come to them only by the favour of their sovereign, in whose hand all the laws are like flaming fires, to enlighten those who please him, and to consume others, when he thinks fit. Robberies and bad intrigues joyned together ruined this man. He means that the court would have winked at such-like extortions practised by another marshal of France, if the rest of his conduct had tended to the welfare of the state; but since this man's factions tended only to sow division in the royal family for the advantage of the Spaniards (22), it was thought necessary to deliver him up to the rigour of justice. To speak freely, those who formed factions with Mary de Medicis, were altogether inexcusable; for instead of cherishing in this princess the passionate desire of dominion, they should have advised her to be quiet and peaceable. She had tasted sufficiently of the royal power in her husband's life-time, and during the minority of her son. When he became of age and was married, she ought to have studied only to lead a peaceable life as a queen dowager, without endeavouring to prescribe to Lewis XIII the choice of such and such ministers, and without quarrelling with them. I believe one might apply to her what Tiberius said one day to the Widow of Germanicus. You take every thing for an injury that hinders you from reigning. Nurum Agrippinam, post mortem mariti, liberius quiddam questam, manu apprehendit: Græcoque versu, Si non dominaris, iniquit, filiola, injuriam te accipere existimas (23)? The Paris Gazette contains a remarkable thing, concerning the reasons which obliged the king not to grant letters of grace upon this occasion. The death of marshal Marillac, (so the Gazetteer expresses himself in the article from Brussels, dated May 15, 1632) makes people here talk differently: nevertheless the common opinion is, that those who wrote in the names of the queen-mother, and king's brother, letters full of threats addressed to his judges to fright them, instead of doing him any service, had been the cause of his ruin; because they hindered the king from granting him a pardon, and, in a manner, forced his majesty to give him up to justice, instead of affording him that clemency which he might have found, if his majesty had not apprehended with great reason, that the favour would have been imputed to his weakness and fear, which had been owing only to his mercy (24).

As to the question, whether the embezzling of the publick moneys could be punished with death, I refer you to Mr du Chastelet (25), who maintains, that the

(14) Tiberii, Caique, & Claudii, ac Neronis res, florentibus ipsis, ob metum falsæ; postquam occiderant, recentibus odiis compositæ sunt. Tacit. Annal. lib. i, cap. 1.

(15) Idem, Histor. lib. 1, cap. 1.

(16) Horace, de Arte Poëtica, says, that old men praise the times passed, and blame the present. Laudator temporis acti Se puero, censor castigatorque minorum.

(17) Le Laboureur, Pref. to the Hist. of Charles VI, fol. 1 ij, verso. Compare what is said in the Nouvel. de la Rep. des Lettres, June 1686, art. 1, at the end.

(18) Relation of the process of marshal Marillac, pag. 8.

(19) Ib. pag. 18.

(20) Chastelet, ubi supra, pag. 821, 822.

(21) Id. ib. pag. 804, 805.

(22) After all the knowledge and strong presumptions that his majesty might have, that he was partly guilty of the troubles and divisions that were begun in France, for the only advantage of strangers, will any body besides this faithful Historian, or one of his accomplices, think it unjust that he was thus prosecuted? Id. ib. pag. 823.

(23) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. liii.

(24) Paris Gazette, May 24, 1632, pag. 24, Edit. of Roum, in 8vo.

(25) Chastelet, ubi supra, pag. 807, &c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'these misadventures did not hinder him from charming one of the queen's maids of (b) Ib. pag. 771. 'honour [B].' He married her, and thought that after the death of Henry IV (b), under the government of the women, his outward show, and the appearance of his virtues, being joyned with his little services, his cajolling, attendance, and complaisance, would procure him all that he could not obtain before. ——— The difference between the profession of his brother, who was the master of requests, and his running at the ring, rather than his handling the sword, procured him the name of Gendarme. He was always the busiest man in the lists and tournaments. ——— The queen being concerned by her alliance to deliver him from his necessitous condition, gave him an office in the company of the duke of Orleans, increased his salary, and desired the marquis d'Ancre to make use of him. The marquis became marshal of France ——— and was secretly instructed by Marillac in the method and policy of war, and gave him hopes (i) Ib. pag. 772. of a good reward [C]. His death, and the removing of the queen-mother, left Marillac (i) burdened with a wife, and with their common poverty. ——— He had a mind to comply with those who sat at the helm, being very unwilling to depart from his pretensions at court, which were his chief inheritance. But he was given to understand, that his presence was not grateful to the king. Whereupon he returned to his mistress, alledging a false pretence of suffering banishment upon her account; and after some refusals, he was restored to her favour, and was made marshal de camp at Pont de Sé [D]. He did not well discharge this office, and yet it was confirmed to him by the king, upon the request of the queen-(k) Ib. pag. 773. mother. He conceived great hopes in 1624 (k), because MICHAEL DE MARILLAC, his brother, was advanced to the office of superintendant of the finances, and cardinal

the sentence passed upon marshal Marillac, does not exceed the rigour of the laws. This we can scarce grant him, and the sentence passed upon the marshal, would be better approved than it is, if it was like that which was passed upon Mr Fouquet. At the time of his trial there was published a learned book about embezzling the public moneys.

If it be considered, that even to this day there are some writers who plead for the innocence of Mr Marillac (26), the discussions I have now proposed in this remark, will not be found improper in a Critical Dictionary. For it is more useful than is commonly believed, not to use one's readers to suffer themselves to be drawn by the popular opinions concerning the conduct of sovereigns. But it is eminently dangerous to be deceived herein, when we understand that the common opinions are fortified by certain apophthegms that come out under great names. This is the present case; read therefore what an ingenious man has lately published. It was under pretence of robbing the public treasure, that cardinal Richelieu cut off marshal Marillac's head. They alledged against that lord, that he had employed the king's money in sumptuous buildings on his fine estate at Tournebu. This fine estate, worth about two thousand Livers per annum is in Normandy, lying on the banks of the river Siene, between Vernon and Andely. Mr de Marillac, who inherited it from his ancestors, began to build a house there worth about ten or twelve thousand crowns but left it unfinished. One day the prince of Condé, grandfather to the present prince, passing by this magnificent building, about half finished, having neither doors nor windows, stopt on a sudden, and having viewed it well, said to the gentlemen who were with him: This building is alledged as a reason why Marillac's head should be cut off; but I would not whip a page for it (27). See how this saying runs about: some ascribe it to cardinal Richelieu (28), others to Mr de Marillac himself (29), and others to the prince of Condé. If that Prince spoke in this manner he was not very exact; for he supposed that this building was the foundation of the accusations, which caused the marshal de Marillac to lose his life, and perhaps in the whole trial there was not one word said of the house of Tournebu. The judges do not concern themselves with future expences, and it would be a fine thing to condemn a man for a house which is not yet built. But what need is there of dispute? We need only read the sentence given by the commissioners, and we shall find that the accusation was grounded upon something very different from the design of a building.

[B] He charmed one of the queen's maids of honour.] The words which follow in Mr du Chastelet are these (30). 'She was descended from a branch of 'the house of Medicis, before the crown of Florence 'came into it. She was poor and indifferently hand-'some; and had already formed several designs to 'make a more advantageous alliance, which did not 'succeed. The prospect she had of meeting with no 'better fortune, and the fear she was in, that it 'would be more difficult for her being a stranger than 'for another, to live for the future with the trouble-'some title of an old maid, made her resolve to mar-'ry him. It is true, the match was easily made up, 'since she had nothing for an estate, but a great 'name, and her lover could afford nothing but his 'fine mien and galantry. But they conceived great 'hopes of advancement, and joined to the natural 'address of an Italian woman educated at court, the 'tricks and intrigues of a man, who after he had 'been fifteen years there, had learned all the arts 'of deceiving, and appearing to be what he was not.' This lady died during the trial of her husband; whereof we have a proof in the speech of the marshal to his judges. He represented to them What method the deceased lady his wife had taken to get access to the king by the means and permission of cardinal Richelieu; and he added, That she was inhumanly repulsed, banished, and worse treated than if she had been among Barbarians, being forced to retire into a village, and to dwell in a borrowed house, where she died of grief, and almost without any relief (31). The contract of this marriage was made December 20, 1607. They had no children (32).

[C] The marquis d' Ancre became marshal of France . . . . . and gave him hopes of a good reward.] Mr du Chastelet paraphrases this maliciously. The new marshal of France, says he, (33) took upon him the command of the armies without going thither: and to make people believe that he was perfectly skilled in a profession, which he had never learned, he procured Mr Marillac to instruct him secretly in the method and policy of war. After a month's conversation, they were so pleased with one another, and so well satisfied with their courage and skill, that they were quickly persuaded they could undertake any thing safely. This master of a military school, who pretended nothing but to make himself rich, and understood the ways of making an advantage by the expences of war, desired of his scholar, as the first favour, to be made commissary-general; together with a power which made all the commanders, or pay-masters, of the troops tributary to him, by taking from them all means of making a prey of the soldiers without him. This brave office, which would have brought in so good a revenue, he was assured of, if the death of the marquis d'Ancre had not prevented this design, together with many others.

[D] He was restored to the favour of the queen-mother, and was made marshal de camp at Pont de Sé.] The paraphrase which follows is no less malicious than the former. 'The fate of disgrace, which required all 'sorts of people to be accepted and employed, the 'tears of his wife, the advices and little services, 'which the party received from the other Marillac, 'his brother, being assisted by the ministry of some 'religious correspondence, caused all things past to be 'forgotten: He had the tone and look of a com-'manding officer, and could talk of entrenchments, 'half-moons, and redoubts, and had so many young 'men about him, who could better defend than de-'sign them, that for want of another, and of 'being

(26) See, above, citation (35) of the article LEWIS XIII, what I have quoted from the Mémoirs d'Artagnan, and add thereto these words of page 50, of the same book: The marshal de Marillac, tho' he was unfortunately ruined, was not therefore less esteemed by a great many good men, who knew the occasion of his misfortune.

(27) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges d'Histoire & de Litterature. Tom. ii, pag. 15. Dutch Edit. 1700.

(28) See, above, citat. (42) of the article LEWIS XIII.

(29) See, above, citation (19).

(30) Chastelet, ubi supra, pag. 770, 771.

(31) A true relation of what passed at the trial of marshal Marillac, pag. 8, 9.

(32) Father Anselme's Hist. of the great Officers, pag. 252.

(33) Chastelet, ubi supra, pag. 771.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cardinal Richelieu was made miniſter of ſtate. The firſt command that he received was to go into Champagne to the duke of Angouleſme with a commiſſion to furniſh proviſions for the army [E]. —— As this was his firſt commiſſion, ſo it was alſo the firſt beginning of his theft [F]. They became more enormous when he was employed in the fortification and building of the citadel of Verdun, of which the king made him governor, and appointed him lieutenant general of the three biſhoprics, with the office of pay-maſter-general (l). He was employed in the war of Rochelle in 1627 (m). He was preſent at the defeat of the Engliſh in the iſle of Ree [G], and ſerved, 'as Marſhal de Camp in the quarters of the 'duke of Angouleſme, with ſo bad ſucceſs, that in all the ſallies that were made, and all 'the attempts for taking the fort of Thadon, and blowing up with a petard the grates 'on the ſide of the moraſs, he was always forced to excuſe himſelf, and to juſtify his 'not being where he ſhould have been. He was conſtantly accuſed by the ſoldiers of 'ſome miſtake, and of being the cauſe why things ſucceeded ſo ill; ſo ſtrong was 'their opinion, that he was not ſo valiant as he was thought to be (n)". It was during the ſiege of Rochelle, that he begun to cabal againſt cardinal Richelieu; which he did chiefly by endeavouring to render him odious to Mary de Medicis (o). Marillac continuing at Rochelle, contributed at a diſtance, as much as lay in his power, towards carrying on the monopoly; and as he confeſſed at his tryal he wrote often to the queen-mother, and gave inſtructions to thoſe who decyphered his letters, that Mr Bouthillier, then her ſecretary, ſhould ſee none of his diſpatches; that they ſhould be conveyed by the ladies of the bed-chamber, and that this good princeſs ſhould know nothing of the diſtruſt that he had —— Thoſe who formed this cabal became ſkillful men in the practice and government of women. —— Marillac, became the hero of the faction, and therefore a deſign was laid to make him marſhal of France; and the queen-mother was ſo well perſuaded, that it was for her honour and ſervice to puſh on this matter, that ſhe uſed the ſtrongeſt recommendations which obliged the cardinal to ſnatch this ſtaff from the hand of the king, and give it to this importunate ſuitor at the ſiege of Privas (p). This new marſhal of France and his brother, who was then keeper of the great ſeal, continued their endeavours to ruin the cardinal, which they hoped to compaſs in Italy, and for this end they did what they could to hinder the king from approaching Piedmont, and with the ſame proſpect, the marſhal ſlighted the orders which the king ſent him to bring the army from Champagne into Italy (q) [H]. At laſt he went

(l) Ib. pag. 774.

(m) Ib. pag. 778.

(n) Ib. pag. 780.

(o) Ib. pag. 783.

(p) Ib. pag. 785.

(q) Ib. pag. 795.

'being better known, he was made marſhal de camp 'at Pont de Sé. Experience quickly diſcovered, by 'the undertaking, performance, and keeping of the 'works, which were all equally bad, that he was 'a much better ſoldier and captain upon paper than 'in the field . . . . . The ill opinion which the ſol-'diers had of his valour in his youth, was not made 'better after the loſs of the battle at Pont de Sé, 'which they attributed to his want of courage, and of experience (34). See the margin (35).

(34) Id. ib. pag. 772.

(35) Note, that Pont de Sé, a place upon the Loire, was attacked and taken by the king, Auguſt 8, 1620, from the troops of the queen-mother, who had declared for the malecontents.

[E] With a commiſſion to furniſh proviſions for the army.] 'He executed this commiſſion ſo ill, that the ſup-'port he had from the queen-mother, and the in-'tereſt of his brother, who became daily more pow-'erful, did not hinder him from being accuſed to the 'king from this time of miſdemeanors and thefts. 'In this firſt attack he had recourſe to the cardi-'nal by letters, and afterwards at his trial, he ſhowed 'the cardinal's anſwer of the ſeventh of April, 1625; 'which was full of marks of his friendſhip. It con-'tained an aſſurance, that he had removed out 'of the king's mind this bad impreſſion, and ad-'viſed him ſo to behave himſelf for the future, that he 'ſhould not ſtand in need of ſuch aſſiſtance (36).'

(36) Ib. pag. 799.

[F] This was alſo the beginning of his thefts.] A beginning which was attended with continual conſe-quences of the ſame nature, if we believe our author. And it will be found, ſays he (37), whatever declaration has been made of his innocence, that after this, till the time of his impriſonment, he did not manage, or treat of any affair relating to money, for his majeſty, but he practiſed all poſſible ways to make an advantage of it. The detail he gives about this is dreadful: therein are to be ſeen ſuch exceſſive and ſordid miſdemeanors, that Mr du Chaſtelet was obliged to anſwer an ob-jection which was very obvious, ſince he had elſewhere repreſented the marſhal as a perſon ambitious of glory. 'It ſeems, ſays he (38), that one who minds 'ſuperficially this diſcourſe, would think it could not 'be meant of the ſame man: Therein we ſee the 'meanneſs of all ſorts of villainies, and the high 'thoughts of honour and offices. We find alſo, that 'Marillac applied himſelf to great things, and at 'the ſame time took the poor peaſants by the throat 'to rob them of their goods. Yet it is eaſy to un-'derſtand that theſe fruits proceed from the ſame 'root, and that he might be capable of both theſe 'extreams, if any one will remember, that he was 'of a malicious and proud ſpirit, and that to bear 'the weight of his ambitious poverty, he muſt have 'had recourſe to vile practices that diſhonoured his 'life. And ſucceeding beyond his own expectation, 'he was tranſported by the impetuous current of 'his faction, wherein women, and many people in-'capable of war, had ſo much authority, that 'he who had a good mien, could talk much and 'make a noiſe, eaſily acquired the opinion of great 'valour with thoſe who had no experience in his pro-'feſſion.'

(37) Ibid.

(38) Ib. pag. 793.

[G] He was preſent at the defeat of the Engliſh in the iſle of Ree.] We ſhall now inform you who was the author of an anonymous relation, which appeared at this time. 'It is obſervable, that the keeper of the 'ſeals (39) became the hiſtorian of the tranſactions in 'that iſle at the defeat of the Engliſh, that he might 'give all the glory of them to his brother. He would 'not put his name to it, that the relation might be 'the leſs ſuſpected, and that he might give it the 'more credit againſt the public voice of all thoſe 'who returned after the fight. He was very indiſ-'creet to make the great and only harangue of his 'book about him: For beſide, that he was accounted 'by the ſoldiers a man great only in words, but little 'in deeds, he juſtified the name which the ſoldiers 'gave him of Marillac Gold-bridge, becauſe he gave 'ſo many reaſons for not fighting. He makes him 'come near the enemies to take a view of them in 'theſe words: That he approached them in ſpite of 'the volleys of the advanced ſoldiers, which he was 'forced to ſtand. Whereupon it was ſaid, at the firſt 'reading of this panegyric, that he found them of a 'bad taſte, and ſuch as he had never taſted but this time. '. . . . . In a word, he makes him the only author 'of all the feats of courage and conduct, and allows 'marſhal Schomberg only to approve his counſels, 'and Thoiras to make raſh and revengeful overtures 'for the death of his two brothers. Yet all the 'world knows, that after this action which the ro-'mance of his brother attributes wholly to him, he 'was more complained of than before, &c (40).' I ſuppreſs the reſt, becauſe it is too ſatirical.

(39) That is, Michael de Marillac, brother to him of whom I ſpeak in this article.

(40) Chaſtelet, ubi ſupra, p.g. 279.

[H] He ſlighted the orders the king ſent him, to bring his army from Champagne into Italy.] He perſiſted in his diſobedience, 'till the ninth or tenth 'of September, that an expreſs command came 'from the king to depart under a great penalty. He 'acquainted

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'these misadventures did not hinder him from charming one of the queen's maids of
(b) Ib. pag. 771. 'honour [B].' He married her, and thought that after the death of Henry IV (b), under the government of the women, his outward show, and the appearance of his virtues, being joyned with his little services, his cajolling, attendance, and complaisance, would procure him all that he could not obtain before. ——— The difference between the profession of his brother, who was the master of requests, and his running at the ring, rather than his handling the sword, procured him the name of Gendarme. He was always the busiest man in the lists and tournaments. ——— The queen being concerned by her alliance to deliver him from his necessitous condition, gave him an office in the company of the duke of Orleans, increased his salary, and desired the marquis d'Ancre to make use of him. The marquis became marshal of France ——— and was secretly instructed by Marillac in the method and policy of war, and gave him hopes
(i) Ib. pag. 772. of a good reward [C]. His death, and the removing of the queen-mother, left Marillac (i) burdened with a wife, and with their common poverty. ——— He had a mind to comply with those who sat at the helm, being very unwilling to depart from his pretensions at court, which were his chief inheritance. But he was given to understand, that his presence was not grateful to the king. Whereupon he returned to his mistress, alledging a false pretence of suffering banishment upon her account; and after some refusals, he was restored to her favour, and was made marshal de camp at Pont de Sé [D]. He did not well discharge this office, and yet it was confirmed to him by the king, upon the request of the queen-
(k) Ib. pag. 773. mother. He conceived great hopes in 1624 (k), because MICHAEL DE MARILLAC, his brother, was advanced to the office of superintendant of the finances, and cardinal

the sentence passed upon marshal Marillac, does not exceed the rigour of the laws. This we can scarce grant him, and the sentence passed upon the marshal, would be better approved than it is, if it was like that which was passed upon Mr Fouquet. At the time of his trial there was published a learned book about embezzling the public moneys.

If it be considered, that even to this day there are some writers who plead for the innocence of Mr Marillac (26), the discussions I have now proposed in this remark, will not be found improper in a Critical Dictionary. For it is more useful than is commonly believed, not to use one's readers to suffer themselves to be drawn by the popular opinions concerning the conduct of sovereigns. But it is eminently dangerous to be deceived herein, when we understand that the common opinions are fortified by certain apophthegms that come out under great names. This is the present case; read therefore what an ingenious man has lately published. It was under pretence of robbing the public treasure, that cardinal Richelieu cut off marshal Marillac's head. They alledged against that lord, that he had employed the king's money in sumptuous buildings on his fine estate at Tournebu. This fine estate, worth about two thousand Livers per annum is in Normandy, lying on the banks of the river Siene, between Vernon and Andely. Mr de Marillac, who inherited it from his ancestors, began to build a house there worth about ten or twelve thousand crowns but left it unfinished. One day the prince of Condé, grandfather to the present prince, passing by this magnificent building, about half finished, having neither doors nor windows, stopt on a sudden, and having viewed it well, said to the gentlemen who were with him: This building is alledged as a reason why Marillac's head should be cut off; but I would not whip a page for it (27). See how this saying runs about: some ascribe it to cardinal Richelieu (28), others to Mr de Marillac himself (29), and others to the prince of Condé. If that Prince spoke in this manner he was not very exact; for he supposed that this building was the foundation of the accusations, which caused the marshal de Marillac to lose his life, and perhaps in the whole trial there was not one word said of the house of Tournebu. The judges do not concern themselves with future expences, and it would be a fine thing to condemn a man for a house which is not yet built. But what need is there of dispute? We need only read the sentence given by the commissioners, and we shall find that the accusation was grounded upon something very different from the design of a building.

[B] He charmed one of the queen's maids of honour.] The words which follow in Mr du Chastelet are these (30). 'She was descended from a branch of 'the house of Medicis, before the crown of Florence 'came into it. She was poor and indifferently handsome; and had already formed several designs to 'make a more advantageous alliance, which did not 'succeed. The prospect she had of meeting with no 'better fortune, and the fear she was in, that it 'would be more difficult for her being a stranger than 'for another, to live for the future with the trouble-'some title of an old maid, made her resolve to marry him. It is true, the match was easily made up, 'since she had nothing for an estate, but a great 'name, and her lover could afford nothing but his 'fine mien and galantry. But they conceived great 'hopes of advancement, and joined to the natural 'address of an Italian woman educated at court, the 'tricks and intrigues of a man, who after he had 'been fifteen years there, had learned all the arts 'of deceiving, and appearing to be what he was not.' This lady died during the trial of her husband; whereof we have a proof in the speech of the marshal to his judges. He represented to them What method the deceased lady his wife had taken to get access to the king by the means and permission of cardinal Richelieu; and he added, That she was inhumanly repulsed, banished, and worse treated than if she had been among Barbarians, being forced to retire into a village, and to dwell in a borrowed house, where she died of grief, and almost without any relief (31). The contract of this marriage was made December 20, 1607. They had no children (32).

[C] The marquis d'Ancre became marshal of France . . . . . and gave him hopes of a good reward.] Mr du Chastelet paraphrases this maliciously. The new marshal of France, says he, (33) took upon him the command of the armies without going thither: and to make people believe that he was perfectly skilled in a profession, which he had never learned, he procured Mr Marillac to instruct him secretly in the method and policy of war. After a month's conversation, they were so pleased with one another, and so well satisfied with their courage and skill, that they were quickly persuaded they could undertake any thing safely. This master of a military school, who pretended nothing but to make himself rich, and understood the ways of making an advantage by the expences of war, desired of his scholar, as the first favour, to be made commissary-general; together with a power which made all the commanders, or pay-masters, of the troops tributary to him, by taking from them all means of making a prey of the soldiers without him. This brave office, which would have brought in so good a revenue, he was assured of, if the death of the marquis d'Ancre had not prevented this design, together with many others.

[D] He was restored to the favour of the queen-mother, and was made marshal de camp at Pont de Sé.] The paraphrase which follows is no less malicious than the former. 'The fate of disgrace, which required all 'sorts of people to be accepted and employed, the 'tears of his wife, the advices and little services, 'which the party received from the other Marillac, 'his brother, being assisted by the ministry of some 'religious correspondence, caused all things past to be 'forgotten: He had the tone and look of a com-'manding officer, and could talk of entrenchments, 'half-moons, and redoubts, and had so many young 'men about him, who could better defend than de-'sign them, that for want of another, and of 'being

(26) See, above, citation (35) of the article LEWIS XIII, what I have quoted from the Mémoirs d'Artagnan, and add thereto these words of page 50, of the same book: 'The marshal de Marillac, tho' he was unfortunately ruined, was not therefore less esteemed by a great many good men, who knew the occasion of his misfortune.

(27) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges d'Histoire & de Litterature. Tom. ii, pag. 15. Dutch Edit. 1700.

(28) See, above, citat. (42) of the article LEWIS XIII.

(29) See, above, citation (19).

(30) Chastelet, ubi supra, pag. 770, 771.

(31) A true relation of what passed at the trial of marshal Marillac, pag. 8, 9.

(32) Father Anselme's Hist. of the great Officers, pag. 252.

(33) Chastelet, ubi supra, pag. 771.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cardinal Richelieu was made miniſter of ſtate. The firſt command that he received was to go into Champagne to the duke of Angouleſme with a commiſſion to furniſh proviſions for the army [E]. ——— As this was his firſt commiſſion, ſo it was alſo the firſt beginning of his theſts [F]. They became more enormous when he was employed in the fortification and building of the citadel of Verdun, of which the king made him governor, and appointed him lieutenant general of the three biſhoprics, with the office of pay-maſter-general (l). He was employed in the war of Rochelle in 1627 (m). He was preſent at the defeat of the Engliſh in the iſle of Ree [G], and ſerved, 'as Marſhal de Camp in the quarters of the 'duke of Angouleſme, with ſo bad ſucceſs, that in all the ſallies that were made, and all 'the attempts for taking the fort of Thadon, and blowing up with a petard the grates 'on the ſide of the moraſs, he was always forced to excuſe himſelf, and to juſtify his 'not being where he ſhould have been. He was conſtantly accuſed by the ſoldiers of 'ſome miſtake, and of being the cauſe why things ſucceeded ſo ill; ſo ſtrong was 'their opinion, that he was not ſo valiant as he was thought to be (n)". It was during the ſiege of Rochelle, that he begun to cabal againſt cardinal Richelieu; which he did chiefly by endeavouring to render him odious to Mary de Medicis (o). Marillac continuing at Rochelle, contributed at a diſtance, as much as lay in his power, towards carrying on the monopoly; and as he confeſſed at his tryal he wrote often to the queen-mother, and gave inſtructions to thoſe who decyphered his letters, that Mr Bouthillier, then her ſecretary, ſhould ſee none of his diſpatches; that they ſhould be conveyed by the ladies of the bed-chamber, and that this good princeſs ſhould know nothing of the diſtruſt that he had ——— Thoſe who formed this cabal became ſkillful men in the practice and government of women. —— Marillac, became the hero of the faction, and therefore a deſign was laid to make him marſhal of France; and the queen-mother was ſo well perſuaded, that it was for her honour and ſervice to puſh on this matter, that ſhe uſed the ſtrongeſt recommendations which obliged the cardinal to ſnatch this ſtaff from the hand of the king, and give it to this importunate ſuitor at the ſiege of Privas (p). This new marſhal of France and his brother, who was then keeper of the great ſeal, continued their endeavours to ruin the cardinal, which they hoped to compaſs in Italy, and for this end they did what they could to hinder the king from approaching Piedmont, and with the ſame proſpect, the marſhal ſlighted the orders which the king ſent him to bring the army from Champagne into Italy (q) [H]. At laſt he went

(l) Ib. pag. 774.

(m) Ib. pag. 778.

(n) Ib. pag. 780.

(o) Ib. pag. 783.

(p) Ib. pag. 785.

(q) Ib. pag. 795.

'being better known, he was made marſhal de camp 'at Pont de Sé. Experience quickly diſcovered, by 'the undertaking, performance, and keeping of the 'works, which were all equally bad, that he was 'a much better ſoldier and captain upon paper than 'in the field . . . . . The ill opinion which the ſol-'diers had of his valour in his youth, was not made 'better after the loſs of the battle at Pont de Sé, 'which they attributed to his want of courage, and of experience (34). See the margin (35).

(34) Id. ib. pag. 772.

(35) Note, that Pont de Sé, a place upon the Loire, was attacked and taken by the king, August 8, 1620, from the troops of the queen-mother, who had declared for the malecontents.

[E] With a commiſſion to furniſh proviſions for the army.] 'He executed this commiſſion ſo ill, that the ſup-'port he had from the queen-mother, and the in-'tereſt of his brother, who became daily more pow-'erful, did not hinder him from being accuſed to the 'king from this time of miſdemeanors and thefts. 'In this firſt attack he had recourſe to the cardi-'nal by letters, and afterwards at his trial, he ſhowed 'the cardinal's anſwer of the ſeventh of April, 1625; 'which was full of marks of his friendſhip. It con-'tained an aſſurance, that he had removed out 'of the king's mind this bad impreſſion, and ad-'viſed him ſo to behave himſelf for the future, that he 'ſhould not ſtand in need of ſuch aſſiſtance (36).'

(36) Ib. pag. 799.

[F] This was alſo the beginning of his theſts.] A beginning which was attended with continual conſe-quences of the ſame nature, if we believe our author. And it will be found, ſays he (37), whatever declaration has been made of his innocence, that after this, till the time of his impriſonment, he did not manage, or treat of any affair relating to money, for his majeſty, but he practiſed all poſſible ways to make an advantage of it. The detail he gives about this is dreadful: therein are to be ſeen ſuch exceſſive and ſordid miſdemeanors, that Mr du Chaſtelet was obliged to anſwer an ob-jection which was very obvious, ſince he had elſewhere repreſented the marſhal as a perſon ambitious of glory. 'It ſeems, ſays he (38), that one who minds 'ſuperficially this diſcourſe, would think it could not 'be meant of the ſame man: Therein we ſee the 'meanneſs of all ſorts of villainies, and the high 'thoughts of honour and offices. We find alſo, that 'Marillac applied himſelf to great things, and at 'the ſame time took the poor peaſants by the throat 'to rob them of their goods. Yet it is eaſy to un-'derſtand that theſe fruits proceed from the ſame 'root, and that he might be capable of both theſe 'extreams, if any one will remember, that he wa-'of a malicious and proud ſpirit, and that to bear 'the weight of his ambitious poverty, he muſt have 'had recourſe to vile practices that diſhonoured his 'life. And ſucceeding beyond his own expectation, 'he was tranſported by the impetuous current of 'his faction, wherein women, and many people in-'capable of war, had ſo much authority, that 'he who had a good mien, could talk much and 'make a noiſe, eaſily acquired the opinion of great 'valour with thoſe who had no experience in his pro-'feſſion.'

(37) Ibid.

(38) Ib. pag. 793.

[G] He was preſent at the defeat of the Engliſh in the iſle of Ree.] We ſhall now inform you who was the author of an anonymous relation, which appeared at this time. 'It is obſervable, that the keeper of the 'ſeals (39) became the hiſtorian of the tranſactions in 'that iſle at the defeat of the Engliſh, that he might 'give all the glory of them to his brother. He would 'not put his name to it, that the relation might be 'the leſs ſuſpected, and that he might give it the 'more credit againſt the public voice of all thoſe 'who returned after the fight. He was very indiſ-'creet to make the great and only harangue of his 'book about him: For beſide, that he was accounted 'by the ſoldiers a man great only in words, but little 'in deeds, he juſtified the name which the ſoldiers 'gave him of Marillac Gold-bridge, becauſe he gave 'ſo many reaſons for not fighting. He makes him 'come near the enemies to take a view of them in 'theſe words: That he approached them in ſpite of 'the volleys of the advanced ſoldiers, which he was 'forced to ſtand. Whereupon it was ſaid, at the firſt 'reading of this panegyric, that he found them of a 'bad taſte, and ſuch as he had never taſted but this time. '. . . . . In a word, he makes him the only author 'of all the feats of courage and conduct, and allows 'marſhal Schomberg only to approve his counſels, 'and Thoiras to make raſh and revengeful overtures 'for the death of his two brothers. Yet all the 'world knows, that after this action which the ro-'mance of his brother attributes wholly to him, he 'was more complained of than before, &c (40).' I ſuppreſs the reſt, becauſe it is too ſatirical.

(39) That is, Michael de Marillac, brother to him of whom I ſpeak in this article.

(40) Chaſtelet, ub. ſupra, fol. 279.

[H] He ſlighted the orders the king ſent him, to bring his army from Champagne into Italy.] He per-ſiſted in his diſobedience, 'till the ninth or tenth '[illegible] September, that an expreſs command came 'from the king to depart under a great penalty. He 'acquainted

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google went from thence; but he kept thoſe troops near Lyons to put in execution the reſolutions that were taken againſt the perſon of the cardinal (r). The king's recovery made this plot miſcarry. The marſhal went over the Alps, and obtained the ſame power over the armies that the marſhals de la Force and Schomberg had (s); but the cabal having failed in their main deſign, I mean the queen not being able to obtain the favour ſhe deſired of her ſon the king, to remove the cardinal from his council, the Marillacs were undone (t). The king having taken away the ſeals from the eldeſt, which were powerful and dangerous inſtruments in ſo bad hands, cauſed him to be carried to Lizieux (u), and commanded the marſhals de la Force and Schomberg to ſeize the other, and ſend him priſoner under a ſtrong guard to the caſtle of Sainte-Menehouſt. Theſe are ſome extracts out of the book of Mr du Chaſtelet. He mentions alſo the engagement which the eldeſt of theſe gentlemen had entered into with the League [I]. We ſee, in Moreri, that the marſhal always refuſed the offers his friends made him to deliver him out of priſon, and that his ſentence was reverſed by a decree of parliament after the death of cardinal Richelieu [K]. This deſerves

(r) Ib. pag. 799.

(s) Ibid.

(t) Ib. pag. 803.

(u) Father Anſelme's Hiſtory of great Officers, pag. 104, ſays, that he was carried to the caſtle of Caën, and from that to the caſtle of Chateaudun, where he died in priſon, Auguſt 7, 1632.

‘ acquainted thoſe of Paris, that he was there as ‘ a ſhield to ſecure them againſt the forces of the ‘ emperor, that waited only for his removal, that ‘ they might enter into France. He filled the king- ‘ dom with letters written to his friends, containing ‘ the cauſes of his delay, which he excuſed to the ‘ king, ſometimes by falſe news, and ſometimes be- ‘ cauſe he could not draw troops out of the garriſons, ‘ without paying the ſoldiers and the communities ‘ which had maintained them. This delay was ſo ‘ prejudicial to the king's deſigns, that all the reſo- ‘ lutions of thoſe whom he entruſted with his affairs, ‘ and with the army beyond the Alps, remained in ‘ ſuſpence upon the uncertainty of his coming, which ‘ he promiſed in one diſpatch, and preſently delayed ‘ by another for reaſons frivolous and deceitful; which ‘ occaſioned ſuch a loſs of men and time, that if he ‘ had come in the beginning of July to Suza, as he ‘ might eaſily have done, and was commanded to ‘ do, the paſſage of Veillane had been ſecured, and ‘ the relief of Cazal infallible at the beginning of ‘ Auguſt. If he had obeyed, as he could have done, ‘ the men had not been there in the time of that ‘ peſtilence and mortal diſeaſe, which deſtroyed ‘ twenty thouſand French in the Autumn, in the ‘ plains of Piedmont. The ſtate of the beſieged, ‘ and of our troops had not forced the generals to ‘ admit, in September, the Spaniards into the city ‘ and caſtle, by a truce, which the event only ex- ‘ cuſed; and the bad air of Lyons, infected with ſo ‘ many impurities and miſeries, had not put the king ‘ in danger of his life (41).' Here you may ſee the confirmation of a reflexion I made above (42), that it was for the good and ſervice of Lewis XIII, that his troops ſhould be commanded by the friends of cardinal Richelieu; for there being nothing more proper to deſtroy this prime miniſter than the bad ſucceſs of the war, it was to be feared, that the enemies of that cardinal would favour at leaſt indirectly the enemies of France. You ſee how the Marillacs contrived the matter ſo, that the expedition to Italy, of which they had the direction, proved unfortunate (43). I am willing to believe they did not deſire the ſucceſs of the Spaniards as ſuch, but only as a means to procure the fall of the prime miniſter. Whatever motive they might have to deſire it, the intereſt of the crown, and the ſervice of Lewis XIII ſuffered by it.

(41) Ib. pag. 793.

(42) See, above, remark [X] of the article LEWIS XIII.

(43) Chaſtelet, ibid. pag. 789.

[I] The obligations which the eldeſt of theſe gentlemen had entered into with the League.] The circumſtances of this are very remarkable. Mr du Chaſtelet affirms, that, among other things, it was repreſented to cardinal Richelieu, ‘ That it would not be difficult to ‘ make people believe the ingratitude and diſguiſes of ‘ Marillac the keeper of the ſeals; that it would ‘ eaſily be credited that he, whom all the world be- ‘ lieved poſſeſſed with ſuch a furious paſſion, as to ‘ ſign the League with his own blood; who had a ‘ mind from a Frenchman to become a Spaniard; ‘ who from counſellor in the parliament of Paris, ‘ became an aſſiſtant to an attorney, to impriſon the ‘ moſt illuſtrious perſons in the world; who de- ‘ parted from his pretenſion of being a gentleman, to ‘ be a deputy of the third eſtate of the League, tho' he ‘ was an officer in the higheſt court; who from a ‘ lay-counſellor, became aſſiſtant as a cleric to the ‘ bull thundered out againſt his king; and who, from ‘ a furious Leaguer became a domeſtic to the ducheſs ‘ of Bar, and her confident ſo far as to go to a ‘ Proteſtant ſermon, might, on this occaſion, have ‘ aſſumed all the faces, changes and reſolutions ‘ that were moſt agreeable to his paſſion (44).' The author whom M. du Chaſtelet refutes, had ſaid, that marſhal Marillac recommended to his nephew, That he ſhould always ſerve the king faithfully next to G O D. Which Mr du Chaſtelet criticizes thus. ‘ Upon what ‘ other grounds, ſays he (45), was the rebellion of ‘ the League founded? Did Buſſy, the Spartacus of ‘ our age, being encouraged by the preſence and ‘ fury of Michael de Marillac, who aſſiſted him, uſe ‘ any other prologue for his driving the ſenate from ‘ their ſeats, and dragging them to priſon?'

(44) Ib. pag. 796, 797. See alſo pag. 787, and 836.

(45) Ibid. pag. 839.

[K] We ſee in Moreri that . . . his ſentence was reverſed . . . . after the death of Richelieu.] The Memoirs of Mr Puyſegur, cited in the Dictionary of Moreri, ſay, that the ſame day the marſhal was ſeized, the captain of his guards ‘ propoſed to him to procure his eſcape; ‘ and that the marſhal anſwered him, that he would not ‘ make his eſcape, if he could; that he feared nothing; ‘ that he had always been a true ſervant to the king; ‘ that he ordered him to ſerve his majeſty faithfully, and ‘ to tell all his friends to do the ſame (46).' Mr Puyſegur publiſhed this as having learned it afterwards from Mr de Marillac, when he had him in his cuſtody at Pontoiſe. Thoſe that will read what is related four pages after this, will not think that Moreri has informed us faithfully, nor that Mr Marillac had never any intention to make his eſcape. The king had a mind to know whether Mr de Puyſegur would be anſwerable for this marſhal, and conduct him to the great hall of the vicarſhip of Pontoiſe. ‘ I ſay, they are the ‘ words of Mr Puyſegur (47), that I could not anſwer ‘ for him, that Mr de Marillac, keeper of the ſeals, ‘ had there a daughter who was a Nun, that was very ‘ powerful, and much beloved, that I would not run ‘ the hazard of carrying him thither; and that there ‘ was another reaſon which hindered me, which I ‘ would not tell, but the king knew afterwards, that ‘ by the intrigue of that Nun, and the queen-mother, ‘ Mr d' Argouges, who belonged to her, would have ‘ given me a 100000 crowns to ſet Marillac at liberty.'

(46) Puyſegur Memoir. pag. 83. Dutch Edit.

(47) Ib. pag. 87.

The other obſervation of Moreri, viz. that the parliament of Paris reverſed the ſentence againſt marſhal Marillac, might have overthrown what I ſaid in the firſt remark of this article, if that parliament had revived the proceſs, and declared that the judges who condemned this marſhal, did willingly oppreſs him, or were deceived by falſe witneſſes. But I cannot believe that the decree of the parliament of Paris contained any ſuch thing. I muſt confeſs that I do not know the tenor of it, and I do not remember that I have ſeen any book except Moreri's Dictionary, wherein it is mentioned. Father Anſelme ſays nothing of it, and yet he was a man who was very careful to oblige the families he wrote about. Common ſenſe tells us, that if the parliament of Paris had declared marſhal Marillac innocent of all the crimes for which he was condemned to death, they had ſet a mark of infamy upon thoſe who had condemned him, and chiefly upon Mr de Chateauneuf their preſident. This had been a ſtain ſo black, ſo ſhameful and abominable, that I cannot underſtand how Mr de Chateaneuf could have appeared in public; and yet it was after the death of cardinal Richelieu, which, according to Moreri, was the time when the ſentence againſt Marillac was reverſed, that he was delivered from his diſgrace:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ſerves a reflexion.

may it ought to be obſerved, that he was advanced a ſecond time to be keeper of the ſeals in 1650 (48). See the margin (49). I could therefore eaſily believe, that the decree which Moreri mentions, does not concern the things whereof the marſhal was accuſed, but only the method of proceeding. It could not but be diſagreeable to the parliament; for the erection of an extraordinary court to judge the officers of the crown, was a thing irregular, and contrary to the rights of parliament. Beſides, marſhal Marillac had often declared, that he did not own the commiſſioners that tried him to be his natural judges. This might afford the parliament of Paris a ſpecious reaſon, to declare that the marſhal was not lawfully tried; but this is no proof, that they declared him innocent of the crimes upon which the condemnation was grounded. Here is a convincing inſtance of what I ſay. After the battle of Rocroy, and the taking of Thionville, the court having a mind to make ſome acknowledgment to the duke of Enguien, reſtored to the prince of Condé the fine houſe of Chantilli, and ſome other parts of the inheritance of the duke of Montmorency, to whom the princeſs of Condé was heireſs. The decree of the parliament of Paris intervening upon the letters of the grant, ſays expreſsly, that the duke of Montmorency was not rightly judged: and this is founded upon one of the moſt certain maxims of the kingdom; That the dukes and peers cannot be judged but by the king in perſon, and in his court of parliament, a ſufficient number of eccleſiaſtical and ſecular peers being preſent (50). According to theſe maxims, the marſhal de Biron had not been rightly tried; for Henry IV did not aſſiſt in perſon at his trial. But ſetting aſide all cavils, I ſhall only obſerve, that what was inſerted in favour of the duke de Montmorency, in the decree of the parliament of Paris, does no ways hinder but that he was certainly guilty of rebellion, and cannot impeach the probity of his judges. They were incompetent, if you pleaſe; but they gave ſentence according to law, and againſt a perſon who was really guilty. It often happens that inferior judges are guilty of irregular proceedings, which are nulled by ſuperior courts, and the accuſed gains nothing by it, but only a little time; for the proceedings are renewed with all the requiſite formalities, and he is duly convicted, and the firſt ſentence is confirmed in the main.

Note, That I do not intend to deny, that the honour of ſome perſons who were puniſhed with death, has been reſtored in ſuch a manner as did import a judicial declaration of their innocence; but commonly this is the conſequence of a reviewing of the proceſs, attended with new writings in juſtification of the party, and with convincing proofs of the corruption or raſhneſs of the judges. Without this, the reſtoring of the honour of thoſe that are puniſhed with death, is nothing but a favour granted for the good ſervices that have been received, or are expected, from a conſiderable family. This is a comfort to a family, and a kind of barrier againſt the inſulting reproaches of it's enemies. I cannot tell exactly what kind of reſtoring that was which follows: 'In 1549, a little after the 'death of king Francis I, James de Coucy, lord of 'Vervin, the king's lieutenant at Bologne, and Odoart 'de Biez, marſhal of France, his father-in-law, were 'condemned; the former to death, becauſe he had 'not well defended Montreuil againſt the Engliſh, the 'other to loſe his dignity of marſhal, becauſe he had 'betrayed and ſurrendered Bologne to Henry king of 'England. Theſe two lords were declared innocent 'in 1577, in the reign of Henry III, at the ſuit of 'James de Coucy, ſon to the ſaid lord of Vervin, 'and grandſon to the ſaid lord marſhal Biez: and 'the verification and publication of their innocence was done judicially at Bologne, June the 'fourteenth (51).'

To ſpeak truth, the letters-patents, edicts, and decrees of princes, contain often ſome honourable things, which, properly ſpeaking, are nothing but compliments, and muſt be underſtood after the manner of compliments. Do you think that Henry III ſpoke according to his own judgment, when he declared (52), that the duke of Alençon, his brother, the king of Navarre, his brother-in-law, the prince of Condé, and all the other lords, knights, gentlemen, officers, and inhabitants of his kingdom, who had a hand in the laſt troubles, had been in this his good and loyal ſubjects and ſervants; and when he teſtified, that he was well and duly informed of the good intention of the ſaid duke of Alençon, and that there was nothing done by him, nor by thoſe concerned with him, whoſoever they were, the living as well as the dead, but what was for his ſervice? Do you think that Lewis XIII ſpoke more ſincerely, when he declared (53), that he believed that what was done by the prince of Condé and his followers, had been done with a good intention, and for his ſervice? The like clauſes are commonly to be found in all the edicts of peace, ſince the firſt civil war for religion under Charles IX (54), and are now become a form that will be uſed at all times when the exigences of the ſtate ſhall require it. The heads of a party, in a troubleſome civil war, do commonly capitulate ſo happily for themſelves, and their own intereſt, that they obtain either the marſhal's ſtaff, or the blue ribbon, or the government of a place, beſides letters, I do not ſay of pardon, but wherein the king declares that he is perſuaded, that what they did was for his ſervice. Neither the prince who ſpeaks, nor the ſecretary of ſtate who draws up the writing, nor the chancellor who ſeals it, believe any thing of this to be true; yet the neceſſity of the times forces them to expreſs themſelves after this manner. But nobody underſtands this literally; people continue to ſay, or to think, that they bore arms againſt the king, and were rank rebels. The reſt muſt paſs for compliments under the great ſeal, and chancery-lies.

What kings do in their edicts and declarations, is alſo done ſometimes in a parliament, either by their order, or upon their recommendation, and ſometimes tho' they are not concerned in it. I mean, that the honour of perſons is reſtored ſometimes upon one pretence, and ſometimes upon another, ſuppoſing that this ſerves the purpoſes of the relations as well as reaſon it ſelf: but the judges who have condemned, are not accounted infamous, or looked upon as puniſhable, unleſs the re-inſtating decree, be grounded upon a review of the writings, and it be ordered, that the judges or witneſſes ſhall be immediately proſecuted. I think that nobody dare ſay, that the parliament of Paris ordered any thing like this againſt Mr de Chateauneuf, or againſt his aſſeſſors, or againſt that multitude of witneſſes whom they examined and re-examined. If Mr Moreri had cited ſome authors, he might have eaſed me, and perhaps enabled me to know, that what I have juſt now obſerved is needleſs. See the margin (55). It muſt be confeſſed, that in hiſtorical matters, thoſe who abound with exact quotations, do extreamly abridge the way of inſtruction.

(48) Anſelme, cited ſupra, pag. 105.

(49) The prince of Condé remembring that Mr de Chateauneuf preſided at the trial of Mr de Montmorency, (compare what is ſaid, in remark [G] of the article LEWIS XIII, at the beginning), croſſed him as much as he could, and at laſt cauſed the ſeals to be taken from him. See Priolo, lib. v, cap. xvi, & xxvi, & alib. Would not he have alledged, if he could, the infamy wherewith the parliament of Paris had marked him?

(50) Aubery, Hiſt. of cardinal Mazarin, book v, pag. 208.

(51) Richeotne, Apologetical Complaint, num. 50, pag. 184, 185.

(52) The edict of the year 1578 Art. xlix, liii.

(53) Edict of the month of May, 1616. Art. xviii.

(54) See Mr Daillé's Reply to Adam and Cottiby, part ii, cap. xviii, pag. 112, 113.

(55) Balzac, in the thirteenth Letter of the firſt book to Mr Conrart, dated April 30, 1650, mentions a letter he had writen to a gentleman of Languedoc, wherein, ſays he, I have ſpoke of the reviewing of the proceſs of marſhal Marillac, although nobody be named in it. I confeſs I know not what he means by that reviewing. I want a great many books and memoirs for which I have occaſion.

MARINELLA, or MARINELLI, (LUCRETIA), a Venetian lady of a great deal of wit, who publiſhed among other books [A] one intituled La Nobiltà e l'eccellenza delle donne con diffetti e mancamenti de gli huomini, (The excellency and nobleneſs of women with the defects and faults of men) (a). She carried the pretenſions of her ſex, not only to an equality, as ſome authors have done [B], but alſo to a ſuperiority above

(a) It was printed at Venice in 1601, in 4to.

[A] Among other books.] She wrote a book, intituled, La Colomba Sacra, (the Holy Dove) the Life of the Virgin Mary, and of that of St Francis. I find this in le coſe notabili & maravigliose della Citta di Venetia (1).

(1) At pag. 311, of the Venice Edit. 1655.

[B] At ſome authors have done (2).] I ſhall name only two: one is Madam de Gournay, who wrote a little book of the equality of men and women. Her pretenſion was diſapproved by Mrs Schurman: 'Nobiliſſima Gornacenſis diſſertatiunculam ..... uti ab 'elegantia ac lepore improbare minime poſſum: ita 'eam per omnia comprobare nec auſim quidem nec velim; licet ad ſapientum teſtimonia quæ illa nobis exhibuit, brevitatis cauſa provocarim (3). - - - - The ſhort diſcourſe of the excellent Madam de Gournay . . . . as I cannot, becauſe of it's elegance, and gracefulneſs, diſapprove

(2) See the article FONTE.

(3) Anna Maria, a Schurman, in Opuſcul. p. 85.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google above the male. Mrs de Schurman did not approve the design of this book (b); and therefore she would have blamed Mrs Jacquette Guillaume [C].

(b) Tanto vero abest ut hoc cum virginali modestia aut saltem innato mihi pudore congruere arbitrer, ut vel perlegere pigeat tractatum cætera insignem Lucretiæ Marinellæ. - - - - - So far am I from thinking this agreeable to the modesty of a virgin, or my own innate modesty, that I cannot bear to read over the treatise of Lucretia Marinella, though otherwise very ingenious. Anna Maria à Schurman, in Opusculis, pag. 85.

'disapprove it; so I neither dare, nor will, in all things 'approve it, tho', for brevity's sake, I have referred to 'the testimonies of the men of wisdom which she hath 'produced' The other author is one who published at Paris in 1673, a book intituled, Of the Equality of the two sexes, a discourse physical and moral, wherein is to be seen the importance of clearing the mind from prejudices. He thought that some would write against him, and he was threatened with it (4). But finding that none appeared to refute him, he himself wrote against his own book; for he published a treatise in 1675, Of the excellency of men, against the equality of Sexes. If you consider well all that he says, you will discover, that he had no design to refute his first book, but rather to confirm it indirectly. However it be, these two books were reprinted at Paris in 1679. It was a long time before the author of them was known: It was said in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of October 1685 (5), that his name was Frelin; but some time after it was declared there (6), that he should rather be called Poulain. And indeed this is his true name, altho' he assumed that of la Barre, at the beginning of the third edition in 1691 (7), and at the beginning of the third part of his work published in 1692. I must tell you, by the way, that he was an ecclesiastic of Lorrain, who embraced, at Geneva, the Protestant communion.

(4) See the Journal des Sçavans, March 16, 1676.

(5) Article vii, pag. 1145, of the second edition.

(6) On the back side of the last page of the table of the second edition of the Nouvelles for the year 1685.

(7) See the Hist. of the Works of the Learned, Sept. 1691, pag. 27, &c.

[C] Mrs de Schurman would have blamed Mrs Jacquette Guillaume.] Who published at Paris, in 1665, a book intituled, The Illustrious Ladies, wherein is proved, by good and strong reasons, that the Female Sex in all respects exceeds the Male. There was published at Paris a book in 8vo, in 1643, with this title, The generous Woman, who proves that her Sex is more Noble, more Politic, more Valiant, more Learned, more Virtuous, and more Frugal, than that of Men, by L. S. D. L. L. I add, that Mr Scheffer (8) informs me, that there was printed at Upsal, in 1650, a treatise intituled, La donna migliore dell huomo, Paradosso, written by Jacobus del Pozzo (i. e. de Puteo).

(8) Joh. Scefferi de Scriptis & Scriptor. Suecorum, pag. 301.

This Thesis had been a long time maintained by some wits. Jerom Ruscelli published, in 1552, an Italian book, wherein he gave the superiority of perfection to the women, CHE LA DONNA sia di gran lunga piu nobile & piu degna dell' HUOMO (9). He observes, that Plutarch, John Boccace, il Cortegiano, l'Agrippa, il Portio, il Lando (10), il Domenichi, and several others, handled this question; notwithstanding which, we do not find, that their reasons have made the world believe, that the women surpass the men. He quotes (11) Maggio, and Bernardo Spina, who writ in defence of the same opinion. I have a book, which was printed at Paris in 1617, with this title, A Reply to the Antimalice, or Defence of Women, of the Sieur Vigoureux, otherwise called Brye-Comte-Robert . . . . . by the Sieur de la Bruyere, a Gentleman of Berne. This gentleman declares (12), That his intention is to confute what the author of the defence had said, that the women are better than the men, and more virtuous in all things. Note, that this defence was the refutation of a piece of one James Olivier (13), and that he, who published it, to have a larger field of discourse, undertook to appropriate to the men . . . . what was attributed to the women, in the book which he refuted (14). You will find other writers in the second tome of Vigneul Marville's Miscellanies, at the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth pages of the Dutch edition.

(9) Ruscelli, Lettura sopra un Sonetto del Marchese della Terza, fol. 14.

(10) See his article, at the end of the rem. [A].

(11) Fol 14. verso, & fol. 15.

(12) In his preface.

(13) Intitulé, Alphabet de l'imperfection & Malice des Femmes.

(14) Preface to the Replique à l'Antimalice. This Anti is not to be found in Mr Bayle's collection.

MARINELLO (JOHN) an Italian Physician in the XVIth century, published, in Latin, Commentaries on the works of Hippocrates in general (a), and on the Aphorisms in particular (b), a Treatise of Fevers, and a Treatise of the Plague, &c. I have spoken elsewhere (c) of two Italian books, which he published, one of which will engage me to make a small remark [A].

(a) At Venice, 1575, in folio.

(b) At Venice, 1583, in 16mo.

(c) In the remark [C] of the article LIEBAUT.

[A] One of his books will engage me to make a small remark.] It is that which is intituled, Le Medicine pertenenti alle infermita delle Donne. I have shewn, in another place (1), that there is no reason for saying, that the work of John Liebaut, on the Diseases of Women, is only a translation of this. Lazarus Pe, publishing a new edition of this work of Liebaut at Paris, in 1609, in 8vo, intituled it, The Diseases of Women, and their Cure, in three books, by John Marinello, of Formia (2), a learned Italian Physician. He revised, corrected, and augmented it one third, in which he made use of Roderigo à Castro, a Portuguese Physician, who had happily seconded John Marinello. Here is a passage, in which this latter is commended, and in which Liebaut is accused of Plagiarism. 'Marinello . . . . has so skillfully handled 'this matter, that he has exceeded all the ancients 'and moderns: for all the parts of it, to the most 'minute, are clearly, distinctly, and learnedly, com- 'prised. A work worthy of so deserving a genius as 'his! of which he has given proofs throughout the 'whole: it is he, who has continued Arculan on 'Rhasis: it is he, who wrote the four books of the 'Embellishment of Women; and many other treatises, which the Italians and French have improperly laid claim to: as this book of the diseases of 'women, which M. John Liebaut claimed to himself: notwithstanding which, by comparing one 'with the other, I have discovered, that he took all 'the materials from Marinello, transposing sometimes, and adding something of his own the better 'to disguise it. But the credit of it ought to be restored to the author, and John Liebaut to be never- 'theless commended for having polished, enlarged, 'and translated this book into French; as also that of 'the Embellishment of Women (3).

(1) In remark [C] of the article LIEBAUT.

(2) In Lindenius renovatus, pag. 634, he is said to be a Venetian.

(3) Lazarus Pe, in the Epistle Dedicatory.

MARIUS, surnamed ÆQUICOLA, because he was born in the country of the Æqui in Italy [A], flourished at the end of the XVth century, and in the beginning of the XVIth. He studied at Paris, Physics and Mathematics under Faber Stapulensis (a). He was one of the wits in the court of Francis Gonzaga, marquis of Mantua, and he wrote in Italian a history of Mantua [B], wherein he enlarges very much

(a) He himself says so, as I learned by a memoir which a certain person communicated to me, but would not be named.

[A] He was surnamed Æquicola, because he was born in the country of the Æqui.] This is the opinion of Leander Albertus, in his description of Italy. Æquicolorum nomen superiori memoria Marius Alvetius plurimum nobilitavit cognomento Æquicola (1). The Italian words of this author are these; ha illustrato gli Equicoli, Mario di Alveto (2). We must not wonder, that Nicodemo (3) did not make use of them, to refute Nicolas Toppi, who placed this Mario among the Neapolitan authors (4); for there was great reason for placing him there. Marius Æquicola was of Alvito; and if on the one side, many Geographers believe, that this place was situate in the country of the ancient Æqui, it is certain, on the other side, that at present it belongs to the kingdom of Naples.

(1) Leander Albertus, in Descript. Ital. pag. 225.

(2) Fol. m. 149. verso.

(3) Nicodemo, Addit. alla Bibl. Napoletan. pag. 172.

(4) Nicolo Bibl. Napoletan. pag. 206.

[B] He wrote in Italian a history of Mantua.] Let us cite the words of Leander Albertus: 'Diu inter 'Francisci Gonzagæ Mantuani Marchionis familiares fuit,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google much upon what concerns the illuſtrious houſe of Gonzaga. He wrote many other books [C]: what he wrote about the nature of Love, was re-printed ſeveral times [D], and yet is very difficult to be met with. I have ſaid ſomething of him in another place (b), Scaliger, the father, praiſes him very much [E]. The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque deſerves to be cenſured [F].

(b) In the remark [B] of the firſt VERGERIUS.

' fuit, & lingua vernacula pereleganter Gonzagarum
' vitas ſcripſit (5). - - - - He was long honoured with
' the friendſhip of Francis Gonzaga, marquis of Mantua,
' and very elegantly wrote the lives of the family of Gon-
' zaga in his mother-tongue.' Give no credit to what he ſays of the elegance of this book; for I know that the ſtyle of it was ſo harſh, that Benedict Oſanna was obliged to correct and poliſh it, when a new edition of that hiſtory of Mantua was made in 1608. ' Maximam vitæ partem Manituæ egit Ma-
' rius inter familiares Iſabellæ Eſtenſis uxoris Fran-
' ciſci II, Marchionis in ejus gratiam ſcripſit de
' Mantuana hiſtoria breves commentarios a rerum Ori-
' gine ad ſua uſque tempora lingua Italica, eaque
' rudi & rancida, ut ea ætas ferebat. Verum ſeculo
' ſequenti Bened. Oſanna Mantuanus cum Marii hi-
' ſtoria recuderetur, voces obſoletas uſitatis commuta-
' vit, & ſtylum rubigine ſquallidum limavit ornavit-
' que (6). - - - He ſpent the greateſt part of his life at
' Mantua, among the intimates of Iſabella D'Eſte, wife
' of Francis II, the marquis, to oblige whom, he wrote
' a ſhort hiſtory of Mantua, from it's original to his
' own time, in the Italian tongue, but that rude and
' unpoliſhed, agreeable to that age. But, in the next
' century, Benedict Oſanna of Mantua, when Marius's
' hiſtory was to be reprinted, changed the obſolete words
' for thoſe in uſe, and poliſhed the ſtile.' It is divided into five books: The three firſt are dedicated to Francis II, Marquis of Mantua, who died in 1519. The fourth, being wholly deſigned for the life of that marquis, was dedicated to Frederic Gonzaga, his ſon. to whom Marius was ſecretary, if we may believe Boneſmond. The fifth contains the hiſtory of this Frederic, till the year 1521. Of this I have been informed by a memoir, which Mr . . . was pleaſed to ſend me.

(5) Leander Alberus, ubi ſupra.

(6) Theſe words are taken from a memoir, which Mr . . . . has been pleaſed to ſend me.

[C] He wrote many other books.] A treatiſe De opportunitate, printed at Naples in 1507, in 4to. Epiſtola ad Maximilianum Sfortiam Mediolani ducem de liberata Italia, printed in 1513, in 4to. A Latin apology againſt the ſlanderers of the French nation. It was tranſlated into French by Michael Roſe, and that verſion was printed at Paris in 1550, in 8vo. D. Iſabellæ Eſtenſis Mantuæ Principis iter in Galliam Narbonenſem deſcriptum. I ſhall ſpeak hereafter of the deſcription of that journey. We find in the Bibliotheque of Draudius (7) one Marius Æquivolus Olivetanus, the author of a book of Theology (8), printed at Munich in 1584, and (9) one Marius Æquicolius, the author of an harangue de laudibus trium Philoſophiæ facultatum. Toppi (10) aſcribes the firſt of theſe two treatiſes to our Marius Æquicola. He gives us the title of it, with a clauſe, which Draudius has forgotten, viz. that Anſelm Stocklius firſt publiſhed this book, after he had corrected it. Leonard Nicodemo (11) mentions this title; Introduzione di Mario Equicola al comporre ogni ſorte di rima della lingua volgare, con uno eruditiſſimo diſcorſo della Pittura, e con molto ſegrete allegorie, intorno alle Muſe, e alla poeſia, at Venice 1555, in 4to. Add to this what will be ſaid in the following remarks.

(7) At pag. 283, of the edition of Francfort, 1625.

(8) In quo tractatur unde antiquorum latria, & vera Catholici religio incrementum ſumpſerint: cum epiſtola Anthelmi Stockii Equitis.

(9) At pag. 1451.

(10) Nicolo Toppi, ubi ſupra.

(11) Nicodemo, ubi ſupra, pag. 191.

Let us ſee what Mr . . . . . has informed me of, as to the relation of a journey, which Iſabella d'Eſte, marchioneſs of Mantua, made into Provence, to viſit St Baume, to which ſhe was obliged by a vow. The author declares, that he knows not the reaſon of that journey, and would not tell it, if he knew it (12). Here is his dedication. ' Marius Æquico-
' la Ferdinando Gonzagæ Franc. March. Mantuæ iiii.
' filio S. D. P. In hoc ſcribendo non minus equidem
' animo laboravi quam corpore fatigabar, cum ea
' adirem de quibus diximus loca: ſequitur enim laſ-
' ſitudo ingenii, ut corporis. Jam vero arma Itine-
' raria non Herculis ad poſtem fiximus, ſed in tem-
' plo Veneris genitricis conſecravimus. Illius ergo
' hæc ad te. Vale. - - - - Marius Æquicola, to Fer-
' dinand Gonzaga, ſon of Francis iiii, marquis of Man-
' tua. In writing this, I have wearied my ſelf no leſs
' in mind than in body, when I came to thoſe paſſages,
' of which we ſpoke. But now I have hung up the ar-
' mour of my expedition, not on the pillar of Hercules
' but in the temple of my mother Venus. For her ſake I
' ſend you this.' He begins his relation with inquiring into the original of vows among the ancients. After this, he leads his heroine, thro' Venice, over the Alps, into Provence, and gives a ſhort and good deſcription of the places, thro' which ſhe paſſed. The impreſſion of the book is faulty; for there is no year to it, nor is the year of the pilgrimage mentioned; but it ſeems it was before 1512.

(12) Cauſas noncnt alii, non diſſimulo ne meminerint: quod equidem ſcirem, diſſimularem.

[D] What he wrote about the nature of Love was reprinted ſeveral times,] Toppi mentions only the edition of Venice 1536, in 8vo; which is not the firſt; for he ſays, Un libro di natura d'amore, riſtampato e corretto (13) Nicodemo (14) takes notice of the edition of Venice 1554, in 12mo, which is intituled; Libro di Natura d'amore di Mario Equicola di nuovo con ſomma diligenza riſtampato, e corretto da M. Lodovico Dolce. Con una tavola delle coſe piu notabili che nell' opera ſi contengono. He ſays, that Doni mentions this book with praiſe, in his firſt Libreria, at p. 73, of the Venice edition 1550. This book of Æquicola was reprinted at Venice in 1563, and 1583. Gabriel Chapuys made a French tranſlation of it, which was printed at Paris (15): The following paſſage of Auguſtinus Niphus will not be ſuperfluous: ' Tempori-
' bus noſtris Marius Æquicola Olivetanus amiciſſimus
' noſter meo Judicio fertiliſſime de amore ſcripſit, &
' licet vulgari atque materno ſermone, tamen nihil
' intentatum præteriit (16). - - - In our times, Marius
' Æquicola of Olivetum, my very good friend, wrote
' with a moſt fruitful genius, in my opinion, on the ſub-
' ject of love; and, tho' in the vulgar and mother-
' tongue, yet he left nothing unattempted.' Do not take Olivetanus for an error of the preſs; for the author calls himſelf Equicolam Olivetanum, in his book De opportunitate (17). It was not becauſe he was of the order of the monks of mount Olivet, as Poſſevin affirms in his Apparatus; but becauſe he believed the place of his birth might be called Olivetum (18), as well as Alvitum or Alvetium.

(13) Toppi, ubi ſupra.

(14) Nicodemo, ubi ſupra.

(15) See du Verdier's Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 433.

(16) Auguſt. Niphus, de amore, cap. i, pag. m. 285.

(17) Mr . . . . in the memoir cited above.

(18) Ab Oleis, ibid.

[E] Scaliger. the father, praiſes him very much.] He inſcribed a piece of Poetry to him, which begins thus:

Maxime vir, geminas cui circum tempora laurus
Purpurea facilis nectit Apollo manu:
Æquicola Aonidum decus, acceptiſſime rerum
Numinibus veſtris, numinibuſque meis:
Quid faciam miſeri . . . . (19)?

O thou! the Muſes favourite! for whoſe brows
A double laurel Phœbus ſelf prepares:
Deareſt Æquicola! What ſhall I do,
Unhappy that I am? . . . . .

(19) Julius Cæſar Scaliger, in Lacrymis, part i, Poematum, pag. 535, Edit. 1591.

This Poem was written in 1517, if we believe Joſeph Scaliger (20), who adds, that his father and Matthew Bandel, a dominican, contracted a very cloſe friendſhip at Mantua, while they were both inſinuating themſelves into the favour of Æquicola.

(20) Joſephus Scaliger, Confut. Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 264. See alſo pag. 240, 241.

[F] The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque deſerves to be cenſured.] Marius Æquicola is there firnamed Alvelanus (21), which is a fault; it ſhould be Alvetanus. It is ſaid there, that his Italian treatiſe De natura amoris, corrected by Thomas Fazellus Porcaccius, was printed at Venice in 1563. I know no author, who has thoſe three names. Marius Æquicola Alvetanus, the author of that book, is impertinently diſtinguiſhed from Marius Æquicolus, ' Vir nobilis, Italus, eques
' auratus, qui ſcripſit pro Baptiſta Mantuano defenſo-
' rium in ſycophantas librum 1. Item de opportuni-
' tate. Item de natura & de amore. - - - - - A man
' of noble birth, and an Italian, who wrote a book, in ' favour of Baptiſta Mantuanus, intituled Defenſorium
' in Sycophantas; another, De opportunitate; and
' another, De natura & amore.'

(21) Epit. Bibl. Geſn. pag. 573.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MARLIANUS (RAIMOND), wrote an alphabetical deſcription, veterum Galliæ locorum, populorum, urbium, montium, ac fluviorum, eorum maxime quæ apud Cæſarem in Commentariis ſunt, & apud Cornelium Tacitum, i. e. Of the antient places, people, cities, monntains, and rivers of Gaul, thoſe eſpecially, which occur in Cæſar's Commentaries, and Cornelius Tacitus: which is uſually printed at the end of Cæſar's Commentaries. It was ſaid, in the year 1704, in a famous aſſembly, that he was one of the learneſt men of his time, in the reign of Lewis XII (a). In my edition of Julius Cæſar he is called Vir clariſſimus, & ſui temporis eruditiſſimus, that is, A moſt famous man, and the greateſt ſcholar of his time.

(a) See Memoirs de Trevoux, July 1704, pag. 1133.

MARNIX (PHILIP DE) lord of Mount Sainte Aldegonde. See SAINTE ALDEGONDE.

MARNIX (JOHN DE) baron des Potes, &c. is not known to me but by a book intituled, Reſolutions Politiques, ou Maximes d'Eſtat, which he printed at Bruſſels in 1612, in 4*to*. It contains ſome good things, and chiefly in the margins. He dedicated it to the arch-duke Albert, ſovereign of the Low-Countries, whoſe ſubject he acknowledges himſelf to be. He put out, ſome years after, a ſecond edition of it, very much enlarged (a), and dedicated it to the Infanta Iſabella Clara Eugenia, this arch-duke's widow. I have not ſeen his other book, intituled Repreſentations, which the catalogue of Oxford mentions to have been publiſhed at Bruſſels in 1622, in 4*to*.

(a) It was reprinted at Rouen, in 1624, and in 1631, in 8vo.

MAROT (CLEMENT) valet de chambre to Francis I, and the beſt Poet of his time, was of Cahors. He infinitely exceeded JOHN MAROT, his father, who was pretty good at making verſes (a) [A]. Some ſay, that he was educated, in the quality of a page to Nicolas de Neufville, who was the firſt of his family that was ſecretary of ſtate; but they are miſtaken [B]. They add, with more truth, that, about 1520, he was appointed to ſerve the princeſs Margaret [C], the king's ſiſter, and the duke of Alençon's wife.

(a) See Paſquier, Recherches de la France, lib. viii, cap. vi, pag. m. 613.

[A] JOHN MAROT, his father, ... was pretty good at making verſes.] He was born at Mathieu, near to Caen, if we may believe Moreri. Others ſay only, that he was of Caen, and add, that he was Poet to queen Anne of Bretagne, and then valet de chambre to Francis I (1). The collection of his works contain, The Doctrinal of Princeſſes and noble Ladies, deduced in 24 Rondeaux. The Journies to Genoa and Venice, victoriouſly finiſhed by king Lewis XII. Other forty-nine Rondeaux. An Epiſtle of the Ladies of Paris to king Francis I, being in Italy, after he had defeated the Swiſſers. Another Epiſtle of the Ladies of Paris to the Courtiers of France, who were then in Italy. Another Epiſtle to queen Claudia. The Church ſpeaking to France. A Royal Song about the Conception of Our Lady, and another Royal Song in honour of JESUS CHRIST (2).

(1) La Croix du Maine, pag. 242.

[B] Some ſay, that he was educated in the quality of a page ..... but they are miſtaken.] Mr de Rocolles aſſerts this fact (3), againſt whom I offer two reaſons. Nicolas de Neufville, who was the firſt of his family, that was preferred to the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, was born in 1542 (4); and therefore he could not have Clement Marot for page, who was then fifty-five years old, Nicolas de Neufville, his father, died very ancient in 1599 (5); nevertheleſs we may very well ſay, that he was born a long time after our Poet. Now, we never ſee gentlemen much younger than their pages. This is my firſt reaſon. The ſecond is taken from a Poem, wherein Marot relates, that, after he left his country, he was always in the retinue of Francis I.

(2) Taken from du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibliotheque Franſoiſe, pag. 718.

(3) Rocolles, True Hiſtory of Calviniſm, lib. v, pag. 153.

(4) According to F. Anſelme, Hiſt of the great Officers, pag. 273, he died in 1617, aged ſeventy five years.

5) Anſelme, ib.

A bref parler, c'eſt Cahors en Quercy,
Que je laiſſay pour venir querre icy
Mille malheurs; auſquelz ma deſtinée
M' avoit ſubmis. Car une matinée
N'ayant dix ans en France fus mené:
Là ou depuis me ſuis tant pourmené,
Que j'oubliay ma langue maternelle,
Et groſſement apprins la paternelle,
Langue Françoiſe es grand Cours eſtimée:
Laquelle en fin quelque peu s'eſt limée.
Suyvant le Roy François premier du nom,
Dont le ſavoir excede le renom.
C'eſt le ſeul bien, que j'ay acquis en France
Depuis vingt ans en labeur, & ſouffrance (6).

(6) Marot, in the poem intituled Hell, pag. 42, Hague Edit. 1700.

In ſhort, Cahors in Quercy did I leave,
Oppreſs'd with woes unnumber'd here to grieve.
Scarce ten years old, to France I was convey'd,
One morn; where, afterwards, ſo long I ſtay'd,
That I forgot my mother-tongue, to gain
Imperfectly the French, with toil and pain.
In time, I gain'd a victory entire
Or'e that fam'd language, which great courts admire;
Following the great king Francis, firſt o'th' name,
Whoſe knowledge far exceeds his royal fame.
In France, this ſole advantage cou'd I gain,
By twice ten years of ſuff'rance and of pain.

Mr de Rocolles adds, that Marot dedicated to this lord of Neufville one of his Poems, intituled, The Temple of Cupid; and that the epiſtle, wherein he dedicates this Poem, is dated at Lyons, May the 15*th*, 1538. Several editions of Marot (7), which I have conſulted, give me no ſuch account (§ a): The Temple of Cupid is placed in them at the beginning, without date, and without any dedication.

This wants reforming. See remark [R].

[(§ a). If Mr Bayle could have conſulted the old editions, particularly that of Stephen Dolet, Lyons 1542, in which this epiſtle is found, he would have ſeen, that, when Marot compoſed his Temple of Cupid, he was, in fact, page to Nicolas de Neufville, lord of Villeroy. For the reſt, this Poem is at leaſt as old as the year 1532, becauſe we find it among the Juvenilia Clementina, reprinted in 8vo, at Paris, that year, by Jeffery Tory. So that the dedication of the ſame Poem to the lord of Villeroy, in 1538, related properly to the laſt reviſal which the author made of it; and it is alſo what that dedication expreſsly ſays. REM. CRIT.]

(7) That of Paris, by Nicholas du Cheſmin, 1545, in 16mo. That of Paris by Eſtienne Groulleau, 1552, in 16mo. That of Lyons by Guillaume Rouille à l'eſcue de Veniſe, 1548, in 16mo. That of Roüen, by Raphael du Petit Val, 1596, in 12mo. That of Roüen, by Claude le Vilain, 1615, in 12mo. That of the Hague, by Adrien Moetjens, 1700, in 12mo

[C] He was appointed to ſerve the princeſs Margaret.] Mr de Rocolles affirms, that ſhe took him into her ſervice as her ſecretary (8). But Marot, who is more to believed than any other, tells us, that he was not in that employment.

(8) Rocolles, ubi ſupra, pag. 15.

Rien n'ay acquis des valeurs de ce Monde,
Qu'une Maiſtreſſe, en qui git & abonde
Plus de ſavoir, parlant, & eſcrivant,
Qu'en autre femme en ce Monde vivant.
C'eſt du franc Lys l'iſſue Marguerite,
Grande ſur terre, envers le Ciel petite:

C'eſt

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Wife. He followed that duke to the army in 1521 (b). He was wounded, and taken prisoner, at the battle of Pavia [D]. This adventure is less taken notice of, than the persecution he suffered from the bigots, who put him in prison as one suspected of Heresy [E]. When he was delivered out of their hands, by the protection of Francis I, he (b) See the Epistle of Marot from the camp of Attigny, pag. 104, of the Hague Edit. 1700, and the following.

C'est la Princesse à l'esprit inspiré,
Au cueur esleu, qui de Dieu est tiré
Mieux (& m'en crois) que le festu de l'Ambre :
Et d'elle suis l'humble Valet de chambre.
C'est mon estat. O Juge Plutonique :
Le Roy des Francs, dont elle est sœur unique,
M'ha fait ce bien : & quelque jour viendra,
Que la sœur mesme au frere me rendra (9).

(9) Marot, Ibid. pag. 43.

The only worldly benefit I found,
A mistress was, in whom I saw abound
More wit, than her whole sex beside can show ;
Great on the earth, but to heav'n bending low.
My muse the princess Margaret intends,
Into whose soul heav'n inspiration sends ;
Whose pious heart GOD to himself does draw,
Better, I trust, than amber does the straw.
On her, her very humble slave, I wait ;
And this, Plutonian judge, is Marot's fate.
This honour to her brother do I owe,
Who on his sister did this gift bestow :
The compliment, perhaps, she may repay,
And Marot be giv'n back another day.

These verses inform us, that he was appointed by Francis I, to serve the princess, his sister : which appears also by the following passage :

Ainsi je suis poursuy, & poursuivant
D'estre le moindre, & plus petit servant
De vostre hostel (magnanime Princesse)
Ayant espoir que la vostre noblesse
Me recevra, non pour aucune chose,
Qui soit en moy pour vous servir enclose :
Non pour prier, requeste, ou rhetorique,
Mais pour l'amour de vostre Frere unique,
Roy des François qui à l'heure presente
Vers vous m'envoye, & à vous me presente
De par Pothon, Gentilhomme honorable (10).

(10) Id. in the Despourveu à Madame la Duchesse d'Alençon, pag. 104.

'Tis thus, great princess, I aspire to be
The humblest vassal of your high degree ;
Hoping to me your favour will be shown,
Not for ought meritorious of my own ;
But for the king your royal brother's sake,
Who sends me now, your bounty to partake.
Presented thus by Mr Pothon's hand,
I humbly wait your highness's command.

[D] He was wounded, and taken prisoner, at the battle of Pavia.] The author of the Life of Clement Marot, inserted in the collection of the most excellent pieces of the French Poets (11), has not omitted this adventure. He produces the following verses of Marot, without telling us from what piece he had them (12).

(11) Printed at Paris by Claude Barbin, 1692.

(12) It is from the first Elegy, pag. 47. It is not inscribed to the king, as is affirmed in the Life of Clement Marot, prefixed to his works, in the Hague Edit. 1700.

Là fut percé tout outre rudement
Le bras de cil, qui t'ayme loyaument :
Non pas le bras, dont il ha de coustume
De manier ou la lance, ou la plume :
Amour encor le te garde, & reserve,
Et par escrits veult que de loing te serve.
Finalement, avec le Roy mon maistre
Delà les monts prisonnier se vid estre
Mon triste corps, navré en grand suffrance.
Quant est du cueur, long temps y ha, qu'en France
Ton prisonnier il est sans mespriſon.

'Twas there that arm, whose loyalty profound
To you is known, receiv'd a cruel wound :
But not that arm, which wont to guide the pen,
Or wield the glitt'ring lance, was wounded then.
Love, for your sake, that arm does still preserve,
It's mistress, tho' removed far off, to serve.
Lastly, beyond the Pyrenees convey'd,
And pris'ner, with my royal master, made,
My body now's enslav'd by cruel chance ;
My heart has long your pris'ner been in France.

[E] The bigots put him in prison, as one suspected of Heresy.] This was done at the instance of Dr Bouchard, when Francis I was the prisoner of Charles V in Spain. The first of these two facts is proved by these words of Marot :

Donne response à mon present affaire,
Docte Docteur. Qui t'ha induit à faire
Emprisonner depuis six jours en ça,
Un tien Amy, qui onc ne t'offensa ?
Et vouloir mettre en luy crainte, & terreur
D'aigre justice, en disant, que l'erreur
Tient de Luther ? Point ne suis Lutheriste,
Ne Zuinglien, & moins Anabaptiste :
Je suis de Dieu par son filz Jesu Christ (13).

(13) Marot's Epistle to Mr Bouchart, Dr of Divinity, pag. 116.

Answer me, learned sir ; what cou'd prevail
On you, to throw your friend into a goal,
Six days in hard confinement there to lye,
And tremble for the law's severity ;
Saying, that I with Dr Luther err ?
I am no Heretic, I do aver.
Nor Zuinglius, nor Luther is my guide ;
Much less with Anabaptists do I side.
My orthodoxy to the world is known ;
I worship God, thro' Jesus Christ his son.

He afterwards in this letter, continues to protest, that he is orthodox and a good Catholic. The proof of the second fact is contained in the verses I am going to transcribe. Note, that Marot relates, in them, what passed between his judges and him, during his imprisonment.

Or suis-je loing de ma Dame, & Princesse,
Et pres d'ennuy, d'infortune, & destresse,
Or suis-je loing de sa treſclere face.
S'elle fus pres (ô cruel) ton audace
Pas ne se fust mise en effort de prendre
Son serviteur, qu'on n'ha point veu mespredre :
Mais tu vois bien (dont je lamente, & pleure)
Qu'elle s'en va (helas) & je demure
Avec Pluton, & Charon nautonnier.
Elle va veoir un plus grand prisonnier :
Sa noble mere ores elle accompagne
Pour retirer nostre Roy hors d'Espagne (14).

(14) Marot, in the poem intituled Hell, pag. 43.

I am absent from my royal mistress' eye,
And near to grief, distress and misery,
Had she been by, her presence you'd have fear'd,
And guiltless I from durance had been spar'd.
But wisely you the princess' absence chose.
(Fatal departure ! cause of all my woes !)
She's gone, alas ! and left Marot behind,
With Pluto, and with Charon, here confin'd.
She's gone, and her great mother in her train,
To bring our captive monarch back from Spain.

I know not the circumstances of the conclusion of this process ; but I believe that the king and the princess Margaret protected our Poet. Do not tell me, that it

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he was ſtill in great fear of thoſe people, and ſo much the more, becauſe he had very naturally deſcribed the injuſtice of the Chatelet in one of his Poems (c). And therefore, when he knew, that they were again in ſearch after him, and that they had ſeized his books, he had not the courage to return to Paris [F]. He left Blois, where he had learned this it is manifeſt that the letter (15), he wrote to Francis I, on the fifteenth day of his impriſonment, was very well received, and that this prince was ſo charmed with it, that he wrote himſelf to the court of Aydes, to procure the liberty of Clement Marot (16); for this concerns another impriſonment, not about Hereſy, which was after the king's return into France. It is eaſy, to prove all theſe particulars. Marot declares, that he had been in priſon fifteen days, and that he was accuſed of taking a priſoner out of the hands of the ſerjeants (17). It appears by the regiſter of the court of Aydes at Paris, that the letter of Francis I, concerning the enlargement of Marot, is dated from Paris, November 1, 1527 (18). This prince declares, that he was duly informed of the cauſe of the ſaid impriſonment, which was the reſcueof certain priſoners, and enjoins, that all excuſes being ſet aſide, Marot ſhould be delivered out of priſon; which orders the court obeyed. Here then is a fault to be corrected in the collection of the moſt excellent pieces of the French Poets, and in the new edition of the works of Clement Marot (19). The Life of this Poet, in both theſe works, ſays, that the letter of Francis I to the court of Aydes, delivered Marot out of priſon, where he had been put upon ſuſpicion of Hereſy. Did the court of Aydes meddle with that? This ought to teach thoſe, who write the lives of private perſons, that it concerns them to attend to the ſmalleſt circumſtances.

(c) See the remark [F], citation (22).

(15) It is at pag. m. 149 of his works.

(16) The Life of Clement Marot in the collection of the moſt excellent pieces of the French Poets, Tom. i.

(17) See his letter to the king, pag. 149.

(18) See the Anti-Baillet, of Mr Menage, Tom. ii, ob. cxii.

(19) That at the Hague 1700.

[F] He had not the courage to return to Paris.] Let us hear what he himſelf ſays: he tells us, that as he was returning thither, he came back, when he underſtood that the king was prepoſſeſſed againſt him. The verſes, which I cite, are in a letter, which he wrote to that monarch.

Pour revenir donques à mon propos,
Rhadamanthus aveques ſes ſuppoſts
Dedans Paris, combien que fuſſe à Blois,
Encontre moy fait ſes premiers exploits,
En ſaiſiſſant de ſes mains violentes
Toutes mes grands richeſſes excellentes,
Et beaux treſors, d'avarice delivres:
C'eſt à ſavoir mes papiers, & mes livres,
Et mes labeurs. O Juge ſacrilege,
Qui t'ha donné, ne loy, ne privilege,
D'aller toucher, & faire tes maſſacres
Au cabinet des ſaintes Muſes ſacres?
Bien eſt-il vray que livres de deffenſe
On y trouva: mais cela n'eſt offenſe
A un Poëte, à qui on doibt laſcher
La bride longue, & rien ne lui cacher (20).
- - - - - - - - -
Le Juge donc affecté ſe monſtra
En mon endroit, quand les premiers outra
Moy, qui eſtois abſent, & loing des villes,
Où certains fols feirent choſes trop viles,
Et de ſcandale: helas, au grand ennuy,
Au detriment, & à la mort d'autruy.
Ce que ſçachant, pour me juſtifier.
En ta bonté je m'oſay tant fier,
Que hors de Blois party, pour à toy Sire,
Me preſenter: mais quelqu'un me vint dire,
Si tu y vas, amy, tu n'es pas ſage:
Car tu pourrois avoir mauvais viſage
De ton Seigneur. Lors comme le Nocher,
Qui pour fuir le peril de'un Rocher
En pleine mer ſe deſtourne tout court,
Ainſi pour vray m'eſcartay de la Court;
Craignant trouver le peril de durté:
Où je n'euz onc fors douceur, & ſeurté (21).

(20) Marot, in his Epiſtle to the king, during his exile at Ferrara, pag. 179.

(21) Ib. pag. 180.

But to return to my narration true;
Fell Rhadamanthus, and his horrid crew,
At Blois their firſt attacks upon me made,
And their dire hands on all my riches laid.
They bore my books by violence away,
And my dear treaſur'd papers were their prey.
O ſacrilegious judge! What laws permit
To violate the Muſes cabinet?
Were books prohibited among them found?
Poets by ſuch reſtraints were never bound.
A looſer rein ſhou'd be indulg'd the muſe,
And bards have liberty their books to chuſe.
- - - - - - - - -
Tho' abſent from the town, their ſpite I found,
Who know with keeneſt calumny to wound.
This knowing, I, my innocence to clear,
Reſolv'd before your majeſty t'appear;
And, leaving Blois, to court I took my way,
But ſome one ſtopp'd me, and began to ſay;
If you go thither, friend, you are not wiſe;
The king may ſee you with unfav'ring eyes.
Then, as a pilot, when he ſpies a rock,
Turns ſhort his veſſel, to avoid the ſhock,
So I my ſteps directed far from town,
Dreading a jail, whoſe hardſhips I had known.

Note, that he begins this letter with repreſenting that his flight is no proof that he owns himſelf to be guilty, but only that he is convinced of the bad adminiſtration of juſtice.

Je penſe bien que ta magnificence,
Souverain Roy, croira que mon abſence
Vient par ſentir la coulpe, qui me point
D'aucun mesfait: mais ce n'eſt pas le poinct.
Je ne me ſens du nombre des coulpables:
Mais je ſçay tant de Juges corrompables
Dedans Paris, que par pecune prinſe,
Ou par amis, ou par leur entreprinſe,
Ou en faveur, & charité piteuſe
De quelque belle humble ſoliciteuſe,
Ilz ſauveront la vie orde, & immunde
Du plus meſchant, & criminel du monde
Et au rebours, par faute de pecune,
Ou de ſupport, ou par quelque rancune,
Aux innocens ilz ſont tant inhumains,
Que content ſuis ne tomber en leurs mains.
Non pas que tous je les mette en un compte:
Mais la grand' part la meilleure ſurmonte.
Et tel merite y eſtre authoriſé,
Dont le conſeil n'eſt ouy, ne priſe.
Suyvant propos, trop me ſont ennemys
Pour leur Enfer, que par eſcrit j'ay mis,
Où quelque peu de leurs tours je deſcœuvre,
Là me veult on grand mal pour petit œuvre:
Mais je leur ſuis encor plus odieux,
Dont je l'oſay lire devant les yeux
Tant clervoyans de ta Majeſté haute,
Qui ha pouvoir de reformer leur faute (22).

(22) Ib. pag. 176.

Perhaps your majeſty may take my flight
For proof of guilt; but that wou'd not be right.
I truſt I ſhall not criminal be found:
But corrupt judges ev'ry where abound.
At Paris, money properly apply'd,
With friends, and a fair ſuitreſs on your ſide,
Will ſtop the hands of juſtice, right or wrong,
And ſave the vileſt ſlave that ever ſwung,
But, if you cannot bribe the magiſtrate,
Tho' innocent, the gallows is your fate.

I wou'd

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

this news, and retired to the houſe of the queen of Navarre, his antient miſtreſs (d), and, not thinking himſelf ſafe there, he went into Italy, and ſtaid at the court of the princeſs

(d) The ducheſs of Alençon was becoſne queen of Navarre by her marriage with John d'Albret.

I wou'd not fall into ſuch hands as theſe,
To ſuffer, or eſcape, as they ſhall pleaſe.
Not that this cenſure comprehends them all;
But ah! the number o'th' upright is ſmall.
And ſuch alone deſerve to fill the chair,
Who without favour or affection bear.
*Beſides, too many foes my Hell * has made*
Of ſuch, who fear, leſt I ſhould ſpoil their trade;
Who curſe my muſe for painting them aright,
And dragging ſome of their dark deeds to light.
But more they take offence, that I ſhou'd dare
To bring ſuch verſes to your royal ear.
They know, your majeſty has piercing eyes,
To ſee, and to reform, their villanies.

* A poem of Marot's ſo called.

He informs us afterwards of a thing his Hiſtorians take no notice of, viz. That he was made priſoner while he was under a great ſickneſs, and that the king gave orders he ſhould be let alone.

- - - Meſmes un jour ils vindrent
A moy malade, & priſonnier me tindrent,
Faiſans arreſt ſus un homme arreſté
Au lict de mort, & m'euſſent pis traité,
Si ce ne fuſt ta grand' bonté, qui à ce,
Donna bon ordre avant que t'en priaſſe,
Leur commandant de laiſſer choſes telles:
Dont je te rends graces treſimmortelles (23).

(23) Ibid. pag. 177.

One day they came, when I in bed was laid,
Sick, and in pain, and me their priſ'ner made;
Arreſting one almoſt at his laſt breath,
And ſinking under the arreſt of death.
But let me thank your gracious majeſty,
Which kindly interpos'd to reſcue me.
My life and liberty to you I owe,
Who bad their envious rage no farther go.

Then he goes on, and cenſures the Sorbonne, and proteſts, that the ſuſpicions of Hereſy, they had endeavoured to raiſe in the king's mind againſt him, were altogether unjuſt. See what he ſays againſt the Sorbonne.

Autant comme eux, ſans cauſe qui ſoit bonne
Me veult de mal l'ignorante Sorbonne:
Bien ignorante elle eſt d'eſtre ennemie
De la trilingue, & noble Academie,
Qu'as erigée. Il eſt tout manifeſte,
Que là dedans contre ton veuil celeſte
Eſt deffendu qu'on ne voiſe allegant
Hebrieu, ny Grec, ny Latin elegant:
Diſant, que c'eſt langage d'Heretiques.
O povres gens de ſçavoir tous ethiques!
Bien faites vray ce proverbe courant,
Science n'ha hayneux que l'ignorant.
Certes, ô Roy, ſi le profond des cueurs
On veult ſonder de ces Sorboniqueurs,
Trouvé ſera que de toy ils ſe deulent.
Comment douloir? Mais que grand mal te veulent,
Dont tu as fait les lettres, & les arts
Plus reluiſans, que du temps des Ceſars:
Car leurs abus void on en façon telle.
C'eſt toy, qui as allumé la chandelle,
Par qui maint œil void mainte verité,
Qui ſous épeſſe, & noire obſcurité
A fait tant d'ans icy bas demeurance.
Et qu'eſt-il rien plus obſcur qu' ignorance?
Eux, & leur court en abſence, & en face
Par pluſieurs fois m'ont uſé de menace:
Dont la plus douce eſtoit en criminel
M' executer (24).

(24) Ibid.

The Sorbonne, ignorant ſociety,
Beholds Marot with no leſs jealous eye:
Thoſe ignorants, who fooliſhly withſtand
The nurſ'ry, founded by your royal hand;
Where the three languages ſhould ſtudied be:
But 'tis well known, they thwart your majeſty,
Forbidding the young ſtudents to recite
Greek, Hebrew, Latin, languages polite;
But languages abus'd by Heretics,
And therefore ill befitting Catholics.
Poor wretches, laid in Pagan darkneſs low,
You verify the Proverb (well I know)
That ignorance is learning's only foe.
Certes, O king, cou'd we to th' bottom ſee
Of their diſlike, they hate your majeſty;
Under whoſe reign, auſpicious, arts ariſe,
Science uprears her head, and ignorance flies;
Learning appears in a more ſhining robe,
Than when the mighty Cæſars ſway'd the globe.
'Tis you have lit the candle, by whoſe light,
Truth, bury'd long in ignorance's night,
(For what is more obſcure, than ignorance?)
Burſts forth upon the general eye of France.
Theſe ignorants, and their ſociety,
Preſent, and abſent, oft have menac'd me,
Death was the mildeſt ſentence I cou'd hope;
And 'twas their pity doom'd me to the rope.

I do not ſet down the heroic vow, which he adds. He wiſhed he might be ſacrificed to their rage, provided the church were not ſubject to their frauds. I doubt whether he would have carried his zeal ſo far as he ſaid; but I do not doubt of what he ſays, that thoſe Doctors had a mind to keep up ignorance. This part of the XVIth century will be an eternal blot to the Sorbonne, who managed things at that rate. Let us now go on to the proteſtations this Poet made of his being orthodox.

Or à ce coup il eſt bien évident,
Que deſſus moy ont une vieille dent,
Quand ne pouvans crime ſur moy prouver,
Ont tres-bien quis (25), & tres-bien ſceu trouver,
Pour me faſcher, briefve expedition,
En te donnant mauvaiſe impreſſion
De moy ton ſerf, pour apres à leur aiſe
Mieux mettre à fin leur voulonté mauvaiſe:
Et pour ce faire ilz n'ont certes eu honte
Faire courir de moy vers toy maint compte,
Avêques bruit plein de propos menteurs,
Deſquelz ilz ſont les premiers inventeurs.
De Lutheriſte ilz m'ont donné le nom:
Qu' à droit ce ſoit, je leur reſponds que non.
Luther pour moy des cieux n'eſt deſcendu:
Luther en Croix n'ha point eſté pendu
Pour mes pechez: & tout bien advisé,
Au nom de luy ne ſuis point baptizé:
Baptizé ſuis au nom qui tant bien ſonne,
Qu'au ſon de luy le Pere éternel donne
Ce que l'on quiert: le ſeul nom ſous les cieux
En, & par qui, ce monde vicieux
Peut eſtre ſauf. Le nom tant fort puiſſant,
Qu'il ha rendu tot genoüil flechiſſant,
Soit infernal, ſoit celeſte, ou humain:
Le nom, par qui du Seigneur Dieu la main
M'ha preſervé de ces grands loups rabis,
Qui m' eſpioient deſſous peaux de Brebis (26).

(25) The ſame as cherché.

(26) Ibid. pag. m. 178.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

princeſs Renata of France, ducheſs of Ferrara (e), who was a good friend to thoſe of the Reformed religion. He obtained, of Francis I, leave to return, in 1536 [G]; but he was ſo well known to be a follower of what was called the new opinions, that he made his eſcape, ſome years after, to Geneva. It is pretended, that he there debauched his landlady, and that the penalty of death, which he feared, was changed into that of whipping, at the requeſt of Calvin [H]. He left Geneva, and went to Piedmont, where he died

(e) See the Epiſtle, which Marot wrote to the king, during his exile.

Now their revengeful ſpirit plain is ſeen,
When, failing 'gainſt my life to vent their ſpleen,
A ſhort expedient they at length have found,
At once my quiet, and my fame to wound,
By robbing me of what I hold moſt dear,
Your gracious countenance, and princely ear;
That, ſtript of royal favour, I may feel
The utmoſt rage of blind and furious zeal.
This to effect, without remorſe or ſhame,
My character they blacken and defame,
And brand with Luther's Hereſy my name.
The charge is falſe, and a meer calumny;
Luther did not come down from heav'n for me,
Nor dy'd upon the croſs, from ſin to ſet me free.
In Chriſt's, nor Luther's, name, I was baptiz'd;
That name, whoſe ſound in Heav'n ſo much is priz'd,
That it procures us all we wiſh to have,
Powerful alone a vitious world to ſave:
That name, at which all knees do humbly bow,
In Heav'n above, in Earth, or Hell below:
That name, by which the Father does me keep Safe from theſe ravenous wolves, in cloathing of a ſheep.

[G] He obtained . . . . leave to return in 1536.] This date is verified by his poem intituled, A Godbleſs-you to the Court (27), which he wrote a little after his arrival: in it he ſpeaks of the death of the Dauphin, and of the marriage of the princeſs Magdalen (28), and obſerves, that ſhe was upon her departure. Now the Dauphin was poiſoned in Auguſt 1536, and the princeſs Magdalen married the king of Scotland on the firſt day of the year 1537. Add to this, that Marot ſays he arrived at Lyons, a little after Francis I. ſet out from thence (29).

(27) Pag. m. 191.

(28) He calls her Queen Magdalen: but this does not prove, that the marriage was compleated; it being ſufficient that it was agreed upon.

(29) This prince departed from thence, after the emperor Charles V retired from Provence, in the autumn of the year 1536.

Si qu'à Dieu rends graces un million,
Dont j'ai atteint le gracieux Lyon,
Où j'eſperoys à l' arriver tranſmettre
Au Roy François humble ſalut en mettre (30)
Conclud eſtoit. Mais puis qu'il en eſt hors,
A qui le puis je, & doy je addreſſer, fors
A toy qui tiens par prudence loyale,
Icy le lieu de ſa hauteur Royale (31).

(30) That is to ſay, in verſe.

(31) Marot, in his poem to cardinal de Tournon, pag. 189.

At Lyons (Heav'n be prais'd!) I am ſafe arriv'd,
But of my hopes unluckily depriv'd.
King Francis, at whoſe feet I thought to lay
His humble ſlave, and my poor duty pay,
Is gone: ſince then I've miſs'd his majeſty,
To whom can I ſo properly apply,
As you, who, by your royal maſter's grace
With loyal prudence here ſupply his place?

Mr Maimbourg ſays, that the ducheſs of Ferrara obtained of the king the return of our Poet, upon aſſurance given, that he ſhould be more wiſe for the future (32). Others ſay, that king Francis I. granted the ducheſs her petition, only upon condition, that Marot ſhould return to the Romiſh religion, and ſhould be more diſcreet for the future (33). I do not ſee in the works of Marot, that that princeſs meddled with this; and I doubt whether her zeal for the Proteſtant religion would permit her to treat of the recalling any man upon ſuch conditions. This is certain, that Marot, having begged of the Dauphin to obtain him a paſs for ſix months, declared that he had learned in Italy to be very circumſpect in his diſcourſes, and never to ſpeak of God.

(32) Maimbourg, ubi infra, pag. 97.

(33) The Life of Marot, in the collection of the moſt excellent pieces of the French Poets.

Il le feroit (34) s'il ſavoit bien comment
Depuis un peu je parle ſobrement:
Car ces Lombards avec qui je chemine,
M'ont fort apris à faire bone mine:
A un mot ſeul de Dieu ne deviſer,
A parler peu, & à poltronniſer.
Deſſus un mot une heure je m'arreſte:
S'on parle à moy, je reſpons de la teſte.
Mais je vous pry mon ſaufconduit ayons,
Et de cela plus ne nous eſmayons (35).

(34) That is, the king would recall me.

(35) Marot, Epiſtle to the dauphin, pag. 183.

The king wou'd me recal, were it but known,
How cautious in diſcourſe of late I'm grown.
Theſe Lombards, in whoſe country I reſide,
From talking indiſcreet my tongue have ty'd.
To utter the word GOD I'm never heard;
I dwell an hour upon a ſingle word.
If any ſpeak, I hear indeed what's ſaid,
But only nod, and anſwer with my head.
Pray let my paſſport be diſpatched away,
And of theſe things we'll talk another day.

[H] It is pretended, that he debauched his landlady at Geneva, and that the penalty of death . . . . was changed . . . at the requeſt of Calvin.] All thoſe, who affirm this, build upon the teſtimony of Cayet, who therefore muſt be taken for the firſt, and the only perſon that affirms it. Florimond de Remond, who is alſo cited, is only his tranſcriber. As if by reading and meditating on the Pſalms, which he tranſlated ſo ill, they are the words of Mr Maimbourg, he was not become a better man †, and afterwards, according to his former cuſtom, leading a very licentious life, he had debauched his landlady, which is puniſhed with death at Geneva. Calvin, by his intereſt, cauſed his puniſhment to be changed ‡ into another more mild, which was that of whipping, which he ſuffered through all the ſtreets (36). Here follow the words of another writer. Having committed at Geneva a notorious adultery, he had certainly been hanged, if, by the intereſt of Calvin, they had not converted the puniſhment into that of whipping through all the ſtreets of Geneva, as Cayet ſays. But Beza, conſidering he was one that followed the ſame errors with himſelf, and whoſe pſalms he had finiſhed, does not ſo clearly declare this fact (37). It is true, Theodore Beza only obſerves in general, that Clement Marot could never reform the habit of immorality, he had got at the court of France. Quamvis (ut qui in aula, peſſima pietatis & honeſtatis magiſtra, vitam fere omnem conſumpſiſſet) mores parum Chriſtianos ne in extrema quidem ætate emendarit (38). This general expreſſion implies a great deal, and in particular inſinuates, that Marot did in no wiſe edify the Genevois by his chaſtity. However, I do not think it probable, what Cayet ſays; for if a poet, ſo famous as Marot, and ſo much hated in the Romiſh communion, had been whipped through all the ſtreets of a great city, all Europe would have quickly known it; he would have been inſulted, upon the account of this infamy, in ſeveral books; he would not have dared to preſent himſelf before thoſe, who commanded for the French king at Piedmont; we ſhould not have been reduced to the ſingle teſtimony of Victor Cayet, ſo many years later than this adventure. Some may ſay, that the Proteſtants themſelves would have publiſhed this puniſhment, to ſhew the ſeverity of their diſcipline at Geneva: but it muſt be granted, that this obſervation has no great weight; for, without being perfect in the moſt refined politics, any one will judge that the reputation of a brother, who is perſecuted, muſt be managed to the beſt advantage (39). For the reſt, it is ridiculous to object to the Proteſtants the publick uſe of Marot's Verſion, ſuppoſing he had been puniſhed for his adulteries: for the immorality of a Poet, who tranſlates the Pſalms of David well, ought not to prevent the ſinging of his tranſlation in churches; any more than the immorality of a Painter, † Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes Ref. lib. i.

‡ Cayet, in his Formul. Flor. de Ræm. lib. viii, cap. xviii.

(36) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calv. livr. ii, pag. m. 99.

(37) The Life of Clement Marot, in the collection of the moſt excellent pieces.

(38) Beza, in Iconibus.

(39) Note, that the public records of Geneva make no mention of this puniſhment of Marot. See Jurieu, Apol. for the Reformed, cap. xii, pag. 124.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

died in 1544, aged about sixty years [I]. The Chronological fault, which, it seems, Mr Maimbourg is guilty of, concerning the first flight of Clement Marot, is very slight [K]. As to the other faults he has committed, speaking of this person, you may see a refutation of them in the authors, who wrote against his history of Calvinism. You may find in Sleidan (f), and Pasquier (g), a fine Elogy upon Clement Marot. It may be said, without flattery, not only that the French Poetry had never appeared with such natural charms and beauty, as he adorned it, but also that, in all the remainder of the XVIth century, there appeared nothing that came near his happy Genius, his native elegance, and the smartness of his Poems. The Poets of the Pleiad are dull in comparison of him: And if, in the next age, a Voiture, a Sarrazin, a Benserade, and some others, exceeded him, it is only because they found the times improved to a better judgment, and a more refined stile (b). The incomparable La Fontaine, who owned himself

(f) Sleidan, lib. xv, ad ann. 1543, fol. m. 366.

(g) Pasquier. Recherches, lib. vii, cap. v, pag. m. 613, 614.

(b) Mr de la Bruyere, whose words you will see in the remark [M] of the article RONSARD, confirms this.

Painter, or Statuary, ought to hinder those, who worship images, from consecrating a picture or statue.

[I] He died in Piedmont in 1544, aged about sixty years.] The first of these two facts is told us by Sammarthanus, and the second by Theodore Beza. But we must not think, that Sammarthanus condescended to tell us, that Marot died in 1544. This had been too plain, and would not have allowed him to express himself in pompous phrases: therefore, in order to it, he tells us that this Poet died the year, in which the battle of Cerizolles was fought. ‘ Cum extorris & rerum ‘ egenus Taurini apud infubres procul à tuorum aspectu ‘ decesseris, eo ipso anno quo ad Ceresolam illius agri ‘ oppidum regius exercitus Anguiano duce insignem de ‘ Cæsarianis victoriam reportavit (40). You dying a ‘ banished man, far from the sight of your relations and ‘ friends, in Piedmont, that very year, in which the ‘ king's army, under the duke of Anguien, gained a signal ‘ victory over the Germans at Cerizoles, a town of that ‘ country.’ There is among the Poems of Marot (41), a stanza of ten verses to the king, sent from Savoy in 1543, and (42) a salutation from the camp of the duke of Anguien at Cerizoles. This shews, that he left Geneva the same year that he published his fifty Psalms. ‘ Edidit illos quinquaginta Psalmos hoc anno ‘ Genevæ, quosese receperat, cum in Galliis propter ‘ Lutheranismi suspicionem parum esset tutus. Tri- ‘ ginta quidem Psalmos ediderat ante biennium (43) - - - ‘ He published those fifty Psalms this year at Geneva, ‘ whither he had retired, not being safe in France, on ‘ account of a suspicion of Lutheranism. He had pub- ‘ lished thirty Psalms two years before.’ There is an Eclogue upon the victory of that duke of Anguien (44). As to the sixty years of Marot's life, I must have recourse to other witnesses (45), for Sammarthanus does not stoop to take notice of it. Note, that I shall rectify, below in the remark [R], what concerns the sixty years. The verses, cited above in citation (5), seem to prove, that, in 1526, he was but thirty years of age. Note, that in his eclogue, under the name of Pan and Robin, he considers himself as on the brink of old age.

[K] The Chronological fault, which, it seems, Mr Maimbourg is guilty of, is very slight.] He says that Clement Marot did not run away till 1535. ‘ When .. ‘ he saw, that the king, his master, positively declared ‘ in the hall of the bishop's palace that he would ‘ spare no body in this case, he was afraid lest he ‘ should be seized, and therefore he fled quickly into ‘ Berne, and after that he went farther over the Alps ‘ to Ferrara, to the duchess Renata, who pro- ‘ tected the Protestants (46).’ The King's Declation in the hall of the bishop's palace, was in the year 1535 (47). Mr Maimbourg relates it (48) under that year with many circumstances. Now we have shewn above, that Marot returned from Ferrara into France in 1536, and we find in his poems (49) a letter from Lyon Jamet to Marot, of which the last verses are these:

C'est à Ferrare au huictieme an
De la sienne proscription.
Mais à la tienne intention
Que ce soit le dernier. Amen.

That is,

At Ferrara, in the eighth year of his banishment; but may it prove the last. Amen.

This is a proof will some say, that the flight of Marot could not be, at the latest, till the year 1528. But those, who shall say so, are very much to blame; for Lyon Jamet marks the time of his own proscription, and not of Marot's. It will be said, that this latter, in a letter, which he wrote to Ferrara, upon the departure of Madam de Soubise, says (50), that this lady left a court, wherein she had continued seven years. It is probable that she followed Renata of France, who was married, in 1527, to the duke of Ferrara; from whence it might be concluded, that she returned into France in 1534; which would prove, that Marot was beyond the Alps that year. But, I confess, this proof appears to me weak, when I consider, that Rabelais, in the year 1536, mentioned the return of this lady as a piece of news (51). As I see nothing in the Works of Marot, which can make us believe, that he stayed long at the court of the duke of Ferrara, I do not think, that Mr Maimbourg is much mistaken; for Marot himself tells, that he stayed but a little while at the court of the king of Navarre.

Si m'en allay, evitant ce danger,
Non en pais, non à Prince estranger,
Non point usant de fugitif destour,
Mais pour servir l'autre Roy à mon tour,
Mon second Maistre, & ta sœur son espouse,
A qui je fus des ans a quatre & douze,
De ta main noble heureusement donné.
Puis tost apres, Royal chef couronné,
Sçachant plusieurs de vie trop meilleure,
Que je ne suis, estre bruslez à l'heure,
Si durement, que mainte nation
En est tombée en admiration,
J'abandonnay, sans avoir, commis crime,
L'ingrate France, ingrate, ingratissime
A son poëte (52).

I fled, tis true, the danger to avert,
But fled not to a stranger prince's court.
A fugitive is an inglorious thing:
I paid my duty to another king,
My second master, and his royal spouse,
The princess, Sir, your sister, in whose house,
Full sixteen years are pass'd, since I was plac'd,
And with the title of her servant grac'd.
Soon after, hearing, that the fire did roast
Many, of better lives than I can boast,
Whilst wand'ring nations saw, with great surprise,
The kindling flames of persecution rise;
France I abandon'd, that ungrateful soil,
But most ungrateful to her Poet's toil.

Comparing this passage with that, which I have cited above (53), we may easily discover the true epoch of the retreat of Clement Marot, and in what manner the circumstances are to be ordered. The enemies of this poet accused him to the king in the time of the placards, and doubtless they rendred him suspected of being an accomplice in the insolence of those who posted them up. He had notice of this, and was resolved to go and justify himself: but because he was told, that he could not compass his end, he retired to the queen of Navarre, and, being informed there, that Francis I caused some Lutherans to be burnt, he removed farther still

(50) The works of Marot, pag. m. 209.

(51) See the article FERRARA, citat. (47).

(52) Marot's Epistle to the king, in the time of his exile at Ferrara, pag. 180, 181.

(53) Citat. (21).

(40) Sammarthanus, Eleg. lib. i, pag. m. 24.

(41) At pag. 383.

(42) At pag. 387.

(43) Sleidanus, lib. xv, fol. m. 366 verso, ad ann. 1543.

(44) At pag. 473.

(45) To Theodore Beza, who has said, in his Icones, eruter annum vitæ sexagesimum mortuus. La Croix du Maine, probably upon the authority of Beza, has said, pag. 65, that Marot died at the age of sixty years or thereabouts.

(46) Maimbourg, ubi supra, pag. 97.

(47) See Bouchet's Annals of Aquitain, fol. m. 271.

(48) Pag. 30, & seq.

(49) At. pag. 174.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſelf to be his ſcholar [L], has contributed very much to reſtore the credit of this antient Poet's verſes. An infinite number of curious perſons ſought after his works, and could hardly find them; which obliged a Bookſeller at the Hague (i) to reprint them. This is a very fine edition. You may ſee, in the judgments that have been collected about Clement Marot (k), 'that the French Poets are indebted to him for the rondeau, and 'that they do in a manner owe to him the modern form, or the reſtoration of the ſonnet, 'and madrigal, and of ſome other kinds of little verſes.' We may add, that he invented the mixture of maſculine and feminine rhymes (l), without which our Poetry would be very harſh and unpleaſant. There are but too many obſcene pieces among his works [M], and

(i) Adrian Moetjens: his edition is of the year 1700, in two volumes in 12mo.

(k) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, Tom. iii, pag. 206.

(l) See the Obſervations of Mr Menage upon the poems of Malherbe, pag. 402. But note, that Marot ſometimes diſpenſed with this mixture.

ſtill from Paris, and eſcaped into Italy. And thus Mr Maimbourg is miſtaken only in a few months: he thought that Marot did not retire to Berne, till after the harangue of the king; whereas he ſhould have ſaid, that he retired ſome weeks before (54).

[L] La Fontaine owned himſelf to be his ſcholar.] See what he wrote to Mr de Saint-Everemond.

(54) The affair of the Placards happened in the month of November 1534. The proceſſion and the harangue of Francis I, belong to the month of January 1535.

Vos beaux Ouvrages ſont cauſe,
Que ja'y ſceu plaire aux neuf Sœurs,
Cauſe en partie, & non toute:
Car vous voulez bien ſans doute,
Que j'y joigne les Ecrits
D'aucuns de nos beaux Eſprits.
J'ay profité dans Voiture,
Et Marot par ſa lecture
M'a fort aidé, j'en conviens.
Je ne ſçay qui fut ſon Maiſtre
Que ſe ſoit qui ce peut eſtre,
Vous eſtes tous trois les miens (55).

(55) La Fontaine's Poſthumous Works, pag. 107. Dutch Edit.

'Tis from your works I've learn'd to pleaſe the Nine;
But you'll allow me other wits to join
With you, as the inſpirers of my Muſe:
Voiture's and Marot's aid I can't refuſe:
I profit by them both, I frankly own.
Who Marot's maſter was, to me's unknown;
But you all three were mine. . . . .

'I had forgot maſter Francis, whoſe diſciple I acknowledge my ſelf to be, as well as Mr Vincent's, and 'Mr Clement's *.' What he ſays, that he did not know whoſe ſcholar Marot was, gives me occaſion to recite a paſſage of Lewis Camerarius, which will inform us, that John le Maire de Belges was Marot's maſter. 'Audivi ego ex viris dignis fide, Eum illum 'Belgam, hominem doctum, & in linguæ Latinæ antiquioribus ſcriptis multum verſatum, primum fuiſſe, 'qui rationem & modum demonſtraret elegantioris ſermonis Gallici loquendo, ſcribendi autem quaſi artis 'viam indicaſſe, quam cum ipſe ſequeretur uſurpando, 'tum aliis præcipiendo traderet: Eumque Poëtam quem 'Gallia habuit celeberrimum, & cujus ornatam copiam 'venuſtatemque imprimis admirata eſt, Clementem 'Marottum, eundem percoluiſſe & componendi verſus 'ſcientiam edocuiſſe (56). - - - - I have been informed 'by men of credit, that John le Maire de Belges, a man 'of learning, and very converſant with the ancient La'tin authors, was the firſt who poliſhed the French 'tongue, and taught others, by his own example, the art, 'as it were, of writing: and that the ſame perſon in'ſtructed the famous and admired French Poet, Clement, 'Marot, to make verſes.' By this author's leave, theſe Latin words are very ill placed; he ſhould not have taken advantage of the liberty, which the ancient language of the Romans allows, of making uſe of expreſſions that may be underſtood in different ſenſes. We muſt conſult Chronology, to know whether he means that Clement Marot taught John le Mair, or whether John le Maire taught Clement Marot to make verſes. The latter is the true ſenſe; but we cannot diſcover it without a cloſe attention to the author's deſign, and the help of Chronology. Why does he thus unneceſſarily fatigue the mind of his readers? I will obſerve, upon this occaſion, another thing againſt the ſame writer, concerning the book, out of which I have taken the aforeſaid paſſage. It is the Latin tranſlation of the Treatiſe of Schiſms, written in French by John le Maire de Belges: It was printed at Leipſic in 1572, with notes. Lewis Camerarius knew not, that John Schardius had already publiſhed (57) a Latin tranſlation of the ſame book in 1566. Voſſius knew nothing of the Latin tranſlation of Lewis Camerarius; for he mentions only the other (58). Note, that Marot, in his letter to Madam de Soubize, ſpeaks of John le Maire, without taking notice that he had been taught by him.

* Francis Rabelais, Vincent Voiture, and Clement Marot.

(56) Ludovicus Joach. F. Camerarius, in Proœm. Verſionis Latinæ Tractatus de Differentiis Schiſmatum.

(57) At Baſil, with the four books of Theodoricus a Niem, Hiſtoriarum ſui Temporis.

(58) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 650.

Or adieu donc, noble Dame, qui uſes
D'honeſteté tousjours envers les Muſes.
Adieu par qui les Muſes deſolées
Souventesfois ont été conſolées,
Adieu qui voir ne les peult on ſouffrance.
Adieu la main qui de Flandres en France
Tira jadis Jean le Maire Belgeois,
Qui l'ame avoit d' Homere le Gregeois (59).

(59) Marot, Epiſtle to Madam De Soubize, pag. 209.

Adieu then, noble lady, to whoſe hand
The Muſes, for reſpect, indebted ſtand!
Adieu, from whom the afflicted Nine receive
The kindeſt conſolation, when they grieve!
Adieu the hand, which firſt from Flanders brought Divine le Maire, inſpir'd with Homer's thought.

But here follows what I find in the Recherches of Stephen Paſquier: 'Our country-man Clement Marot, in 'the ſecond impreſſion of his works, owns, that it 'was John le Maire de Belges who taught him to make 'an eliſion of the e feminine in the middle of the 'verſe (60).

(60) Paſquier, Recherches, lib. viii, cap. ii, pag. m. 612. See the words of Marot below, in the remark [R].

[M] There are but two many obſcene pieces among his works.] He followed in this the humour of the times, and of the beſt Poets of antiquity, and, which is worſe, his own inclinations and courſe of life; for he was not only a court Poet, but alſo a man, who loved women, and could not renounce his ſenſual pleaſures. We have ſeen in Latin, the teſtimony that Theodore Beza gives of him (61). Let us now ſee what he ſays of him in French: Clement Marot, after his return from Italy to the court, was very much hated by the Sorbonne, for tranſlating, very happily, thirty Pſalms of David into the French tongue, which are dedicated to the king, who thought them worthy to be printed. But he was forced to make his eſcape, and retreated to Geneva, where he tranſlated twenty more of them. He had always been bred up in a very bad ſchool, and could not live in ſubjection to the reformation of the Goſpel; and therefore he went, and ſpent the reſt of his days in Piedmont, which was then in the poſſeſſion of the king, where he lived in ſome ſecurity under the favour of the governours (62).' Yet it muſt be confeſſed, that the obſcenities of Clement Marot are leſs groſs, and better wrapped up, than thoſe of the Roman Poets, and of many French Poets, companions of Theophile. What is ſtrange, is, that the talents of his wit, his ſmartneſs, the agreeable, lively, eaſy, ingenious turn of his Muſe, are never perceived more, than when he writes upon a laſcivious ſubject. Is it not ſtrange, that the greateſt part of the Poets have an unhappy gift of ſucceeding better on this, than on other ſubjects? Such a Poet, whoſe verſes would be inſipid, unleſs he gives a looſe to his pen, makes excellent pieces (63), when he lays aſide all modeſty. This cannot proceed from the nature of Poetry it ſelf, but muſt come from the corruption of man's heart. Whatever may be the cauſe of it, the effect appeared certain to thoſe, who have given it for a maxim, that a Poet ought to be chaſte as to his perſon, but not as to his verſes, ſince they cannot be acceptable, and ſeaſoned with ſalt, unleſs they be a little ſmutty.

(61) In the remark [H], citation (38).

(62) Beza, Hiſt. des Egliſes Reform. lib. i, pag. 33.

(63) Poetically, but not morally, ſpeaking.

Nam caſtum eſſe decet piam poetam
Ipſum. Verſiculos nihil neceſſe eſt:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and this gives juſt occaſion to blame him. I ſhall relate ſome curious things concerning his verſion of the fifty Pſalms of David [N]. The moſt notable particulars are to be found in

Qui tum denique habent ſalem, ac leporem,
Si ſunt molliculi, ac parum pudici,
Et quod pruriat incitare poſſunt,
Non dico pueris, ſed his pilofis.
Qui duros nequeunt movere lumbos (64).

(64) Catullus, Epig. xvi.

The Bard himſelf ſhou'd chaſte and pious be:
His verſe is not reſtrain'd to chaſtity;
For ſprightly wit implies obſcenity.
Such wit, as rouzes to the feaſts of love
Mortals, who ſcarce their ſluggiſh haunches move.

Which is a falſe maxim, or at leaſt a very pernicious one, and deſerves not to be looked upon as a rule, by men who are ſincerely good. But it is with this, as with the itching deſire of uttering a jeſt. No conſideration can reſtrain it (65) and, when a poet thinks himſelf capable of doing wonders in an epigram, provided he admits ſome obſcene thoughts into it, he quits, in favour of his Wit, the ſentiments of mind. This is what Des Accords did. 'I wiſh, ſays 'he, I had not been ſo looſe and wanton at that age, 'but I cannot help it now. I will excuſe myſelf by this 'diſtich, which I gave to a learned and ſevere Senator 'of our parliament of Dijon, together with the book.

(65) See the remark [D] of the article MARY, the Egyptian.

Putidulum ſcriptoris opus ne deſpice, namque
Si laſciva legis, ingenioſa leges.

Let not a little ſmut offend your ear:
Together wit and wantonneſs appear.

'And indeed, I never affected to appear ingenious, 'that I might be laſcivious; but I have been laſci- 'vious only that I might be ingenious (66).' Such writers may find a good leſſon in this laſt verſe of an epigram of Martial (67), Tanti non erat eſſe te diſertum: a leſſon, which he gave to others, and which himſelf ſtood in need of as much as any body, but which he never practiſed. Let us return to Marot, and ſay, that, in all probability, his heart and his wit agreed: however it be, he gave no ill turn to this kind of verſes. His epigram on a wild Spouſe, was thought worthy by Menage to be inſerted almoſt entire among his obſervations, where he endeavours to prove that it was formerly ſaid, j'ai mors, for j'ai mordu (68).

(66) Des Accords, in his preface to his Bigarrures.

(67) The forty third of the twelfth book.

(68) Menage, Obſervations ſur la Langue Françoiſe, Tom. i, pag. 90. Edit. of Paris 1675.

[N] I ſhall relate ſome curious things concerning his verſion of the fifty Pſalms of David.] Florimond de Remond (69) affirms, that Marot, after his return from Ferrara into France, was exhorted by Vatablus to turn the Pſalms of David into French verſe, and that, following his advice, he publiſhed a verſion of thirty Pſalms, and dedicated it to Francis I. It was cenſured by the faculty of Divinity at Paris, who, moreover, made ſome remonſtrances and complaints of it to that monarch. 'The king, who loved Marot 'for the fineneſs of his wit, made uſe of delays, and 'ſaid, that he had approved the firſt draughts, and 'deſired to ſee the reſt. Upon which account the 'Poet ſent him this epigram.

(69) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. of the Birth and Progreſs of Hereſy, liv. viii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 1042, & ſeq. See alſo Mr Varillas, his tranſcriber, book xxi, of the Revolutions, pag. 48, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

Puis que voulez que je pourſuive, ô Sire,
L'œuvre Royal du Pſautier commencé,
Et que tout cœur aymant Dieu le deſire,
D'y beſongner me tiens pour diſpenſé:
S'en ſente donc qui voudra offenſé:
Car ceux à qui un tel bien ne peut plaire,
Doivent penſer ſi jà ne l'ont penſé,
Qu'en vous plaiſant, me plaiſt de leur deſplaire

Since you deſire it, Sire, I can't refuſe
To cloath in metre David's royal muſe.
Let thoſe then, whom the work diſpleaſes, know,
If you're my friend, I care not who's my foe.

'Nevertheleſs the publication, after many remon- 'ſtrances made to the king, was forbidden. But

Des hommes plus la choſe eſt deſirée,
Quand plus elle eſt aux hommes prohibée,

We value moſt what is forbidden us.

'They could not be printed ſo faſt as they were 'ſold off. They were not then ſet to Muſic, as 'they are now, to be ſung in churches; but every 'one gave them ſuch a tune as he thought fit, and 'commonly that of a ballad. Each of the princes 'and courtiers took a Pſalm for themſelves. King 'Henry II loved this Pſalm, Ainſi qu'on oyt le cerf 'bruire, - - - Like as the Hart doth breathe and bray; 'and took it for his own, which he ſung in hunting. Madam de Valentinois, whom he loved, took 'this, Du fond de ma penſée; - - - Lord, to thee I make 'my moan; and made choice of it for herſelf. The 'queen choſe the Pſalm, Ne vueillez pas ô Sire, - - - 'Lord, in thy wrath reprove me not; which ſhe ſung 'to a merry tune. Antony, king of Navarre, took 'the Pſalm, Revange moy, prens la querelle; - - - 'Judge, and revenge my cauſe, O Lord; which he 'ſung to the tune of a dance of Poitou, and ſo did 'the reſt. In the mean time, Marot, fearing leſt he 'ſhould be ſent to priſon a ſecond time, becauſe he 'could not hold his tongue, fled to Geneva, where 'he continued his verſion as far as fifty Pſalms (70). 'Beza put the remaining hundred Pſalms into verſe (71), 'and the Pſalms, which he rhymed in imitation of 'Marot's, were received by all men with as much ap- 'plauſe as ever any book had. For not only all the 'Lutherans, but the Catholics alſo took pleaſure in 'ſinging them; becauſe they were pleaſant, eaſy to 'learn, and fit to be played upon the violin, and 'muſical inſtruments. Calvin took care to put them 'in the hands of the beſt Muſicians in Chriſtendom; 'and, among the reſt, he pitched upon Godimel, 'and another called Burgeois, to ſet them to Muſic (72). 'After this, ten thouſand copies of the Pſalms in 'rhime, ſet to Muſic, were diſperſed every where. 'Then every one begun, even the Catholics, to carry 'them about, and ſing them as ſpiritual ſongs, 'thinking there was no hurt in doing it. For they 'were not as yet, nor till ſome years after, a form of 'religious worſhip among the Calviniſts; but after- 'wards they were appointed to be ſung in their aſſem- 'blies, being divided into ſmall ſections; which 'was done in the year 1553, to ſerve as a reſting- 'place, where they might take breath, after ſo long 'a devotion as theirs is. For the ſinging of Pſalms 'at church, for the moſt part, laſts half a quarter of 'an hour. After they were bound up with the Cal- 'vinian and Geneva catechiſms, the uſe of them was 'wholly forbidden, and the former prohibition re- 'newed, with a ſevere penalty; ſo that to ſing a 'Pſalm, was to be a Lutheran (73).' The ſubſtance of this narrative of Florimond de Remond was turned into elegant Latin, by Famianus Strada (74), who particularly obſerves, that Francis I. often ſung this tranſlation of the Pſalms (75).

(70) Id. Flor. de Remond, ibid. pag. 1043.

(71) Id. ib. pag. 1044.

(72) Id. ib. pag. 1049.

(73) Id. ib. pag. 1050.

(74) Strada de Bello Belg. dec. i, lib. iii, pag. m. 130, 131.

As I intend here chiefly to inſiſt on matters of fact, I have not taken notice of the critical obſervations of Florimond de Remond. He pretends, that Marot has falſified the Hebrew text, tho' Vatablus gave him a very good verſion of it. The criticiſms of this Hiſtorian have been confuted not only by reaſons, but alſo by authorities (76). Mr Jurieu has produced 'the approbation of the Doctors of the Sorbonne, upon 'which Charles IX, in the greateſt heat of perſecution, 'granted a Licence to Antony Vincent, a Printer at 'Lyons, for the printing of theſe Pſalms. The approbation 'runs thus: We, Doctors of Divinity, whoſe names 'are here ſubſcribed, do certify, that, in a certain tran- 'ſlation of the Pſalms, preſented to us, beginning at 'the forty eighth Pſalm, with theſe words, C' eſt 'en ſa très Sainte cité, and ending with this verſe, 'Chante à jamais ſon Empire. We have found no- 'thing contrary to our Catholic faith, but every 'thing agreeable to it, and to the truth of the Hebrew 'text: in teſtimony whereof we have ſigned the pre- 'ſent certificate, Octob. 16, ſigned J. de Salignac. 'Viboult. The Licence, granted to Plantin, for printing 'theſe

(75) Rex quamvis ejus (Marotti) verſiculos identidem cantitaret. Id. ib.

(76) See Mr Jurieu, Apology for the Reformers, Tom. i, pag. 126, & ſeq. Edit. in 4to.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'these Psalms, says also, that these Psalms, before the 'impression, had been examined, viewed, and approved, 'by Mr Josse Schelling, Portionary of St Nicolas at 'Brussels, deputed for this end by the council of 'Brabant. And that, after the impression was finished, 'they were viewed again, and found to be no wise (77) Ibid. pag. 127. 'repugnant to the Catholic faith (77).' That the dates may appear, we must add to these words, what the same author says three pages after; which is, that the edition, for which Charles IX granted a licence to Antony Vincent, a Printer at Lyons, 'is to be seen 'at this day, bearing date 1562; and that the privi- 'lege of the sixteenth of October is of the same year. 'Three years after, Plantin printed them at Antwerp, (78) Ib. pag. 130. 'with the privilege of Philip, king of Spain (78).' Mr Bruguier, minister and professor of Divinity at Nimes, has related the very words of the licence of Charles IX. The most authentic approbation of this work, says he (79), 'was that of king Charles IX, in 1561, (79) Bruguier, Discourse about the singing of Psalms, pag. 32, 33. This Discourse was printed in 1664. 'who, after he had caused these Psalms to be exami- 'ned by some persons well versed in the Scripture, 'and the Languages, found that they were faithfully 'translated according to the truth of the Hebrew 'text, whereupon, being in council, he readily gave 'his approbation, and licence for printing and sing- 'ing of these Psalms. The words of the licence, 'which are still to be seen in our old Psalms, are these. 'By a special favour, full power, and royal authority, 'we have given and granted to Antony, the son of Antony 'Vincent, Bookseller at Lyons, the privilege, leave, 'licence, and permission, for the space of ten years next 'following, to print, or cause to be printed, when, and 'wheresoever he shall please, all the Psalms of the pro- 'phet David, translated according to the truth of 'of the Hebrew text, turned into French metre, and set 'to good Music, as it is well known, and has been exa- 'mined by men learned in the holy Scripture, and in the 'said languages, and also in the art of Music, &c.' There are some difficulties in all this; for it is hardly conceivable, that Charles IX should have granted to a Bookseller of Lyons a licence, dated October the nineteenth, 1562, for printing the Psalms of Clement Marot, and Theodore Beza. The first civil war of religion was then in it's greatest height. Lyons had been in the power of the Huguenots for five months, and they were actually besieged in Roan. It is therefore more probable, that this licence was granted in 1561, as Mr Bruguier says: but this difference of dates between him and the other ministers (80) is inconvenient. Besides it is inconceivable, that, in 1561, or 1562, the translation, which was sung at Geneva, should have been examined by the Sorbonnists, without the forty seven Psalms; for, according to Florimond de Remond, the fifty Psalms, which Marot translated, were bound up with the other hundred Psalms, translated by Theodore Beza, and with the Calvinian catechisms, in the year 1553; and from that time 'the use of them was wholly forbidden, and the 'first prohibitions were renewed with severe penal- 'ties (81). 'Note, that the forty eighth Psalm, which was the beginning of the translation presented to the doctors of the Sorbonne, was not translated by Clement Marot, but by Theodore Beza. I must not forget, that the Sieur de Pours, in his vast catalogue of the Psalms, that have been printed with licence (82). says nothing of the edition of Lyons approved by the Sorbonne, and authorized by Charles IX, but he observes, that the edition of Plantin, approved by a doctor, deputed to that end by the council, having a royal licence, dated June the sixteenth, 1564, was finished in the month of September next following, and that the names of Clement Marot, and Theodore Beza, do not appear in it (83) (§ β). Add to this the remark [S].

(80) Drelincourt, in his dialogues against the missionaries, concerning the service of the Reformed churches, pag. 59, affirms, that all the Psalms were printed at Lyons and Paris, with an authentic licence of king Charles IX, in 1562.

(81) Flor. de Remond, ubi supra, pag. 1050.

(82) Jeremiah de Pours, Divine Melody of the Holy Psalmist, pag. 570, & seq.

(83) Id. ib. pag. 571.

[(§ β) The privilege for the translation of the other Psalms is dated, not the nineteenth of October 1562, as Mr Jurieu believed, but the nineteenth of October 1561, and it is the same which Mr Bruguier has cited under this date. For the rest, tho' I am fully persuaded, that the approbation of the Sorbonne, of the sixteenth of October 1561, is still in being, I cannot tell where it is; for the privilege of the nineteenth of October does not contain it, nor even mention it. Here is my opinion on all this, which yet does not entirely satisfy me.

It is past doubt, that king Francis I, licensed the impression of the Psalms, the translation of which Marot dedicated to him. It was, I think, in the year 1540, in consequence of the approbation, mentioned by Sleidan, lib. xv, under the year 1543. But this privilege related only to the thirty Psalms then translated by this Poet. These thirty Psalms make a part of Marot's works, printed in 8vo, by Dolet, in 1542, with a privilege for ten years, says the title of this edition.

Nevertheless, this approbation, in the intention of the Sorbonne, must imply much less than a licence for printing, since, according to Sleidan's account in the same place, after the impression of these thirty Psalms procured by Marot, this Poet, as being an avowed Lutheran, was obliged to retire to Geneva, where, in 1543, he translated into verse twenty other Psalms, which being printed the same year at Geneva with the first thirty, gave occasion to a preface, which Calvin prefixed to this edition.

We do not find, that, 'till the year 1553, the Reformed, whether natives of France, or inhabitants, sung any other Psalms, than these fifty, excepting eight other Psalms, the translators of which are yet unknown; which eight Psalms, with the first thirty of Marot, were printed, in 1542, in Gothic, at Rome, by order of the Pope, by Theodore Drust, a German, his Printer in ordinary, the fifteenth of February; as we read, in the last leaf of the book, printed in 8vo, without either name, of place or Printer. Jeremiah de Pours knew nothing of this edition, which, by the way, is the same with that of Strasburgh, 1545, except as to the number of Psalms. The other hundred, put into verse by Beza, appeared probably in 1553, since it was at that time, that being tacked to the Catechism and Liturgy of Geneva, they excited the aversion of the Catholics, who, after the example of Francis I, on his death-bed †, made no scruple to use the first fifty.

† Inventory of Serres, in the place where the death of king Francis I, is mentioned.

This aversion continued to the time of the Conference of Poissy, the event of which, being favourable to the Reformed, produced, the nineteenth of October 1561, the privilege of Charles IX, upon the approbation given by the Sorbonne, on the sixteenth, for the translation of the rest of the Huguenot Psalms; in consequence of which, the edition of Antony Vincent appeared at Lyons, in 1562; from which, several years after, other editions, in various forms, were printed at Lyons, Rochelle, and elsewhere, all in virtue of this privilege, which ought to have been inserted in them at length, together with the approbation of the Sorbonne.

Villemadon's letter, cited by Mr Bayle in the remark [O], mentions the Psalm, Vers l'Eternel des oppressez le Pere, &c. This Psalm, which is the 142d, and, according to the remark of Jeremiah de Pours, the 141st, after the reckoning of that time; this Psalm, I say, is the last but one of the Gothic edition of 1542; and it was then just translated into verse, probably for the use of the Dauphiness Catherine de Medicis, who, being thitherto barren, and threatned for that reason with a divorce, conceived hopes from thence of the birth of a prince in a short time, which in effect happened the following year. REM. CRIT.]

He observes (84), that the fifty Psalms of Clement Marot were printed at Strasburg in 1545, with the ecclesiastical Liturgy. 'The Music of those Psalms, 'says he, is not every where like that, which was 'aftewards made use of. The poetry is also in many 'places different from that which is in those old edi- 'tions .... The first Psalm in it ends thus: (84) Id. ib. pag. 570.

Car le chemin des bons est approuvé
Du Seigneur Dieu, qui toujours l'a trouvé
Droit & uni: Car on ne s'y fourvoye.

'The Psalms are without sections or marks of di- 'stinction. The Apostle's Creed, and some other 'Canticles, are set also to Music, and, besides the 'common Decalogue, there is also another.

Oyons la voyx que de sa voix
Nous a donné le Createur,
De tous hommes legislateur,
Nostre Dieu souverain. Kyrie-Eleison.

That

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

That is,

Let us hear the voice of our Creator, the law-giver of all men, our ſupreme GOD. Lord have mercy upon us.

'Which is repeated at the end of every verſe of the 'Decalogue.' What follows deſerves to be conſidered. 'The firſt preface, prefixed to the Pſalms of Marot 'by the church of Geneva, is dated June the tenth, '1543, written by Mr John Calvin .... All the 'Pſalms, with their Muſic, were printed the firſt 'time at Geneva, with a preface concerning an agree-'ment for the relief of the poor Refugees at Geneva; 'which then the other Printers, who printed from 'the firſt copies, ſhould voluntarily and liberally 'furniſh. The deacons of Geneva, in 1567, after the 'preface to the ſermons of John Calvin upon Deute-'ronomy, complain, with grief, of thoſe, who printed, 'or cauſed to be printed every day, and who had hereto-'fore printed, the Pſalms turned into metre by Beza. 'For every one of them knows very well, that they could 'not with a good conſcience, and ought not to print 'them, without paying to our poor, what was promiſed 'and agreed upon before ever they were printed the firſt 'time (85).' De Pours obſerves (86), that Lewis Bourgeois ſet eighty three Pſalms to Muſic in four, five, and ſix parts, which were printed at Lyons in 1561; and (87) that Guidomel (88) ſet to Muſic the Pſalms of David, printed at Paris, by Adrian le Roy and Robert Balard, in 1565; and that our Pſalms were ſet to Muſic in four and five parts, by Claudius Guidomel, and after that by Claudius le Jeune, who was of Valenciennes (89).

(85) Id. ib. pag. 582.

(86) Ibid. pag. 575.

(87) Ibid. pag. 581.

(88) He ſhould be called Goudimel.

(89) Ibid. pag. 721.

I wonder he takes no notice of him, who was the firſt author of the ordinary Muſic; for Muſic, in ſeveral parts, was never uſed in the Reformed churches. Here is what a profeſſor of Lauſane did me the honour to write to me. 'I have diſcovered a thing which 'is curious enough: It is a teſtimonial, which Beza 'gave under his hand, and in the name of the 'other miniſters, to William Franc, the ſecond of 'November, 1552, wherein he declares, that it was he, 'who firſt ſet the Pſalms to Muſic, as they are ſung in 'our churches: and I have ſtill a copy of the Pſalms, 'printed at Geneva, where William Franc's name is; 'and beſides this, a licence from the magiſtrate, 'ſigned Gallatin, ſealed with red wax, in 1564, 'in which he is alſo acknowledged to be the author 'of this Muſic. Our Plantin, in his Lauſana Reſti-'tuta, gives him the ſame teſtimony (90).'

(90) A MS. letter from Mr Conſtant de Rebecque, who ſhall be mentioned hereafter, in citation (b) of the diſſertation concerning James Bruta, at the end of this work.

Here follows the anſwer of Mr de Pours to Florimond de Remond, concerning the conformity of the tunes of ſome Pſalms with thoſe of balads (91). 'Florimond ſays, the tune of our thirty eighth Pſalm;

Las en ta fureur aigue
Ne m'argue,
De quoy fait Dieu toutpouſſant,

(91) Ibid. pag. 577, 578.

'agrees with this balad,

Mon bel ami, vous ſouviene,
De Piene,
Quand vous ſerez par dela.

'And that the tune of the 130th Pſalm agrees 'with this,

Languirai-je plus guere,
Languirai-je toujours!

'If it had pleaſed this counſellor, he might have 'added a ſong of the adverſity of England, changed 'into proſperity, to the tune of the thirty eighth 'Pſalm.

Tous les Huguenots de France,
Mille cinq cens & cinquante,
La Regente,
Qu'on appelle Eliſabeth.

All the Huguenots of France,
One thouſand, five hundred, and fifty,
The queen,
Whom they call Elizabeth.

'Of whom it is ſaid,

Comme auſſi en Angleterre,
Bonne terre,
Dieu ſa grace a fait couler,
Leur donnant en ce Royaume
Une Dame
Qui ne veut point vaciller.

As alſo in England,
A good land,
GOD has pour'd down his grace,
Giving them in this kingdom
A miſtreſs,
Who will continue ſtedfaſt.

'This ſeems to be more antient, intituled, to the 'tune de Piene, without making any mention of the 'aforeſaid Pſalm.

Sus Cardinaux, Archeveſques,
Et Eveſques,
Venez tous me ſecourir,
Moines, preſtres & Hermites,
Jeſuites,
Venez pour me voir mourir.
Papauté ſuis appellée,
Qui meſlée,
Me ſuis de perdre la gent,
Envoyant dedans la flamme,
Corps & ame
Du riche & de l'indigent.
Je veux que de moi on chante,
La meſchante,
Qui juſqu'au ciel s'eſlevoit,
Elle eſt cheute & abiſmée,
La damnée,
Qui tout le monde enchantoit.

Come, cardinals, archbiſhops,
And biſhops;
Come all to my aſſiſtance,
Monks, prieſts, and hermits,
Jeſuits,
Come, and ſee me dye.
My name is Popery,
Who have attempted
To ruin the nation,
Setting on fire,
The body and ſoul
Of the rich and poor.
I wou'd have them ſing of me,
The wicked,
Who lifted himſelf up to Heav'n,
She is fall'n, and ſunk,
The damned one,
Who enchanted the whole world.

'Now they muſt know, that theſe delicate ſtrains are 'taken away from the wanton Poets, as being unjuſt 'poſſeſſors of them; and their wantonneſs is turned 'into holineſs. That, which was wont to belong to 'them, is taken from them, and is as it were ſancti-'fied: antiently, any thing that was of common uſe, 'tho' it were even the ſpoil of an enemy, being ſo-'lemnly ſet apart and ſequeſtred, and applied to the 'ſervice of the ſanctuary, was reputed a holy thing.' After this, he makes uſe of recrimination (92), and ſhews, that the tranſlation of the Pſalms into Flemiſh verſe, printed at Antwerp, by Simon Cock, in 1540, with the Imperial licence, granted at Bruſſels in 1539, contains a Muſic borrowed from balads, and that it is ſaid ſo at the beginning of each Pſalm (93). 'You will find, ſays he, in the Pſalms 'of Cock, theſe following inſcriptions ſet down 'according to the Pſalms. The 72d Pſalm is 'ſung to the tune of, D'ou vient cela. The 81ſt 'to the tune of, Sur le pont d'Avignon. The 95th to 'the tune of, Que maudit ſoit ce faux vieillard. The '103d Pſalm to that of, Languir me faut. The '113th to that of, De triſteſſe & deſplaiſir. Likewiſe,

(92) This recrimination was alſo made uſe of, when Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm was anſwered; for the ſongs, that are ſung at Chriſtmas, and the ſpiritual ſongs of Colletet, and thoſe, which the author of l'Evêque de Cour made ſuch a jeſt of, were objected. See Jurieu, ubi ſupra, pag. 128, 129, and Mr Rou, Remarks upon the Hiſtory of Calviniſm, pag. 39, & ſeq.

(93) De Pours, ibid. pag. 572.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google in a letter written to Catherine de Medicis, a little after the death of Henry II [O]. We ‘ wiſe, the 120th Pſalm to that of, Madame la regente

‘ ce n'eſt pas la façon. The 128th Pſalm to that of, Il
‘ me ſuffit de tous mes meaux. The 135th to that of,
‘ Le berger & la bergere ſont a l'ombre d'un buiſſon.
‘ It is a Flemiſh Pſalter, and thoſe inſcriptions, which
‘ at firſt were were all in French, are placed there in ‘ Walloon, according to the Imperial ſtile, mentioned
‘ in our preface, which puts the Walloon language for ‘ good French (94).

(94) Id. ib. pag. 578.

I have quoted in the margin (95) two authors, who have objected to the Catholics the prophane tunes of their Chriſtmas ſongs, &c. I add, that there has been lately reprinted, at Geneva, a piece which had been publiſhed in 1645, and which affords matter for a ſharp recrimination: Out of which I ſhall tranſcribe what follows. ‘ Nullo delectu ſacra profanaque juxta
‘ habet (hæc gens) imo tam præpoſtero cultu divina
‘ curat, ut pios Eccleſiæ uſus nullis ſemper in-‘ ſanientis ſeculi ludis pervertat, ſordibuſque conta-‘ minet. Quæ quidem ſatis denuo experti ſumus, his ‘ Natalis Chriſti nuper exactis temporibus, cum om-
‘ nia templa putidis profanarum cantionum vocibus
‘ perſonarent: ubi quotannis ipſum Incarnationis My‘ ſterium turpiſſimis ſecularium cantuum odis conſpur-
‘ catur; tantuſque amor eſt Eccleſiaſticos hymnos ad
‘ mundanas ejuſmodi cantilenas inflectere, ut nulla
‘ quantumvis obſcœna vulgetur, quin ſtatim in Eccle-
‘ ſiis ridicule detorta audiatur; vixque in indignatione
‘ riſum teneo, quoties recordationem ſubit alicubi vi-
‘ deri ſacrorum cantuum rituale, in quo hanc (ut alias ‘ omittam omnino turpes) rubricam legere eſt:

(95) See, above, citat. (92).

MAGNIFICAT to the tune of,

Que ne vous requinquez-vous vieille:
Que ne vous requinquez-vous donc (96)?

(96) Querela ad Gaſſendum de parum Chriſtianis Provincialium ſuorum ritibus, &c. pag. 71. Edit. Genev. 1700.

‘ - - - This people makes no difference between ſacred and ‘ prophane things; nay, their care of divine things is ‘ ſo prepoſterous, that they pervert and defile them with ‘ every folly of a looſe and abandoned age. This I was ‘ ſufficiently convinced of, the laſt Chriſtmas, when every ‘ church reſounded with prophane ſongs; where every ‘ year the myſtery of the Incarnation itſelf is prophaned
‘ with moſt ſcandalous worldly ſongs; and ſo fond are ‘ they of adapting church hymns to ſuch worldly ſongs,
‘ that the moſt obſcene no ſooner appear, than they are ‘ ridiculouſly heard in the churches: and I can ſcarce
‘ forbear laughing in my anger, when I recollect that ‘ I have ſeen a ritual of Pſalms, in which (to omit others, ‘ which are quite ſcandalous) you may read this rubric.
‘ Magnificat, to the tune of,

Trick up yourſelf, old dame.

The piece, I ſpeak of, was written by an advocate called Muret, who inſcribed it to the famous Gaſſendus, to repreſent to him the ridiculous ceremonies of the Provençals.

[O] The moſt particulars are to be found in a letter . . . . written to Catherine de Medicis, a little after the death of Henry II.] It is dated Auguſt 26, 1559, and was ſent to Catherine de Medicis ‘ by a gentleman,
‘ who had ſerved the deceaſed queen of Navarre,
‘ and ſubſcribed himſelf Villemadon, with whom the ‘ aforeſaid lady (97) had formerly conferred privately
‘ about her affairs, and even about points of reli‘ gion (98).’ I will make uſe of the very words of the letter. ‘ (99) I ſhall begin, Madam, with telling
‘ you, that, in the reign of king Francis, and the ‘ late king, who was then Dauphin, being returned
‘ from Piedmont, where he forgot himſelf ſo far as ‘ to commit a vile and foul adultery, by the coun-‘ ſel and management of certain minions, wicked and ‘ unfaithful ſervants, and by whom, moreover, the ‘ wretched wife of the great ſeneſchal, Diana of ‘ Poitiers, who was the public and common re-
‘ ceptacle of ſo many debauched and diſſolute men,
‘ ſome of whom are dead, and others are ſtill alive,
‘ was introduced to him as a fine ring, from whom ‘ he would learn a great deal of virtue: and after ‘ the news was come, that a baſtard child was ‘ born of the foreſaid adultery; you were talked of,
‘ Madam, by the foreſaid ſcoffers, and the ſaid old
‘ whore, who declared among themſelves, that you
‘ was incapable of ſo great an honour, as to be
‘ the wife of a Dauphin of France, becauſe you ‘ would never have any children, ſince you had been ‘ ſo long without bearing any, and it was not the ‘ fault of your lord and huſband. I remember that,
‘ at the caſtle of Rouſſillon upon the Rhône, they ‘ had a great deal of talk about it, notice whereof
‘ was brought to the deceaſed queen of Navarre, who ‘ loved you very well, and told me . . . . . (100).
‘ You was not ignorant, Madam, of this miſchief,
‘ which was deſigned againſt you; but you had ‘ then a bloody wound in your heart, and you ſought
‘ after the lord with tears and prayers, becauſe you
‘ wanted him: And at that time you acknowledged
‘ him, honouring the Holy Bible, which was kept
‘ in your trunks, or lay upon the table, in which ‘ you looked, and read ſometimes. And your wo‘ men and ſervants had the happy opportunity to ‘ read in it; and there was none but the nurſe,
‘ who did not love you much, no more than ſhe
‘ did GOD, who was angry at it. . . . . GOD did not ‘ anſwer you preſently, but left you for many years in ‘ a languiſhing condition, that you might ſeek after ‘ him, pray, and beſeech him, that he would awake
‘ for your aſſiſtance. . . . . The Almighty, your pro‘ tector . . . . (101) prepared and opened a way, from ‘ whence all the bleſſings of the king and your ſelf
‘ were to ſpring, and to come to perfection. For this ‘ Father, being full of mercy, put it in the heart of ‘ the deceaſed king Francis, to take great pleaſure
‘ in the thirty Pſalms of David, with the Lord's-Prayer,
‘ the angelical Salutation, and the Apoſtles Creed,
‘ which the late Clement Marot had tranſlated, and ‘ dedicated to his majeſty; who commanded the ſaid
‘ Marot to preſent the whole to the emperor Charles
‘ V, who received the ſaid tranſlation graciouſly,
‘ highly valued it, and preſented him with two hun‘ dred Spaniſh piſtoles, and alſo encouraged him to ‘ finiſh the ſaid work, by tranſlating the reſt of the ‘ ſaid Pſalms, and deſired him to ſend him, as ‘ ſoon as he could, the Pſalm Confitemini Domino, ‘ quoniam bonus, becauſe he particularly loved it.
‘ Which ſeeing and hearing the Muſicians of thoſe
‘ two princes, nay all the Muſicians of France, ſtrove
‘ who ſhould beſt ſet the ſaid Pſalms to Muſic, and ‘ every body ſung them. But if any perſon loved
‘ them dearly, and commonly ſung them, and cauſed
‘ them to be ſung, it was the late king Henry, who ‘ loved them ſo well, that good men bleſſed GOD
‘ for it; and his minions and his whore loved them,
‘ or feigned ſo great a love for them, that they ‘ wont to ſay, Sir, ſhall not this be mine? Give ‘ me that if you pleaſe: inſomuch that this good
‘ prince had much ado to pleaſe every one's fancy,
‘ according to his deſire. Nevertheleſs kept for ‘ himſelf the following Pſalm, as you may remem‘ ber:

(100) Ib. pag. 502.

(101) Ib. pag. 503, & ſeq.

Bienheureux eſt quiconques
Sert à Dieu volontiers, &c (102).

(102) It is the 128th Pſalm.

The man is bleſt who fears the Lord,
Nor only worſhip pays,
But keeps his ſteps confin'd with care
To his appointed ways, &c.

‘ He himſelf made a tune to this Pſalm, which was ‘ very good and pleaſant, and very ſuitable to the ‘ words. He ſung it, and cauſed it to be ſung ſo
‘ often, that he plainly ſhewed he had an earneſt de-‘ ſire to be that bleſſed man, whom David deſcribes in
‘ the ſaid Pſalm, and to ſee you become the fertile ‘ vine therein mentioned. This was when he was re-
‘ covering of his ſickneſs at Angouleſme. The queen,
‘ my miſtreſs, (who was then with king Francis, her ‘ brother) intreated him to uſe with pity and clemency
‘ the citizens of Rochelle, inſtead of maſſacring them,
‘ and ſent me to you to be informed of his ſickneſs;
‘ which I found ſo much abated, that he begun to ‘ ſing the ſaid Pſalms, with lutes, violins, ſpinnets,
‘ and flutes, attended with voices; and he took great ‘ delight in them, and commanded me to come near ‘ him, becauſe he knew that I loved Muſic, and could ‘ play a little upon the lute and guittar; and he ‘ ordered

(97) That is to ſay, Catherine de Medicis.

(98) Beza, Hiſt. Eccl. book iii, pag. 225.

(99) Recueil des choſes Memorables faites & paſſees pour le faict de la Religion, & Etat de ce Royaume depuis la mort du Roy Henry II, Tom. i, pag. 501, Edit. 1565, in 12*mo.*

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We muſt not forget, that the church of Geneva, which was the firſt that made uſe of this verſion of the Pſalms, was the firſt that forſook it [P], to make uſe of another verſion

'ordered the tune, and the parts of it, to be given 'me, which I carried to the queen, my miſtreſs, with 'the news of the recovery of your health. I muſt 'not forget your Pſalm, which you often deſired to be 'ſung, and which was this:

Vers l'Eternel des oppreſſez le pere
Je m'en iray, luy monſtrant l'improper
Que l'on me faict, luy ferai ma priere
A haulte voix, qu'il ne jette en arriere
Mes piteux cris, car en lui ſeul j'eſpere (103).

(103) This is the beginning of Pſalm 141.

To thee, O Lord, my cries aſcend,
O haſte to my relief:
And with accuſtom'd pity hear
The accents of my grief.

Inſtead of off'rings, let my pray'r
Like Morning incenſe riſe;
My lifted hands ſupply the place
Of Evening ſacrifice, &c.

'When my ſaid queen of Navarre ſaw theſe two 'Pſalms, and heard how they were frequently ſung, 'even by the Dauphin, ſhe admired it very much, 'and ſaid to me, I know not how the Dauphin's lady 'came by this pſalm, Vers l'Eternel, &c. for it is 'none of thoſe that were tranſlated by Marot. But 'it is not poſſible to find another, wherein her af'fliction is better deſcribed, and by which ſhe may 'more clearly ſhew the grief that ſhe feels, and de'ſire of GOD to be eaſed of it, as indeed ſhe will 'be. For ſince it has pleaſed GOD to put this gift 'into their hearts, behold the time, behold the days 'are at hand, when the eyes of the king ſhall be ſa'tisfied, the deſires of the Dauphin ſhall be fulfilled, 'the hopes of the enemies of the Dauphin's lady ſhall be 'diſappointed, and my wiſhes alſo, and the faith of my 'prayers, ſhall come to an end. Within the ſpace of a 'year, the merciful viſitation of the Lord will ap'pear, and I dare ſay that ſhe ſhall have a ſon for 'the greater joy and ſatisfaction .... (104). About 'thirteen or fourteen months after this, you brought 'forth our king Francis, who is now alive ... (105). 'But when this good GOD made you fruitful, then 'the late king began to be negligent and forgetful of 'ſuch a benefit: Whence it came to paſs, that GOD, 'being provoked, permitted this poor prince to be 'infatuated with that old whore Diana, who admitted 'into his houſe a young ſerpent (106), which ſe'cretly licked her boſom: He was her oracle, and 'ſhe was the organ of it; he began to blame the ſaid 'Pſalms of David, which teach us to forſake all 'ſins, which encourage chaſtity, and ſtrengthen vir'tue. Then he brought in the laſcivious verſes of 'Horace, which excite the fleſh to all ſorts of 'wantonneſs and leudneſs, and other fooliſh ſongs, 'which were made about their infamous amours, 'by thoſe Poets of the devil; not only to indulge 'their impure and unchaſte life, but alſo to plunge 'them into the abyſs of all iniquity and exceſs, 'and even of all impiety. For ſeeing that the great 'ſeneſchal's lady had, in imitation of you, a Bible 'in French, he ſet himſelf to deſpiſe and condemn 'it, and making a great ſign of the croſs, and 'ſtriking his breaſt with his hand, and fetching deep 'ſighs like an hypocrite, he repreſented to her, that 'ſhe muſt not read it, that ſuch reading did not 'belong to women, and was attended with great 'danger; but that, inſtead of one maſs, ſhe ſhould 'hear two, and content her ſelf with her beads and 'primer, in which there was ſo much good devo'tion, and ſo many fine pictures. And by this means 'this wretched old ſinner perſuaded the late king to 'believe all ſhe ſaid, and you had ſuch a force put 'upon you, Madam, that your confeſſor Bouteiller 'was taken from you, who taught and adminiſtred 'to you the pure word of GOD, and, inſtead of 'the ſaid Bouteiller, her Dr Henuyer, a Sorbon'niſt, was obtruded upon you, to ſuborn your con'ſcience; who was alſo given afterwards to the late 'king, to govern his, and imprint upon it what he 'pleaſed. In ſhort, he robbed you both of that 'holy treaſure, which never periſheth, and which 'procures immortality to him that is poſſeſſed of it. 'He concealed it from you, and made you both 'ſlaves to vain ſuperſtitions, by the ſnares of an old 'woman, whom he had firſt blinded the better to carry 'on his deſign.'

(104) Recueil, ib. pag. 505.

(105) Ib. pag. 506.

(106) He means the cardinal of Lorrain.

[P] The church of Geneva, which was the firſt that made uſe of this verſion, was alſo the firſt that forſook it.] It is now a long time ſince it was perceived in France, that certain paſſages of this verſion were become barbarous; which gave riſe to Mr Conrart's deſign of reviſing it. He began this work, and Mr de la Baſtide finiſhed it. But their new verſion was never introduced into the public ſervice of the Reformed. If any propoſals were made about it, they were only examined; but the deciſion was always, that they would keep where they were (107). The French churches, ſettled in foreign countries ſince the revocation of the edict of Nantes, have continued to ſing the tranſlation of Clement Marot and Theodore Beza. At laſt it was reſolved in good earneſt, in the church of Geneva, to uſe them no more, and to introduce in their room the verſion of Mr Conrart and Mr de la Baſtide, after they had been reviſed and ſome alterations made in them. The paſtors and profeſſors of Geneva acquainted the public with their intention (108), by an advertiſement, which was prefixed to the edition they publiſhed of this new verſion in 1695; and ſome years after they quite aboliſhed the uſe of the old tranſlation, and requeſted the other churches, by their circular letters, to do the like. The churches of Heſſe-Caſſel and Neufchatel have admitted this innovation, upon the ſame foot with the church of Geneva (109). It is not yet known (110), what the churches in England and Brandenburg will do; but it is well known, that the Walloon ſynod, aſſembled at Rotterdam, in the month of Auguſt 1700, reſolved to retain the ancient cuſtom, and to change only ſome expreſſions or ſome words in the old Pſalter.

We have ſeen a letter of a gentleman of Montpellier, dated June the 5th, 1700, upon which I will make two obſervations. This gentleman ſays, 'That, 'after Mr Godeau had printed his paraphraſe upon 'the Pſalms, the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur made it a queſtion, 'whether he was a Poet, in a Latin diſſertation, 'which appeared with this title, An Godellus ſit Poëta.' He is miſtaken; the diſſertation of this Jeſuit, Antonius Godellus, Epiſcopus Graſſenſis, utrum Poëta, contains nothing that relates to the Pſalms of Mr Godeau. He ſays, 'that we may apply to the Poems 'of Marot and Beza, what Quintilian ſays of Ennius: 'Let us reverence the verſes of Ennius, as we re'verence the groves, that are venerable for their 'great age, and whoſe old and lopped oaks, though 'they have little beauty, yet ſtrike us with a religious 'awe.' Ennium ſicut ſacros vetuſtate lucos adoremus, in quibus grandia & antiqua robora jam non tantam habent ſpeciem, quantam religionem. Quintilian. lib. 10. cap. 1. He might have found in Quintilian another paſſage more to his purpoſe, where he obſerves, that the Salian prieſts themſelves ſcarce underſtood the ſong they ſung; but that religion did not allow of any change, and that we ought to retain ſuch cuſtoms as have been conſecrated. Saliorum carmina vix ſacerdotibus ſuis ſatis intellecta, ſed illa mutari vetat religio & conſecratis utendum eſt (111). When it is alledged, that it is ſufficient to take from the old tranſlation ſometimes one word, and ſometimes another, according as they become obſolete, obſcene, and unintelligible; it ſeems to be founded on very plauſible reaſons: For indeed, to avoid great confuſion, all changes of this nature muſt be made inſenſibly. If many ages be ſpent in following this method, it will be with the verſion of Marot and Beza, as it was with the famous ſhip of Theſeus (112). It was preſerved as a precious thing, and no repairs were made in it but what were neceſſary, that is, in proportion as any ſea piece rotted. Which was at laſt an inſtance made uſe of by the Philoſophers, who diſputed, whether bodies be the ſame, or no, the matter whereof has been changed.

(107) In the Latin ſtile, we ſhould ſay, that theſe propoſitions were antiquatæ; for the reſult was antiqua manent. Note, that the churches of France could not decide this matter, becauſe, ſince this verſion was made, they have not had leave to hold a national ſynod.

(108) See the letter intituled, An Anſwer to a printed Letter, which Mr Jurieu wrote to a French miniſter at London againſt the change of the Pſalms propoſed by the church of Geneva. This Anſwer contains thirteen pages in 4to, and is dated July, 24, 1700.

(109) Ib. p. 11.

(110) I write this in October, 1700.

(111) Quintil. lib. i, cap. vi, pag. m. 39.

(112) See Plutarch, in Theſeo, pag. 1c. C.

I ſhall

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſion more ſuitable to the preſent genius of the French tongue. It is not known, whether other churches will conform to this change. I do not remember that I ever took notice, that Marot mentions his wife in his poems; but I have found in them a paſſage, which ſhews, that he was a father, and beſides it appears that MICHAEL MAROT, his ſon, wrote verſes, which were printed [Q].

There are ſome things, in the article of this Poet, which want to be ſet right. This will give me an opportunity to point out more at large the editions of his works [R]. What

I ſhall make but one remark on the letter, which Mr Jurieu has printed, wherein he condemns the innovation. He ſays, that the churches of France received from the church of Geneva, a liturgy and a book of Pſalms, which was made and ſung at Paris, before it was at Geneva. This is not exactly true, ſince the verſes, made at Paris, contained only thirty Pſalms, and thoſe, who ſung them, were indifferently either friends or enemies to the reformed religion. It was at the court of Francis I, that they were chiefly ſung; and it is very well known how much this prince perſecuted the reformed religion. And if, afterwards, the French ſung the other twenty pſalms of Marot, and thoſe of his ſucceſſor, it was before the Reformed diſtinguiſhed themſelves by this way of ſinging, and made it a part of their exerciſes of devotion. Now this was not done, till the whole Pſalter was ſet to Muſic at Geneva, and bound up with the Catechiſm, and from that time the Catholics left off the ſinging of theſe Pſalms, as may be ſeen above in a paſſage of Florimond de Remond (113). It cannot therefore be pretended, that theſe verſes were ſung at Paris before they were at Geneva. I ſay, this cannot be pretended in the ſenſe I ſpeak of: For the queſtion is about a ſinging peculiar to the Reformed, and making part of their pious exerciſes. In this reſpect its birth was at Geneva; and it cannot be denied, that the church of Geneva begun firſt to ſing thoſe Pſalms. I know very well what may be alledged concerning the numerous aſſemblies of the Reformed at Paris about the year 1558: of whom Beza ſpeaks in the following manner (114). 'Thus the aſſembly 'daily multiplied at Paris, where it happened, that 'ſome being in the place called le pré aux Cleres, a 'public place of the univerſity, began to ſing Pſalms; 'which being heard, a great many of thoſe, who 'were walking, or playing at divers games, joined 'the company that was ſinging, ſome for the novelty 'of it, and others to bear a part in the Muſic. This 'continued for ſome days in a very great aſſembly, 'where were preſent the king of Navarre himſelf, 'with many lords and gentlemen, both of France and 'other nations, who fell a finging. And although, 'in a great multitude, there is frequently great confuſion, yet there was ſuch an harmony and devotion, 'that every one preſent was raviſhed with it; even 'thoſe who could not ſing, nay, the moſt ignorant, got upon the walls and the places round 'about, to hear the finging, and declared that it 'was ill done to forbid ſo good a thing.' But who does not ſee that all this happened, after thoſe of Geneva had added the Pſalter to the Cathechiſm? Note, that, before Beza tranſlated a hundred Pſalms, thoſe of Marot were ſung in the eccleſiaſtical aſſemblies of Geneva; for, without doubt, the following words ought to be underſtood of an aſſembly at Geneva. '(115) Beza writes thus in his Paphraſe 'upon the Pſalms in 1581. It is now thirty two 'years (viz from the year 1549. (116) that this 91ſt 'Pſalm was the firſt that I heard ſung in the aſſembly 'of Chriſtians, being the firſt time that I was preſent 'there; and I may ſay, that I was ſo rejoiced to hear 'it ſung, that ever ſince I have had it as it were engraved in my heart.'

[Q] He was a father .... MICHAEL MAROT, his ſon, wrote verſes which have been printed.] You will find this in the deſcription of Clement Marot's flight.

J'abandonnai, ſans avoir commis crime,
L'ingrate France, ingrate, ingratiſſime
A ſon Poëte: & en la delaiſſant,
Fort grand regret ne vint mon cueur bleſſant:
Tu ments marot, grand regret tu ſentis,
Quand tu penſas a tes Enfans petits (117).

Ungrateful France, without a crime, I quit,
Nor feel the leaſt regret in leaving it.
'Tis falſe, Marot; great grief does ſeize your mind,
When thinking on your children, left behind.

We may with certainty conclude from hence, that he was married; for he was not ſo profligate as to tell Francis I, in a letter, that he was ſorry for the loſs of his baſtards. La Croix du Maine relates, that Michael Marot, the ſon of Clement Marot, wrote ſome French Poems, which were printed with the Contredicts à Noſtradamus, written by the lord du Pavillion ... Printed at Paris in 1560, by Charles l'Angelier (118).

[R] There are ſome things .... which want to be ſet right. This will give me an opportunity to point out more at large the editions of his works.] It is always wrong to deny, or call in queſtion, what is true; but ſometimes it is excuſable, becauſe there may be plauſible reaſons for ſo doing. This is my caſe here. I have contradicted (119) an author, who has ſaid, that Marot was page to one Nicolas de Neufville, who was the firſt ſecretary of ſtate of his family, and that he dedicated to him his Poem of the Temple of Cupid, the 15th of May 1538. I very juſtly denied, that he had been page to Nicolas de Neufville, who was ſecretary of ſtate; but I ought not to have denied that he had been page to that gentleman's father. I grounded what I ſaid on the difference of age; I took for granted what Theodore Beza affirms, that Marot lived ſixty years. Who could have thought, that Theodore Beza was miſtaken, he, who doubtleſs was acquainted with Clement Marot at Paris (120), and who had it in his power to have informed himſelf at Geneva, of ſeveral particulars relating to this famous refugee? Now, ſuppoſing that Marot was born in the year 1484, as it ought to be ſuppoſed on the teſtimony of Theodore Beza, it was right to deny, that he had been page to one Nicolas de Neufville, who died in 1599. I drew my ſecond reaſon from a paſſage of Clement Marot, in which he affirms, that from the age of ten years, he had always been in the retinue of Frances I. Does this ſuit with one, who had been page of Nicolas de Neufville? There are very good editions of the works of Clement Marot, which have not the epiſtle dedicatory of the Temple of Cupid. Is there not good reaſon, from hence, to ſuſpect, that, if it is to be met with in ſome other editions, it is ſuppoſititious? Theſe are the principles on which I reaſoned in the remark [B]; they muſt be allowed to be probable: nevertheleſs I am obliged ingenuouſly to confeſs, that Marot had been page to one Nicolas de Neufville, and that he himſelf owns it in dedicating to him the Temple of Cupid. I have found this epiſtle dedicatory in the edition of Niort, by Thomas Portau, 1596. This edition (121) is the beſt of all thoſe I had conſulted: Marot's words are theſe. In reviſing the books of my youth, in order to publiſh them more correct than before, I recollected, that, at the very time, when I was your page, moſt honoured Sir, I compoſed, by your order, the Queſt of conſtant Love, which I found in the beſt place of the Temple of Cupid, in viſiting it, as my age then required. It is therefore fitting, that this work ſhould be dedicated to you, who commanded it; to you, my firſt maſter, and the only one (except princes) whom I ever ſerved (122). You ſee by this, that he wrote verſes while he was a page. This circumſtance confirms me in my preſent opinion, that Marot died younger than Beza pretends; for, if he was ſixty years old when he died in 1544, he muſt have been born in 1484, and have been page to Nicolas de Neufville about the beginning of the XVIth century, and have begun from that time to make verſes. Yet we do not find that he wrote any, which can be referred to the reign of Lewis XII (123). It is more probable, that he was born in 1496. Take notice of the verſes, which I have cited in the remark [B]: they were made in 1526, and

(113) Citation (73).

(114) Beza, Hiſt. Eccl. book ii, pag. 141. See alſo Jeremiah de Pours, ubi ſupra, pag. 731, 732.

(115) De Pours, ibid. pag. 730.

(116) I do not think, that de Pours reckoned right: for Beza coming to Geneva, October 24, 1548, it is not likely that he did not begin to aſſiſt at the aſſemblies of the Faithful, till 1549.

(117) Marot, in his Epiſtle to the king at the time of his baniſhment at Ferrara, pag. m. 181. Add, that, in the poem, wherein he prays the dauphin to procure him a paſs, pag. 182, he ſays, Not to go and viſit my caſtles, but to ſee my little Marots.

(118) La Croix du Maine, pag. 326.

(119) In the remark [B].

(120) Beza, having an exquiſite talent for Poetry, no doubt got acquainted with Marot, or at leaſt got opportunities of ſeeing him.

(121) Mr Des Maizeaux obliged me with his copy in June 1702.

(122) Marot, Epiſtle Dedicatory to Meſſire Nicolas de Neufville, knight, lord of Villeroy. It is dated at Lyons, May 15, 1538.

(123) See his Eclogue of Pan and Robin, where we find that his firſt poems were made in the reign of Francis I.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

What I have ſaid about certain editions of the Pſalter of the Proteſtants of Geneva, will be and they ſhew, that he was carried to court at the age of ten years, and that he had followed it, with labour and misfortunes, twenty Years. We have no verſes, where he ſpeaks of his old age: he is contented to ſay, that he is in the autumn of his age.

Car l'yver qui s' appreſte
A commencé à neiger ſur ma teſte (124).

(124) Marot, Eclogue of Pan, pag. 38, Edit. at Niort, 1596.

Th' approaching winter 'gins to ſhed
It's ſilver honours on my head.

(125) Epigr. pag. 433.

He ſays in another place (125),

Plus ne ſuis ce que j'ay eſté,
Et ne le ſaurois jamais eſtre:
Mon beau Printemps, & mon eſté,
Ont fait le ſaut par la feneſtre.

I am no longer, now, the ſame;
Another man, in all, but name:
My chearful ſpring, and ſummer bright,
Have out of window ta'en their flight.

The autumn of age uſually reaches to between forty and fifty-five years, more or leſs: a man is already in the winter of life at ſixty years.

ADVANTAGES of the edition of Clement Marot's works, at Niort, in 1596.

Since I have ſaid, that the edition of Niort 1596, is the beſt of all thoſe I had conſulted, it will be proper to point out what is particular in it. We find in it ſome pieces, which were wanting in ſeveral of the preceding editions, and which have been left out of ſeveral of the ſubſequent editions. The firſt of theſe pieces are, Clement Marot's epiſtle in proſe to Stephen Dolet, of the laſt day of July, 1538. The ſaid Clement Marot's epiſtle in proſe of the 12th of Auguſt 1530, to ſeveral of his brethren, all ſons of Apollo. The ſaid Marot's epiſtle in proſe to Meſſire Nicolas de Neufville, knight, lord of Villeroy, on his piece of the Temple of Cupid. Theſe three epiſtles (126) of the author were again inſerted, becauſe they give us to underſtand, among other things, certain notable particulars, which ſerve both to preſerve his works intire in the hands of the Printer, and to ſhew us what his ſtile was in proſe, they likewiſe inſerted the epiſtle of Stephen Dolet, with his annotations in the margin, on the Hell of the ſaid Marot. The epiſtle of the ſaid Marot to his friend Anthony Couillart, lord of Pavillion, with an epigram of Michael Marot, only ſon of the ſaid Clement Marot. The three firſt of theſe pieces are at the beginning of the book: the letter of Dolet is to be found at page 47, and that of Marot to the lord de Pavillon at page 211. That of Dolet, was written to Lion Jamet, and is dated at Lyons, the firſt day of the year of Grace, 1542. It informs us, that the Poem intituled Hell, was printed only at Antwerp. Note, that Clement Marot, in his letter to the ſame Dolet, makes great complaints againſt thoſe, who, printing his works, had mixed with them pieces, of which he was not the author, and ſome of which were compoſed coldly and with a bad grace, and others full of ſcandal and ſedition. The injury they have done me, ſays he, is ſo great and ſo outrageous, that it has touched my honour, and endangered my perſon . . . . . In truth, I dare ſay it without lying, (always without reproach) that the profit of all theſe my labours accrues to them. I have planted the trees, they gather the fruit of them. I have dragged the plow, they reap the harveſt; and all I gain by it is a little eſteem among men, which yet they would rob me of, by aſcribing to me fooliſh and ſcandalous works. I know not what to call this, but ingratitude, which I cannot have deſerved, except by the fault I commit in giving them my copies. Now I am not the only one who have been thus finely ſerved. If Alain Chartier were alive, I firmly believe (my friend) he would willingly bear me company in complaining of thoſe of their art, who have added to his excellent works, the Counter-Lady without mercy, the Hoſpital of Love, the Complaint of St Valentine, and the Shepherdeſs of Granſon, works certainly unworthy of his name; and of which he was no more the author, than I am of the Complaint of the Bazoche, the Alphabet of the preſent Time, the Epitaph of the Count de Sales, and many other fooliſh pieces, which they have thrown amongſt my works. Here follows another cauſe of complaint. Nor were they ſatisfied, continues he, to injure me alone, but many other excellent Poets of my time, whoſe fine works the Bookſellers have joined with mine, making me, in deſpite of myſelf, the uſurper of another's honour, which I could not know, and bear at the ſame time. I have therefore thrown out of my book, not only bad, but even good things which do not belong to me; contenting myſelf with the productions of my own muſe. But that the reader may not complain, I have put twelve times as much of my own compoſitions, never before printed, in the room of thoſe I have thrown out; nay even two books of Epigrams. And after having reviſed both the old and the new, changed the order of the book for the better, and corrected an infinite number of errors of the preſs, I have reſolved to ſend you the whole, in order that, under the fine and ample privilege, which the king has given you in conſideration of your meritorious virtue, you may (in reſpect to our friendſhip) get it re-printed, not only thus correct as I ſend it you, but even ſtill more ſo: which you may eaſily do, if you will take care of it with a diligence equal to your learning. If you would know in what the new diſpoſition of his Poems conſiſts, you need only conſider theſe words. Moreover their additions have quite ſpoiled the order of my books, which coſt me ſo much to adjuſt, which order (learned Dolet, and the other courteous readers) I thought proper to change at this laſt reviſal, ſeparating between my youthful works, and thoſe written afterwards; ſo that you may readily find what you have a mind to read, and if you do not find it where it uſed to be, you will find it in a place more ſuitable to it. The concluſion of this letter is very remarkable. Putting you in mind, that of all the books, which have been heretofore printed under my name, I declare theſe to be the beſt, the moſt ample, and the beſt diſpoſed; and I diſclaim the others as baſtards, or as ſpoiled children. This is what he wrote at Lyons the 31ſt of July 1538. It was then near eight years ſince the impreſſion of his Poems intituled, L'Adoleſcence, i. e. Poems of Youth, and to which the letter, to a great number of his brethren, all ſons of Apollo, ſerved by way of preface. What I am going to copy from that letter will acquaint us of the eagerneſs of the public for the productions of Marot's muſe. 'I know not, my dear 'brethren, which has moſt incited me to publiſh theſe 'little pieces of my youth; your continual intreaties, 'or the diſpleaſure it gave me to hear cryed about 'the ſtreets a great part of them, incorrect, badly 'printed, and more to the Bookſeller's profit, than 'the Author's credit. Certainly both conſiderations 'prevailed upon me, but your intreaties the moſt.' In the ſame Letter we find what Paſquier has informed us of above (127). 'Hoping ſoon to offer you ſome-'thing better, and, as a pledge of that better, I now 'preſent you, after the Adoleſcence (128), a work of 'a better temper, and more poliſhed materials: but 'the Adoleſcence ſhall go before, and I will begin it 'with the firſt Eclogue of Virgil's Bucolics, tranſlated 'when I was very young, as you may perceive by the 'ſeveral ways, even by the eliſion of the e feminine, 'which I did not then obſerve; and which John le 'Maire de Belges, by teaching it to me, reproved me 'for (129).' This letter was written from Paris the 12th of Auguſt 1530: and it is proper to take notice of this date; becauſe it is the Æra of the firſt edition, which Clement Marot owned and directed.

(126) Note, that the two firſt were taken from the edition of Lyons, 1543, by Stephen Dolet.

(127) In remark [L] at the end.

(128) On this occaſion, I ſhall remark, that the little book, which followed the Adoleſcence Clementine, was printed at Lyons, by Francis Juſtus, in 1534. See the edition of Niort, pag. 398.

Tho' the edition of Niort had no other advantage than that of informing us of the particulars I have juſt mentioned, it would deſerve to be preferred to the others; but that is not it's only advantage: the works of Marot are there ranged in very good order, and augmented with ſeveral pieces, which never before appeared. The Bookſeller informs us, that he had 'procured the whole to be thus diſpoſed by M. Francis 'Mixiere of Poiſtou, M. D. his friend, who, loving 'the memory of the author, and the preſervation of 'his works more grave and leſs wanton, was willing 'to undertake it, by way of amuſement and relaxa-'tion from other more ſerious ſtudies; giving himſelf 'the trouble farther of enlarging and explaining a good 'part of the ſhort arguments of each poem or ſubject, 'by the addition he has made of ſuitable circumſtances; 'namely, to whom, of whom, of what, in what 'place, at what time, and on what occaſion, they 'were written; as far as he could inform himſelf by 'the hiſtory of that time, and by the edition of Ste-'phen Dolet of the year 1543, and others preceding

(129) Marot, Epiſtle to a great number of his brethren.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be a little enlarged [S].

'that, according to which they were reſtored where 'they had been taken away, by ſome Printers, who 'too boldly maim the works of authors, and leave out 'their preliminary epiſtles or prefaces (130): thereby 'preventing the reader from readily comprehending 'their deſign, with the order and method they obſerve 'in their books, which they generally diſcover in their 'ſaid prefaces or epiſtles.'

(130) This ſhews how old this practice is, which is ſtill complained of, as may be ſeen in remark [F] of the article ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO.

[S] What I have ſaid (131) of certain editions of the Pſalter of the Proteſtants of Geneva ſhall be a little enlarged.] I have quoted two miniſters (132), who have ſaid, that Charles IX granted a licence for printing this Pſalter to Antony Vincent, Bookſeller of Lyons. This privilege is dated the 14th of October 1562, according to one of theſe miniſters; but, according to the other, it was granted in 1561. I learn from Mr Daillé (133), that it was given at St Germain en Laye, the 19th of October 1561 (§ a), that Robertet, one of the Secretaries of State, ſubſcribed it, and that that theſe Pſalms were printed at Paris, in 1562, for Adrian de Roy, Robert Balard, Martin le Jeune, and Robert Motet; and at Lyons for John Deſtournes. This date proves the obſervation of Mr Jurieu to be falſe (134); for it is not true, that the month of October 1561, was the time when the heat of the perſecutions was violent. It was the time of the conference of Poiſſy: the affairs of the Proteſtants were not then in a very bad ſituation. It will be of ſome uſe to obſerve with what view Mr Daillé mentions this privilege of the Pſalms. He was to anſwer a ſpeech, which the Clergy had made to king Lewis XIII in 1636, in which, among other things, the Proteſtants were charged with having blotted out of their Pſalms a certain paſſage, which contained a prayer for the king (135). The archbiſhop of Orleans was the ſpeaker, and recited theſe verſes of the former tranſlation;

(131) In the remark [N].

(132) Jurieu and Bruguier.

(133) Dallæus, Reſponſ. Apolog. ad Aurelianenſis Epiſcopi Orationem, pag. 261.

[(§ a) Charles IXth's privilege is not dated Octob. 19; but December 26, 1561. REM. CRIT.]

(134) See the remark [N], citation (77).

Seigneur, plaiſe toi de defendre
Et maintenir le roi:
Veuille nos requeſtes entendre,
Quand nous crions à toi.

That is,

Be pleaſed, O Lord, to defend and maintain the king; and hear our petitions, when we cry unto thee.

(135) It is in Pſalm xix according to the Vulgate, and the xxth according to the Hebrew.

He pretended, that it was not long before the pretended Reformers had changed theſe four verſes into the following:

Seigneur, plaiſe toi nous defendre,
Et faire que le roi
Puiſſe nos requetes entendre
Encontre tout effroi.

That is,

Be pleaſed, O Lord, to defend us, and make the king hear our petitions againſt all affright.

His declamation thereupon was very vehement. I omit Mr Daillé's anſwer, as to the principal point, namely to ſhew, that the Hebrew Text is more agreeable to the latter tranſlation, than to the former, which is according to the Vulgate: I only ſay, that he obſerves, that the latter verſion is that, which has always been followed ſince the Reformed obtained the firſt liberty of conſcience, by the edict of January 1562. He ſhews that it is the verſion which appeared in the Pſalter, printed with the privilege, which Charles IX granted, the 19th of October 1561. He confeſſes, that the firſt way of tranſlating is in ſome editions; but he ſays, that they never were uſed by the reformed Churches, or but a very little time. He had ſeen one, which, as far as he could remember, was of the year 1559 (136). It contained but a part of the Pſalms. Obſerve what I have ſaid above, citation (77), that the Pſalter approved by the doctors of the Sorbonne, began but at the xlviiith Pſalm. Whence is it then, that ſo many editions, mentioned by Mr Daillé, and publiſhed in virtue of the privilege granted by Charles IX, in conſequence of the approbation of the doctors, contained the xxth Pſalm? Mr Colomiés has declared for the firſt tranſlation, and has blamed Beza, for not having followed it, in his firſt edition of the Pſalms, which appeared, if I am not miſtaken, adds he, in the year 1560, he afterwards went from it (137). In which he did very ill, continues he, to correct himſelf. For (beſides that this laſt tranſlation is not near ſo faithful as the firſt) referring to the people, what ought to be underſtood of the king, he has thereby given occaſion, though innocently, to a calumny, with which we are charged to this very day.

(136) Dallæus, ubi ſupra, pag. 260, 261.

(137) Colomiés, Letter to Mr Claude, at page 184 of his Obſervationes ſacræ, Edit. 1679.

MARSILIUS of Padua. See MENANDRINO.

MARSUS (a) (PETER), born at Ceſa in Campagnia di Roma (b), was eſteemed for his works about the end of the XVth century. He had been a diſciple of Pomponius Lætus and Argyropylus (c). He was dedicated to an eccleſiaſtical life from his youth (d); notwithſtanding which, he employed himſelf more in illuſtrating profane authors [A], than in turning over Chriſtian authors. It is true, that, remembring his vocation, and to preſerve the decorum of it, he undertook to comment on the fineſt book of Morality, which the Pagans have left us; I mean Tully's Offices [B]. At that time he

(a) He had this name becauſe he was born in the country of the antient Marſi.

(b) Leandro Alberti, Deſcritt. di tutta Italia. fol. m. 151, verſo.

(c) See the remark [C].

(d) See the remark [B].

[A] He employed himſelf very much ... in illuſtrating profane authors.] His notes on Silius Italicus were printed in Folio, with the text of that Poet, at Venice, in the year 1483 and 1492, and at Paris in 1512. Add to this the editions in 8vo, which are that of Paris 1531, and that of Baſil 1543. His Notes on Terence were printed, with thoſe of Malleolus, at Straſburg, in 1506, in 4to, and at Lyons in 1522 (1). They had already been printed at Venice. The edition of his Commentary on the books of Cicero de natura Deorum, which has been taken notice of in Geſner's Bibliotheque (2), and which is of Baſil, apud Jo. Oporinum 1544, is not the firſt. This work was firſt printed at Paris, and dedicated to Lewis XII by the author, who calls himſelf a prieſt (3) in his preface, and acknowleges himſelf to be, already, very old. Father Leſcalopier had ſeen a copy of this little book only in the library of the Jeſuits at Reims (4). I am going to mention a Commentary of our Marſus, on Tully's Offices.

(1) Geſner, Bibl. fol. 538, verſo.

(2) Fol. 550, verſo.

(3) Servulum & Preſbyterum Chriſti.

(4) Leſcalop. Pref. Comment. in Ciceronis libros de Natura Deorum.

[B] Remembring his vocation ..... he undertook to comment on .... Tully's Offices.] This is what he ſays in his epiſtle dedicatory to cardinal Francis de Gonzaga. 'Ne igitur ocio; quod poſt varios labores & 'moleſtias ſub te tandem nactus ſum: & melius mihi 'ipſi jam polliceri audeo clementia tua & generoſo 'animo frætus abuti viderer: diu multumque cogitavi 'quid potiſſimum mihi cum decoro agendum eſſet qui 'ab ineunte ætate ſacris inſtitutis & ceremoniis initiatus 'eſſem & addictus. Tandem id elegi quod meæ profeſſioni congrueret: & in ſe plurimum honeſtatis haberet & utilitatis. Ciceronis officia, ſ. ad uſum eruditionem cultumque vitæ communis inſtituta interpretari (5) ----- That I may not ſeem to abuſe the leiſure, which, after many fatigues and troubles, I have at length gained under you, and, depending on your clemency and generoſity, dare promiſe my ſelf ſtill better, I conſidered a long time with my ſelf, what was fitteſt for me to employ my time in, who have been from my youth, devoted to the rites and ceremonies of religion. At length I choſe what was ſuitable to my profeſſion, and moſt reputable and uſeful; namely, to explain Tully's Offices, deſigned for the uſe, inſtruction, and cultivation of common life.' He reviſed this Commentary ſome time after, and corrected ſeveral faults, which youth and a haſty impreſſion had introduced into it. Read what he confeſſes in the epiſtle dedicatory of the ſecond edition. 'Qui falſa docet atque defendit: ignorantiam

(5) Petrus Martyr, Ep. ad F. Gonzag. Card. Mantuan.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he enjoyed an honourable leiſure by the favour and liberality of cardinal Francis de Gonzaga. This good fortune had been preceded by ſeveral troubles and inconveniences. He dedicated this commentary to that cardinal; but, when he publiſhed a ſecond edition augmented and corrected, he dedicated it to cardinal Raphael Riario, who honoured him with his good offices. I cannot ſay where nor when he died (e); but I know, that he lived to a great age, and that he was vigorous enough even then to continue writing books (f). Some have ſpoke of his works with great contempt; but others have highly commended them [C]. The moderation, which Barthius obſerved, appears to

(e) See in the remark [C] the words of Leander Alberti.

(f) See the paſſage of Eraſmus, towards the end of the remark [C].

' rantiam ſuam fatetur: & ducem ad omne ſcelus im-
' pudentiam. Horum ſacratis inſiſtens veſtigiis: licet
' hallucinanti ſimilis: mea commentariola recognovi.
' Cum in illis multa juveniliter ac minus quam de-
' cuiſſet conſiderate dicta cognoſcerem: celeritas nam-
' que partus efficit: ut manca quodammodo & habe-
' rentur & eſſent: cum Horatianæ maturitatis oppor-
' tunitatem exſpectare non ſuſtinuerint: quod impru-
' dentiæ aſcribendum eſt: præſertim hac ætate quæ
' per omnem Italiam perſpicaciſſimis decoratur inge-
' niis (6) - - - - He who teaches and defends what is
' falſe, confeſſes his ignorance, and impudence, which ' leads to every vice. Treading in the ſacred footſteps of
' theſe men, tho' like one who miſtakes the way, I have
' reviſed my Commentary; obſerving in it many things boy-
' iſhly and inconſiderately ſaid; for a haſty birth is gene- ' rally imperfect; nor could I wait the maturity pre-
' ſcribed by Horace; which is to be aſcribed to imprudence,
' eſpecially in this age, when the fineſt geniuſes appear in
' all parts of Italy.' All authors ought to profit by this example. They ſhould not apply to a Printer the moment they are paſſed their childhood, and they ſhould compoſe ſedately and at leiſure. They find, too late, the inconvenience of the contrary behaviour (7). But let us return to Peter Marſus. He retrenched many things, and added many others; and he acknowledges, that Cardinal Raphael Riario, his patron, had given him his advice in the reviſal. ' Ne igitur
' ocio quod benignitas tua mihi conceſſit abuterer: id
' tentavi quod eminentiſſimum celſitudinis tuæ inge-
' nium & ſupra ætatem in rebus omnibus judicium ef-
' flagitabant. Utilitatem: ſi quæ erit in his Petri
' Marſi clientis tui commentariolis: amplitudini tuæ
' debebunt adoleſcentes: quorum inſtitutioni: te hor-
' tante: te duce: pro viribus conſulendum duxi: quod
' ut aliquando conſequerer multa delevi: multa addidi:
' quæ ex uberrimo Platonis & Ariſtotelis fonte de-
' ducta: Ciceronis majeſtas expoſcere videbatur (8).
' - - - - Therefore that I might not make an ill uſe of the ' leiſure you have kindly procured me, I attempted ſuch a
' work, as your Eminency's great abilities, and uncom-
' mon judgment required. If youth receives any benefit
' from the Commentaries of your client Peter Marſus, they
' are indebted for it to your Eminency, who encouraged
' and aſſiſted me in endeavouring their improvement; to
' effect which, I have blotted out many things, and ad-
' ded others, which, fetched from the plentiful ſtores of
' Plato and Ariſtotle, the mighty Cicero ſeemed to re-
' quire.' Note, that he ſays, he intended to reviſe in the ſame manner what he had written on Silius Italicus; but that he waited for a convenient opportunity to publiſh his thoughts on Horace, and on Cicero's Tuſculan Queſtions, and his books de Finibus. Note alſo, that he commented on the treatiſes, which generally go along with the Offices, namely the Dialogues de Amicitia, and de Senectute, and the Paradoxes. The edition, which I make uſe of, is of Venice, per Bartholomæum de Zanis de Porteſio, 1498, in Folio. It is at leaſt the ſecond. Geſner mentions only that of Lyons 1514 (9).

[C] Some have ſpoken of his works with great contempt; but others have highly commended them.] Geſner (10) cites theſe words of Ludovicus Vives. ' Petrus
' Marſus in Officia Ciceronis loquacitate pene intole-
' rabilis - - - - - Peter Marſus in his Commentary on
' Tully's offices, is intolerably loquacious.' Let us ſee the judgment, which Dauſqueius made on Peter Marſus's Notes on Silius Italicus. ' Silium immerentem ac de
' fato ſuo mœrentem conſpicati tres viri, licet humani
' habiti, ſuppetias ferre connixi ſunt Marſus, Modius,
' & Auctor Crepundiorum; ſed aut novis ſæviere pla-
' gis, aut hiantia vulnera diduxere. Ignoſcibilis qui-
' dem Marſi ignoratio, & ſeculo condonanda: ſimpli-
' citate nocuit, nec valde (11) - - - - - Three perſons,
' though eſteemed good-natured men, beheld SILIUS la-
' menting his undeſerved fate, and reſolved to help him:
' they were Marſus, Modius, and the author of the Crepundia: but they either gave him new wounds, or cruelly
' opened his old ones. Marſus's ignorance is indeed par-
' donable, and to be aſcribed to the age in which he ' lived; he hurt his author through folly, but not greatly.'

Here follow ſome authors, who judge of him more to his advantage. ' Petrus Marſus non ad poëtas ſolum
' explicandos, ſed ad oratores, quoque & philoſo-
' phos ſtudium adjecit. Extant ejus in Silium Ita-
' licum commentarii, multa eruditione referti: ſed
' longè utiliora, quæ in Ciceronis opera conſcripſit:
' eloquens, ut Pomponii auditorem agnoſcas, &, quod
' plus eſt, propemodum philoſophus: ſed quantuſcun-
' que in philoſophia eſt, eum Argyropuli contuber-
' nium effecit. Epitaphium ejus tale mihi ſeſe obtulit

Quæ ſola eloquii ſuperabat gloria & illam
Perdidimus, tecum vixit & interiit (12).

' (12) - - - - - Peter Marſus applied himſelf not only to
' explaining the Poets, but the Orators and Philoſophers
' likewiſe. There are extant his Commentaries on Silius
' Italicus, full of learning, but what he wrote on Cicero's
' works is much more uſeful: ſo eloquent a writer, that ' you would fancy him a diſciple of Pomponius, and,
' what is more, almoſt a philoſopher: but he is indebted
' to Argyropylus, with whom he lived, for all his Philo-
' ſophy. His epitaph, as I have met with it, is as fol-
' lows:

The poor remains of eloquence are fled;
With thee alone it liv'd, with thee is dead.

Add to this theſe words of Leandro Alberti: ' Ceſa
' picciolo Caſtello, patria gia di Pietro Marſo huomo
' molto litterato. Il quale colle ſue ſingolari virtuti ha
' illuſtrato queſto luogo, come chiaramente conoſcere ſi
' puo dall' opere da lui laſciate, & maſſimamente delli
' Commentari fatti ſopra Sillio Italico. Abandonò li
' mortali pochi anni fa (13). - - - - - Peter Marſus, a
' very learned man, was born at Ceſa, a ſmall caſtle.
' This man has made this place famous by his ſingular
' virtues, as plainly appears by the works he left behind
' him particularly his Commentaries on Silius Italicus.
' He died but a few years ago.' See in the margin the Latin verſion, which Kyriander has given of this Italian paſſage (14), and note, by the way, that Peter Marſus had not been long dead, when Leandro Alberti wrote this; but we can conclude nothing certain concerning the year of his death, ſince this work of Alberti was finiſhed a long time before it was made public. It was printed in the year 1550, and Flaminius had read it in manuſcript in the year 1537 (15). Perhaps, the page, in which Peter Marſus is commended, had been written, a long time, when the author communicated his manuſcript to Flaminius. One ought never to make uſe of the expreſſion not long ſince, &c. without ſetting down the year, in which we thus expreſs ourſelves. Eraſmus, who had ſeen Marſus at Rome about the beginning of the XVIth century, ſays, that he was very old, and that he continued to write. ' Romæ vidi Petrum
' Marſum longævum potiùs quam celebrem. Non
' multum aberat ab annis octoginta, & florebat ani-
' mus in corpore non infelici. Mihi viſus eſt vir pro-
' bus & integer, neque potui non mirari induſtriam.
' In tanta ætate ſcribebat Commentarios in librum de
' Senectute, alioſque nonnullos Ciceronis libellos. Li-
' cebat in eo perſpicere veſtigia veteris ſeculi (16). - - -
' I ſaw Marſus at Rome, who was rather an old, than
' a famous man. He wanted but little of eighty years,
' and he had a vigorous mind in no unhappy body. He
' ſeemed to me a man of probity and integrity, and I
' could not but admire his induſtry. At ſo great an age,
' he

(12) Autor Dialogi de reparatione linguæ Latinæ, apud Gifanium, pag. 411, citante Konigio in Biblioth. pag. 512.

(13) Leand. Alberti, Deſcritt. di tutta l'Italia, fol. m. 125. verſo.

(14) Oppidulum Ceſa, Petri Marſi Patria, nuper vita defuncti, virl cum primis literati, prout ejus ſcripta, maximeque Commentaria in Silium teſtantur.

(15) This appears by a letter of Flaminius, dated the firſt of May, 1537. It is prefixed to Leandro Alberti's book.

(16) Eraſm. Epiſt. v, lib. xxiii, pag. m. 1210.

(6) Petrus Marſus, Epiſt. ad Raphaelem Riarium.

(7) See the remark [B] of the article ZUERIUS.

(8) Marſus, Ep. ad Raph. Riarium.

(9) Geſner, Bibl. fol. 550, verſo.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Dauſq. Præf. in Sil. Ital. fol. 1 verſo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to me very reaſonable [D].

' he wrote Commentaries on the book de Senectute, and ' ſome other books of Cicero. It was eaſy to diſcover ' in him the footſteps of antiquity.'

[D] The moderation, which Barthius has obſerved, appears to me to be very reaſonable.] He does not pretend, that, abſolutely ſpeaking, Peter Marſus's Notes are good; but only that they deſerve praiſe, conſidering the time in which they were written. It is ingratitude, and a crying injuſtice, to deſpiſe or blame authors, who had ſuch great obſtacles to ſurmount, at a time when literature was but beginning to revive. Reaſon will have us pay a veneration to it's firſt reſtorers, though their labours are very imperfect. Such commentators, as, at preſent, ſurpaſs Peter Marſus, would not have equalled him, if they had lived in his time. It is therefore with an ill grace that they inſult him, or judge him not fit to be named. Let us produce the modeſt terms of Barthius; ' Vide quæ notarunt proavorum noſtrorum ævo docti homines, quälium memoriam lubenter facimus ut noſtris litteris ' redintegremus; fuerunt enim optime animati, & ' pro copia tum ſtudiorum, non male de optimis ' Auctoribus meriti: Petrum Marſus Comm. ad Te' rentium, pag. 193. Editionis Venetæ, J. Sulpitius ' ad Lucanum pag. 1230. Tenuibus ambo notis; ſed ' & talia ingenia per nos poſteritati denuo commenden' tur (17). - - - - - Conſider what learned men, in the ' times of our fore-fathers, have remarked, whoſe me' mory let us willingly revive; for they had the beſt ' diſpoſition, and, conſidering the ſtate of learning, de' ſerved very well of the authors: Peter Marſus, ' Comment on Terence, pag. 193, edition of Venice, J. ' Sulpitius on Lucan, pag. 1230: both wrote but ſlender ' notes; nevertheleſs let ſuch geniuſes be again recom' mended by us to poſterity.'

(17) Barthius, in Statium, Tom. iii, pag. 610, ad Verſ. 82, libri vi Theb.

MARTELLIUS, or rather MARTELLUS, (HUGOLIN), biſhop of Glandeves, was of Florence, and one of thoſe Italians, who made their fortune on this ſide of the Alps, by the intereſt of Catherine de Medicis. There are ſcarce any particulars left concerning his life (a), and I have not been able to conſult the Gallia Chriſtiana of the brothers Sammarthani. He publiſhed ſome books of Literature [A], and ſome treatiſes

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] He publiſhed ſome books of Literature.] I find in Konig's Bibliotheque one Hugolinus Martellinus, who publiſhed a Commentary upon the ſecond Ode of the fourth book of Horace, and I am perſuaded that he ſhould be called Martellus or Martellius, and not Martellinus. The Catalogue of Thuanus's library, at p. 324 of the ſecond part, has theſe words. Hugolini Martellii Epiſcopi Gland. epiſtola in qua Calpurnii & Nemeſiani loci aliquot illuſtrantur. This book was printed at Florence by the Juntii in 1590. Naudé obſerves, that one Hugolinus Martellius wrote a whole treatiſe upon an Epigram of Auſonius, and ſo perplexed it with his explications, that it is impoſſible to underſtand any thing of it. If he had known that he ſpoke of a biſhop of Glandeves, he would have made a more honourable mention of him, and not have cenſured him with ſuch palpable contempt. Let us relate, at ſome length, his words; for they explain an obſcure paſſage, and on the other ſide are ſomewhat liable to cenſure (1). ' Auſonii . . . Muſa . . . . Demoſthenis eâ de re judicium, perbrevi ſanè hoc Epigrammate (2) ſed multis tamen obſtructo difficultatibus comprehenſum, nobis offert.

(1) Naudæus, Syntagm. de Studio liberali, pag. 84.

(2) It is the exliſt Epigram of Auſonius.

Diſcere ſi cupias doctis quàm multa licebit.
Quæ nôſti, meditando velis inoleſcere menti,
Quæ didiciſti, haud dum, diſcendo abſumere tendas.

' Sic enim illud exhibent Typographi recentiores, cum ' tamen ante ſuptuaginta annos Aldinus codex, & Gry' phius poſtea liquido haberent in primo verſiculo ' doctus, quæ vox male intellecta fucum procul dubio fecit ' diſertiſſimo Eliæ Vineto, cujus opera atque induſtriâ, ' Auſonii monumenta emendatiora explicatioraque habemus. Hic enim (uti probum Virum, atque ingenuum decebat) fincerè fatetur, ſe mentem hujus Epigrammatis aſſequi non valuiſſe; quam paullò poſt ' Hugolinus quidam Martellius, operæ pretium eſſe ' duxit integro volumine declarare, ſed fatiùs illi profectò fuiſſet micare digitis, aut cucurbitas pingere, ' cùm huic potiùs tam ſpiſſum (velut ſepia) atramentum infuderit, ut illud vix eluere poſſit quidquid eſt ' aquarum in Hippocrene, & Pegaſo; adeò ſingula ' quæque verba malè torquendo, quo ſex in illis gradus ad expeditè diſcendum inveniret, omnem ferme ' Epigrammatis ſenſum corrupit, qui ſic (meo quidem ' judicio) reſtituendus eſt, ut nihil aliud ſibi velit Auſonius, niſi modum edocere, quo docti homines multa ' loqui, & dicere poſſint ex tempore, qui quidem modus in hoc tantùm conſiſtere videtur, ut, quæ jam ' optimè nôrunt, velint ea inoleſcere menti, id eſt, ' firmiter inſerere, ac imaginationi & ingenio commendare; quemadmodum eodem ſenſu dixit Agellius: Natura induit nobis inolevitque, quæ vero nondum bene didicerint, frequenter dicendo & repetendo ' adſumere, & altiùs memoriæ infigere conentur; ſicque totum Epigramma lego, & interpungo:

Diſcere ſi cupias doctus quàm multa, licebit.
Quæ nôſti, meditando velis inoleſcere menti:
Quæ didiciſti haud-dum, dicendo adſumere tendas (3).

(3) According to the correction of Mr Grævius, in the edition of Tollius, there is wanting in the firſt verſe cupis à doctis, and in the laſt diſcenda adſumere.

' - - - - Auſonius's muſe affords us the judgment of De' moſthenes in this matter, in a very ſhort, but obſcure, ' Epigram.

Diſcere ſi cupias, &c.

' So the modern editions give it, though, ſeventy years be' fore, Aldus, and after him Gryphius plainly have it ' doctus in the firſt verſe; which word, ill-underſtood, ' no doubt, puzzled the learned Elias Vinetus, to whoſe ' pains and induſtry it is owing, that the remains of ' Auſonius are more correct and intelligible. He, as be' comes an honeſt man, ingenuouſly confeſſed, that he could ' not diſcover the meaning of this epigram; which ſoon ' after, one Hugolinus Martellius thought it worth his ' while to explain in a whole volume: but he had better ' have trifled away his time on any thing elſe; ſince (like ' the Cuttle-fiſh) he has ſo darkened it with his ink, that ' all the water in Hippocrene and Pegaſus can ſcarce ' waſh it out: for, in order to find in them ſix ſteps to ' learn expeditiouſly, he has tortured every ſingle word, ' and quite deſtroyed all the meaning of the epigram, ' which, in my opinion, is ſo to be reſtored; as that Au' ſonius's meaning ſhall be, only to teach us, how learned ' men may converſe and ſpeak of many things off-hand; ' which conſiſts only in this, that they let thoſe things, ' which they are already well acquainted with, take deep ' root in their minds, and lay faſt hold on their imagi' nations; agreeable to what A. Gellius ſays, Natura ' induit, &c. and that they endeavour, by frequent re' petitions, to infix ſtill deeper in their memories what ' they have not yet well learned. Thus therefore I read, ' and point the whole epigram.

Diſcere ſi cupias doctus, &c.

The miſtake of Naudé conſiſts in this: he ſays, that ſeventy years before, the edition of Aldus put doctus in the firſt verſe; now he wrote this about the year 1633. He pretended therefore, that the edition of Aldus was in the year 1563, or thereabouts. Now this was a miſtake; for that edition was in the year 1517. If any one has a mind to put another ſenſe upon his expreſſions, he may alledge, that he means, that the modern editions, which have put doctis, are later by ſeventy years, than that of Aldus; but beſides that this ſenſe would be ill expreſſed, he muſt alſo be underſtood to mean certain editions, publiſhed in 1587. Now no body has obſerved any edition of Auſonius in that year, and it is certain, that thoſe in 1588, do not deſerve to be mentioned rather than the foregoing.

[B] . . . . and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

treatiſes concerning the reformation of the Calendar [B]. Naudé, who knew ſo many authors, was ignorant of his being a biſhop, and took him to be a very poor writer (b).

(b) See the remark [A].

[B] . . . . and ſome treatiſes concerning the reformation of the Calendar.] Mr Thomaſſin de Mazaugues, counſellor in the parliament of Aix, was pleaſed to give himſelf the trouble to inform me of the following particulars (4). 'Hugolinus Martellus was a Florentine. He came into France with Catherine de 'Medicis, and was made biſhop of Glandeves, January the 10th 1572. The printed books which I 'have of his, are theſe: De anni integra in integrum reſtitutione, dedicated to cardinal Sirlet, and printed 'in 4to at Florence, in 1578. It is divided into 'thirty four ſmall articles, and contains in the whole 'but forty three pages. He reprinted this book at 'Lyons in 1582, in 8vo, with additions, and joined to 'it the following treatiſe, Sacrorum temporum aſſertio, 'which he dedicated to Lewis Martelli, his brother, 'a canon of Florence. In 1583, he alſo publiſhed 'at Lyons in 8vo, the following book, La chiave 'del Calendario Gregoriano, which he dedicated to 'Ottavio Bandini, Referendary, abbot of Caſanuova, 'which is a work of 362 pages, and the moſt conſiderable. This, Sir, is what I know of this Martellius. There are no conſiderable monuments of 'his in his church: he gave ſomething to pious uſes, 'and that is all. None of his family remain in this 'province. We had a famous Phyſician of his name, 'who wrote ſomething and died fifteen years ago, but 'he was not of the ſame family. This Phyſician was 'very learned, and always talking of the abuſes of 'Phyſic, and wrote upon that ſubject.

(4) Taken from a letter written at Aix in Provence, Auguſt 2, 1690.

MARTIN (POLONUS). See POLONUS.

MARTINENGHUS (TITUS PROSPER) a Benedictine Monk, native of Breſcia, and of the family of a count, made himſelf famous by his ſkill in the learned languages. The reputation he acquired, made the college of cardinals ſend for him to Rome, under the pontificate of Pius IV, to give him a commiſſion to reviſe and correct the works of St Jerom, which were afterwards printed by Paulus Manutius. He reviſed alſo the works of St Chryſoſtom, and thoſe of Theophylact, and the Greek Bible, which was printed at Rome. To reward him for ſo great pains, Pius V had a mind to promote him to ſome dignities; but, as ſoon as this Monk heard of it, he retired to a convent in his own country, where he ſpent his time in publiſhing ſeveral books [A]. He died very old at Breſcia, in the monaſtery of St Euphemia, in 1594 (a).

(a) Taken out of the Libraria Breſciana nuovamente aperta da Leonardo Cozzando, Parte prima, pag. 307, & ſeq.

[A] He ſpent his time in publiſhing ſeveral books.] He publiſhed Le bellezze dell' huomo conoſcitor di ſe ſteſſo; they are diſcourſes, which the reading of Plato furniſhed him with. He underſtood the Greek tongue, and had a great inclination to Poetry. Hence it was, that he publiſhed many poems, both in Latin and Greek, moſt of them upon matters of devotion. That, which he made in honour of the Holy Virgin, is divided into ſeveral hymns, which are equal to the number of years that ſhe lived. This poem is intituled Theotocodia, ſive Parthenodia. He made a panegyric upon Sixtus V in Greek and Latin (1).

(1) Taken from Leonardo Cozzando, Libraria Breſciana, pag. 308.

MARTINI (RAYMOND) a Dominican Monk, very well ſkilled in the Oriental Languages flouriſhed about the end of the XIIIth century. He was engaged in the ſtudy of thoſe languages upon this occaſion. Raymond de Pennafort, his general (a), having on one ſide a great deſire to purge Spain from Judaiſm and Mahometiſm, which infected it, and knowing on the other ſide the truth of the maxims, which the primitive Fathers have ſcattered in their works, about conſtraint in matters of religion, cauſed it to be decreed, in a chapter held at Toledo in 1250, that the Monks of his order ſhould apply themſelves to the ſtudy of Hebrew and Arabic. He impoſed this taſk upon ſome of them in particular, among whom he named our Raymond Martini, and he obtained a penſion from the kings of Arragon and Caſtile for thoſe who ſhould ſtudy theſe languages, that they might endeavour to convert the Infidels. From hence it came to paſs that Raymond Martini applied his ſtudies that way, in which he had very good ſucceſs. He was not of Barcelona (b), as ſome have publiſhed (c); but it was there he took upon him the habit of a Dominican, and he was born at Sobirats. Having attained the ſkill that was neceſſary for reading the works of the Rabbins, he extracted from them ſuch things as might ſerve him to beat the Jews at their own weapons, as he has ſhewn in his Pugio Fidei, which was printed at Paris in 1651 (d) [A]. It is believed, that

(a) He was the third general of the Jacobins.

(b) Natione Catalanus, patria Subiratenſis. Altamura, Bibl. Ord. Prædicat. pag. 451.

(c) Antonius Senenſis, in Chronico Ordinis Dominic. & Bibliotheca; Franc. Diagus, in Hiſt. Provinciæ Aragoniæ Fratr. Prædicat; Poſſevinus, in Apparatu; apud Altamur. ibid.

(d) Ex Altamura, ibid.

[A] His Pugio Fidei was printed at Paris in 1651.] Several perſons contributed to this edition. Mr Boſquet, who died biſhop of Montpellier, met with the manuſcript, as he was ſearching with great diligence, at Toulouſe, all the corners of the library of the college of Foix, about the year 1620. He read it, and tranſcribed ſomething out of it, and, after ſome years, when he had learned the Hebrew, by the care of a learned German, called James Spieghel de Roſembach; he ſhewed it to his Hebrew maſter, and gave it to him to tranſcribe. This James Spieghel, being very well verſed in theſe matters, and having frequent Diſcourſes about them with Mr de Mauſſac, put him upon publiſhing this book, from a copy of it very neat, and well pointed, which he gave him: but tho' Mr de Mauſſac was a very able man, yet he wanted an aſſiſtant, who ſhould take upon him the greateſt part of the labour. This aſſociate was Mr de Voiſin, the ſon of a counſellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux. Thomas Turc, general of the Dominicans, ſollicited powerfully the promoters of the edition, and did not only write to them letters equally preſſing and obliging, but alſo gave order, that they ſhould have all the manuſcripts of the Pugio Fidei that could be recovered. John Baptiſt de Marinis, his ſucceſſor, continued to take the ſame care. At laſt the Order concerned themſelves in it ſo far as to be at the expence of the impreſſion (1). The work came from the preſs in 1651, with many prefaces and approbations, which verify what I have ſaid. Mr de Voiſin compared the manuſcript of the college of Foix with three others the firſt of which belonged to the Dominicans of Toulouſe; the ſecond had been ſent from Barcelona, and the third was come from Majorca. He ſet down in the

(1) Prodiit Pugio ille Pariſiis apud Joannem Henault anno 1651, in folio, impenſis Ordinis. Altamura, pag. 451.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google to me very reasonable [D].

' he wrote Commentaries on the book de Senectute, and ' some other books of Cicero. It was easy to discover ' in him the footsteps of antiquity.'

[D] The moderation, which Barthius has observed, appears to me to be very reasonable.] He does not pretend, that, absolutely speaking, Peter Marsus's Notes are good; but only that they deserve praise, considering the time in which they were written. It is ingratitude, and a crying injustice, to despise or blame authors, who had such great obstacles to surmount, at a time when literature was but beginning to revive. Reason will have us pay a veneration to it's first restorers, though their labours are very imperfect. Such commentators, as, at present, surpass Peter Marsus, would not have equalled him, if they had lived in his time. It is therefore with an ill grace that they insult him, or judge him not fit to be named. Let us produce the modest terms of Barthius; ' Vide quæ notarunt proavorum nostrorum ævo docti homines, quàlium memoriam lubenter facimus ut nostris litteris ' redintegremus; fuerunt enim optime animati, & ' pro copia tum studiorum, non male de optimis ' Auctoribus meriti: Petrum Marsus Comm. ad Terentium, pag. 193. Editionis Venetæ, J. Sulpitius ' ad Lucanum pag. 1230. Tenuibus ambo notis; sed ' & talia ingenia per nos posteritati denuo commendentur (17). - - - - - Consider what learned men, in the times of our fore-fathers, have remarked, whose memory let us willingly revive; for they had the best disposition, and, considering the state of learning, deserved very well of the authors: Peter Marsus, Comment on Terence, pag. 193, edition of Venice, J. Sulpitius on Lucan, pag. 1230: both wrote but slender notes; nevertheless let such geniuses be again recommended by us to posterity.'

(17) Barthius, in Statium, Tom. iii, pag. 610, ad Vers. 82, libri vi Thebaid.

MARTELLIUS, or rather MARTELLUS, (HUGOLIN), bishop of Glandeves, was of Florence, and one of those Italians, who made their fortune on this side of the Alpes, by the interest of Catherine de Medicis. There are scarce any particulars left concerning his life (a), and I have not been able to consult the Gallia Christiana of the brothers Sammarthani. He published some books of Literature [A], and some treatises

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] He published some books of Literature.] I find in Konig's Bibliotheque one Hugolinus Martellinus, who published a Commentary upon the second Ode of the fourth book of Horace, and I am persuaded that he should be called Martellus or Martellius, and not Martellinus. The Catalogue of Thuanus's library, at p. 324 of the second part, has these words. Hugolini Martellii Episcopi Gland. epistola in qua Calpurnii & Nemesiani loci aliquot illustrantur. This book was printed at Florence by the Juntii in 1590. Naudé observes, that one Hugolinus Martellius wrote a whole treatise upon an Epigram of Ausonius, and so perplexed it with his explications, that it is impossible to understand any thing of it. If he had known that he spoke of a bishop of Glandeves, he would have made a more honourable mention of him, and not have censured him with such palpable contempt. Let us relate, at some length, his words; for they explain an obscure passage, and on the other side are somewhat liable to censure (1). ' Ausonii . . . Musa . . . . Demosthenis eâ de re judicium, perbrevi sanè hoc Epigrammate (2) sed multis tamen obstructo difficultatibus comprehensum, nobis offert.

(1) Naudæus, Syntagm. de Studio liberali, pag. m. 84.

(2) It is the exlixt Epigram of Ausonius.

Discere si cupias, doctis quàm multa licebit.
Quæ nôsti, meditando velis inolescere menti,
Quæ didicisti, haud dum, discendo absumere tendas.

' Sic enim illud exhibent Typographi recentiores, cum ' tamen ante suptuaginta annos Aldinus codex, & Gryphius postea liquido haberent in primo versiculo ' doctus, quæ vox male intellecta fucum procul dubio fecit ' disertissimo Eliæ Vineto, cujus opera atque industriâ, ' Ausonii monumenta emendatiora explicatioraque habemus. Hic enim (uti probum Virum, atque ingenuum decebat) sincerè fatetur, se mentem hujus Epigrammatis assequi non valuisse; quam paullò pòst ' Hugolinus quidam Martellius, operæ pretium esse ' duxit integro volumine declarare, sed satiùs illi profectò fuisset micare digitis, aut cucurbitas pingere, ' cùm huic potiùs tam spissum (velut sepia) atramentum infuderit, ut illud vix eluere possit quidquid est ' aquarum in Hippocrene, & Pegaso; adeò singula ' quæque verba malè torquendo, quo sex in illis gradus ad expeditè discendum inveniret, omnem ferme ' Epigrammatis sensum corrupit, qui sic (meo quidem ' judicio) restituendus est, ut nihil aliud sibi velit Ausonius, nisi modum edocere, quo docti homines multa ' loqui, & dicere possint ex tempore, qui quidem modus in hoc tantùm consistere videtur, ut, quæ jam ' optimè nôrunt, velint ea inolescere menti, id est, ' firmiter inserere, ac imaginationi & ingenio commendare; quemadmodum eodem sensu dixit Agellius: Natura induit nobis inolevitque, quæ vero nondum bene didicerint, frequenter dicendo & repetendo ' adsumere, & altiùs memoriæ infigere conentur; sic- ' que totum Epigramma lego, & interpungo:

Discere si cupias doctus quàm multa, licebit.
Quæ nôsti, meditando velis inolescere menti:
Quæ didicisti haud-dum, dicendo adsumere tendas (3).

(3) According to the correction of Mr Grævius, in the edition of Tollius, there is wanting in the first verse cupis à doctis, and in the last discendo adjumere.

' - - - - Ausonius's muse affords us the judgment of Demosthenes in this matter, in a very short, but obscure, ' Epigram.

Discere si cupias, &c.

' So the modern editions give it, though, seventy years before, Aldus, and after him Gryphius plainly have it ' doctus in the first verse; which word, ill-understood, ' no doubt, puzzled the learned Elias Vinetus, to whose pains and industry it is owing, that the remains of ' Ausonius are more correct and intelligible. He, as becomes an honest man, ingenuously confessed, that he could ' not discover the meaning of this epigram; which soon ' after, one Hugolinus Martellius thought it worth his ' while to explain in a whole volume: but he had better ' have trifled away his time on any thing else; since (like ' the Cuttle-fish) he has so darkened it with his ink, that ' all the water in Hippocrene and Pegasus can scarce ' wash it out: for, in order to find in them six steps to ' learn expeditiously, he has tortured every single word, ' and quite destroyed all the meaning of the epigram, ' which, in my opinion, is so to be restored; as that Au- ' sonius's meaning shall be, only to teach us, how learned ' men may converse and speak of many things off-hand; ' which consists only in this, that they let those things, ' which they are already well acquainted with, take deep ' root in their minds, and lay fast hold on their imagi- ' nations; agreeable to what A. Gellius says, Natura ' induit, &c. and that they endeavour, by frequent re- ' petitions, to infix still deeper in their memories what ' they have not yet well learned. Thus therefore I read, ' and point the whole epigram.

Discere si cupias doctus, &c.

The mistake of Naudé consists in this: he says, that seventy years before, the edition of Aldus put doctus in the first verse; now he wrote this about the year 1633. He pretended therefore, that the edition of Aldus was in the year 1563, or thereabouts. Now this was a mistake; for that edition was in the year 1517. If any one has a mind to put another sense upon his expressions, he may alledge, that he means, that the modern editions, which have put doctis, are later by seventy years, than that of Aldus; but besides that this sense would be ill expressed, he must also be understood to mean certain editions, published in 1587. Now no body has observed any edition of Ausonius in that year, and it is certain, that those in 1588, do not deserve to be mentioned rather than the foregoing.

[B] . . . . and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

treatiſes concerning the reformation of the Calendar [B]. Naudé, who knew ſo many authors, was ignorant of his being a biſhop, and took him to be a very poor writer (b).

(b) See the remark [A].

[B] . . . . and ſome treatiſes concerning the reformation of the Calendar.] Mr Thomaſſin de Mazaugues, counſellor in the parliament of Aix, was pleaſed to give himſelf the trouble to inform me of the following particulars (4). 'Hugolinus Martellus was a Florentine. He came into France with Catherine de 'Medicis, and was made biſhop of Glandeves, January the 10th 1572. The printed books which I 'have of his, are theſe: De anni integra in integrum reſtitutione, dedicated to cardinal Sirlet, and printed 'in 4to at Florence, in 1578. It is divided into 'thirty four ſmall articles, and contains in the whole 'but forty three pages. He reprinted this book at 'Lyons in 1582, in 8vo, with additions, and joined to 'it the following treatiſe, Sacrorum temporum aſſertio, 'which he dedicated to Lewis Martelli, his brother, 'a canon of Florence. In 1583, he alſo publiſhed 'at Lyons in 8vo, the following book, La chiave 'del Calendario Gregoriano, which he dedicated to 'Ottavio Bandini, Referendary, abbot of Caſanuova, 'which is a work of 362 pages, and the moſt conſiderable. This, Sir, is what I know of this Martellius. There are no conſiderable monuments of 'his in his church: he gave ſomething to pious uſes, 'and that is all. None of his family remain in this 'province. We had a famous Phyſician of his name, 'who wrote ſomething and died fifteen years ago, but 'he was not of the ſame family. This Phyſician was 'very learned, and always talking of the abuſes of 'Phyſic, and wrote upon that ſubject.

(4) Taken from a letter written at Aix in Provence, Auguſt 2, 1730.

MARTIN (Polonus). See POLONUS.

MARTINENGHUS (Titus Prosper) a Benedictine Monk, native of Breſcia, and of the family of a count, made himſelf famous by his ſkill in the learned languages. The reputation he acquired, made the college of cardinals ſend for him to Rome, under the pontificate of Pius IV, to give him a commiſſion to reviſe and correct the works of St Jerom, which were afterwards printed by Paulus Manutius. He reviſed alſo the works of St Chryſoſtom, and thoſe of Theophylact, and the Greek Bible, which was printed at Rome. To reward him for ſo great pains, Pius V had a mind to promote him to ſome dignities; but, as ſoon as this Monk heard of it, he retired to a convent in his own country, where he ſpent his time in publiſhing ſeveral books [A]. He died very old at Breſcia, in the monaſtery of St Euphemia, in 1594 (a).

(a) Taken out of the Libraria Breſciana nuovamente aperta da Leonardo Cozzando, Parte prima, pag. 307, & ſeq.

[A] He ſpent his time in publiſhing ſeveral books.] He publiſhed Le bellezze dell' huomo conoſcitor di ſe ſteſſo; they are diſcourſes, which the reading of Plato furniſhed him with. He underſtood the Greek tongue, and had a great inclination to Poetry. Hence it was, that he publiſhed many poems, both in Latin and Greek, moſt of them upon matters of devotion. That, which he made in honour of the Holy Virgin, is divided into ſeveral hymns, which are equal to the number of years that ſhe lived. This poem is intituled Theotocodia, ſive Parthenodia. He made a panegyric upon Sixtus V in Greek and Latin (1).

(1) Taken from Leonardo Cozzando, Libraria Breſciana, pag. 308.

MARTINI (Raymond) a Dominican Monk, very well ſkilled in the Oriental Languages flouriſhed about the end of the XIIIth century. He was engaged in the ſtudy of thoſe languages upon this occaſion. Raymond de Pennafort, his general (a), having on one ſide a great deſire to purge Spain from Judaiſm and Mahometiſm, which infected it, and knowing on the other ſide the truth of the maxims, which the primitive Fathers have ſcattered in their works, about conſtraint in matters of religion, cauſed it to be decreed, in a chapter held at Toledo in 1250, that the Monks of his order ſhould apply themſelves to the ſtudy of Hebrew and Arabic. He impoſed this taſk upon ſome of them in particular, among whom he named our Raymond Martini, and he obtained a penſion from the kings of Arragon and Caſtile for thoſe who ſhould ſtudy theſe languages, that they might endeavour to convert the Infidels. From hence it came to paſs that Raymond Martini applied his ſtudies that way, in which he had very good ſucceſs. He was not of Barcelona (b), as ſome have publiſhed (c); but it was there he took upon him the habit of a Dominican, and he was born at Sobirats. Having attained the ſkill that was neceſſary for reading the works of the Rabbins, he extracted from them ſuch things as might ſerve him to beat the Jews at their own weapons, as he has ſhewn in his Pugio Fidei, which was printed at Paris in 1651 (d) [A]. It is believed, that

(a) He was the third general of the Jacobins.

(b) Natione Catalanus, patria Subiratenſis. Altamura, Bibl. Ord. Prædicat. pag. 451.

(c) Antonius Senenſis, in Chronico Ordinis Dominic. & Bibliotheca; Franc. Diagus, in Hiſt. Provinciæ Aragoniæ Fratr. Prædicat; Poſſevinus, in Apparatu; apud Altamur. ibid.

(d) Ex Altamura, ibid.

[A] His Pugio Fidei was printed at Paris in 1651.] Several perſons contributed to this edition. Mr Boſquet, who died biſhop of Montpellier, met with the manuſcript, as he was ſearching with great diligence, at Toulouſe, all the corners of the library of the college of Foix, about the year 1620. He read it, and tranſcribed ſomething out of it, and, after ſome years, when he had learned the Hebrew, by the care of a learned German, called James Spieghel de Roſembach; he ſhewed it to his Hebrew maſter, and gave it to him to tranſcribe. This James Spieghel, being very well verſed in theſe matters, and having frequent Diſcourſes about them with Mr de Mauſſac, put him upon publiſhing this book, from a copy of it very neat, and well pointed, which he gave him: but tho' Mr de Mauſſac was a very able man, yet he wanted an aſſiſtant, who ſhould take upon him the greateſt part of the labour. This aſſociate was Mr de Voiſin, the ſon of a counſellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux. Thomas Turc, general of the Dominicans, ſollicited powerfully the promoters of the edition, and did not only write to them letters equally preſſing and obliging, but alſo gave order, that they ſhould have all the manuſcripts of the Pugio Fidei that could be recovered. John Baptiſt de Marinis, his ſucceſſor, continued to take the ſame care. At laſt the Order concerned themſelves in it ſo far as to be at the expence of the impreſſion (1). The work came from the preſs in 1651, with many prefaces and approbations, which verify what I have ſaid. Mr de Voiſin compared the manuſcript of the college of Foix with three others the firſt of which belonged to the Dominicans of Toulouſe; the ſecond had been ſent from Barcelona, and the third was come from Majorca. He ſet down in the

(1) Prodiit Pugio ille Pariſiis apud Joannem Henault anno 1651, in folio, impenſis Ordinis. Altamura, pag. 451.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to me very reaſonable [D].

' he wrote Commentaries on the book de Senectute, and ' ſome other books of Cicero. It was eaſy to diſcover ' in him the footſteps of antiquity.'

[D] The moderation, which Barthius has obſerved, appears to me to be very reaſonable.] He does not pretend, that, abſolutely ſpeaking, Peter Marſus's Notes are good; but only that they deſerve praiſe, conſidering the time in which they were written. It is ingratitude, and a crying injuſtice, to deſpiſe or blame authors, who had ſuch great obſtacles to ſurmount, at a time when literature was but beginning to revive. Reaſon will have us pay a veneration to it's firſt reſtorers, though their labours are very imperfect. Such commentators, as, at preſent, ſurpaſs Peter Marſus, would not have equalled him, if they had lived in his time. It is therefore with an ill grace that they inſult him, or judge him not fit to be named. Let us produce the modeſt terms of Barthius; ' Vide quæ notarunt proavorum noſtrorum ævo docti homines, quæ lium memoriam lubenter facimus ut noſtris litteris ' redintegremus; fuerunt enim optime animati, & ' pro copia tum ſtudiorum, non male de optimis ' Auctoribus meriti: Petrum Marſus Comm. ad Te- ' rentium, pag. 193. Editionis Venetæ, J. Sulpitius ' ad Lucanum pag. 1230. Tenuibus ambo notis; ſed ' & talia ingenia per nos poſteritati denuo commenden- ' tur (17). - - - - - Conſider what learned men, in the ' times of our fore-fathers, have remarked, whoſe me- ' mory let us willingly revive; for they had the beſt ' diſpoſition, and, conſidering the ſtate of learning, de- ' ſerved very well of the authors: Peter Marſus, ' Comment on Terence, pag. 193, edition of Venice, J. ' Sulpitius on Lucan, pag. 1230: both wrote but ſlender ' notes; nevertheleſs let ſuch geniuſes be again recom- ' mended by us to poſterity.'

(17) Barthius, in Statium, Tom. iii, pag. 610, ad Verſ. 82, libri vi Thebaid.

MARTELLIUS, or rather MARTELLUS, (HUGOLIN), biſhop of Glandeves, was of Florence, and one of thoſe Italians, who made their fortune on this ſide of the Alpes, by the intereſt of Catherine de Medicis. There are ſcarce any particulars left concerning his life (a), and I have not been able to conſult the Gallia Chriſtiana of the brothers Sammarthani. He publiſhed ſome books of Literature [A], and ſome treatiſes

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] He publiſhed ſome books of Literature.] I find in Konig's Bibliotheque one Hugolinus Martellinus, who publiſhed a Commentary upon the ſecond Ode of the fourth book of Horace, and I am perſuaded that he ſhould be called Martellus or Martellius, and not Martellinus. The Catalogue of Thuanus's library, at p. 324 of the ſecond part, has theſe words. Hugolini Martellii Epiſcopi Gland. epiſtola in qua Calpurnii & Nemeſiani loci aliquot illuſtrantur. This book was printed at Florence by the Juntii in 1590. Naudé obſerves, that one Hugolinus Martellius wrote a whole treatiſe upon an Epigram of Auſonius, and ſo perplexed it with his explications, that it is impoſſible to underſtand any thing of it. If he had known that he ſpoke of a biſhop of Glandeves, he would have made a more honourable mention of him, and not have cenſured him with ſuch palpable contempt. Let us relate, at ſome length, his words; for they explain an obſcure paſſage, and on the other ſide are ſomewhat liable to cenſure (1). ' Auſonii . . . Muſa . . . . De- ' moſthenis eâ de re judicium, perbrevi ſanè hoc Epi- ' grammate (2) ſed multis tamen obſtructo difficultati- ' bus comprehenſum, nobis offert.

(1) Naudæus, Syntagm. de Studio liberali, pag. m. 84.

(2) It is the exliſt Epigram of Auſonius.

Diſcere ſi cupias doctis quàm multa licebit.
Quæ nôſti, meditando velis inoleſcere menti,
Quæ didiciſti, haud dum, diſcendo abſumere tendas.

' Sic enim illud exhibent Typographi recentiores, cum ' tamen ante ſuptuaginta annos Aldinus codex, & Gry- ' phius poſtea liquido haberent in primo verſiculo ' doctus, quæ vox male intellecta fucum procul dubio fecit ' diſertiſſimo Eliæ Vineto, cujus opera atque induſtriâ, ' Auſonii monumenta emendatiora explicatioraque ha- ' bemus. Hic enim (uti probum Virum, atque inge- ' nuum decebat) ſincerè fatetur, ſe mentem hujus Epi- ' grammatis aſſequi non valuiſſe; quam paullò poſt ' Hugolinus quidam Martellius, operæ pretium eſſe ' duxit integro volumine declarare, ſed fatiùs illi pro- ' fectò fuiſſet micare digitis, aut cucurbitas pingere, ' cùm huic potiùs tam ſpiſſum (velut ſepia) atramen- ' tum infuderit, ut illud vix eluere poſſit quidquid eſt ' aquarum in Hippocrene, & Pegaſo; adeò ſingula ' quæque verba malè torquendo, quo ſex in illis gra- ' dus ad expeditè diſcendum inveniret, omnem ferme ' Epigrammatis ſenſum corrupit, qui ſic (meo quidem ' judicio) reſtituendus eſt, ut nihil aliud ſibi velit Au- ' ſonius, niſi modum edocere, quo docti homines multa ' loqui, & dicere poſſint ex tempore, qui quidem mo- ' dus in hoc tantùm conſiſtere videtur, ut, quæ jam ' optimè nôrunt, velint ea inoleſcere menti, id eſt, ' firmiter inſerere, ac imaginationi & ingenio com- ' mendare; quemadmodum eodem ſenſu dixit Agel- ' lius: Natura induit nobis inolevitque, quæ vero non- ' dum bene didicerint, frequenter dicendo & repetendo ' adſumere, & altiùs memoriæ infigere conentur; fic- ' que totum Epigramma lego, & interpungo:

Diſcere ſi cupias doctus quàm multa, licebit.
Quæ nôſti, meditando velis inoleſcere menti:
Quæ didiciſti haud-dum, dicendo adſumere tendas (3).

(3) According to the correction of Mr Grævius, in the edition of Tollius, there is wanting in the firſt verſe cupis & doctis, and in the laſt diſcenda adſumere.

' - - - - Auſonius's muſe affords us the judgment of De- ' moſthenes in this matter, in a very ſhort, but obſcure, ' Epigram.

Diſcere ſi cupias, &c.

' So the modern editions give it, though, ſeventy years be- ' fore, Aldus, and after him Gryphius plainly have it ' doctus in the firſt verſe; which word, ill-underſtood, ' no doubt, puzzled the learned Elias Vinetus, to whoſe ' pains and induſtry it is owing, that the remains of ' Auſonius are more correct and intelligible. He, as be- ' comes an honeſt man, ingenuouſly confeſſed, that he could ' not diſcover the meaning of this epigram; which ſoon ' after, one Hugolinus Martellius thought it worth his ' while to explain in a whole volume: but he had better ' have trifled away his time on any thing elſe; ſince (like ' the Cuttle-fiſh) he has ſo darkened it with his ink, that ' all the water in Hippocrene and Pegaſus can ſcarce ' waſh it out: for, in order to find in them ſix ſteps to ' learn expeditiouſly, he has tortured every ſingle word, ' and quite deſtroyed all the meaning of the epigram, ' which, in my opinion, is ſo to be reſtored; as that Au- ' ſonius's meaning ſhall be, only to teach us, how learned ' men may converſe and ſpeak of many things off-hand; ' which conſiſts only in this, that they let thoſe things, ' which they are already well acquainted with, take deep ' root in their minds, and lay faſt hold on their imagi- ' nations; agreeable to what A. Gellius ſays, Natura ' induit, &c. and that they endeavour, by frequent re- ' petitions, to infix ſtill deeper in their memories what ' they have not yet well learned. Thus therefore I read, ' and point the whole epigram.

Diſcere ſi cupias doctus, &c.

The miſtake of Naudé conſiſts in this: he ſays, that ſeventy years before, the edition of Aldus put doctus in the firſt verſe; now he wrote this about the year 1633. He pretended therefore, that the edition of Aldus was in the year 1563, or thereabouts. Now this was a miſtake; for that edition was in the year 1517. If any one has a mind to put another ſenſe upon his expreſſions, he may alledge, that he means, that the modern editions, which have put doctis, are later by ſeventy years, than that of Aldus; but beſides that this ſenſe would be ill expreſſed, he muſt alſo be underſtood to mean certain editions, publiſhed in 1587. Now no body has obſerved any edition of Auſonius in that year, and it is certain, that thoſe in 1588, do not deſerve to be mentioned rather than the foregoing.

[B] . . . . and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

treatiſes concerning the reformation of the Calendar [B]. Naudé, who knew ſo many authors, was ignorant of his being a biſhop, and took him to be a very poor writer (b).

(b) See the remark [A].

[B] . . . . and ſome treatiſes concerning the reformation of the Calendar.] Mr Thomaſſin de Mazaugues, counſellor in the parliament of Aix, was pleaſed to give himſelf the trouble to inform me of the following particulars (4). 'Hugolinus Martellus was a Florentine. He came into France with Catherine de Medicis, and was made biſhop of Glandeves, January the 10th 1572. The printed books which I have of his, are theſe: De anni integra in integrum reſtitutione, dedicated to cardinal Sirlet, and printed in 4to at Florence, in 1578. It is divided into thirty four ſmall articles, and contains in the whole but forty three pages. He reprinted this book at Lyons in 1582, in 8vo, with additions, and joined to it the following treatiſe, Sacrorum temporum aſſertio, which he dedicated to Lewis Martelli, his brother, a canon of Florence. In 1583, he alſo publiſhed at Lyons in 8vo, the following book, La chiave del Calendario Gregoriano, which he dedicated to Ottavio Bandini, Referendary, abbot of Caſanuova, which is a work of 362 pages, and the moſt conſiderable. This, Sir, is what I know of this Martellius. There are no conſiderable monuments of his in his church: he gave ſomething to pious uſes, and that is all. None of his family remain in this province. We had a famous Phyſician of his name, who wrote ſomething and died fifteen years ago, but he was not of the ſame family. This Phyſician was very learned, and always talking of the abuſes of Phyſic, and wrote upon that ſubject.

(4) Taken from a letter written at Aix in Provence, Auguſt 2, 1700.

MARTIN (Polonus). See POLONUS.

MARTINENGHUS (Titus Prosper) a Benedictine Monk, native of Breſcia, and of the family of a count, made himſelf famous by his ſkill in the learned languages. The reputation he acquired, made the college of cardinals ſend for him to Rome, under the pontificate of Pius IV, to give him a commiſſion to reviſe and correct the works of St Jerom, which were afterwards printed by Paulus Manutius. He reviſed alſo the works of St Chryſoſtom, and thoſe of Theophylact, and the Greek Bible, which was printed at Rome. To reward him for ſo great pains, Pius V had a mind to promote him to ſome dignities; but, as ſoon as this Monk heard of it, he retired to a convent in his own country, where he ſpent his time in publiſhing ſeveral books [A]. He died very old at Breſcia, in the monaſtery of St Euphemia, in 1594 (a).

(a) Taken out of the Libraria Breſciana nuovamente aperta da Leonardo Cozzando, Parte prima, pag. 307, & ſeq.

[A] He ſpent his time in publiſhing ſeveral books.] He publiſhed Le bellezze dell' huomo conoſcitor di ſe ſteſſo; they are diſcourſes, which the reading of Plato furniſhed him with. He underſtood the Greek tongue, and had a great inclination to Poetry. Hence it was, that he publiſhed many poems, both in Latin and Greek, moſt of them upon matters of devotion. That, which he made in honour of the Holy Virgin, is divided into ſeveral hymns, which are equal to the number of years that ſhe lived. This poem is intituled Theotocodia, ſeve Parthenodia. He made a panegyric upon Sixtus V in Greek and Latin (1).

(1) Taken from Leonardo Cozzando, Libraria Breſciana, pag. 308.

MARTINI (Raymond) a Dominican Monk, very well ſkilled in the Oriental Languages flouriſhed about the end of the XIIIth century. He was engaged in the ſtudy of thoſe languages upon this occaſion. Raymond de Pennafort, his general (a), having on one ſide a great deſire to purge Spain from Judaiſm and Mahometiſm, which infected it, and knowing on the other ſide the truth of the maxims, which the primitive Fathers have ſcattered in their works, about conſtraint in matters of religion, cauſed it to be decreed, in a chapter held at Toledo in 1250, that the Monks of his order ſhould apply themſelves to the ſtudy of Hebrew and Arabic. He impoſed this taſk upon ſome of them in particular, among whom he named our Raymond Martini, and he obtained a penſion from the kings of Arragon and Caſtile for thoſe who ſhould ſtudy theſe languages, that they might endeavour to convert the Infidels. From hence it came to paſs that Raymond Martini applied his ſtudies that way, in which he had very good ſucceſs. He was not of Barcelona (b), as ſome have publiſhed (c); but it was there he took upon him the habit of a Dominican, and he was born at Sobirats. Having attained the ſkill that was neceſſary for reading the works of the Rabbins, he extracted from them ſuch things as might ſerve him to beat the Jews at their own weapons, as he has ſhewn in his Pugio Fidei, which was printed at Paris in 1651 (d) [A]. It is believed, that

(a) He was the third general of the Jacobins.

(b) Natione Catalanus, patria Subiratenſis. Altamura, Bibl. Ord. Prædicat. pag. 451.

(c) Antonius Senenſis, in Chronico Ordinis Dominic. & Bibliotheca; Franc. Diagus, in Hiſt. Provinciæ Aragoniæ Fratr. Prædicat; Poſſevinus, in Apparatu; apud Altamur. ibid.

(d) Ex Altamura, ibid.

[A] His Pugio Fidei was printed at Paris in 1651.] Several perſons contributed to this edition. Mr Boſquet, who died biſhop of Montpellier, met with the manuſcript, as he was ſearching with great diligence, at Toulouſe, all the corners of the library of the college of Foix, about the year 1620. He read it, and tranſcribed ſomething out of it, and, after ſome years, when he had learned the Hebrew, by the care of a learned German, called James Spieghel de Roſembach; he ſhewed it to his Hebrew maſter, and gave it to him to tranſcribe. This James Spieghel, being very well verſed in theſe matters, and having frequent Diſcourſes about them with Mr de Mauſſac, put him upon publiſhing this book, from a copy of it very neat, and well pointed, which he gave him: but tho' Mr de Mauſſac was a very able man, yet he wanted an aſſiſtant, who ſhould take upon him the greateſt part of the labour. This aſſociate was Mr de Voiſin, the ſon of a counſellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux. Thomas Turc, general of the Dominicans, ſollicited powerfully the promoters of the edition, and did not only write to them letters equally preſſing and obliging, but alſo gave order, that they ſhould have all the manuſcripts of the Pugio Fidei that could be recovered. John Baptiſt de Marinis, his ſucceſſor, continued to take the ſame care. At laſt the Order concerned themſelves in it ſo far as to be at the expence of the impreſſion (1). The work came from the preſs in 1651, with many prefaces and approbations, which verify what I have ſaid. Mr de Voiſin compared the manuſcript of the college of Foix with three others the firſt of which belonged to the Dominicans of Toulouſe; the ſecond had been ſent from Barcelona, and the third was come from Majorca. He ſet down in the

(1) Prodiit Pugio ille Pariſiis apud Joannem Henault anno 1651, in folio, impenſis Ordinis. Altamura, pag. 451.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that Peter Galatinus a Franciſcan, took from this Pugio Fidei all that he has ſaid to any good purpoſe in his book De Arcanis Catholicæ Veritatis. But it is more probable, that he ſtole from a Carthuſian of Genoa, called Porchettus Salvago (e) [B], who flouriſhed about the year 1315 (f). It is true, that this Carthuſian had taken from Raymond Martini what he thought proper, as he acknowledges in his preface. This confeſſion acquits him of being a Plagiary, from which Galatinus cannot be cleared, who never mentions Porchettus, nor Martini. The learned Joſeph Scaliger has been guilty of ſome faults [C], in juſtly accuſing Francis Galatinus of being a Plagiary. Martini finiſhed his work in the year 1278 (g). And hereby they are refuted, who pretend, that Raymond de Pennafort was the author of it; for it is plainly proved, that he died January the ſixth, 1275 (b). There are ſome, who think, that Martini wrote another book entituled Capiſtrum Judæorum, and a refutation of the Alcoran; and that the copy of the Pugio Fidei, written with his own hand in Latin and Hebrew, is at Naples, in the convent of St Dominic (i). The great knowledge he diſcovered, in the books and

(e) Porchettus de Sylvaticis.

(f) Rafael Soprani, Scrittori della Liguria, pag. 244.

(g) He ſays ſo, Part ii, Pugion. cap. x, apud Altamur. pag. 453.

(b) Vide Altamuram, ibid.

(i) Poſſev. in Appar. Sacro.

the margin the various readings, and wrote notes upon all the difficult places. He detected all the thefts of Galatinus, and made good ſupplements by way of commentary upon the preface of Raymond Martini. It is ſurpriſing, that Gabriel Naudé did not know, that Scaliger was miſtaken in ſpeaking of Galatinus and Sebondus. See below the remark [C]; and here follow the words of Naudé: 'Omnium ut majori conatu, ſic 'etiam feliciori eventu, Petrus Galatinus Monachus 'ex ordine ſancti Franciſci; aut potius Raimundus 'Sebondus profeſſione Medicus, cujus, præter libros 'de Theologia naturali, duo inſuper volumina ingen- 'tia in Collegio Fuxenſi Theloſano etiamnum hodie 'ſub titulo Pugionis fidei conſervantur. Ex quibus, ſi 'Joſepho Scaligero fides eſt habenda, omnia ſua hau- 'ſit & tranſcripſit Galatinus, diſſimulato ipſius Sobon- 'di nomine; non tam propter acerrimum, quod ſem- 'per extitit inter Dominicanam familiam & Franciſca- 'nam, odium, quemadmodum maligne cavillatur Sca- 'liger, & fortaſſis etiam imperite; quam ut eruditum 'iſtud opus acceſſione quadam augeret & ſibi vendica- 'ret locupletatum ita atque expolitum (2). - - Peter Ga- 'latinus, a Monk of the order of St Francis, as he took more 'pains, ſo ſucceeded better; or rather Raimund Sebondus, 'by profeſſion a Phyſician, of whoſe writing, beſides his 'books on natural religion, two large volumes, under the 'title of Pugio Fidei, are ſtill preſerved in the college of 'Foix, at Toloufe. From which, if Joſeph Scaliger is 'to be believed, Galatinus borrowed and tranſcribed all 'he wrote, ſuppreſſing the name of Sebondus; not ſo much 'on account of the inveterate hatred between the Domi- 'nicans and Franciſcans, as Scaliger ill-naturedly, and 'perhaps unſkillfully, ſuppoſes, as for the ſake of augmen- 'ting that work, and claiming it, ſo augmented and po- 'liſhed, as his own.' There was a ſecond edition of the Pugio Fidei, at Leipſic, in 1687, with a learned introduction, in Theologiam Judaïcam (3).

(2) Naudæus, in Bibliographia Politica, pag. m. 35.

(3) Written by Jo. Benedictus Carpzovius, Theologiæ Profeſſor Lipſiæ.

[B] It is more probable, that Galatinus ſtole from . . . Porchettus Salvago.] This is proved by Father Morin, who affirms, that he found the ſame things in Porchettus, and Galatinus, in all places where he compared them together. He adds, that all the artifice, which Galatinus has made uſe of to conceal his theft, conſiſts in ſome changes of expreſſion, and of the diviſion of the chapters, in the method of the dialogue, and in his frequent citations of a Rabbi (4) unknown to Martinus and Porchettus, and alſo to the Jews. Plagium ſane portentoſum cui vix ſimile unquam factum eſt, nam Galatini liber nihil aliud eſt quam Porcheti exſcriptio ipſiſſimis Porcheti verbis, atque etiam Hebræorum textuum tranſlationibus conſervatis, hoc ſi excipias, quod elegantiæ cauſa quædam verba & verborum conſtructiones immutantur. Eſt enim Porcheti phraſis Galatiniana multo ſimplicior. Deinde alius eſt ordo Galatini & minutius diſtinctus, ideo ex uno Porcheti capite duo vel tria componit & varie digerit, in qua dialogica fermocinatione alium paulo colorem inducit . . . . Non id tantum ſemel deprehendimus, ſed toties quoties id periclitati ſumus, mirati ſane Galatinum Porcheto reconditæ Judæorum Hiſtoriæ nihil ſuperaddere præter frequentia teſtimonia ex libello, &c (5). Galatinus dedicated his book to the emperor Maximilian I, and did not believe, that Porchet's book would be printed ſo ſoon. We may ſay alſo that he hoped this manuſcript would never be publiſhed; for it was exceeding rare: but Auguſtin Juſtiniani, biſhop of Nebbio, did nevertheleſs diſcover it by the help of money, and publiſhed it at Paris in 1520, with this title, Victoria Porchetti adverſus impios Hebræos.

(4) He is called Rabenu Hakadoſch, and his book Gale Razaia, according to Father Morin. Others call him Hakkadoſch.

(5) Joan. Morinus, Exercit. Biblic. i, lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 16. Vide etiam pag. 19.

[C] Joſeph Scaliger has been guilty of ſome faults.] He believed firſt, that the author of the Pugio Fidei was called Raymond Sebondus. 2. That Raymond Sebondus was a Dominican, and that he lived at Toulouſe about the year 1376. 3. That Galatinus ſtole immediately from the Pugio Fidei: Which may be ſeen in his letters, wherein he mentions this twice to Caſaubon (6), and once to Thomſon (7). 'Scito 'illos libros (Galatini) eſſe compendium duorum in- 'gentium voluminum quibus titulum Pugionem fidei 'fecit auctor Raimundus Sebond Monachus Domini- 'canus, eximius Philoſophus. - - - - Know, that thoſe 'books of Galatinus are an abridgment of two large 'volumes, intituled, Pugio Fidei, by the author Raimond 'Sebondus, a Dominican monk, and an excellent Philoſo- 'pher.' This is what he ſays in letter 84, which he thus confirms in letter 93. 'De Galatino ſcito 'me vera dixiſſe, nam non ſolum illa omnia è Rai- 'mundo Sebone expiſcatus eſt, ſed & opus ejus nihil 'aliud eſt quam breviarum Pugionis fidei, ita enim 'opus ſuum doctiſſimus Dominicanus ille inſcripſerat 'qui Toloſæ ante CC, plus minus annos ſcribebat, 'ejuſque operis duo ingentes tomi in Collegio Fu- 'xenſi ejuſdem civitatis ante annos xxi quum ego ibi 'eſſem, extabant. Cum judicio tamen illi libri le- 'gendi ſunt, qui utinam typis excuſi eſſent. Hoc 'unicum exemplum, præter aliud quod penes Mat- 'thæum Beroaldum fuit, Toloſæ extare ſcio. - - - - - 'Know, that what I ſay of Galatinus is true; for he 'not only ſtole it all out of Raimond Sebondus but his 'work is nothing but an abridgment of the* Pugio Fidei; 'for ſo that learned Dominican, who wrote at Toulouſe 'about two hundred years ago, intituled his work; of 'which there were two large volumes extant in the college 'of Foix, twenty-one years ago, when I was there. 'But thoſe books are to be read with judgment, which I 'wiſh were publiſhed. This copy, beſides another in 'the hands of Matthew Beroaldus, is extant, to my 'knowledge, at Toulouſe.' In letter 241, written in 1606, two years after the 93, he changed ſomething as to the age of Raymond Sebondus, 'qui an- 'te ccxxx plus minus annos, ſays he, Toloſæ vive- 'bat. - - - Raimond Sebond, who lived about 230 years 'ago, at Toulouſe.' Father Morin (8) obſerves, againſt Scaliger, that Raymond Sebondus, who does not appear to have underſtood the Hebrew tongue, was a hundred years younger than Raymond Martini the true author of the Pugio Fidei. He adds, that it is at leaſt three centuries ſince this Martinus wrote his book, becauſe Nicolas de Lyra ſpeaks of him. He ſhews, that Galatinus ſtole immediately only from Porchettus. Mr de Mauſſac has reckoned up yet more exactly the faults of the great Scaliger (9). He does not only ſay, that Raymond Sebondus was neither a monk, nor learned in the oriental tongues, and that, according to Trithemius and Simler (10), he died in 1432; but he ſays alſo, that the manuſcript of Raymond Martini in the college of Foix, contains three volumes; and that beſides this, and the copy of Beroaldus, there is one at Naples, one with the Dominicans of Toulouſe, one at Barcelona, and one at Majorca. If any one would deal as rigorouſly with Mauſſac, as he hath done with Scaliger, he might be told, that he unjuſtly attributed to Scaliger the firſt diſcovery of the theft of Galatinus (11). Matthew Beroaldus ſpoke of it, before the manuſcript of Toulouſe was known to Scaliger; which may be thus demonſtrated. Scaliger wrote in the year 1604, that, twenty-one years before, he had ſeen

(6) Epiſt. lxxxiv, & xciii.

(7) Epiſt. ccxli.

(8) Ubi ſupra, pag. 19.

(9) Vide Prolegomena ad Pugionem fidei.

(10) Epit. Bibl. Gesner. But he ſays, claruit, and not obiit anno 1450. He had better have cited Gesner himſelf.

(11) Primus Galatini furta [illegible] doratus eſt. [illegible] Carpzovius [illegible] like. Even [Scaliger [illegible] agere quod primus Galatini plagium prodidit . . . . Excuſe Scaliger. Galatini furta primus [illegible] boratus eſt. Intr. Jud. pag. 92.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and opinions of the Jews, made ſome believe, that he had been of their religion (k). But this is falſe. (k) Auguſtin Juſtiniani, Præfat. ad Porcheti Victoriam.

ſeen at Toulouſe the Pugio Fidei; ſo that he ſaw it in 1583. Now Beroaldus publiſhed his Chronology in 1575, and had occaſion to obſerve, that Galatinus had publiſhed as his own the writings of Raymond Martini, having made ſome alterations in them. Let us ſet down all that he ſays. 'Galatinus (ut hoc 'obiter moneam) Martini Raymundi ſcripta pro ſuis 'edidit, commutato rerum ordine & argumento non- 'nihil variato, ut plagii poſſit accuſari Galatinus: 'quod planum me facturum ſpero ſi dederit Dominus, 'ut pugionem ipſius Raimundi ſcriptum ad impiorum 'perfidiam jugulandam maxime autem Judæorum in 'lucem proferam. Is autem liber ſtudiis Hebraicis 'maxime utilis pervenit ad me ex Bibliotheca Fran- 'ciſci Vatabli Mecænatis mei (12). - - - - Galatinus, 'by the way, publiſhed the works of Raymond Marti- 'nus for his own, changing the method, and varying 'the ſubject a little; ſo that Galatinus may be accuſed of 'Plagiariſm: which I hope to prove beyond doubt, GOD 'willing, that I may bring to light the* Pugio of Raymond 'himſelf, written to detect the treachery of the impious, par- 'ticularly of the Jews. This book, of the greateſt 'uſe in Hebrew ſtudies, came to me out of the library 'of Francis Vatablus, my Mecænas.' This paſſage informs us, that Beroaldus had a deſign to publiſh the Pugio Fidei, and that his copy came from Vatablus. Probably it was by the book of Beroaldus, that Poſſevin knew, that Vatablus had ſuch a manuſcript, and when he mentioned this particular, he accuſed Galatinus of being a Plagiary (13). Note, that Scaliger's letters were not made public till after the printing of Poſſevin's Apparatus; ſo that here we have a ſecond diſcoverer of this theft before Joſeph Scaliger. I have obſerved, that Toppi, in pag. 202, of his Biblioteca Napoletana, ſays, the latter diſcovered it firſt; and therefore he is miſtaken.

(12) Beroaldus, in Chronic. cap. iii, lib. ii.

(13) Poſſev. Apparat. Sacr. Tom. ii, fol. 411.

MARTYR (PETER) a Proteſtant Divine in the XVIth century. See VERMILLI.

MARULUS (MARCUS), a native of Spalato in Dalmatia, lived in the beginning of the XVIth century, as is obſerved in Moreri's Dictionary; who has not given us the right title of one of his books (a). It is a Latin book, which was tranſlated into French, and into ſome other languages (b). The French tranſlator did a thing very ſingular, which deſerves to be related [A]. Geſner confounds this Marulus with Marullus the Poet (c).

(c) Geſn. in Bibl. fol. 495, verſo. His abbreviators have not corrected this. See, at the end of the remark [D] of the article INNOCENT VIII, a little fault of Andreas Rivetus.

(a) See the remark.

(b) Into Spaniſh and German.

[A] The French tranſlator did a thing very ſingular which deſerves to be related.] This I learn from Martin del Rio. This Jeſuit having cenſured Bodin, becauſe he allowed the judges to lye, that they might draw the truth from the criminals, adds, that Marcus Marulus was of the ſame opinion with Bodin, and that the author of the French tranſlation of Marulus's book has corrected this bad doctrine. He ſuppoſes, that Marulus taught the quite contrary, and inſerts in his book a confutation of Bodin's opinion. Fuit in ſententiâ Bodini M. Marulus lib. 4. de Inſtit. benè vivendi cap. 4. Sed errore animadverſo ejus interpres Gallicus plane contrariam Marulo ſententiam tribuit; & multas paginas, quæ non ſunt Maruli, Marulo inſeruit, dictorum ipſorum Maruli confutationem pro Maruli dictis continentes; quam bono exemplo & prudenter ipſe vidit (1). Tranſlators have ſo often exceeded their privileges, that a reader is unhappy, who cannot learn things in the originals; for he always runs the hazard of being impoſed upon. See how Geſner recites the title of this book of Marulus: De religioſe vivendi Inſtitutione lib. 6. per exempla ex veteri, novoque Teſtamento collecta, ex authoribus quoque D. Hieronymo Preſbytero, Gregorio Pont. Max. Euſebio Cæſarienſi, Jo. Caſſiano nonnulliſque aliis qui vitas conſcripſere ſanctorum, digeſta per capita ſive locos communes (2). Miræus has too much abridged this; for he only ſays: Scripſit libros ſex exemplorum, hoc eſt dictorum factorumque memorabilium (3); and yet Moreri thought it too long; for he only ſets down lib. 6. Exemplorum. The Printers, having tranſpoſed the figures, have given us an edition of the works of Marulus in 1610, which, according to Miræus, was in 1601. Gabriel Naudæus, who wrote a diſſertation to prove, that it is lawful for Phyſicians to tell a great many lies to a ſick perſon, does not forget to cite our Marulus, who maintained, that a man, who lies in favour of the commonwealth, or for the greater glory of GOD, does an act of ſingular prudence and piety. Marullus Spalatenſis lib. 4. memor. c. 4. ob Reipublicæ bonum vel majorem Dei gloriam mentiri ſore ſummæ pietatis ingentiſque prudentiæ contendit (4). O wicked morality!

(1) Martinus del Rio, Diſquiſit. Magicar. Tom. iii, lib. v, Sect. 2, pag. m. 74.

(2) Geſn. in Biblioth. fol. 495, verſo.

(3) Anb. Miræus de Scriptor. ſæculi xvi, pag. 9.

(4) Naudæus, in Pentade Quæſt. Jatrophilol. pag. 150, Edit. Genev. 1647.

MARULLUS, a Poet of Calabria, in the Vth century, went to wait upon Attila at Padua, after this king of the Huns had opened a way into Italy by taking of Aquileia, and had ruined and ſubdued all that came in his way. This Poet expected a great reward for the flatteries wherewith he had filled the panegyric of Attila. But when this prince knew by his interpreters, that the Poem, which Marullus had repeated, derived his pedigree from the gods, and called him a god, he ordered that theſe verſes, and the author of them, ſhould be burnt. He moderated this puniſhment, when he reflected, that this ſeverity might induce other authors to write nothing in his praiſe (a).

(a) Ex Callimacho Experiente, in vita Attilæ.

MARULLUS (MICHAEL TARCHANIOTA) [A] retired into Italy after the Turks had taken Conſtantinople, where he was born. He did not leave his country out of zeal for Chriſtianity; for his opinions in matters of religion were very far from being orthodox [B]. It was doubtleſs the fear of ſlavery, or the deſire he had to avoid the cruel

[A] Tarchaniota.] I believe it was the name of his mother's family; for, in the firſt book of his epigrams, there is an epitaph upon Michael Tarchaniota, his grandfather by the mother's ſide, and another upon Euphroſyne Tarchaniota, his mother; and in the third book, there is one upon Paul Tarchaniota, his uncle by the mother's ſide. As to his grandfather by the father's ſide, whoſe epitaph is to be ſeen a few pages after, he was called Philip Marullus. One of the four learned Greeks, who fled for refuge into France, under the reign of Charles VII, and were recommended by Philelphus to William des Urſins, chancellor of France, was called Nicolas Tarchaniotes (1).

(1) Guillet, Life of Mahomet II, Tom. i, pag. 258, ex Turco-Græc. pag. 91.

[B] His ſentiments in matters of religion were very far from being orthodox.] This is what we learn from Leander Albertus (2) who makes this obſervation by the way, in ſpeaking of the river, wherein Ma-

(2) Deſcript. Ital. pag. 44.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cruel vexation of seeing and hearing the insults of an insolent conqueror, that made him remove from Greece. He listed himself a soldier in Italy [C], and served in the cavalry, under Nicolas Ralla (a), who was of Lacedemon. He joined learning with arms, and would be no less a Poet than a soldier: and because he feared, lest his skill in making Greek verses should not be thought any thing extraordinary, he applied himself with great diligence to the study of Latin Poetry, and by this means he acquired a great reputation (b). His Latin verses consist of four books of Epigrams, and four books of Hymns. He began a Poem about the education of princes, which he never finished. What was found of it among his papers, was printed with the Epigrams and Hymns, of all which there have been several editions. Authors are divided in their opinions about these Poems. For some critics, such as the two Scaligers (c), speak very ill of them. But other writers have commended Marullus very much (d). He gained many enemies by censuring too freely the antient Latin Poets (e). Floridus Sabinus undertook their defence, and treated him harshly. Politian had a great quarrel with him upon the same occasion (f). I speak elsewhere (g) of the marriage of Marullus with the learned Alexandra Scala. But here I must take notice, that he was of a restless spirit, and could never find a fixed place, for his body, or for his studies [D]. Other learned men became famous by translating books: but he despised this labour (b) [E], either as a thing below him, or too hazardous, and he was thinking of something of much

(a) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. xxviii, Militari stipendio sese alere coactus. Pier. Valer. de Liter. infel. lib. ii.

(b) Jovius, ibid.

(c) Jul. Cæs. Scaliger, Poet. lib. vi, cap. iv. Jos. Scalig. in Catull. Epigr. lxvii.

(d) Crinitus de honesta, discipl. lib. xxiii, cap. vii. Jo. Secundus Epigr. Jovius, ubi supra. Pontanus apud Jovium, ibid. Pier. Valerian. de Liter. infel.

(e) See Crinitus, ubi supra.

(f) Paulo ante Græcorum nomini favens, cum Politiano ejus gentis ingeniis infesto, maledicentissimis epistolis lites extenderat. Jovius, ibid.

(g) In the article SCALA.

(b) Jovius, ubi supra.

rullus was drowned: Flumen Cæcina Marulli Byzantini viri docti, sed de Christiana pietate haud sane sentientis interitu illustratum. He, who published some curious notes upon Sannazar, makes use of two proofs against those, who pretended, that John Francis Picus assisted Marullus in making his hymns. The first is, that Picus was so much addicted to the study of Christian Theology, that it is not probable that he troubled himself about politeness of style: The second is, that there is no footstep of Christianity in the hymns of Marullus. In hymnis adjutum fuisse a Joann. Francisco Pico erant qui asserirent Lilii Gyraldi ætate, quod tamen mihi neutiquam verisimile sit, cum constet Picum tanto studio incubuisse Christianæ Theologiæ, ut omnem prorsus styli atque elocutionis ornatum neglexisse merito videri possit. Marullum verò si legas, nec volam, nec vestigium hominis Christiani invenias (3). This seems to me good reasoning. Pierius Valerianus relates, that this Poet uttered horrible blasphemies when he died. Ferunt illum primo statim casu vehementer excanduisse, utque erat iræ impatiens convitia & maledicta in superos detorsisse (4). Erasmus would have thought Marullus's Poems tolerable, if they had contained less Paganism: Marulli pauca legi, says he in his Ciceronianus, tolerabilia si minus haberent paganitatis. This Paganism was not the greatest fault of Marullus; his impieties are much more to be condemned; which doubtless were the cause why Lucretius pleased him so much, that he put out a new edition of that author, and endeavoured to imitate him (5), and said, that we must only read other Poets, but get Virgil and Lucretius by heart (6). Joseph Scaliger, in his notes upon Catullus, thunders against this edition. Here follows a proof of the impudent impiety, wherewith Marullus blasphemed heaven:

(3) Not. ad Sannaz. pag. 189. Edit. Amstel. 1689. See also pag. 201.

(4) Pier. Val. de Liter. infel. lib. ii, pag. m. 70.

(5) Gyral. Dialog. i, de Poët. sui temp.

(6) Crinitus, de hon. Disc. lib. xxiii, cap. vii.

At pia pro patria, pro diis, arisque tuendis,
Indueras Latium dux caput arma tibi.
Ultoresque deos jurata in bella trahebas,
Si modo sunt curæ jusque piumque deis.
Sed neque fas, neque jura deos mortalia tangunt,
Et rapit arbitrio fors fera cuncta suo.
Nam quid prisca fides juvit, pietasque Pelasgos?
Nempe jacent nullo damna levante Deo.
Aspice Byzanti quondam gratissima divis
Mœnia, Romanæ nobile gentis opus.
Hæc quoque jampridem hostili data præda furori est
Solaque de tanta gloria gente manet (7).

(7) Marullus, Epigr. lib. i, pag. m. 16, 17.

But pious arms with holy zeal you take
For your dear country, and religion's sake;
A zeal, which vengeful gods to battle draws,
If gods regard the justice of a cause.
But they, supine, in their own heaven remain,
Nor aught on earth e're gives their godships pain:
But this wide world's affairs at random go,
And fate and fortune govern all below.
In vain the ancient Greeks were good and brave;
Their virtues from destruction cou'd not save.
Behold Byzantium's walls of wond'rous fame,
The pride and glory of the Roman name.
To hostile arms a prey, they strew'd the plains,
And nothing, but their memory, remains.

[C] He listed himself a soldier in Italy.] The author of the Anecdotes of Florence (8) says, that Marullus went from Greece into Italy in a company of Cuirassiers. This may be; but Paul Jovius, whom this author follows most, in what concerns the learned men of that time, says no such thing. His words are these. Inter alarios (§α) equites descriptus, Nicolao Ralla Spartano duce in Italia militavit. I do not believe, that Alarius Eques should be translated a cuirassier.

(8) Pag. 179, the Printers, who have miserably disfigured the proper names in this book, have put Marcilius for Marullus. At pag. 161, they have put Trachamote for Tarchaniote.

[(§α) If it were certain, that Paul Jovius wrote alarios, without any mark of abbreviation in the copy, alarii equites, in my opinion, would mean the light-horse, and not cuirassiers; the light cavalry being, if I may so say, wings in comparison of the others. But perhaps, instead of alarios equites, the true reading is Alabastarios equites, Cross-bow-men, as the Albanian cavalry was at that time, since known in France by the name of Estradiots REM. CRIT.]

[D] He was of a restless spirit, and could never find a fixed place for his body, or his studies.] I will cite for this two authors: 'Inquieto ingenio nullibi sedem 'stabilem nactus, in cursu studiorum ac itinerum sem-'per fuit (9). - - - - Being of a restless disposition, he 'settled no where, but was always studying and tra-'velling.' 'Nullius unquam principis liberalitate ita 'adjutus, ut in literarum otium se conferre posset (10). '- - - He never gained so much by the bounty of princes, 'that he could retire, and devote himself to his studies.' I know not whether one may oppose to their testimony that of Crinitus. Let every one do as he pleases: Here it is in verse:

(9) Jov. in Elog. cap. xxviii.

(10) Pier. Valerian. de infel. Litter. lib. ii.

Et gradum
Placuit ad urbem flectere,
Qua noster Medices Pieridum parens
Marulle hospitium dulce tibi exhibet,
Ac te perpetuis muneribus fovens
Phœbum non patitur tela resumere
Laurens Camœnarum decus (11).

(11) Crinitus, lib. ii, Poëmat. pag. m. 328.

That is,

To that city, where Laurens de Medicis, the parent of the Muses, kindly entertains you, O Marullus, and by his munificence towards you, suffers not Phœbus to resume his darts.

Marullus therefore had a good Mæcenas in the person of Laurence de Medicis. Crinitus praises Marullus very much, particularly in his Nænia de obitu Poëtæ Marulli.

[E] He despised the labour of translating.] Mr Varillas (12) tells us, that Laurence de Medicis desired Marullus, (12) Anec. de Flor. pag. 179.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

much greater importance, when he was drowned in a river of Tuſcany [F], blaſpheming againſt Heaven. This was in the year 1500 [G]. I have read, in a late book, that this misfortune was foretold him a long time before; but the witneſs, who is alledged for it, ſays no ſuch thing [H].

lus, in his letters which are ſtill extant, to tranſlate the moral works of Plutarch, but that Marullus 'had 'ſo great an averſion for that ſort of work, wherein 'one muſt, ſaid he, make himſelf a ſlave to the ſen- 'timents of another, that it was impoſſible for him to 'finiſh the firſt page of that verſion.'

[F] He was drowned in a river of Tuſcany.] It is that, which runs by Volterra, and which the antients called Cecina. It ſtill retains the ſame name, as Cluverius and Baudrand affirm, ſo that I cannot underſtand why Pierius Varillas ſays, that it is now named Sicla (13), nor why Valerius calls it the river of Volterra (14). Paul Jovius ſays, that it was more ſwelled than ordinary, that day on which Marullus was drowned in it (15): But Valerianus ſays the quite contrary; and ſince he is more particular in this matter, he is more worthy of credit than the other; and it appears, that he had examined the circumſtances. Marullus, ſays he, perceiving, that his horſe ſo ſunk with his fore feet in the water, that he could not diſengage himſelf, grew angry, and ſpurred him: but he fell with his horſe, and, having his leg entangled under the belly of the beaſt, there wanted but little water to choak him. Fluvium vel exigua tunc aqua fluentem ingreſſus, ſive equum potaturus ſive alia de cauſa tantillum immoratus, ſenſit equum anterioribus pedibus ita in arenas alvei ſemper infidi voraginoſas abſorberi ut emergere inde non poſſet . . . . modica admodum ejus profluentis aqua ſuffocatus interiit (16). The liberty, which Varillas takes in paraphraſing upon what he borrows from another, was prepoſterous upon this occaſion. To tranſlate the words of Paul Jovius, ſolito inflatior, he ſays, that the rains had extraordinarily ſwelled the river, and yet, according to him, Marullus was fording it. He was either drunk or mad, you will ſay; the adverb extraordinarily decides it upon this occaſion. Let us not go ſo faſt: I remember I have read in a book of Lancelotti of Perugia, that the inhabitants of the country advertiſed our Marullus not to paſs the river, becauſe great rains had fallen that night. To whom he anſwered, that he was afraid of Mars, and not of Neptune; for he relied upon the Aſtrologers (17), who had caſt his nativity, and told him, that he ought to be afraid of arms, and that he would do well not to go to the war (18). Volaterranus obſerves, that Marullus, who had lodged in his houſe, parted from him the ſame day he was drowned; and he ſpeaks honourably of him (19). Voſſius, in his treatiſe of the Latin Poets, ſays, that day was the fifteenth of June, 1511 (20). I believe, this error proceeded originally from the two haſty reading of a paſſage in Paul Jovius, wherein the day, on which Marullus died, is ſet down in this manner: 'Eo die 'quo Ludovicus Sforcia captus ut ferrato in carcere 'miſer expiraret, in ulteriorem Galliam eſt perductus. 'That day, in which Lewis Sforza, being taken, was 'carried to the fartheſt part of France, to die miſerably 'in an iron priſon.' Somebody, not carefully attending to the words, confounded the day, on which Lewis Sforza was ſeized, with the day of his death; and, becauſe his death happened in 1511, they concluded, that our Poet died alſo in the ſame year. The ſeizing of Lewis Sforza was on the eleventh of April, 1500 (21). Mr Baillet (22) follows the Chronology of Voſſius, abating one day.

[G] This was in the year 1500.] The manner, in which Paul Jovius characteriſes this year, does not ſuffer us to doubt, that it was the laſt of the XVth century. See the preceding remark, at the end. Peter de St Romauld is miſtaken half a century; for thus he ſpeaks under the year 1545. 'Michael Ma- 'rullus, a native of Conſtantinople, who wrote very 'elegantly in Latin verſe, in imitation of Catullus 'and Tibullus, and who had ſerved the emperor 'Maximilian, in the quality of a captain, was drowned 'in Tuſcany; which an Italian Poet deploring, in his 'epitaph, ſays at the end of it, that if he muſt loſe 'his life in water,

Mergier Aonio flumine debuerat:

He ſhould have periſh'd in th' Aonian ſtream.

'Which way of ſpeaking did not pleaſe the late Mr 'de Balzac (23).'

Sandius refutes Voſſius by this reaſon, namely, that Pontanus, who died in 1503, or 1505, made verſes upon the death of Marullus. He obſerves, that there are ſome, who place the death of Marullus, on the ſixteenth of May 1466, and he convicts them of falſhood by the epigrams of that Poet againſt Pope Innocent VIII, and upon the death of Theodorus Gaza, and John Picus Mirandula. This Pope ſat in the ſee of Rome from 1484, to 1492. Theodorus Gaza died in 1478, and John Picus Mirandula in 1494; therefore the proofs of Sandius are very good; and he had reaſon to reject the opinion of thoſe, who ſaid, that Marullus flouriſhed in the year 1520 (24).

[H] I have read, in a late book, that this misfortune was foretold him . . . but the witneſs, who is alledged, ſays no ſuch thing.] To determine this queſtion of matter of fact, we need only compare the paſſage of the modern author with the words of Pierius Valerianus, who is his witneſs. 'Suffocatus eſt Marullus in Tuſciæ amne 'Cecina fallente equum veſtigio. Miſerabile id leti 'genus multis annis ante ipſi prædictum fuiſſe, inde- 'que ſemper aquas timuiſſe auctor eſt Pierius Valeria- 'nus in Dialogis de literatorum infelicitate, qui rei 'veritatem ignorare non poterat, ipſamque adeo car- 'mine quodam ſuo, multò ante Marulli mortem poſte- 'ritati palam fecerat (25). - - Marullus was choaked in 'the Cecina, a river of Tuſcany, his horſe's foot ſlipping. 'Pierius Valerianus, in his dialogues of the misfortune of 'learned men, tells us, that this unfortunate kind of 'death was foretold him many years before, and that 'from that time he was always afraid of water; nor 'could Pierius be ignorant of the truth of the fact, 'which he publiſhed in one of his poems, long before Ma- 'rullus's death.' According to this account, we have here, not one of thoſe predictions made after the event, which are ſo frequent, but a prediction publiſhed a long time before the event; which would therefore be of great moment, if the matter of fact were certain. Now let us ſhew, that Pierius Valerianus ſays nothing of the prediction, and that his verſes were made after the misfortune of Marullus. I have cited above (26) a long paſſage out of his tract de Literatorum Infelicitate, the concluſion whereof was, aqua ſuffocatus interiit: after which words immediately follow theſe: 'Verum igitur fuit quod meus Pierius 'jam tum puer de Marullo cecinit. CAT. Quid- 'nam? illud muſici recita obſecro quoniam libenter 'ejus cantilenas auſculto. - - - - It was true therefore, 'what Pierius, then a boy, ſung of Marullus. CAT. 'pray recite theſe verſes; for I am always pleaſed to 'hear his poetry.' Then the verſes of Pierius are related, which turn upon this thought, That Marullus ought not to be troubled at his periſhing in water. The fear which is attributed to him, reſpects only the time, in which his horſe fell under him in the Cecina. But ſome, perhaps, may ſay, Pierius was very young when he made thoſe verſes, jam tum puer; he made them therefore before the year 1500; for, according to Thuanus, he died in 1550, aged eighty three years. I anſwer, that Thuanus is miſtaken. Imperialis (27) places the death of Pierius in 1558, and makes him to be then no more than eighty one years of age: and thus he would have been but twenty three years old, when Marullus died. Now it is not without precedent, in good Latin authors, to call one of that age puer; and however it be, the verſes of Pierius did not precede the death of Marullus.

(13) Dum Siclam qui olim Cecina dicebatur. Pier. Valer. ubi ſupra.

(14) Ancol. pag. 179.

(15) Cecina amnis ſolito inſtrior fallente equum cæco vado violenter abripuit. Jovius, ubi ſupra.

(16) Pier. Valer. ubi ſupra.

(17) A great confidence in that ſort of people makes a man ſometimes as bold as madneſs or drunkenneſs.

(18) Don Serendo Lancellotti da Perugia Abbate Olivetano, in the book intitled, Chi l'indovinà è Savio, lib. i, Diſcorſo iii, pag. 64. He cites Paul. Cort. lib. i.

(19) Jo. Jovianus Pontanus diſcipulum habuit Marullum Conſtantinopolitanum hoſpitem meum, qui eodem die quo a me Volaterris diſceſſit in amne Cecina ſubmerſus eſt, vir acris cum ingenii tum judicii. Vitæ. lib. xxxviii, pag. m. 1462.

(20) Id factum XVII. Kal. Jul. an. CIↃIↃXI.

(21) Labbe, Chron. Françoiſe.

(22) Jugement ſur les Poetes, num. 1244.

(23) St Romuald, Abrégé du Thréſor Chronologique, Tom. iii, pag. m. 300. See Balzac, Socrate Chrétien, pag. m. 228.

(24) Taken out of Sandius, Not. in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 227.

(25) Not. ad Sannazari Eleg. pag. 191. Edit. Amſtel. 1689.

(26) Its citation (16).

(27) See his Muſæum Hiſtoricum, pag. 40.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MASCARDI (AUGUSTIN) was a learned man, and one of the beſt Orators of the XVIIth century (a). He was born at Sarzana (b) in 1591, and died there in 1640 (c). You will find in Moreri, that he was chamberlain to Urban VIII, and that this Pope founded for him a profeſſor's chair of Rhetoric in the college della Sapienza in 1628. He granted him for life a penſion of five hundred crowns (d). If Maſcardi was always in want, and oppreſſed with debts, it was not ſo much becauſe he neglected his buſineſs, as becauſe he diverted himſelf too much; for it muſt be confeſſed, that his manner of living was not ſo highly eſteemed as his wit and learning [A]. He was for ſome time prince of the academy of the Humoriſts (e); and he had a paper-war with Paganinus Gaudentius, and other authors [B]. He printed at his own expence his treatiſe dell' Arte Hiſtorica, and had loſt a conſiderable ſum by it, if cardinal Mazarin had not procured many copies to be ſold at Paris [C]. The authors, who ſpeak of him, and to whom Moreri refers us (f), are quoted by Michael Juſtiniani (g).

There is in the works of Balzac a certain diſcourſe, wherein he ſharply cenſures our Maſcardi, without naming him [D].

(a) Michel Giuſtiniani, gli Scrittori Liguri deſcritti, pag. 24. Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth I, pag. 113.

(b) A town in the ſtate of Genoa.

(c) Giuſtiniani, ib. pag. 25.

(d) Id. ib. pag. 24.

(e) Id. ib. pag. 25.

(f) Inſtead of Maracci, Bibliot. Mariam, read in Moreri, Maracci, Bibliotheca Mariana.

(g) Ubi ſupra.

[A] His manner of living was not ſo highly eſteemed as his wit and learning.] To this purpoſe I ſhall cite a paſſage, whereby we learn, that Maſcardi lodged always in other peoples houſes, and that proviſionally, and ſpent his money without diſcretion. 'Utinam 'ſecundiore prudentia ac SANCTITATIS fama 'fuiſſet, nec in hac parte vitæ, ut fama eſt, claudi- 'caſſet; profecto ad egregias ejus virtutes hæc quo- 'que præſtantiſſima omnium laus acceſſiſſet. Sed 'homo in re familiari negligens, profuſus, nulla pe- 'cuniæ acceſſione ſuppeditare ſuis ſumptibus poterat; 'in ſuis nummis nunquam, in ære alieno ſemper: &, 'quod mireris magis, nunquam certis ac conductis 'ædibus habitavit, ſed incertis atque precariis (1). 'I wiſh he had been more famed for prudence and 'PROBITY, and had not, as is reported, been blameable 'in this part of his life: the reſt of his excellent vir- 'tues, then, would have been crowned with this greateſt 'of praiſe. But, being careleſs in his domeſtic affairs, 'and profuſe, no ſums were ſufficient for his expences; 'he was always in debt, and lived upon other peoples 'money; and, what is ſtrange, he never had a ſettled 'habitation.'

(1) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth I, pag. 113.

[B] He had a paper-war with ſeveral authors.] In his hiſtory of the conſpiracy of count Fieſche, he very often attacks the religion of Ubert Folietta. He did the like in his other books, againſt ſome writers; which was the reaſon why he was attacked in his turn. Venendo eſſo parimente tacciato da Paganino Gaudentio, mi ſi dara motivo di far qualche reſteſſione nel libro de gli Academici Humoriſti, per vedir quale di loro ſoſtien meglio le ſue accuſe (2). To the ſecond edition of his hiſtory of the conſpiracy of the count Fieſche are added the objections that were made to him, and his anſwer to them. I know not whether his anſwer to Brunor Taverna, concerning that hiſtory, has been publiſhed: the abbot Michael Juſtiniani had read it in manuſcript (3).

(2) Michel Giuſtiniani, gli Scrittori Liguri deſcritti, pag. 25.

(3) Ib. pag. 25.

[C] Cardinal Mazarin procured many copies to be ſold of his treatiſe dell' Arte Hiſtorica.] Among an infinite number of ridiculous things, which are objected to this cardinal during the troubles of Paris, it was ſaid, that he traded in all manner of merchandize, and that he even made an auction of books in the palace d'Eſtrée (4). Naudé (5) anſwered in his behalf thus: 'I believe I have ſufficiently proved the contrary. 'But now to juſtify likewiſe this ſale of books, which 'was the beſt and moſt decent way the cardinal could 'uſe, to teſtify the care he always took of learned 'men; we muſt know, that the Sieur Agoſtino 'Maſcardi, who was accounted the beſt writer of 'Italy in his time, thought fit to print, in 1636, a 'book of his own writing, intituled, Dell' Arte Hi- 'ſtorica trattati cinque (6), in 4to, and ſo thick, that 'it contained near a hundred ſheets; and becauſe la 'Tavola di Cebete, le Pompe del Campidoglio, la Con- 'giura dei Fieſchi, le Proſe, i diſcorſi Academici, Silva- 'rum ſive variorum Carminum libri iv; and, in a 'word, all his works had ſold very well, he cauſed 'many more copies of this than of the preceding 'ones, to be printed: wherein he was ſo unſucceſs- 'ful, that the greateſt part of the copies were left on 'his hands, becauſe few people delighted in ſuch kind 'of matters. As he was complaining of this one day 'to cardinal Mazarin, he propoſed to ſend ſome 'bales of them to Paris, where he had a man to 'manage his affairs, who ſhould take care to ſell them 'for him, and remit him the money he took: 'which the Sieur Maſcardi very willingly accepted 'of; and by this means he prevented a great loſs, 'which was almoſt unavoidable. I have this ſtory 'from the man himſelf, who managed at that time 'the cardinal's affairs in that city.'

(4) See Naudé, in his Dialogue de Maſcurat, pag. 70.

(5) Naudé, ib.

(6) Naudé had conceived a good opinion of this work. See his Bibliographia Politica, pag. m. 67.

[D] There is in Balzac's works . . . . . a diſcourſe, wherein he ſharply cenſures our Maſcardi, without naming him.] It is in a diſſertation, which was printed with the Socrete Chrétien. It conſiſts of ſome remarks upon divers pieces: thoſe, which concern the philoſophical Orator, point at him, who is the ſubject of this article. Of this Balzac himſelf informs us, in theſe words of a letter, which he wrote to Mr Conrart, January 4, 1641. 'It is Maſcardi, whom I mean, for 'certain very ill things, which I obſerved in him, 'before he had refined his ſtyle, and formed his judg- 'ment (7).'

(7) Balzac's Letter to Conrart, pag. m. 96.

MASCARON (JULIUS), one of the greateſt preachers of the XVIIth century, was born at Marſeilles in the year 1634. He inherited from his father, the moſt famous advocate of the Parliament of Aix, the uncommon talent of Eloquence, which diſtinguiſhed him. He entered very young into the congregation of the Oratory, and he taught Rhetoric, from the age of twenty-two years, at Mans. Soon after he mounted the pulpit, and preached with great great ſucceſs in the church of St Peter at Saumur. The biſhop of Mans, deſiring to keep ſo able a preacher in his church, made him a prebend of it. He was admired at Paris, when he preached the Advent-ſermons at the oratory. He was appointed, in 1666, to make the funeral oration of the queen-mother. Afterwards he preached at court five or ſix years, and was nominated to the biſhopric of Tulle in the year 1671. Having pronounced, with the uſual applauſe, the funeral oration of the mareſchal Turenne in 1675, he was tranſlated to the biſhopric of Agen. He was ſent for, in 1694, to preach the Lent-ſermons at court. The year following, he opened the aſſembly of the Clergy, and returned to his dioceſe, where he died of a dropſy, and a complication of diſtempers, the ſixteenth of December, 1703 (a). His life is prefixed to a collection of his funeral orations, publiſhed at Paris in the year 1704 in 12°.

(a) Taken from the Memoires de Trevoux, Jan. 1705, pag. 95, & ſeq.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MASSARIUS (JEROM), doctor of Phyſic, and native of Vicenza, lived in the XVIth century, and left his country, to ſeek for a land of liberty, where he might openly, and without fear of the conſequences, embrace the Proteſtant religion. He retired into Switzerland, and there publiſhed a controverſial work [A]. It is ſaid, that he taught at Straſburg, and that he died in the year 1564 (a). I will ſet down the titles of ſome other works, which are aſcribed to him (b).

(a) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 517.

(b) See the remark, towards the end.

[A] He publiſhed a controverſial work.] The title of it is: Euſebius Captivus, ſive modus procedendi in Curia Romana contra Evangelicos; in quo eſt Epitome præcipuorum capitum doctrinæ Chriſtianæ, & Refutatio Pontificiæ Synagogæ: una cum hiſtoriis de Vitis aliquot Pontificum, quæ ad negotium religionis ſcitu utiles ſunt ac neceſſariæ. He gives himſelf the name of Hieronymus Marius Vincentinus (1). Placcius has not mentioned this in his collection of pſeudonymous writers. The reaſon of Maſſarius's publiſhing this work was this: His friends took it ill that he had left Italy, to retire into Switzerland: they were of the ſame ſentiments, that he was, as to religion: but worldly motives prevailed upon them ſhamefully and publickly to abjure Proteſtantiſm. They exhorted him to follow their example, and to quit a communion, which they called heretical, and they deſired him to come and confer with them a little. He was afraid leſt they ſhould entrap him, and rejected the propoſition. Some perſons of merit gave a bad turn to this, as if he diſtruſted his cauſe. This made him take pen in hand, to ſhew, that he did not refuſe conferences for the reaſon they ſuſpected, but becauſe he did not believe, his friends propoſed them with a good deſign. He feigns in his book, that a true believer (2), a priſoner at Rome, gives an account of his faith before the Pope and the Inquiſition. The affair comprehends three days: the judges ſpeak little; the priſoner is almoſt the only ſpeaker. The work was dedicated by the author to the ſenate of Berne, and printed at Baſil, for Oporinus, in the year 1553, in 8vo, as is affirmed in the Abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque: but Chriſtopher Pezelius, who procured a more correct edition of it in 1597 (3), ſuppoſes, that it had been printed in the year 1555 (4).

We find, in the abridgment of the ſame Bibliotheque, that Maſſarius had compoſed an excellent grammar of the German tongue, and that his Hebrew grammar was never publiſhed. His Latin verſion and paraphaſe of the treatiſe of Hippocrates de Natura Hominis was printed at Straſburg in 1564 (5).

(1) See the Abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, pag. 349.

(2) Whom he calls Euſebius Veranius.

(3) At Zurich, for John Wolfius, in 8vo.

(4) Editus eſt ante annos quadraginta duos. Pezelius, Epiſt. Dedic. dated in 1597.

(5) Lindenius renovatus, pag. 424.

MATMAN (RODOLPHUS) born at Lucerne in Swiſſerland, became a Jeſuit at eighteen years of age. He taught Rhetoric for twenty years, and died at Munich September 18, 1612, after he had been thirty years in the Society. He prepared ſeveral books for the public (a). He wrote againſt Scaliger, a little book, which many perſons have attributed to Scioppius [A].

(a) Alegambe, in Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 417.

[A] He wrote, againſt Scaliger, a little book, which many perſons have attributed to Scioppius.] It was printed at Ingolſtad in 1608, in 4to, with this title; Cornelii Denii Brugenſis tres Capellæ, ſive admonitio ad Joſephum Juſtum Burdonem Julii Burdonis F. Benedicti Burdonis N. prius Scaligerum nunc Sacrilegum. Scioppius re-printed it in 1611, with his Oporini Grubinii Amphotides Scioppianæ. Scaliger ſpeaks with great contempt of this little book (1): 'Hoc mittimus, ſays he (2), 'ad Apoſtolum Japponenſem, retrimentum inſcitiæ, impurum Auctorem libelli de tribus Capellis, cujus inſcitia certat cum improbitate: quanquam non deſunt qui Furem Veſpillonis filium auctorem aſſerant. - - - 'I ſend this to the Japoneſe Apoſtle, the very dregs of 'ignorance, and the filthy author of the book De Tribus 'Capellis, in which there is as much ſtupidity as knavery; 'tho' ſome aſcribe it to the bearer's ſon.' Theſe laſt words ſignify, that ſome attributed this book to Scioppius. Mr Placcius obſerves, that this is the opinion of ſome perſons (3), and refutes thoſe, who ſhould deny it upon this ground, that it is not in the catalogue of the writings of Scioppius. The author of the Decas Decadum (4) cites a paſſage of Scioppius, to ſhew, that the Jeſuits of Ingolſtad are the true authors of the book De Tribus Capellis, but he knows not the name of the Jeſuit, who wrote this ſatire, and he alledges a paſſage of Scaliger (5), which does not at all prove, as he pretends, that it was Martin Delrio. Mr Baillet has already obſerved, that Denius Burgens Cornelius, is a diſguiſe for Ralph Matman (6); and, ſince Alegambe affirms it (7), we muſt believe it.

(1) It contains leſs than twenty pages in the edition of 1611, in 12mo.

(2) Scaliger, Confut. Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. m. 324.

(3) Tres Capellæ . . . . Scioppianæ videntur nonnullis. Placcius de Anonymis, pag. 65.

(4) Johannes Albertus Faber, Dec. Decadum, num. xxviii.

(5) Taken from the Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 330.

(6) Baillet, Liſt of diſguiſed Authors, at the word DENIUS.

(7) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. pag. 417.

MAUGIN (JOHN), ſirnamed the Angevin [A], lived in the XVIth century, and publiſhed ſeveral books in French, ſome in verſe, others in proſe. The greateſt part were only tranſlations. That of Machiavel's diſcourſes on Livy was printed at Paris, in folio, in the year 1548, and in 16*to* in 1572 (a). He publiſhed in the ſame city, in 1546, in folio, The Hiſtory of Palmerin of Oliva, ſon of king Florendos of Macedonia, and the fair Griana, daughter of the emperor of Conſtantinople, tranſlated from Italian (b). His firſt book of the New Triſtan, prince of Leonnois, knight of the round table, and Yſeulta, princeſs of Yrland, queen of Cornwall, was printed at Paris in folio, in 1554 (c). He dedicated it to Mr de Maupas, abbot of St John of Laon, counſellor and almoner in ordinary to the king, and ingenuouſly confeſſes to him, that he choſe him for the hero of his book, becauſe he knew, that his hand had never been cloſe to thoſe, who had preſented to him their works ſmall or great. He alledges another reaſon; namely, that Mr de Maupas had reſtored him to liberty (d). This epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Laon the twentieth of June 1554, and begins with a piece of raillery, which you will ſee below [B].

(a) Du Verdier, Bibl. Franc. pag. 724.

(b) Id. ib.

(c) La Croix du Maine, knew nothing of this edition: he mentions only that of 1567.

(d) See the remark [B].

[A] Sirnamed, the Angevin.] He thus briefly ſigns the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his New Triſtan, and he puts in the title-page of this book, made French by John Maugin, called the Angevin. This ſhews, that he was more known by the name of his native country, than by that of his family. He was of Angers, according to la Croix du Maine, who adds, that he was ſir-named, the little Angevin (1). Du Verdier Vauprivas has made the ſame remark. If there had been at that time another writer, named Maugin, native of another province, or of the country of Anjou, but more conſiderable than he, either by his ſtature, or his merit, the ſir-name, I am ſpeaking of, would not be ominous; but, as our John Maugin had not a contemporary, who wrote books, and was of the ſame name, we may reaſonably believe, that he was of mean extraction, and of ſmall ſtature, a foot-boy, a journey-man Taylor, &c. oftener bears the name of his province, than that of his family; and it is not without example, that a lacquey has become a diſtinguiſhed Poet and author.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 244.

[B] The Epiſtle Dedicatory of his New Triſtan begins with the following piece of raillery.] 'My lord, it has 'been the common pretence of all French authors for 'this twenty years, either that their copies have been 'ſtolen from them, or that the importunity of their 'friends have forced them to publiſh them. I know 'how commendable modeſty is: but to reckon ſimplicity, and diſtruſt of one's ſelf as ſuch, ſeems to me 'ſo ridiculous and contemptible, that I will not in 'the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'the leaſt make this ill uſe of it, tho' among ſome 'it paſſes for opinion and cuſtom. For this reaſon, 'it was always my intention and deſire, in oppoſi- 'tion to theſe men, from the very hour, in which 'you kindly freed me from captivity and priſon, 'to liberty, and the freedom of your ſervice, to pre- 'ſent you with the product of my pen, which may 'afford you ſo much pleaſure, that I ſhall have ſuf- 'ficient reaſon to be ſatisfied (2).' After the Epiſtle Dedicatory, there is an Ode to Mr de Maupas, out of which I am going to cite a ſtanza, which may induce ſome perſons to think, that Maugin was delivered out of the priſons of the Chatelet.

(2) Maugin, Epiſtle Dedicatory to the New Triſtan.

Maugin fut par vous racheté
D'Enfer, dont mit ſa liberté
Toute a voſtre commande:
Oultre il vous donne ſes labeurs
(Meurdriers de ſes vieigles douleurs)
N'aiant choſe plus grande.

That is,

Maugin by you from Hell (3) was freed;
To you his liberty is due:
The ſole amuſement of his griefs,
His labours he devotes to you.

(3) Alluding perhaps to Nicrot's poem intituled Hell.

For the reſt, the practice which Maugin laughs at, has continued to this time. An infinite number of prefaces witneſs it: we have ſeen alſo, from time to time, prefaces, which take quite another turn. In them the authors acknowledge, that of their own accord they publiſh their works. Sincerity is not the only reaſon which makes them ſpeak thus: they have a mind to rally thoſe, who complain of violence offered them.

MAUSOLUS, king of Caria [A], is more known as the huſband of Artemiſia, than upon any other account; although, during a reign of twenty four years, he acted very politicly, and became formidable (a). After the example of his predeceſſors, he was much more inclined to the party of the Perſians, than to that of the Greeks; and it appears (b), that, in favour of the Perſians, but chiefly out of a deſire to enrich himſelf, he committed many piracies upon the neighbouring iſles. He was one who took money with both hands, and gave no quarter to the purſe of his beſt friends, but made uſe of ſly artifices to enrich himſelf at their expence [B]. He engaged himſelf for money in all ſorts of wicked actions [C]. We muſt not therefore wonder, that his conduct was ſometimes contrary to the intereſt of the court of Perſia, and that by this means he brought himſelf into many difficulties (c). He was much concerned in the war which was called Confederate [D], and which begun in the CVth Olympiad, between the Athenians on one ſide, and thoſe of Rhodes, Chios, Cos and Byzantium, on the other. It was he that contrived this league againſt the Athenians (d). Among other exploits he changed during this war the democracy of Rhodes into an ariſtocracy; but neither his conqueſts, nor his good mien, nor his bravery, nor any of his actions procured him ſuch an immortal name as

(a) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi.

(b) In argumento Orationis Demoſth. contra Timocrat.

(c) See the harangue of Iſocrates ad Philippum, in the place where he ſpeaks of Idrieus, and his brother. This brother was our Mauſolus.

(d) Libanius, in Argument. Orat. Demoſth. pro libert. Rhodior.

[A] King of Caria.] Aulus Gellius has obſerved, that Cicero gives him this title; but that ſome Greek Hiſtorians give him one that is leſs honourable. 'Mau- 'ſolus fuit, ut M. Tullius ait, rex terræ Cariæ; 'ut quidam Græcarum Hiſtoriarum ſcriptores Pro- 'vinciæ Græciæ præfectus, Satrapen Græci vo- 'cant (1). - - - - Mauſolus was, according to Cicero, 'king of Caria; but, according to ſome Greek Hiſtorians, 'governor of a province of Greece: the Perſians call it 'Satrapa.' I know not who they are that have called him the governor of a province of Greece. The word Satrapa, which is Perſian, is ſufficient to prove, either that Aulus Gellius is miſtaken, or that it is not he who has ſaid, Provinciæ Græciæ. Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman have formed no ill ſuſpicions about this paſſage; they cite the laſt part of it, without changing any thing in it. Iſocrates (2) has given to Hecatomnus, the father of Mauſolus, the title of Καρίας ἐπίσκοπος, that is, according to the paraphraſe of Harpocration, Cariæ Satrapes. Mauſolus is called by the ſame Harpocration, and by Suidas ἄρχων Καρῶν, imperans Caribus; by Libanius Καρίας ὑπαρχος Cariæ præfectus (3): but by Polyænus (4), and many others, Βασιλεὺς Καρίας, Rex Cariæ.

(1) Aul. Gellius, lib. x, cap. xviii.

(2) In Panegyr.

(3) Argum. Orat. Demoſth. pro Rhod.

(4) Polyænus, Stratag. lib. vii, cap. xxiii.

(5) Id. ib.

(6) Ariſtot. Oecon. lib. ii.

[B] He made uſe of ſly artifices, to enrich himſelf at the expence of his friends.] Read upon this ſubject Polyænus (5) and Ariſtotle (6); where you may ſee, that if, on one ſide, the court of Perſia taxed Mauſolus at great ſums, he knew, on the other, how to indemnify himſelf, and exact the ſame ſums from others with uſury. In this he was more unjuſt than thoſe great farmers of the king's revenues, who, after they have been taxed, cauſe their ſubordinate officers to be delivered up into their hands. You may ſee moreover in Ariſtotle, that under this king of Caria, it was very well known how to make an advantage of the Lycians inclination to wear long hair. They invented a kind of a tax which was very gainful. See alſo what I cite out of Ariſtotle in the remark [E].

[C] He engaged himſelf for money in all ſorts of wicked actions.] The words of Harpocration, tranſcribed by Suidas, are theſe; φησὶ δὲ αὐτὸν Θεόπομπος μεν- δῆνὸς ἀπίχεσθαι πράγμα]ος χρημάτων ἕνεκα. De quo Theopompus ſcribit eum à nullo facinore pecuniæ cauſa ſibi temperaſſe. Of whom Theopompus writes, that for money he would commit the greateſt crimes. Without doubt theſe words are taken out of the hiſtories of Theopompus; but he took care not to ſpeak thus in the Elogium, he made upon this prince, in the Elogium I ſay, which won the prize that Artemiſia propoſed to the Orators, that would make a panegyric upon her huſband, Then for certain Theopompus made our Mauſolus a moſt accompliſhed prince, and adorned him with all ſorts of virtues; and yet you ſee what he ſays of him in another book. This double dealing, in ſaying one thing with the tongue and another with the pen, is abominable: Every thing ought to be ſuſpected in ſuch kind of people who divide themſelves into two perſons, and think it lawful when they conſider themſelves as Orators, to tell ſuch lies as they would not adopt, when they write a hiſtory, by which no prize is to be got. This diſtinction is meer ſophiſtry, and is no better than that wherewith ſome would ſave the honour of Procopius. An author of memoirs, and a writer of hiſtory, are wholly and inſeparably reſponſible for all that comes from their pen, when they are one and the ſame writer. For the reſt, although Vitruvius ſpeaks rather to the advantage than diſadvantage of Mauſolus, yet one may perceive by his words that this prince was an extortioner (7). He praiſes the magnificence, and the good contrivance of his buildings, and the great conveniences in them.

(7) Halicarnaſſi Potentiſſimi regis Mauſoli domus .... Parietes habet latere ſtructos qui ad hoc tempus egregiam præſtant firmitatem .... neque is rex ab inopia hoc fecit, infinitis enim vectigalibus erat fartus, quod imperabat Cariæ toti. Vitruv. de Architect. lib. ii, cap. viii.

[D] He was much concerned in the war, which was called Confederate.] Moreri and Hofman have falſely imagined, that there were two Mauſolus's, and that he who was concerned in the confederate war, was not the ſame with him who was the huſband of Artemiſia, buried in the Mauſoleum. If they had taken the pains to conſult the originals, they would have made but one article, which would have been for this huſband, and might have been full enough, independently of his wife.

[E] He

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google as his wife did (e) by the ſtately monument which ſhe built for him, and by the tender and friendly reſpect ſhe preſerved for his memory; of which we have ſpoke in the article of ARTEMISIA. Mauſolus died the laſt year of the CVIth Olympiad, as we have ſhown in the remarks upon the ſame article. He had ſome predeceſſors whoſe names we know [E], and ſome ſucceſſors, whoſe names are alſo handed down to us. The Phyſician who cured Mauſolus, demanded a great reward, but like a generous man [F].

(e) See Lucian Dial. Mort. Diog. & Mauſ.

The houſe of Mauſolus in Halicarnaſſus, was built with brick, and lined with marble. Pliny knew no building more antient than that which was adorned with this kind of incruſtation, and this made him conjecture that the art of ſawing marble, was an invention of the Carians; which yet he does not affirm. This houſe ſtill remained in the time of Pliny. See the proofs of all this in the remark [G].

[E] He had ſome predeceſſors whoſe names we know.] We read in Suidas (8), that Lygdamis, contemporary with Herodotus, was the third tyrant of Halicarnaſſus after Artemiſia. Now although Herodotus does not ſay, that Lygdamis, the father of Artemiſia, had been king of Harlicarnaſſus; yet it is very probable, that ſhe was the daughter of a king, and the widow of a king. We may therefore go back as far as her father, who at leaſt, according to the teſtimony of Herodotus (9) dwelt in Halicarnaſſus. She had a ſon called Piſindelus, whoſe ſon was another Lygdamis, who drove away Herodotus from Halicarnaſſus: But he returned thither and drove away the tyrant (10). It is very probable that Lygdamis, the ſecond of that name, was immediately ſucceeded by Hecatomnus, whoſe three ſons Mauſolus, Idrieus and Pexodarus, reigned ſucceſſively in Caria, (ſee the the article of ADA) but it is not certain that Hecatomnus was the ſon of Lygdamis. Who knows whether Lygdamis, driven away by Herodotus, recovered his poſt? Who knows whether Hecatomnus eſtabliſhed himſelf by uſurpation without being related to Lygdamis? One thing is very well known, that he was of Mylaſſa (11), and ſettled there the ſeat of his royalty; and there alſo Mauſolus was born. Vitruvius, who informs us of this, tells us moreover, that Mauſolus cauſed his houſe to be built in Halicarnaſſus, becauſe he found that city excellently well ſituated (12). Ariſtotle informs us of another particular (13). Mauſolus deſiring to raiſe money upon the city of Mylaſſa, repreſented to the inhabitants, that ſuch a city as theirs, which was his native place, and the capital of his kingdom, ſhould not be without walls, eſpecially ſince the Perſians threatened it. Every body contributed according to his ability: But when Mauſolus had got the money into his hands, he told them that it was not yet the will of GOD that the city ſhould have walls.

(8) Suidas, in Ἡρόδοτος.

(9) Herod. lib. vii, cap. xxx.

(10) Suidas, ib.

(11) Strab. lib. xiv, pag. 653.

(12) Vitruv. de Archit. lib. ii, cap. viii.

(13) Ariſt. Oeconom. lib. ii.

[F] The Phyſician who cured Mauſolus, demanded a great reward, but like a generous man.] This was Dexippus, a native of the iſle of Cos, and a diſciple of Hippocrates. He was ſent for by Hecatomnus king of Caria, to cure Mauſolus and Pexodarus, who were dangerouſly ill, and given over by the Phyſicians. He cured them, but upon this condition, that the king, their father, ſhould deſiſt from the war againſt the iſle of Cos. Ἐπὶ ὑποσχέσει ἰάσα[ο τὸ παῦσαι πρὸς Κῶας (ſo it muſt be read, and not Κᾶρας) τότε αὐτῷ ἐνεσώτα πόλεμον. Eos ea conditione ſanavit, ut bellum quod tum adverſus Coos gerebat deponeret (14). Was not this very generous? Could there be a better ſubject? Was not this being throughly affected with love for one's country?

(14) Suidas, ἐν Δεξίππος.

[G] See the proofs of all this in the remark.] They are contained in this ſhort paſſage of Pliny (15). Secundi marmor in cruſtas neſcio an Cariæ fuerit inventum. Antiquiſſima, quod equidem inveni-am, Halicarnaſſi Mauſoli domus (16) Proconneſio marmore exculta eſt lateritiis parietibus. Vitruvius explains this more exactly. Halicarnaſſi, ſays he (17), Po- ‘ tentiſſimi regis Mauſoli domus cum Proconneſio ‘ marmore, omnia haberet ornata, parietes habet la- ‘ tere ſtructos, qui ad hoc tempus egregiam præſtant ‘ firmitatem, ita ſectoriis operibus expoliti ut vitri per- ‘ luciditatem videantur habere. - - - - At Halicarnaſ- ‘ ſus, the palace of the great king Mauſolus, is every ‘ where imbelliſhed with Proconneſian marble, and built ‘ with brick walls, which to this time continue exceed- ‘ ing ſtrong, and are ſo admirably poliſhed by the art ‘ of the Stone-cutter, that they ſeem to ſhine like glaſs.’

(15) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. vi, pag. 287.

(16) Quæ etiam nunc durat - - - which remains to this day, ſays he, book xxxv, ch. xiv, pag. 249.

(17) Vitruv. lib. ii, cap. viii, pag. 29.

MAUSOLEUM. Thus the magnificent monument was firſt called, which Artemiſia erected to Mauſolus her huſband, and which was reckoned one of the ſeven wonders of the world. See a deſcription of it in Pliny (a), and in the Supplement to Moreri [A]. Afterwards the ſame name was given to all coſtly monuments [B]. Thus the ſtately monument was called, which Auguſtus built during his ſixth conſulſhip, between the Via Flaminia and the Tiber, to be a burial-place for him and his family (b), Strabo has deſcribed it to us in his fifth book. It is alſo the name which Florus gives (c) to the monument of the kings of Egypt, wherein Cleopatra ſhut herſelf up, and put herſelf to death. The Latin Dictionaries of Lloyd and Hofman afford us ſeveral authorities, which ſhow, that the word Mauſoleum was given by the Romans to thoſe ſepulchres whoſe ſtructures were magnificent; but there are two verſes of Martial [C], which are not to be joined with thoſe authorities. The French language has adopted this word in the ſame ſenſe with the Romans. We call the monuments of the kings of France Mauſolées. This word is alſo extended to the repreſentations of a monument, which make part of a funeral pomp,

(a) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. v.

(b) Sueton. in Aug. cap. 101.

(c) Lib. iv, cap. xi.

[A] In the Supplement to Moreri.] The author has tranſcribed from Mr Chevreau, without confronting him with Pliny. If he had compared him with his original, he might have ſeen, That the fronts of the Mauſoleum were not a little broader than its extent from ſouth to north (1), but on the contrary a little leſs. ‘ Patet ab Auſtro, (ſays Pliny) & Septentrione ‘ ſexagenos ternos pedes, brevius à frontibus (2). - - - ‘ It extends, from ſouth to north ſixty-three foot, on the ‘ front leſs.’ Father Hardouin (3) ſays, that Dalecampius and Leo Allatius did not underſtand this chapter.

(1) Cherv. Hiſt. of the World, Tom. iv, pag. 36, Dutch Edit. 1687.

(2) Pliny, lib. xxxvi, cap. v.

(3) Hardouin, in Plin. ibid.

[B] The ſame name is given to all coſtly monuments.] Μέγεθος δὲ ὕτω δή τι ἐϛι μέγας καὶ ἐς κα[ασκευὴν περίλεπ[ος τὴν πᾶσαν, ὥϛε καὶ Ῥωμαῖοι μεγάλως δή τι αὐτὸν θαυμάζοντες τὰ παρὰ σφίσιν ἐπιφανῆ μνήμα[α Μαυσωλεῖα ὀνομάζουσιν. Ea fuit operis magnitudo & ornamentorum magnificentia ut Romani valdè illud mirantes magnificentiſſima quæque apud ſe monimenta Mauſolea appellarint (4). Such was the greatneſs of the work and magnificence of ornaments, that the Romans extremely admiring it, called all ſtately monuments among themſelves Mauſolea.

(4) Pauſan. lib. viii, pag. 250.

[C] Two verſes of Martial.] It is an evident miſtake to think, that theſe words;

Aere nec vacuo pendentia Mauſolea,
Laudibus immodicis Cares in aſtra ferant (5).

(5) Mart. Spect. initio.

Nor

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pomp, and last no longer than the time of the funeral. Mr Furetiere is in the right to call them Mausolées; but he adds a thing very uncertain [D].

Nor let the Carians with excessive praise,
Their lofty monuments to heaven raise.

prove, that by Mausoleum, the Latin authors understand in general a magnificent monument; for Martial speaks there only of the first Mausoleum.

[D] Furetiere . . . adds a thing very uncertain.] He says, that the shrine of a saint was also called Mausoleum. I question it; for although Mr du Cange may have informed him, that, in the latest Latin authors, Mausoleum signifies feretrum Sancti alicujus, the coffin of some saint, and Mausoleare, to bury, it does not follow, that Mausoleum has been so used in French; however he should have given some proofs of it.

MECCA, a town of Arabia, is not only famous as being the place of Mahomet's nativity, and because the followers of this false prophet go on pilgrimage to it with great superstition, but also because it had a temple, which in the times of old Paganism, was no less reverenced among the Arabians, than that of Delphos among the Grecians [A]. Those who presided over this temple, were very considerable at Mecca (a), and this shows the error of those who say, that Mahomet was of mean extraction; for he was of a family which had for a long time enjoyed the government of the city and that of the temple [B]. People did not fail to tell stories concerning the miraculous protection which Heaven afforded to that sacred place [C]. The inhabitants of

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] It had a temple, which, in the times of old Paganism, was no less reverenced among the Arabians, than that of Delphos among the Grecians.] Dr Prideaux furnishes me with this comparison; his words are these (1). 'As to the temple of Mecca, and what 'it was before Mahomet, all that is true of it, is 'this. It was an heathen temple in the same veneration 'among the Arabs, that the temple of Delphos was 'among the Greeks, where all their † tribes for 'many ages came once a year to perform their idola'trous homage to their gods, till at length Maho'met having forced them to change their idolatry 'for another religion altogether as bad, made this 'temple also undergo the same change, by appoint'ing it thenceforth to be the chief place for the per'forming of that false worship, which he had im'posed upon them, in the same manner as it was 'before of that which he had abolished; and so it 'hath continued ever since.' From the beginning of his imposture he ordered his disciples, 'to pray with 'their ‡ faces towards Jerusalem, which he used to 'call the Holy City, and the City of the Prophets, 'and pretended to fix his pilgrimages there, and to 'make it the chief place where all his sect were to 'worship. But now finding that his followers still 'bore a superstitious veneration to the temple of 'Mecca, which had for many ages been the chief 'place of the idolatrous worship of the Arabians, 'and that it would be the most effectual means to 'reconcile his fellow-citizens to him, if he still pre'served their temple in its former honour, he 'changed this order to serve his purpose, and there'fore directed his ‡ disciples to pray with their 'faces towards Mecca, and ordained the temple of 'that place, which from its square form was called 'the Caaba, (that word signifying a square in the 'Arabic tongue) to be the chief place of worship for 'all those of his religion, to which they were still 'to perform their religious pilgrimages as in former 'times (2).' The author had just said (3), 'It was 'usual among the people of the east, of whatsoever 'religion, to observe one particular point of the Hea'vens, towards which they turned their faces when 'they prayed. The Jews, in what part of the world 'soever they were *, prayed with their faces towards 'Jerusalem, because they there had their temple ††; 'the Arabians towards Mecca, because there was their 'Caaba, the chief place of their heathen worship.' The order which Mahomet gave his followers to turn towards Mecca when they prayed, was in the second year of the Hegira: And since that time, adds Dr Prideaux (4), 'have we all those fabulous stories in'vented, by this impostor, in order to exalt the tem'ple of Mecca, and render it more famous. As that 'it was ‡‡ first built in Heaven to be the place where 'the Angels were to worship, and that Adam wor'shipped at it while in Paradise; but being cast 'down from thence, (for they place Paradise in Hea'ven) he prayed GOD, that he might have such a 'temple on Earth, towards which he might pray, 'and go round it to worship him in the same manner 'as the Angels went round that which he had seen in 'Heaven: That thereupon GOD sent down the re'semblance of this temple in curtains of light, and 'pitched it at Mecca, in the place where the Caaba 'now stands, which is, say they, exactly under the 'original, that is in Heaven: That there, after the 'death of Adam, Seth built it with stones and clay, 'and that the people of GOD there worshipped till 'the Flood, by which it being destroyed ‡‡, GOD 'commanded Abraham again to rebuild it, having 'shown him the form of the fabric in a vision, and 'directed him to the place by his visible Shechinah 'residing on it: That accordingly Abraham and Ismael 'rebuilt it in the place where it now stands: And 'that Ismael ever after, living at Mecca, there wor'shipped GOD with the true worship; but his po'sterity having afterwards corrupted it with idolatry, 'and also prophaned this holy temple, he was now 'to purge it from idols, and consecrate it a-new to 'the true worship of GOD, for which it was origi'nally designed. Thus, he not only retained the tem'ple of Mecca, but also the pilgrimages were con'tinued thither, as well as the other ceremonies that 'had been in use, in the times of idolatry. For, 'as all these things had been held for a long time in 'great veneration by the Arabians, there was no 'great difficulty in persuading them to embrace them, 'after he had once introduced them into his new 'religion.' Add to these last words what shall be said hereafter in the remark [F].

(1) Prideaux, Life of Mahomet, pag. m. 96.

† Shareftani Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, pag. 8, 9. Makrisi Pocockii Spec. Hist. Arab. pag. 177, 311.

‡ Abul Feda Abul Faraghius, pag. 102, Johannes Andreas, cap. vi, Pococ. Spec. Hist. Arab. pag. 175.

‡ Alc. cap. ii, Johannes Andreas, cap. ii, vi.

(2) Prideaux, ib. pag. 92, 93.

(3) Ib. pag. 92.

* Dan. cap. vi, ver. 10. Buxtorfii Synagoga Judaica, cap. x. Maimonides in Halachoth Tephillah, cap. i, sect. iii.

†† Abul Faraghius, pag. 102.

(4) Prideaux, ubi supra, pag. 94, 95. See the remark [F] of the article ABRAHAM.

‡‡ Shareftani Pocockii Spec. Hist. Arab. pag. 115. Sionita Appendix ad Geographiam Nubiensem, cap. vii

[B] Mahomet was of a family which had for a long time enjoyed the government of the city and that of the temple.] Some reckon back as far as one Cosa, as Dr Prideaux informs us (5). 'This Cosa  was 'very famous among the Koraishites, for establishing 'in his family the keeping of the keys of the 'Caaba, and at the same time the presidency of 'that temple, which is the same to which the Ma'hometans now make their pilgrimage at Mecca, 'and was then as much celebrated for the heathen 'worship among the Arabs, as it hath since been 'for the Mahometan; and therefore the presidency 'of it was a matter of great moment, as being a 'station, which rendered him that was in it ho'nourable through all Arabia. It was before in the 'possession of Abu-Gabshan,' who was so simple as to part with it for a bottle of wine, in an unhappy moment when he was in an humour to drink. He had afterwards a mind to get off from such a prejudicial bargain, and was supported by the people of his own tribe; but both he and they were driven out of Mecca by Cosa (6). 'And from 'that time the whole possession of Mecca remained 'to the Koraishites: and Cosa and his posterity in 'a right line down to Mahomet, had the presidency 'of the temple, and the chief government of the 'town ever after (7). Cosa was great grandfather of 'Mahomet's grandfather.'

(5) Prideaux, ib. pag. 2.

 Abul Feda. Pocock. Spec. Hist. Arab. pag. 42, 50, 342. Eccbelensis Hist. Arab. pag. 1, cap. iii. Fortalitium Fidei, lib. iv, Consid. 1.

(6) Prideaux, ib. pag. 3.

(7) Ibid. pag. 4.

[C] Stories were told concerning the miraculous protection, which Heaven afforded to that sacred place.] About seventy years before the time of Mahomet, there

‡‡ Alc. cap. ii, iii, & xxii. Al Jannabi in vita Abrahami Shareftani, Zamach Sharidum ad cap. ii. Alcorani Sharifol Edrisi Liber Agar Johannes Andreas, cap. i.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of Mecca lived in very groſs ignorance [D], and yet they rejected the viſions and doctrines which Mahomet taught them as ridiculous (b). He was an inſtance of the truth of this maxim, no prophet in his own country. He could never make his own countrymen reliſh his pretended revelations; and both becauſe they thought them impertinent, and becauſe they ſuſpected he had a mind to deſtroy the old religion, and to aſpire to tyranny under the auſpicious title of a new prophet (c), they oppoſed his deſigns ſo vigorouſly, that he was forced to betake himſelf to flight (d); and it was only by way of military conqueſt, that he eſtabliſhed in that place his new law (e). There was a ſharp war between him and thoſe of Mecca for ſix years after he fled. This was followed by a truce, which was to laſt ten years; but it continued only two (f), for in the eighth year of the Hegira (g), this impoſtor accompanied with ten thouſand men, marched againſt Mecca, under pretence that it had broken the truce, and very eaſily ſubdued it. He baniſhed from thence all idolatry [E], and in a little while after he went upon other expeditions. He made a pilgrimage to Mecca in the tenth year of the Hegira, he entered it on the great day of that ſolemnity. The people ran in crouds from all places of Arabia to ſee their new maſter: He inſtructed them in his Law, after which he returned to Medina, and died there the next year. He had the policy, during the truce he concluded with the inhabitants of Mecca, to command his followers, to go in pilgrimage to Mecca. This was

(b) Prideaux's Life of Mahomet, pag. 22, 65.

(c) Ib. pag. 24

(d) Ib. pag. 73, 74.

(e) See the remark [E].

(f) Prideaux, ib. pag. 112.

(g) It is the ſame thing with the flight of Mahomet. This eighth year of the Hegira anſwers to the year 629.

there reigned over the Homerites, an ancient nation of the Arabs, lying to the South of Mecca, a certain king called † Du Nawas, who having embraced the Jewiſh religion, perſecuted, that of the Chriſtians, which had been planted there upwards of three hundred years before, and did the utmoſt he was able to extirpate it out of his Dominions (8). . . . . This perſecution forced many of the Homerite Chriſtians to fly into Ethiopia for ſafety; where making their complaints to the king who was a Chriſtian, of the cruel perſecution of Du Nawas againſt them, prevailed with him to ſend Aryat his uncle ‡, with an army of ſeventy thouſand men for their relief; who having overthrown Du Nawas in battle, purſued him ſo cloſe that he forced him into the ſea, where he periſhed. Whereupon the kingdom of the Homerites fell into the hands of the Æthiopians, and Aryat governed it twenty years. After him ſucceeded Abraham Al Aſram, who having built a famous ‡ church at Sanaa, the chief city of the Homerites, abundance of Arabians reſorted thither to the Chriſtian worſhip, ſo that the temple of Mecca began to be neglected, and the Heathen Worſhip there, hitherto performed by ſo great a concourſe of people, from all parts of Arabia, fell to ruin: at which the inhabitants of Mecca were exceedingly diſturbed. For their chief ſupport depended on the great reſort of pilgrims, who went thither every year, according to cuſtom, to worſhip their Heathen deities, and to perform certain ceremonies, the ſolemnity of which drew thither a multitude of people from all parts of Arabia. And therefore to expreſs their indignation againſt this church, which ſo much threatned their common intereſt with total ruin, ſome of them went to Sanaa, and getting privately into the church, had the impudence to defile it with their excrements. At which Abraham was ſo incenſed, to revenge the affront, he vowed the deſtruction of the temple of Mecca: and accordingly, to effect it, marched thither with a great army and beſieged the town. But not being able to compaſs his end, (probably for want of proviſions ſo neceſſary for his numerous forces in ſo deſart and barren a country) he was forced to march back again with loſs; and becauſe he had ſeveral elephants in his Army, this was called, the War of the Elephant; and the Æra by which they uſed to reckon after that time, the Æra of the Elephant. To this war the Alcoran alludes in the 105*th* chapter, called the Chapter of the Elephant, where Mahomet tells us, How the lord treated them that came mounted upon elephants to ruin the temple of Mecca, and that he defeated their treacherous deſign, and ſent againſt them great armies of birds, which threw down ſtones upon their heads, and made them like corn in the field, which is deſtroyed and trodden under foot by the beaſts. Where * the Commentators of the Alcoran tell us, that to preſerve the temple of Mecca from the deſtruction that threatned it, GOD ſent againſt the Æthiopians great armies of birds, each of which carried three ſtones, one in the bill, and one in each foot, which they threw down upon the heads of the enemies; and that thoſe ſtones, altho' not much bigger than peaſe, where yet of that weight, that falling upon the helmet, they pierced that and the man through; and that on each of them was written the name of him that was to be ſlain by it; and that the army of the Ethiopians being thus deſtroyed, the Temple of Mecca was ſaved (9).

† Abul Feda Al Maſudi. Ecchelenſis Hiſt. Arab. Part i, cap. x. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 62.

(8) Prideaux, ib. pag. 79.

‡ Al Jannabi Ahmed Ebn Yuſef. Ecchelenſis Hiſt. Arab. Part ii, cap. i. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 63.

† Abul Feda, Al Jannabi Ahmed Ebn Yuſef. Zamachſhari Bidawi, & Jalalani in Commentar. ad cap. cv. Alcorani. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 64. Celſii notæ ad Alfraganum, pag. 54.

* Zamachſhari Bidawi, Jalalani, &c.

(9) Prideaux, ubi ſupra, pag. 80.

[D] The inhabitants of Mecca lived in very groſs ignorance.] Mahomet was 'an illiterate Barbarian ††, 'that could neither write nor read. But this was not 'ſo much a fault in him, as in the Tribe to which he 'belonged, with whom it was the cuſtom as to all 'manner of literature, to continue ‡‡ in the ſame ig'norance in which they were born, even to their lives 'end. And therefore at the time when Mahomet firſt 'ſet up for a Prophet, there was not one man of Mec'ca that could either write or read, excepting only '‡‡ Waraka, a kinſman of Cadigha, who having firſt 'turned Jew, and afterwards Chriſtian, had learned to 'write Arabic in Hebrew letters. And for this rea'ſon, the inhabitants of Mecca were called  the 'Illiterate, in oppoſition to the people of Medina, 'who being the one half Chriſtians, and the other 'half Jews, were able both to write and read; and 'therefore were called † the People of the Book. It 'was of them that ſeveral of Mahomet's followers, 'after he came to Medina, learned to read and write 'alſo, which ſome of them had begun to learn before 'of Baſhar the Cendian ⊥, who having lived at An'bar, a city of Erack, near the Euphrates, there 'learned that art; from whence coming to Mecca, 'and marrying the ſiſter of Abuſophian, he ſettled 'there, and from him the men of Mecca are firſt ſaid 'to have received letters. Among the followers of 'Mahomet, Othman was the greateſt proficient here'in, which advanced him afterwards to ‡ be ſecretary 'to this Impoſtor. But for want of paper at firſt, being 'in a place where there was never before any occaſion 'for it, they were forced to make uſe * of the ſhoul'derbones of mutton, and camels, to write on; 'which was a device antiently made uſe of by 'other tribes of the Arabs, who had letters, but 'wanted traffic to accommodate them with more 'convenient materials for this purpoſe; and there'fore their books, in which their Poems, and other 'matters they delighted in, were written ††, were 'only ſo many of thoſe bones of ſheep and camels 'tied together with a ſtring (10).'

†† Alcoran. cap. vii. Johannes Andreas, cap. ii. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. 156. Diſputatio Chriſtiani, cap. xii. Richardi Confutatio, cap. iii.

‡‡ Ebn'ol-Athir Shareſtani. Al Motawazi in libro Mogreb. Pococke. Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 157.

 Al Bochari Pocock. ibid.

 Shareſtani Pocock. Spec. Arab. Hiſt. pag. 156.

† Shareſtanſi, & Pocock. ibid. Hottinger. Hiſt. Orient. lib. i, cap. i.

⊥ Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 157.

‡ Elmacin. lib. i, cap. i. Bartholomæus Edeſſenus.

* Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 157.

†† Ebnol Athir. Pocock. ibid.

[E] He very eaſily ſubdued Mecca. He baniſhed from thence all idolatry] He marched ſo expeditiouſly to this city with his army, that he was at the gates of it before the inhabitants were aware of his deſign ††; therefore be ſurpriſed them before they had time to prepare for their defence; and ſo they were forced to ſubmit themſelves to him . . . . The city ſurrendered at diſcretion without making the leaſt ſhew of defence. On his entry into it having put to death ſuch as had been moſt violent againſt him, all the reſt, ſubmitted to him, and embraced his religion. He was no ſooner abſolute maſter of the place, but he ſet himſelf to purge the Caaba of it's idols, and conſecrate that Temple a-new, as if he had reſolved to preſerve it's antient ſplendor, by making it the Moſque, the moſt ſacred of all, and the chief place for the religious ſervice of his followers. There ‡‡ was a multitude of idols within the temple, and as many without, that ſurrounded it, all which Mahomet pulled down and deſtroyed, without exception. The chief among thoſe idols were thoſe of Abraham and Iſmael within the Temple, and that of Hoball without. The reſt were of Angels and Prophets, and others of their principal Saints departed, whom they worſhipped only as media-

(10) Prideaux, ubi ſupra, pag. 36, & ſeq.

†† Abul Farag. pag. 103. Elmacin. lib. i, cap. i.

‡‡ Pocokii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 95, 96, 97, 98.

tors,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

was a ſolemnity which the Arabians for many ages had held in great veneration [F]. He believed therefore, that by preſerving it, he ſhould diſpoſe them the ſooner to ſubmit to the new yoak he had a mind to impoſe upon them. And doubtleſs this had a good effect for his purpoſe upon the inhabitants of Mecca, ſince they reaped a very great advantage from this religious cuſtom, and an advantage which they ſtood much in need of, for they have the moſt barren and fruitleſs ſoil in the world. I have ſhown above (i), the lamentable ſtate to which their city was reduced in the IVth century of the Hegira. It had ſuffered in the firſt century of the ſame Æra (k), all that the fury of war uſually produces. Some authors ſay (l), that Solyman erected there an univerſity about the year 949 of the Hegira, and that the college which he built there, and the revenue wherewith he endowed it, were worthy of his magnificence. Authors do not agree as to the ſituation of Mecca. Moreri's Dictionary places it a day's journey from the Red-Sea. Mr Baudrand makes it forty Arabic miles diſtant from it; and Mr d'Herbelot three days journey. Some (m) place it almoſt under the line, and others in twenty one degrees, and forty minutes of north latitude (n). The uſe of arms is prohibited within its territory, which is ſix miles to the eaſt, twelve to the north, eighteen to the weſt, and twenty four to the ſouth: but robbers laugh at this prohibition, and plunder wherever they can, which obliges travellers and pilgrims frequently to carry arms in thoſe parts, to ſecure themſelves from the inſults of thoſe highway-men (o). An author whom

(i) In the article ABUDHAHER.

(k) See Bibliotheque Orientale, of Mr d'Herbelot, pag. 569.

(l) Gabr. Sionita & Joan. Hefronita, de nonnullis Oriental. Urbibus, pag. 19.

(m) Id. ib. pag. 17.

(n) See d'Herbelot. ubi ſupra, pag. 569.

(o) Gabr. Sionita & Jo. Hefron. ubi ſupra, pag. 20.

*tors, in the ſame manner as the Romaniſts now do their ſaints, and the images which they erect unto them. For the Arabians always held, that there was but only one God, the Creator and Governor of all things, whom they called Allah Taal, that is the ſupreme GOD, and GOD of Gods, and Lords of Lords, whom they durſt never repreſent by any image. But this GOD being (as they held) ſo great and ſo exalted, as not to be approached to by men while here on Earth, but through the mediation of advocates interceeding for them in Heaven; that Angels and Holy Men beatified might perform this office for them, they ſet up their images, and built them temples, and directed their worſhip and devotions to them. And in this conſiſted the whole of the Arabian idolatry, which Mahomet put an end to by deſtroying theſe idols (11).

 Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 107, 108.

(11) Prideaux, ubi ſupra, pag. 122, & ſeq.

[F] He ordered the pilgrimage to Mecca. This was a ſolemnity which the Arabians held in great veneration for many ages.] 'This was a rite of the Heathen A-'rabs, who for many ages before uſed to go once a 'year to the temple of Mecca, there to worſhip their 'Heathen Deities. The time of this pilgrimage † 'was in the month of Dulhagha; and on the tenth 'day of that month was their great feſtival, in which 'the chiefeſt ſolemnities of their pilgrimage were per-'formed . . . . . And that every body might come 'with full liberty and ſafety to this feſtival from all 'parts of Arabia, and alſo return in the ſame manner, 'not only this month, but alſo the preceding and 'following were held ſacred among them, in which 'it was not lawful to uſe any act of hoſtility againſt 'any man whatſoever, as I have before ſhewn (12). 'And therefore this ſolemn pilgrimage to Mecca 'having been a religious uſage, which all the tribes 'of the Arabs had been long accuſtomed to, and was 'had in great veneration among them, Mahomet 'thought not fit to exaſperate them with any inno-'vation in this matter, but adopting it into his religion 'retained it juſt in the ſame manner as he found it 'practiſed among them, with all the ridiculous rites 'that accompanied it, and ſo it is obſerved even un-'to this day by all of that religion, as one of the 'fundamental duties of it. For this crafty impoſtor 'taught them concerning it (as he did of all the o-'ther Heathen rites of the Arabs, which he found ne-'ceſſary to retain) that it was a command from God 'to Abraham and Iſmael, annually to obſerve this pil-'grimage to Mecca; and it was commanded them on 'their rebuilding the Caaba; now, ſays he, in the 'beginning, this pilgrimage was performed only to 'honour God, all the Arabians repairing to Mecca 'once a year to worſhip God together, juſt as the 'Jews did afterwards three times a year, going up to 'Jeruſalem by his order at the time of their three ſo-'lemn feaſts. But in proceſs of time the Arabians 'having perverted this cuſtom, and changed it into 'idolatry, Mahomet made them believe he had an or-'der from God to re-eſtabliſh it in it's former purity. 'By enjoining this pilgrimage, this falſe prophet la-'boured to preſerve to the town which gave him birth 'the advantages it had enjoyed a long time before. 'And in thus providing for the intereſt of that people 'in the very religion which he was a framing, he 'thought he might the eaſier prevail to draw them 'over to it. And in this he was not miſtaken. For 'had he aboliſhed this pilgrimage, it being the grea-'teſt honour and benefit which that place enjoyed, 'and by which indeed the inhabitants did moſtly ſub-'ſiſt; their intereſt would have engaged them to that 'vigorous oppoſition againſt him, that in all likeli-'hood he would never have become maſter of that 'town, and conſequently have miſcarried in the whole 'deſign (13).'

† Shareſtani. Makrizi. Golii notæ ad Alfraganum, pag. 8, 9. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 177.

(12) See the laſt paragraph of this remark.

(13) Prideaux, ubi ſupra, pag. 113, & ſeq.

This reflexion is very judicious; there is nothing that ſets men more againſt innovations in matters of religion, than when they ſee that the change of worſhip would put a ſtop to their trade, and be lucrum ceſſans, & damnum emergens, gain ſinking, and loſs riſing. I know very well, that ſuperſtition alone, is ſufficient to make a city obſtinate in retaining the worſhip of it's idols: the hope of their protection is ſometimes the only advantage that is reaped from them. The worſhip of idols is not always attended with public profit; the artificers and merchants do not always get by it, and it does not always occaſion a great concourſe of ſtrangers and devout travellers, who leave a great deal of money behind them. Without this kind of aſſiſtance, the zeal of a people for their antient Gods may inſpire them ſtrongly to oppoſe the extirpation of idolatry; but it is quite another thing, when the publick worſhip is a ſource of gain to private perſons. What was the cauſe, pray, of that popular commotion, which made that out-cry (when St Paul was preaching) Great is Diana of the Epheſians? Was it not from the remonſtrance of one Demetrius, a Silver-Smith, who made ſilver-ſhrines for Diana, which brought no ſmall gain to the Crafts-men (14)? He aſſembled them and told them, Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth; and gave them to underſtand, that not only their profit, but likewiſe the advantage of the whole city of Epheſus, was concerned not to ſuffer one Paul, who perſuaded and turned away many people, ſaying they be no Gods which are made with hands. From hence we may conclude, that the inhabitants of Epheſus would have been more tractable, with reſpect to the Goſpel, if their great Diana could have been taken away, without doing any prejudice to their gain, or to the veneration which all the world had for their temple. They would in ſuch a caſe have been infinitely more docile as to the lectures of St Paul againſt idols. We muſt confeſs therefore, that Mahomet found out a notable device to gain the inhabitants of Mecca. He preſerved the concourſe of pilgrims, which was ſo profitable and glorious to them; he left their temple its ancient privileges; he took care to indemnify them: this was an excellent remedy againſt the vexation which the ruin of their ancient idolatry might cauſe them.

(14) Acts of the Apoſtles, chap. xix, ver. 24.

Note, That Dr Prideaux in the place where he obſerves, that the Arabians had no leave to do any act of hoſtility, during the month of their great feſtival, nor in the Month preceding, or next following, adds this, as I have before ſhown (15). I believe he means that he has ſpoken of this, when, in the pages 83 and 84, he mentions the war, 'in which Mahomet firſt 'bore arms, being then twenty years old †. It was 'called

(15) See, above, citation (12).

† Al Kodaï, Al Kamus, &c. Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 174, in margine.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google whom I have already named affirms, that Mecca is ſituated near the river Betius, which is now called Chaibar (p). Yet a few Lines after he ſays, that all the water of that town was in the well of Zemzem [G], and in the ciſterns where the rain was kept; but that in the laſt century it was conveyed from mount Arafat by means of an aqueduct, which coſt a great deal of money (q). See the remark [G]. I ſhall ſay ſomething of the prince to whom Mecca belongs [H].

(p) Baudrand, pag. 696.

(q) Id. ib. He cites Golius, (it ſhould be Golius) Not. in Alfraganum.

‘ called the Impious War, becauſe it proceeded to that ‘ heat and fury, that they carried it on even in thoſe ‘ months when it was reckoned impious among them ‘ to wage war. For it was ‡ an ancient cuſtom ‘ through all Arabia, to hold four months of the ‘ year ſacred, in which all war was to ceaſe: and ‘ theſe were the months of Moharam, Rajeb, Dulkaada, and Dulhagha; which are the firſt, the ſeventh, the eleventh and the twelfth of the year. ‘ And theſe months were ſo religiouſly obſerved by all ‘ the tribes, that how great ſoever the enmity of one ‘ tribe might be to another, a thing common enough ‘ amongſt them, the ſacred month was no ſooner be‘ begun, but taking off the heads of their ſpears, and ‘ laying down their arms, they forbore all manner of ‘ hoſtilities, and even carried on trade together, ‘ mingling with each other, as if there had been a ‘ ſolid peace, and perfect friendſhip between them: ‘ ſo that if a man, during thoſe months, had met the ‘ murderer of his father or brother, he durſt not aſſault him, how violent ſoever his reſentment or thirſt ‘ of revenge might be.’ This paſſage and the other do not agree together; one mentions four months, which do not immediately ſucceed one another; the other mentions three months that follow one another.

‡ Al Jauhari, Al Schareſtani, Al Kamus, Citati a Golio in notis ad Alfraganum, pag. 4, 5, & Pocockii Spec. Hiſt. Arab. pag. 174, 176.

[G] The well of Zemzem.] Others call it Zamzam, or Zanzam as I have ſhewn above (16). This well is one of the moſt ſacred rarities of Mecca. It is ſaid to be a ſpring of water, which was produced under the feet of Iſhmael, when he was dying with thirſt. The pilgrims are obliged to make uſe of this water to waſh their body and head three times: they muſt alſo drink of it, and, if they can, muſt carry ſome of it away with them. ‘ Poſtquam ſacellum illud, atque lapidem ‘ prædictum inviſerunt, ſe ad aliud intra templum ſatis ‘ amplum ſacellum conferunt, ubi puteus eſt dictus ‘ Zam Zam; & eſt inquit Jacub Ben Sidi Aali, fons ‘ ſeu ſcatebra quæ fluxit ſub pedibus Iſmaël dum ge‘ meret ſitibundus, quam Hagar primo videns filio ait ‘ linguâ Coptiticâ Zam, Zam, hoc eſt, ſiſte, ſiſte gra‘ dum. Ex hoc puteo multi ſunt qui aquam exhauriunt, ‘ atque dant peregrinis quibus præceptum eſt corpus ‘ & caput eadem aqua ter ſe lavare, atque ex eadem ‘ bibere, ſecumque ſi poſſint deferre (17) - - - - After ‘ they have viſited that chapel, and the ſtone (18) before ‘ mentioned, they go to another pretty large chapel within ‘ the temple, where there is a well called Zam Zam, ‘ and is, ſays Jacub Ben Sidi Aali, a fountain, or ſpring, ‘ which guſhed out under the feet of Iſmael, when he ‘ was ready to dye with thirſt, which Hagar preſently ‘ ſeeing ſaid to her ſon in the Coptic tongue, Zam, Zam, ‘ that is, ſtay, ſtay. Many draw water out of this well, ‘ and give it to pilgrims, who are commanded to waſh ‘ their head and body with it three times, and to drink ‘ of it, and, if they are able, to carry ſome of it away ‘ with them. Mahomet, to render the town of Mecca, ‘ the place where he was born, more conſiderable, ‘ to raiſe the devotion of the poeple, and draw thither ‘ a greater multitude of pilgrims, beſtowed great en‘ comiums upon the water of this well. For there is ‘ a tradition of him received by the Kalif Omar, ‘ which ſays, that the water of the well of Zemzem ‘ ſerves for a cure, and gives health to thoſe that ‘ drink of it; but that thoſe who drink plentifully ‘ of it, and quench their thirſt with it, obtain the ‘ pardon of all their ſins. And it is reported of Abdallah, ſirnamed Al Hafedh, becauſe he knew by ‘ heart a great many traditions, that being aſked ‘ about his memory, he anſwered that ever ſince he ‘ had drank great draughts of the water of Zemzem, ‘ to ſtrengthen it, he had forgot nothing that he had ‘ learned (19).’ Mr de Herbelot, from whom I have theſe words, has collected many particulars concerning this well. Conſult his Bibliotheque Orientale at the word Zemzem. I ſhall take from it only this: ‘ The town of Mecca continued a long time without ‘ any other water, than that of the well of Zemzem, ‘ till the great concourſe of caravans obliged the Kalifs ‘ to build an aqueduct, which affords now a ſufficient ‘ quantity of it (20).’ This ſuppoſes that the aqueduct is more ancient than Mr Baudrand affirms upon the credit of Golius (21).

(16) In the text of the article ABUDHAHER, and remark [K] of the article AGAR.

(17) Gabr. Sionita & Jo. Heſronita de nonnullis Oriental. Urbibus, pag. 19.

(18) That is, the ſtone ſpoken of before, remark [K] of the article AGAR.

(19) D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. pag. 928, col. 2.

(20) Id. ib.

(21) See the text of the article towards the end, citation (g).

[H] We ſhall ſay ſomething of the prince to whom Mecca belongs.] He is deſcended from Haſcem, great grandfather of Mahomet, and ſtiles himſelf the head of the Haſcemeans. He alſo gives himſelf the title of Scerif or Emir. He formerly held of the Soudans of Egypt, and afterwards of the Turkiſh ſultans, but he always preſerved his own dominion and power. Et quanquam olim Ægypti ſultanorum, ac modo Othomanorum pareat imperio (22), nunquam tamen ſuo dominio auctoritateque fuit ſpoliatus (23). The Grand Signior is ſo far from aſſuming the title of the ſovereign of Mecca and Medina, that he calls himſelf their humble ſervant. The Emir or Scerif of Mecca is commonly poor; although he has large incomes, and receives many preſents from princes and pilgrims; but he has always ſome quarrels with his brothers who aſpire to dominion, and with the Arabian Beduins. He receives from the Grand Signior a third part of the revenues of Egypt, on condition that he ſhall protect the pilgrims of Mecca, and ſecure them from the inſults and robberies of the Arabians (24). This I have taken from the Appendix to the Geographia Nubienſis. Mr d'Herbelot affirms, ‘ That ‘ the moſt antient original of the Emirs or Scerifs of ‘ Mecca, as they are now called, is that which is ‘ related by Ben Schouhnah, under the reign of the ‘ Aioubites, or princes of the poſterity of Saladin, ‘ who reigned in Jemen in Arabia. For he writes, ‘ that at that time, there was a prince at Mecca, and ‘ another at Medina, who had the title of Emir, and ‘ that in the year 633 of the Hegira, one Cotadah, ‘ the ſon of Edris, of the race of Ali, of the branch ‘ of Hoſſain, was Emir of Mecca (25).’ I remember, that during the laſt war (26), the news-writers of the allies, publiſhed from time to time, that the affairs of the Turks went very ill in Aſia, and that Mecca had been taken from them (27). The news-writers of Paris were vexed at it, and gave to underſtand in the firſt place, that this was not true, and in the ſecond, that the conſequence drawn from it was not good, ſince Mecca does not belong to the Turk, and the Porte receives no revenue from thence, but rather ſends thither preſents and penſions.

(22) That is, as appears by the whole ſequel of the diſcourſe, that he is under the protection of the great Turk.

(23) Appendix Geogr. Nubienſis, ubi infra.

(24) Gabr. Sionita & Jo. Heſronita, ubi ſupra, ſive in Appendice Geograph. Nubienſis, pag. 21.

(25) D'Herbelot, ubi ſupra, pag. 569, col. 2.

(26) I write this in Octob. 1700.

(27) Compare this with the above citat. (13), of the article MAHOMET, II.

MEY (Jonh de) a doctor of Phyſic, profeſſor of Divinity, and miniſter at Middelburg in the XVIIth century, wrote ſeveral books in Dutch (a). He wrote alſo a Latin book intituled Sacra Phyſiologia (b), wherein he explains the paſſages of Scripture which concern Natural Philoſophy. There are ſome who have ſpoken of that treatiſe with a great deal of contempt [A]. This author died the eighth of April 1678, being fifty nine years

(a) They are all collected in one volume in folio, printed at Middelburg in 1682.

(b) Printed at Middelburg in 1661, and not at Venice in 1602, as Konig ſays.

[A] There are ſome who have ſpoken of that treatiſe with a great deal of contempt.] Valentine Henry Voglerus accuſes him of collecting without judgment the opinions of other authors, and of ſuffering himſelf to be too much drawn away by novelty. Another accuſes him of being a plagiary. Here follows the proof: ‘ Induſtriam ſuam non approbavit Valentino Henrico ‘ Voglero, qui in ſuo commentario poſthumo de eodem ‘ argumento cenſet Maium non tam ſuam ſcientiam declaraſſe, quam alienas ſententias exſcripſiſſe, idque nulla fere delectu novitate præcipue opinionum pellectum. ‘ Quod judicium inclementius aliquanto videri poterat, ‘ cum in ejuſmodi ſcriptoribus aliter fieri vix oportebat, ‘ quibus non tam induſtriæ gloria quam legentis utili‘ tas

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

years of age, as Witte obſerves in the 116th page of the ſecond part of his Diarium Biographicum.

' tas ſpectatur, niſi id reprehenſione dignum eſt quod ' Maius ex eo hominum genere eſſe videtur, qui ſup- ' primendis autorum nominibus unde ſua exſcripſerunt, ' neſcio quam ingenii laudem affectant (1). - - - - His ' induſtry has not been approved by Valentine Henry Vog- ' lerus, who, in his poſthumous commentary upon the ſame ' ſubject, thinks, that Mey had not ſo much ſhown his ' own learning as copied the ſentiments of others, and ' that almoſt without diſtinction, being chiefly led ' away by the novelty of opinions. Which judgment ' might ſeem a little too ſevere, ſince writers of that kind ' ought ſcarcely to do otherwiſe, who conſider the benefit ' of the reader more than the glory of induſtry, unleſs ' that Mey deſerves cenſure, becauſe he ſeems to be one ' of thoſe, who, ſuppreſſing the names of authors from ' whence they have tranſcribed their own materials, af- ' fect, I cannot tell how, to be thought men of parts.'

(1) Godofredus Vockerodt, in Præfat. Diſputationes de Fœtura artificioſa Jacobi. This book was printed at Iena in 1689, in 4to.

MEYNIER (HONORATUS DE) the author of a book intituled, Les demandes curieuſes & les reſponſes libres, (curious Queſtions and free Anſwers), which he publiſhed at Paris in 1635. He had born arms thirty ſix years (a). This book runs upon political and military ſubjects, and contains ſome conſiderations and examples which are not extraordinary, but do not want good ſenſe. I have cited it ſometimes (b).

(a) See his advertiſement to the French nobility.

(b) Above, citation (26) of the article FRANCIS I, and citation (34) of the article LEWIS XI.

MELAMPUS, a great ſoothſayer among the antient Pagans, was the ſon of Amythaon and Aglaia [A]. He had a brother called Bias, for whom he expreſſed a great affection upon two occaſions; firſt in procuring him a wife, and in the ſecond place in procuring him a crown. Neleus, who reigned at Pylos in Peloponneſus, required of thoſe who would marry his daughter, that they ſhould bring to him the fine oxen of Iphiclus, which were fed in Theſſaly. Melampus, to enable his brother to make this preſent to Neleus, undertook to carry off thoſe oxen (a). In this deſign he did not ſucceed, for thoſe who kept them made him priſoner; but becauſe he propheſied in priſon, concerning ſuch things as Iphiclus deſired an explication of, he obtained, as a reward the oxen (b). Thus he was the cauſe of the marriage of his brother [B], and procured

(a) Pauſanias, lib. iv, ſub fin.

(b) Id. ib.

[A] He was the ſon of Amythaon and Aglaia.] See, in the remark [A] of the article AMPHIARAUS, the genealogy of Amythaon. It would be needleſs to repeat it here. I ſhall only ſay, that Melampus's mother called Aglaia by Diodorus Siculus (1) is called Eidomene in Apollodorus (2), who adds, that ſhe was the daughter of Pheres the ſon of Cretheus (3).

(1) Diodor. Siculus, lib. iv, cap. lxx, pag. 258.

(2) Apollod. lib. i, pag. 45.

(3) Id. ib. p. 51.

[B] Thus he was the cauſe of the marriage of his brother.] The narrative of Pauſanias, which I have followed, does not agree with that of Apollodorus, which I ſhall now abridge. Bias deſired in marriage Pero, the daughter of Neleus, who was at that time courted by ſeveral others. Neleus told them, that he would not marry her to any, but to him that ſhould bring him the oxen of Phylachus, that were kept by a dog which no man or beaſt durſt approach. Bias implored the aſſiſtance of Melampus, who promiſed to bring him thoſe oxen, after he had continued a year in priſon. Accordingly he was ſeized as he endeavoured to commit this robbery; he was loaded with chains and made a cloſe priſoner. He had already been near a year in this captivity, when he heard the noiſe of worms eating the beam of the roof of the houſe. He aſked them how much was eaten of it; they anſwered, there remained but a very little. Thereupon he deſired to be carried to another place, which was done, and in a little while after the houſe fell. Phylachus admired this, and knowing that Melampus was a very good diviner, he ſet him at liberty, and aſked him how his ſon Iphiclus might have children: The prophet promiſed him every thing that depended on his knowledge, provided he would grant him the oxen. He uſed ſome ceremonies to call forth the birds; a vulture preſented itſelf, which informed him, that when Phylachus gelded ſome rams, he had left near Iphiclus the bloody knife; and that Iphiclus being ſeized with fear, fled away, and fixed the knife in a tree; and that he muſt take it away from thence, and ſcrape off the ruſt of it, and make Iphiclus drink it ten days ſucceſſively in wine. Melampus did as the vulture told him; Iphiclus became the father of Podarces, and the diviner brought to Pylos the oxen which were to be given to Neleus, after which he cauſed the marriage to be celebrated between Bias and Pero, and ſtayed at Meſſina (4).

(4) Taken from Apollodorus, lib. i, pag. 47. See alſo Homer. Odyſſ. lib. xv, pag. m. 462.

(5) Ἐστυδάκεσαν δὲ ἆρα οἱ τότε πλοῦτόν τινα συλλέγεσθαι τοιοῦτον ἵππων καὶ βοῶν ἀγέλας. Fuit hoc præcipuum illis temporibus divitiarum ſtudium luculenta habere equorum & boum pecuaria. Pauſan. lib. iv. ſub fin.

Let us obſerve two things from Pauſanias; one is, that in thoſe ages, the greateſt care of rich people, was to have a great number of oxen and horſes (5). That this was the chief deſire of that time, he proves, 1. By the conditions which Neleus ſtipulated with the admirers of his daughter. 2. By the order which Euryſtheus gave to Hercules to bring him oxen from Spain. 3. By the conditions of the combat between Eryx and Hercules. The firſt, if he was overcome was to loſe his kingdom, and if he did overcome he was to gain the oxen which Hercules had carried away from Erythia. 4. By the preſent of a hundred oxen, which Iphidamas, the ſon of Antenor, made to his father-in-law when he married. The ſecond obſervation from Pauſanias is this, that thoſe who married their daughters, demanded a wedding preſent from their ſons-in-law (6). This puts me in mind of Saul, who obliged David to bring him an hundred foreſkins of the Philiſtines (7). But I muſt add, that Pauſanias has omitted ſomething, which hinders us from judging exactly in this affair. By this narrative it would ſeem, that it was the ſole ambition of having fine oxen, a ſign of vain-glorious wealth at that time, that moved Neleus to require of the lovers of Pero, that they ſhould bring him the oxen of Iphiclus. But the truth is, it was another thing which prompted him to act after this manner. Part of the eſtate of Tyro, his mother, had been uſurped by Iphiclus (8); he had a mind to have the loſs repaired, and to be revenged upon the uſurper. And therefore he deſired, that he who would marry his daughter ſhould do this exploit. There is ſcarce any omiſſion, but makes hiſtory deceitful: and this fault is very common in moſt of the relations of antient Mythology. The only way to make them good, is to join together the ſeveral pieces which are diſperſed in divers authors: which Muretus hath done as to this expedition of Melampus, and by that means has given us a full account of it. I ſhall extract from him thoſe circumſtances which Pauſanias and Appollodorus have omitted.

(6) Ἔδνα ἐπὶ τῇ θυγατρὶ ἀ- τεῖ τοῦς μνωμένους. A ſimilitium munus deſcebat. Ibid.

(7) 1 Sam. xviii, 25.

(8) See Muretus in Propertium, Eleg. iii, lib. ii.

Melampus was ſerved in priſon by a very good man, married to a very bad wife: from the former he received a thouſand civilities, and from the latter abundance of bad uſage. The worms which corroded the beam, having diſcovered that the houſe would quickly fall, he pretended to be ſick, and deſired to be tranſported elſewhere with his bed. The huſband went before, the wife followed after; and as ſoon as the bed was almoſt out of doors, the houſe fell down and cruſhed the wife to pieces. The huſband having learned of Melampus the whole ſecret of this affair, acquainted Phylachus with it, who informed Iphiclus. Iphiclus knowing the ability and deſign of Melampus, was very kind to him: You ſhall have my oxen, ſaid he to him, provided you will enable me to get children. The Diviner gave him hopes; he ſacrificed, he marked out the regions of the auguries. All ſorts of birds came thither except the vulture; but none of them could tell

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google procured to him a kingdom in the following manner. Being desired to cure the women of Argos of a furious disease, he would not do it, but on condition they would give him half the kingdom of Argos. This condition at first was denied him, but when the disease increased, they returned to him and promised him what he demanded: but not being satisfied with this, he would have them also resign up to his brother the third part of the kingdom, to which they consented. This adventure is differently related [C]. He was the first who taught the Greeks the ceremonies of the worship of Bacchus (c). He was not the inventer of them, if we believe Herodotus, but he acquired the knowledge of them by the conversation he had with the Phœnicians [D]. It is pretended that he understood tell him what he must do to enable Iphiclus to get his wife with child. At last a vulture presented himself, and did more than all the rest: he showed the cause of the barrenness, and then the remedy. Phylachus, says he, being one day angry with his son, pursued him with sword in hand, and not being able to overtake him, he fixed his sword in a pear-tree, and there it continues from that time wrapped up in the bark. You will find it in such a place, take it from thence, and make Iphiclus drink the rust of it ten days together in wine. The fear wherewith he was seized that day, is the cause of his impotency; you may cure it by the receipt I have prescribed (9).

(c) Herodot. lib. ii, cap. xlix.

(9) Taken from Muretus, ubi supra.

PROPERTIUS criticised.

This narrative serves as a commentary upon some verses of Propertius, which deserve a little censure, for a fault which Muretus did not perceive. Propertius having said, that love is a passion which constrains young men to endure all things, proves it by the imprisonment of Melampus.

Ac veluti primo taurus detractat aratra,
Mox venit assueto mollis ad arva jugo:
Sic primo juvenes trepidant in amore feroces,
Dehinc domiti post hæc æqua, & iniqua ferunt.
Turpia perpessus vates est vincla Melampus
Cognitus Iphicli subripuisse boves:
Quem non lucra, magis Pero formosa coëgit,
Mox Amythaonia nupta futura domo (10.)

(10) Propert. Eleg. III, lib. ii.

The bull at first declines to plough the field,
But to the yoke use makes him tamely yield:
So fiery youths, tho' first love's power they fear,
Yet afterwards the greatest hardships bear.
Iphiclus to prison Melampus sent,
Because to steal his oxen the prophet went.
Captivity he bore, and chains beside,
To have the beauteous Pero for his bride.

This example is impertinently alledged; for it was not the love of a maid, but brotherly kindness which induced Melampus to expose himself to the disgrace of a prison. Theocritus served as a guide to lead Propertius astray. He has placed Melampus also among the examples of the power of love.

Τὰν ἀγέλαν χ' ὡ μάντις ἀπ' Ὄθρυος ἄγε Μελάμπους
Ἐς πύλον. ἁ δὲ Βίαν τῶ ἐν ἀγκοίνησιν ἐχλίνθη
Μάτηρ χαρίεσσα περιφρόνω Ἀλφεσιβοίας.

Egit & vates Melampus armentum ab Othry monte
In Pylum. In amplexu vero Biantis jacuit
Pulcherrima Pero mater sapientis Alphesibœæ (11).

(11) Theocrit. Eccll. III, sub fin. pag. m. 25.

And the prophet Melampus drove the oxen from mount Othrys to Pylos. But yet Bias enjoyed the beautiful Pero, mother of the wise Alphesibœa.

The ostentation of learning hath drawn several impertinent things from the antient Poets. Ronsard, and many others, in the XVIth century have split upon this rock.

(12) See, besides Apollodorus, ubi infra, Servius in Virgil. Eclog. VI, ver. 48.

(13) Μετὰ δαιμονίας ἀνάγκης δὲ τῆς ἐρωμανίας ἐπραττον Omni decore per deserta discurrebant. Apollod. lib. ii, pag. 85.

[C] This adventure is differently related.] I have followed the relation of Herodotus, but here is another. Prœtus having disputed the kingdom of Argos with Acrisius, his brother, was driven out of the country, and could not settle again but at Tyrinthus. He had three daughters who grew mad, as a punishment for some irreligious act (12). The fury that seized them was so violent, that they run through the fields with all sorts of indecency (13). Melampus, who understood not only the art of Divining, but also Physic, promised to cure them, provided their father would give him the third part of his kingdom. Prœtus finding that the cure of his daughters would cost him too much, would not purchase it at this price. Their distemper grew worse, and became contagious: the other women of Argos were so tormented with it, that they killed their children, and went into the desarts. The malady increased every day more and more, so that Prœtus was willing to pay Melampus for the cure according to his own demand: but the Physician raised the price, and demanded another third of the kingdom for his brother. This was granted him; for it was feared lest a refusal should engage him to demand a greater recompence afterwards. He picked out the most vigorous young men to run with loud cries after those poor distempered women. They were pursued as far as Sicyon: The eldest of the daughters of Prœtus died by the way; the two others were purged; Melampus married one; and Bias the other. Some time after there was born to Prœtus a son, who was called Megapenthes (14). We may observe, that it is said, Melampus, besides part of the kingdom, demanded in marriage one of the three daughters he should cure (15).

(14) Taken from Apollodorus, lib. ii, pag. 85, & seq.

Another account of it is this Under the reign of Anaxagoras, the son of Argeus, the son of Megapenthes, the women were seized with such a malignant fury, that they ran up and down the streets and thro' the fields. Melampus having cured them, found Anaxagoras so thankful, that he received of him two thirds of his kingdom; that is, this prince divided it equal with him and Bias. Since that time the kingdom of Argos was possessed by three kings, till the posterity of Melampus and Bias failed; the former in the sixth generation, and the later in the fourth. The posterity of Anaxagoras at last re-united all the three parts of the kingdom, and continued till Cylarabes, who died without children. After which Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, seized on Argos (16). Thus you see there is a great difference in Chronology between Pausanias and Apollodorus.

(15) Servius, in Virgil. Eclog. VI, ver. 48.

(16) Taken from Pausanias, lib. ii, pag. 60.

Some think that the distemper of these women, was nothing else but the Furor Uterinus, which is the opinion of Mr Menjot. (17) Their imagination was so disordered, that they fancied themselves cows.

Prœtides implerunt falsis mugitibus agros:
At non tam turpes pecudum tamen ulla secuta est
Concubitus: quamvis collo timuisset aratrum,
Et sæpe in levi quæfisset cornua fronte (18).

The Prœtides with fancied lowings fill'd
The pastures; yet of them none sought such foul
Embraces: tho' they fear'd the plough, and oft
In their smooth foreheads, dubious, felt for horns.
TRAPP.

(17) Antonius Menjotius, Dissertat. Patholog. Part i, pag. 122.

(18) Virgil. Eclog. VI, ver. 48.

However it be, the antients relate, that religious remedies were used to cure this malady. Pausanias says, that the daughters of Prœtus hid themselves in a cave, and that Melampus drew them out by virtue of some mysterious ceremonies, and expiations, and brought them to a village called Lusi, where he cured them in the temple of Diana. Ἃς ὁ Μελάμπους θυσίαις τε ἀπορρήτοις καὶ καθαρμοῖς καθήγαγεν ἐς χωρίον καλούμενον Λυσούς . . . καὶ ἱκέσατο τῆς μανίας ἐν Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερῷ. Quas Melampus arcanis quibusdam sacris & expiationibus eduxit in vicum quos Lusos nuncupant . . . . & ab insania liberavit in Dianæ templo (19). We shall see hereafter (20) that he made them also take some remedies.

(19) Pausanias, lib. viii, pag. 252, 253.

[D] The conversation he had with the Phœnicians.] I mean with Cadmus, and those who accompanied him into

(20) See the remark [G].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

derſtood the language of birds, and learned of them what was to come to paſs [E]. Some ſay alſo, that the worms which eat wood, anſwered his queſtions (d). And yet, thoſe who built him a temple (e), after his death, and who offered him ſacrifices, and celebrated his feſtival every year, did not attribute to him any kind of divination (f). I could eaſily refute the argument that was made uſe of to prove, that he certainly foretold future things [F]. If the Poets had not made pleaſant digreſſions upon what concerns him, they would only have told us, that he was an able Phyſician [G], and if Statius ſpoke hiſtorically, into Bœotia (21). I ſhall obſerve two faults in Barthius: He ſays, that Plutarch affirms, Melampus taught the Grecians ſeveral things that were borrowed from the Egyptians (22). Plutarch is ſo far from ſaying ſo, that, on the contrary, he blames Herodotus for ſaying this, and taxes him with a wicked prevarication, for endeavouring to rob Greece of part of it's glory (23). You muſt know, that the Grecians did not own, that they were the diſciples of the Phœnicians in matters of religion. Pauſanias had a long conteſt with one of that country about it (24). The ſecond fault of Barthius is, that he ſays Herodotus affirms, that Melampus brought from Egypt the feſtivals and worſhip of Bacchus. De Bacchi ſacris ex Ægypto in Græciam allatis ab Melampode, non tamen perfectis ſcribit etiam libro ſecundo Herodotus (25). Herodotus does not ſay that Melampus made a journey into Egypt, but, on the contrary, ſuppoſes that Cadmus and his companions who came into Bœotia, were thoſe who inſtructed Melampus. It is neceſſary to cenſure ſuch faults in order to ſhow, that it is not ſufficient to have the authors we cite before our eyes; for if we do not examine them very narrowly, even to the leaſt word, we ſhall make them ſay a thouſand things which they never thought of. Take notice, I do not abſolutely deny, that our Diviner travelled into Egypt: I know that the Egyptians affirmed it (26).

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) It was in a city called Ægiſthena in the country of Megara. Pauſan. lib. i, ſub fin.

(f) Καὶ θύουσι τῷ Μελάμποδι καὶ ἀνὰ πᾶν ἔτος ἑορτὴν ἄγουσι. μαντεύεσθαι δὲ ὅτι δὶ ἐνειράτων αὐτὸν, οὔτε ἄλλος λέγουσι. Melampodi ſacrum faciunt & feſtum diem quotannis celebrant: futura vero prædicendi neque è ſomniis neque ex ulla ratione ei ſcientiam tribuunt. Idem, ibid.

(21) Herod. lib. ii, cap. xlix.

(22) Barthius, in Statium, Tom. ii, pag. 834.

(23) Plut. de Malignit. Herodoti, pag. 857.

(24) Pauſan. lib. vii, pag. 230. See, above, citation (87) of the article JUPITER.

(25) Barthius, ubi ſupra.

(26) Diodor. Siculus, lib. i, cap. xcvi, pag. m. 83.

[E] It is pretended, that he underſtood the language of birds, and learned of them what was to come to paſs.] I have already ſpoken of this in other places (27), but I ſhall here ſet down the very words of Apollodorus. Μελάμπους ἐπὶ τῶν χωρίων διαιτᾶτο, ἔσης περὶ τῆς οἰκήσεως δρυὸς, ἐν ᾗ φωλεὸς ὄφεων ὑπῆρχεν, ἀποκτείναντων τῶν θηραπόντων τοὺς ὄφεις, τὰ μὲν ἑρπετὰ, ξύλα συμφορήσας, ἔκαυσε· τοὺς δὲ τῶν ὄφεων νεοσσοὺς ἔθρεψεν. οἱ δὲ, γενόμενοι τέλειοι, περιστάντες αὐτῷ κοιμωμένῳ τῶν ὤμων ἐξ ἑκατέρου, τὰς ἀκοὰς ταῖς γλώσσαις ἐξεκάθαιρον. ὁ δὲ, ἀνασὰς, καὶ γενόμενος περιδεὴς, τῶν ὑπερπετομένων ὀρνέων τὰς φωνὰς συνίει· καὶ παρ' ἐκείνων μαθάνων, πρὸς ἔλεγε τοῖς ἀνθρώποις τὰ μέλλοντα. περιέλαβε δὲ καὶ τὴν ἐπὶ τῶν ἱερείων μαντικήν. περὶ δὲ τὸν Ἀλφεὸν συντυχὼν Ἀπόλλωνι, τὸ λοιπὸν ἄριστος ἦν μάντις. Melampus cum ruri ageret, ac pro ipſius ædibus quercus eſſet, in eaque ſerpentium latebra eſſet, occiſis a miniſtris ſerpentibus, cætera quidem reptilia congeſtis lignis concremavit, at ſerpentium pullos educavit: qui cum ad juſtum corporis modum ſuccreviſſent, ipſum jam dormientem circumſtabant, & ex utroque humero illius aures linguis extergebant. Tandem expergefactus, excitatuſque, ac perterrefactus, ſupervolitantium avium voces intelligebat, & quæ ab iis futura edocebatur, mortalibus prædicebat, per haruſpicinam præterea vaticinari ab iis didicit. Ad hæc Apollini prope Alpheum obviam factus, circa cætera vaticinandi peritiſſimus evaſit (28). - - - - Melampus living in the country, and there being an oak before his houſe, in which ſerpents uſed to lurk, he made a fire of wood, and burned the other reptiles, but his ſervants having killed the old ſerpents, he preſerved, and brought up the young ones; which being grown to their full bigneſs, ſtood round him as he lay aſleep, and from each ſhoulder liked his ears with their tongues. At length waking, and getting up in a fright, he underſtood the voices of birds, and, as they taught him, he foretold to men what was come to paſs. Beſides, he learned of them to propheſy by the art of Divination. And moreover meeting Apollo near Alpheus, he became moſt ſkillful in other methods of prognoſticating. You will find ſeveral collections concerning this faculty of ſerpents in the book which I direct you to (29).

(27) In the remark [C] of the article CASSANDRA, and the remark [B] of the article TIRESIAS.

(28) Apollodor. lib. i, pag. 47.

(29) The Hierozoicon of Bochartus, book i.

[F] I could eaſily refute . . . . the argument that was made uſe of to prove that he foretold future things.] The force of that proof lies in this: The reputation of this Diviner would not have laſted for ſeveral ages, if he had not convinced the world, by inconteſtable proofs that he had the gift of prophecy. 'Permul-'torum exemplorum & noſtra plena eſt reſpublica & 'omnia regna omneſque populi, cunctæque gentes, 'augurum prædictis multa incredibiliter vera eeci-'diſſe: neque enim Polidæ, neque Melampodis, 'neque Mopſi, neque Amphiarai, neque Calchantis, 'neque Heleni tantum nomen fuiſſet, neque tot na-'tiones id ad hoc tempus retinuiſſent Arabum, Phry-'gum, Lycaonum, Cilicum, maximeque Piſidarum, 'niſi vetuſtas ea certa eſſe docuiſſet. Nec vero 'Romulus noſter auſpicato urbem condidiſſet, neque 'Accii Navii nomen memoria floreret tam diu, niſi hi 'omnes multa ad veritatem, & mirabilia dixiſſent (30). '- - - - *Both our own republic, and all kingdoms, and 'nations, and countries are full of inſtances, that many 'more incredible things have happened true according 'to the predictions of Sooth-ſayers: for the fame of 'Polidas, Melampus, Mopſus, Amphiaraus, Calchas, 'and Helenus, would not have been ſo great, nor have 'been preſerved to this time by ſo many nations, as the 'Arabians, Phrygians, Lycaonians, Cilicians, and eſpe-'cially the Piſidians, if antiquity had not averred thoſe 'things for truth. Nor would our Romulus have 'luckily founded the city, nor the memory of Accius Na-'vius remain ſo long, if all theſe had not told many 'wonderful things according to truth.' This reaſon is like the objection which Cicero recites in favour of the oracle of Delphos. You may read it in the Miſcellaneous Thoughts on Comets (31), with ſome reflexions which refute it. Thither therefore I muſt refer you for an anſwer to the paſſage in the ſecond book de Legibus. There is in Cicero a maxim, which might be brought to aſſiſt this paſſage; he ſays, that time deſtroys fictions, but confirms the judgments that are founded upon nature. Opinionum commenta delet dies, naturæ judicia confirmat (32). From whence it may be inferred, that the oracles, having continued many ages, were not a fiction. But let us refute Cicero by Cicero himſelf. He acknowledges in his ſecond book de Legibus, that the art of the Augurs did not then continue. 'Dubium non eſt, quin hæc 'diſciplina & ars augurum evanuerit jam & vetuſtate, '& negligentia. Itaque neque illi aſſentior, qui hanc 'ſcientiam negat unquam in noſtro collegio fuiſſe, ne-'que illi qui eſſe etiam nunc putat (33). - - - - Un-'doubtedly this ſcience and art of Divination is vaniſhed 'thro' length of time and negligence. Therefore I nei-'ther agree with thoſe that deny this ſcience ever to 'have been in our college, nor with thoſe that think it 'ſtill ſubſiſts.' It had therefore the fate of the opinions which human wit brings forth, ſince time, inſtead of confirming it, deſtroyed it.

(30) Cicero, lib. ii. de Legibus, fol. 334. D.

(31) Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 45.

(32) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, See, above, citation (71) of the article LAUNOI (JOHN DE).

(33) Idem, lib. ii, de Legibus, cap. xiii.

[G] He was an able Phyſician.] Apollodorus makes him the inventer of purgatives, and ſays, he uſed them in curing the daughters of Prœtus (34). Μελάμπους . . . . . μάντις ὢν τὴν διὰ φαρμάκων καὶ καθαρμῶν θεραπείαν πρῶτος εὑρηκώς (35) . . . . . Ταῖς δὲ λοιπαῖς τυχούσαις καθαρμῷ σωφρονῆσαι συνέζη. Melampus . . . . vaticinandi cognitione inſignis & qui potionandi expurgandique rationem primus invenit . . . . reliquæ vero repurgatæ reſipuerunt. - - - - Melampus . . . . famous for his ſkill in divining, and who firſt invented the method of purging, and giving potions . . . . but the reſt being thoroughly purged, came to their ſenſes. Servius obſerves, that he was ſir-named Καθαρτὴς, that is, The Purger (36). But let us not build upon this, ſince the ſame Grammarian intimates, that the purifications invented by Melampus,

(34) Apol. lib. ii, pag. 85.

(35) Id. ib. pag. 85.

(36) Servius, in Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 550.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cally, we ought to believe that Melampus arrived to a great age [H]. He left ſome children behind him (g). Heſiod commended him in a book that is loſt (b).

(b) Pauſan. lib. ix, pag. 306.

and uſed for the daughters of Prœtus belonged to religion. Prœtidas ipſe purgavit luſtrationibus quas invenerat, hoc dicit, convaleſcente morbo, nec medicinam prodeſſe nec religionem (37). That is, by theſe words

(37) Id. ib.

Ceſſere magiſtri
Phillyrides Chiron, Amythaoniuſque Melampus (38),

(38) Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 549.

We muſt underſtand, that diſeaſes in a certain ſtate are above the power of Phyſic and Religion. Chiron is therefore repreſented there as a Phyſician, while Melampus is repreſented as the diſpenſer of ſupernatural remedies. But I will rather keep to Servius upon the eclogues of Virgil, where we find Melampus repreſented as a mixed perſon, partly as a Phyſician, and partly as a Prophet. He firſt appeaſed Juno, and then made his patients take a certain medicine. 'Quas (Prœtidas) Melampus . . . . placata Junone, 'infecto fonte ubi ſolitæ erant bibere, purgavit & in 'priſtinum ſenſum reduxit (39). - - - - Whom (the 'daughters of Prœtus) Melampus . . . . having firſt ap-'peaſed Juno, purged, by putting phyſic in the fountain 'where they uſed to drink, and ſo brought them to their 'ſenſes.' Note, that καθαρμὸς ſignifies not only a purgative medicine, but alſo that which we call an exorciſm, or rather a magical form of words.

(39) Servius, in Virgil. Eclog. VI, ver. 48.

There is a kind of hellebore, which upon his account is called melampodium (40): which is a ſign that he made uſe of it, and one may very well believe that he did not omit it in the grand cure, which was to purchaſe him a kingdom. Yet Pliny intimates nothing of this; he ſpeaks of Melampus only as a prophet; he does not attribute to him the cure of the daughters of Prœtus, but ſays, it was aſcribed to a ſhepherd. 'Melampodis fama divinationis artibus 'nota eſt. Ab hoc appellatur unum ellebori genus 'Melampodion. Aliqui paſtorem eodem nomine in-'veniſſe tradunt, capras purgari paſto illo animad-'vertentem, datoque lacte earum fanaſſe Prœtidas 'furentes (41). - - - - The fame of Melampus is well 'known by his ſkill in Divination. From him one kind 'of hellebore is called Melampodion. Some relate, that 'a ſhepherd of the ſame name invented it, having ob-'ſerved his goats to purge by eating of it, and that, by 'giving their milk to the daughters of Prœtus, he cured 'them of their madneſs.' If Voſſius (42) built upon this paſſage, when he ſays, that our Melampus cured the fury of the daughters of Prœtus, by mixing black hellebore with goats milk, he has not faithfully related it, and he ſhould produce ſome authorities for what he ſays. He is in the right to cenſure Peter Caſtellan and John Neander, for making Melampus poſterior to Empedocles. In this they were guilty of a miſtake; for Melampus lived before the Trojan war. As to the writings we have under his name, they are ſuppoſititious. We have Melampi ex Palpitationibus Divinatio, printed in Greek at Rome in 1545. Ex Nævis Corporis Divinatio, printed at Rome in Greek the ſame year, and in Latin at Venice in 1552. (Nicolas Petreius is the author of that verſion) and in Latin and Greek, with the Metopoſcopia of of Cardan at Paris, in 1658. See Lindenius Renovatus, at p. 804. The abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque informs me, that 'Melampus hierogrammateus 'ſcripſit de auguriis ex ſaltibus corporis, quæ Augu-'ſtinus Niphus in librum primum de auguriis tran-'ſtulit. - - - Melampus, an excellent author, wrote on 'Divination from the palpitations of the body, which 'Auguſtinus Niphus tranſcribed in his firſt book de 'Auguriis.'

(40) Plin. lib. xxv, cap. v, pag. m. 380.

(41) Id. ib.

(42) Voſſius, de Philoſophia, cap. xi, num. 17, pag. m. 84.

[H] We ought to believe that Melampus arrived to a great age.] Statius ſuppoſes, that Amphiaraus was aſſociated with Melampus for conſulting the auguries concerning the war of Thebes:

- - - - ſolers tibi cura futuri
Amphiaraë, datur, juxtaque Amythaone cretus
Jam ſenior ſed mente virens Phœboque Melampus
Aſſociat paſſus: dubium cui dexter Apollo
Oraque Cyrrhæa fatiarit largius unda (43).

(43) Statius, Thebaid. lib. iii, ver. 451.

- - - - - - *This was thy ſcene
Amphiaräus, with old Melampus join'd
Amythaon's ſon, who flouriſh'd ſtill in mind,
And Phœb's great preſence; 'twas a doubt, it ſeems,
Who beſt below'd, drunk moſt of Cyrrha's ſtreams.*

STEPHENS.

Melampus was the great grandfather of Amphiaraus; the latter had then ſeveral children, and one among the reſt, who was Generaliſſimo of the Argivi ten years after; from whence we may conclude, that Melampus muſt have been very old. But the Poets make no ſcruple of anachroniſms. Statius ſuppoſes in another place, that Thiodamas, the ſon of Melampus, was choſen to ſucceed Amphiaraus in overſeeing the auguries. He repreſents him as the ſecond in that art, but yet of ſo great modeſty, as obliged him to own himſelf unworthy of the ſucceſſion, juſt as the ſon of a great king is afraid in his infancy, that he cannot ſupply the place of his deceaſed father.

Concilium rex triſte vocat: quæruntque gementes,
Quis tripodas ſucceſſor agat? quo prodita laurus
Tranſeat? atque orbum vittæ decus. haud mora, cunctis
Inſignem fama, ſanctoque Melampode cretum
Thiodamanta volunt. qui cum ipſa arcana deorum
Partiri, & viſas uni ſociare ſolebat
Amphiaraus aves, tantæque haud invidus artis
Gaudebat dici ſimilem, juxtaque ſecundum.
Illum ingens confundit honos, inopinaque turbat
Gloria, & oblatas frondes ſubmiſſus adorat,
Seque oneri negat eſſe parem, cogique meretur.
Sicut Achæmenius ſolium, genteſque paternas
Excepit ſi forte puer, cui vivere patrem
Tutius, &c (44).

(44) Id. ib. lib. viii, ver. 275.

Would he have made ſuch compariſons if he had known that Thiodamas was brother to the grandfather of Amphiarus? Add to this, that Statius is the only perſon, if I be not miſtaken, who gives ſuch a ſon to Melampus. The two which Homer gave him, were called Antiphates and Mantius (45). To mention this by the by, the father of Amphiaraus was the ſon of the later, if we may believe Pauſanias (46). But the common opinion is, that Antiphates was the father of Oicles.

(45) Homerus, Odyſſ. lib. xv, pag. m. 462.

(46) Pauſan. lib. vi, pag. 195.

MELANCHTHON (PHILIP) born at Bretten in the Palatinate of the Rhine, Febr. 16, 1497, was one of the wiſeſt and greateſt men of his age. He gave ſo early marks of his capacity, that they begun betimes to inſtruct him; which was done by the care of his grandfather by the mother's ſide, more than by his father's [A]. He ſtudied firſt

(1) This word ſignifies black earth, and therefore Reuchlin gave our Philip the name of Melanchthon, which in Greek ſignifies the ſame thing as Schwartzerdt does in the German language.

[A] They begun betimes to inſtruct him, which was done by the care of his grand-father by the mother's ſide, more than by his father's.] As I do not pretend to commend one of them to the prejudice of the other; I will ſhew, why George Schwartzerdt (1), the father of our Philip, did not take care of the education of his ſon. He was taken up with the affairs of the elector Palatine, his maſter, whom he ſerved as engineer, or commiſſary of the artillery. 'Huic (avo materno) pa-'tre occupato negotiis principum, præcipue educatio '& inſtitutio Philippi curæ fuit (2). - - - - The inſtru-'ction and education of Philip, was chiefly committed to 'the care of the grand-father by the mother's ſide, the fa-'ther being employed in the affairs of princes.' Camerarius is my authority for the words I have uſed, for thus he ſays: 'Orto pernicioſo bello inter Palatinos & 'Bavaros cognatos Principes cum Georgius patriæ ſuæ 'Principi Philippo operam officiumque quod debebat, 'fideliter præſtaret, inprimis machinarum tormento-'rumque ratione adminiſtranda (3). - - - - A bloody war 'broke

(2) Melch. Adam. in Vit. Philoſoph. pag. 184.

(3) Joach. Camerarius, in Vita Philip. Melancht. pag. m. 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

first in the place of his nativity, at a public school, and then under a tutor, when it was known that the master of that school had the Pox (a). He was some time after sent to Pfortsheim, where there was a famous college, and lodged with a relation of his, who was sister to Reuchlin. Upon this occasion it was that he was quickly known to this learned person, who loved him with great tenderness (b). Having lived there about two years, he was sent to Heidelberg (c) in the year 1509 (d), and there made such considerable improvement (e), that he was intrusted to teach the sons of a certain count (f), though he was under fourteen years of age. He has been justly reckoned among illustrious youths [B]. Being vexed that he was refused his degree of master of Philosophy, on account of his youth,

(a) Joach. Camerarius, in Vita Melanchthonis, pag. m. 5.

(b) Id. ib. pag. 7, & seq.

(c) Id. ib. pag. 10.

(d) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. German. pag. 328.

(e) Id. ib. pag. 329.

(f) It was the count of Leonstein.

'broke out between the Palatine and Bavarian princes, who were related to one another, whilst George was faithfully employed, especially as Engineer, in the service of his own prince.' I think this Engineer was at first only a Gunsmith, who growing very skillful in his art, came to be known and beloved by princes. He invented the most useful arms, as well offensive as defensive, both for tournaments and battles. It is pretended that Maximilian the emperor made good use of those inventions in a duel. This singular matter of fact I shall here relate, to excite my readers to search curiously into the circumstances of it. Read therefore carefully this encomium on the father of Melanchthon: 'Ipse Georgius & probitate, integritate, taciturnitate-'que & fide, etiam prudentiâ atque solertiâ, & quod 'admirabili artificio opera armorum elaborare sciret, 'quibus & defenderentur contra vim adversariorum in 'conflictu, & instruerentur ad hos percellendum ster-'nendumque qui manum sive in acie cum hostibus, 'seu in ludis equestribus, cum suis (quæ exercitationes 'tum in aulis Principum studiosissime frequentabantur) 'conferere vellent: Harum igitur artium ille peritus, '& iis virtutibus quas commemoravimus ornatus, in 'notitiam pervenit maximorum & potentissimorum 'Principum, iisque carus fuit, in quibus nominasse 'satis sit & Regem optimum & bellatorem Invictissi-'mum Divum Maximilianum Imperatoris Friderici 'filium. Quem Georgius aliquando cum glorioso pro-'vocatore Italo, cui nomen Claudio Bataro, certami-'ne singulari congressurum ita instruxit, & sic arma 'ipsius machinando paravit, ut fortissimo Viro Maxi-'miliano victoria certa facile etiam & celeriter con-'tingeret. Claudius enim non diu repugnans, cum 'quanto omnibus rebus esset inferior sentiens, ad pe-'des Maximiliani se adjecisset, ita in potestatem ejus 'se tradidit (4). ------ George himself was a man of probity, integrity, secrecy, and fidelity; he was likewise prudent and industrious, and very ingenious in making arms both offensive and defensive, either for battles or tournaments, which kind of exercise was then very common in the courts of princes. Upon the account of those good qualities I have mentioned, and of his skill in these arts, he came to be known and beloved by the greatest and most powerful princes, particularly that excellent king, and invincible warriour, Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederic. Maximilian, being to fight a duel with one Claudius Batarus, an Italian bully, who sent him a challenge, George equipped and fitted him with arms so ingeniously contrived, that he quickly and easily obtained the victory. For Claudius, not being able to resist long, and finding himself inferior in every respect, threw himself down at Maximilian's feet, and surrendered.' He was born at Heidelberg, but he settled at Bretten by marrying the daughter of John Reuterus, who had been mayor of that town some years (5). He died eleven days after his father-in-law, the twenty ninth of September 1508. His widow did not marry again till after she knew that Melanchthon, her son, was married. She was displeased with it, and this discontent obliged her to marry a citizen of Bretten, about the year 1520 (6). She died the sixth of June 1529 (7). Her son George, younger, about four years, than Melanchthon (8), survived his brother (9), and was employed in the highest offices of his country (10).

(4) Id. ib. pag. 2, 3.

(5) Id. ib.

(6) Mater vidua manfit annis totis 12. postea cum Philippum duxisse uxorem audiisset, non sine quadam offensiuncula, nupsit iterum viro honestissimo civi Brettano. - - - - His mother remained a widow twelve whole years, &c. Id. ib. pag. 5.

(7) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 328.

(8) Camerarius, ubi supra, pag. 4.

(9) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philos. pag. 184.

(10) Camer. ib. pag. 8.

That this remark may be not only historical, but also critical. I will add, that the Jesuit Maimbourg is to be blamed for saying, that Melanchthon was of a little village in the lower Palatinate, and of a mean extraction (11). This is refuted by what I have already said. See also Mr Seckendorf in the second book of the History of Lutheranism, pag. 158.

(11) Maimb. Hist. of Lutheran. book ii, pag. 181. Dutch Edition.

[B] He has been justly reckoned among illustrious youths.] The chapter which Mr Baillet has bestowed upon him in his Historical Treatise of young men, who became famous by their studies or writings, was due to him, and is very curious. There we see, that at the age of thirteen years he dedicated to Reuchlin a Comedy which he wrote without any assistance. This young scholar being at Pfortsheim, made his school-fellows learn the several parts of a kind of comedy, which Reuchlin had lately published. His design was to act that piece in the presence of the author, and this was performed very prettily: Tunc & æqualibus suis scriptum quoddam ludicrum Reuchlini instar Comœdiæ illis diebus editum edifcendum distribuit, & suas cuique partes assignavit, ut coram Reuchlino ad se reverso fabula ea ageretur. Quod etiam factum est cum summa ipsius voluptate atque lætitiâ (12). He might then be in his thirteenth year, or he might be younger, for he stayed two years at Pfortsheim, and went from thence to Heidelberg, where he was matriculated, October 13, 1509 (13). Mr Baillet adds, that he was employed to make the greatest part of the harangues and discourses of eloquence, that were spoken in public in the university of Heidelberg. This agrees with the words of Melchior Adam: 'Scripsit jam adolescentulus professori-'bus in eâ scholâ orationes, quæ publice recitatæ sunt '(14). - - - - He wrote, whilst he was but a lad, orations for the professors in that college, which were spoken in public.' Here follows a passage which is not exactly true. 'At the age of thirteen he wrote a co-'medy to the honour of Reuchlin. He was but 'nineteen years when he published his Rhetoric: 'the next year he put out his Logic, and in his 'twenty fourth his Grammar. Immediately after 'he wrote many pieces of Theology, and at twenty 'six years of age he published his Common-places, 'which were equally esteemed by * Protestants and 'Catholics: for being published under the name of 'Mester Philippo di terra nera, and carried to Rome, 'all the copies were presently sold (15).' You have already seen what I have to say about this comedy to the honour of Reuchlin; which I will not repeat. I only say, that Mr Teissier did not rightly attend to these Latin words. 'Anno decimonono evulgavit Rhetori-'cam; sequenti Dialecticam: vicesimo quarto Gram-'maticam, aliis deinde annis alia (16). - - - - - In the 'year nineteen he published his Rhetoric, the next year 'his Logic, the twenty fourth his Grammar, and in the 'following years other things.' They refer to the years of the century, and not of Melanchthon; and therefore Mr Teissier should have said that he was twenty two years old when he published his Rhetoric, &c. He ought not to have asserted, that he wrote several pieces of Theology, only after the publishing of his Grammar; for he put out several treatises of that nature in the year 1521 (17), three years before his Grammar was printed. In fine, it is false that he published his Common-places at the age of twenty six, for he published them in the year 1521 (18), when he was but twenty four years old.

(12) Camerar. ibid. pag. 9.

(13) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philosoph. pag. 185.

(14) Id. ib. pag. 186.

* Scaligerana.

(15) Teissier, addit. to the Eloges. Tom. i, pag. 188.

(16) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. pag. 331.

(17) Id. ib.

(18) Id. ib. pag. 332.

Note, that all the pieces which Melchior Adam has just named, are posterior to his being professor at Wittemberg. But we must remember what he says elsewhere, that Melanchthon published some books whilst he was professor at Tubingen. 'Privatim ac 'publice cum magna laude & admiratione docuit (Tu-'bingæ) & scripta quædam ceu primos fœtus ex qui-'bus satis apparuit qui proventus in posterum expectan-'di forent, in lucem edidit (19). - - - - He taught '(at Tubingen) both in public and private with great 'applause and admiration, and published some works as 'first fruits, from which it sufficiently appeared what a 'a crop might be expected afterwards.' There is reason therefore to believe, that he was an author in print before the age of twenty or twenty one, and so he deserved very well to be placed in the catalogue of Mr Baillet. I have read in the parallel which John James Grynæus made between the (19) Id. in Vitis Philosoph. pag. 186.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google youth, and finding that the air of Heidelberg did not agree with his conſtitution, he left that univerſity in 1512, and went to ſee that of Tubingen (g) where he ſtaid ſix years (b). There he heard the lectures of all ſorts of profeſſors, and publickly explained Virgil, Terence, Cicero, and Livy; and being very laborious, he found time alſo to ſerve Reuchlin in his quarrels with the Monks, and to overſee a Printing-houſe (i) [C]. He moreover applied himſelf very much to the reading of the word of GOD [D]. He accepted in 1518, the profeſſorſhip in the Greek tongue, in the univerſity of Wittemberg, which Frederic the elector of Saxony offered him upon the recommendation of Reuchlin (k). He made ſo fine an inauguration ſpeech four days after his arrival, that he not only removed the contempt to which his ſtature and mien expoſed him, but alſo raiſed great admiration of himſelf (l). The lectures he read upon Homer, and upon the Greek text of the epiſtle of St Paul to Titus, drew a great croud of auditors, and excited in them an earneſt deſire of underſtanding the Greek tongue (m). One of the greateſt ſervices he did to the ſciences, was to reduce them into a ſyſtem (n), which was then difficult, conſidering the confuſion wherewith they had been taught for a long time. There was quickly an intimate friendſhip contracted between him and Luther (o), who taught Divinity in the ſame univerſity. They went together to Leipſic in the year 1519, to diſpute with Eccius. The following years were to Melanchthon a complication of hard labours; he wrote many books, he travelled in order to found colleges, and viſit churches (p). But nothing coſt him more pains than the taſk that was given him in the year 1530, to draw up a Confeſſion of Faith; which is called the Augſburg Confeſſion, becauſe it was preſented to the emperor at the diet in that city. All Europe was convinced, that he was not ſo averſe as Luther, to an accommodation, and that he would have ſacrificed many things for the ſake of peace [E]. Wherefore Francis I. judged him a proper perſon to pacify the diſputes

(g) Ib. pag. 329.

(b) Id. in Vitis Philoſoph. pag. 186.

(i) Id. ib. & in Vit. Theol. pag. 330.

(k) Camerar. ubi ſupra, pag. 24.

(l) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theologorum, 330.

(m) Id. ib.

(n) Id. ib. pag. 331.

(o) Camerar. ibid. pag. 30, 31.

(p) In 1527.

prophet Daniel and Melanchthon, a fine encomium upon the latter it deſerves to be tranſcribed. 'At Deum 'immortalem, quam non ſpem de ſe præbet, admo- 'dum etiam adoleſcens & pene puer, Philippus ille 'Melanchthon, utraque literatura pene ex æquo ſuſ- 'piciendus! Quod inventionis acumen? quæ ſermonis 'puritas? quanta reconditarum rerum memoria? quam 'varia lectio? quam verecunda regiæque prorſus indo- 'lis feſtivitas (20). - - - But, good GOD, what hopes 'may we not conceive of Philip Melanchthon, tho' as 'yet very young, and almoſt a boy, equally to be admired 'for his knowledge in both languages, what quickneſs of 'invention? What purity of diction? What vaſtneſs of 'memory? What variety of reading? What modeſty and 'graceſulneſs of behaviour?' This is what Eraſmus ſaid in the year 1515.

(20) Eraſmus, Paraphraſ. in 1 Theſſ. cap. ii, apud Jo. Jac. Grynæum Epiſt. ſelect. pag. 302.

[C] And to overſee a Printing-houſe.] This remark is, properly ſpeaking, an appendix to the preceding, for it relates to Melanchthon, as he wrote books in his youth: for to put in good order a confuſed heap of collections, is, in effect, to make a book. So Mr Baillet thought; for having obſerved that Melanchthon 'made it his recreation to correct the printing-preſs 'of the place, he adds, that to ſuch a paſtime we owe, 'among other books, the edition of Nauclerus at Tu- 'bingen. It was a ſilly heap of chronicles and fables 'bundled together among hiſtories in a ſtrange confu- 'ſion. Melanchthon took the pains to purge it, and 'to ſelect out of it what was tolerable and put it in 'order? ſo that one may ſay, this book is the work 'of Melanchthon (21).' Camerarius obſerves, I. That the labour of Melanchthon upon Nauclerus, conſiſted, not only in putting things in order, and new moulding them, but alſo in enlarging them. II. That the corrector of this book took upon him to reviſe all the books which Thomas Anſhelmus ſhould print. Librum hunc (Naucleri) exprimendum ſuſceperat Thomas Anſhelmus qui Typographicam officinam habebat Tubingæ. A quo perfectum fuit, ut & illius ſcripti & aliorum, quæ à ſe ederentur, curam reſpectumque Philippus ſuſciperet, quo prodirent correctiora. Is tunc & in hoc opere Naucleri partim diſponendo, partim augendo, partim etiam retexendo id præſtitit, ut lectio libri iſtius à plurimis expeteretur, & fructu voluptateque non careret (22). Note, that this edition of Nauclerus was the firſt of all.

(21) Baillet's Enfans celebres, Art 21.

(22) Camer. ubi ſupra, pag. 16. Sæ alſo Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſoph. pag. 186, 187.

[D] He applied himſelf much to the reading of the word of GOD.] He had a copy of the Bible, which John Frobenius had lately printed at Baſil in a ſmall volume, which he carried always about him, and chiefly when he went to church. Thoſe who ſaw that during divine ſervice, he held always in his hands a book much larger than a prayer-book, believed that he was reading quite another thing than what the time and place required of him. Thoſe that envyed him took occaſion from hence to make him odious. This is what we learn from Camerarius (23). Another author obſerves, that Reuchlin made him a preſent of that Bible (24).

(23) Camer. ubi ſupra, pag. 15.

(24) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſoph. pag. 185.

[E] Would have ſacrificed many things for the ſake of peace.] This appears chiefly by the book he wrote concerning things indifferent; which was ſo ill received by the faction of Illyricus. 'Suaſerat Philippus de 'Adiophoris ne ſcrupuloſe contenderent, modo nihil 'idololatriæ illi ritus ac ceremoniæ haberent adjunctum, '& ſervitutem aliquam, quæ ſine impietate ſit, ſuſti- 'nendam (25). - - - - Philip adviſed them not to con- 'tend ſcrupulouſly about indifferent things, provided thoſe 'rites and ceremonies had nothing of idolatry in them, 'and to bear ſome hardſhips, if it might be done with- 'out impiety.' Illyricus, on the contrary, cryed out, that people ſhould rather deſert all the churches, and threaten an inſurrection, than to bear a ſurplice. Contra Flacius vociferabatur potius vaſtitatem faciendam in templis, & principes metu ſeditionum terrendos quam ſal- tem linea veſtis admittatur (26). Some Roman Catholics have been inſpired with the ſame ſpirit, if we may believe the anonymous author of a letter publiſhed by Mr Jurieu. 'I enquired, ſays he (27), as 'much as poſſibly I could, whether a Proteſtant would 'be received into the Romiſh communion, upon the 'biſhop of Meaux's explication of the Romiſh do- 'ctrine, as it was made uſe of to inſtruct thoſe who 'ſeek to comply with the times. Every one told me 'no, and ſome body added that no abjuration 'was to be ſigned, but that in which the whole 'ſarago ſhould be included. Theſe are the very 'words he made uſe of. This calls to my mind what 'a Jeſuit ſaid, that they would not put out one 'wax taper, though it were to convert all the Hugue- 'nots.'

(25) Id. ib. pag. 195.

(26) Id. ib. pag. 196.

(27) Suite du Preſervatif contre le changement de Religion, pag. 173. of the Hague Edit. 1683.

What Melanchthon ſaid to his mother, plainly ſhews, that he hated diſputes in religion, and that he was only engaged in them by the part he was to act in the world. Being gone to the conferences at Spire in the year 1529, he made a little journey to Bretten, to ſee his mother. This good woman aſked him what ſhe muſt believe amidſt ſo many diſputes, and repeated to him the prayers ſhe was wont to make, and which contained nothing that was ſuperſtitious. Continue, ſaid he, to believe and pray as you have done hitherto, and never trouble your ſelf about controverſies. Ab ea cum interrogatus eſſet: quid ſibi in ejuſmodi controverſiis credendum? reſpondit, auditis illius precibus, quæ nihil ſuperſtitionis habebant, ut pergeret hoc credere & orare quod credidiſſet & oraſſet hactenus: nec pateretur ſe turbari conflictibus diſputationum (28). This refutes invincibly a ſilly ſtory which Florimond de Remond publiſhed. It is written, ſays he (29), that Melanchthon being at the point of death in the year 1560, his mother, being extremely old, ſpoke to him after this manner: 'My

(28) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 333

(29) Florimond de Remond, Hiſtory of the Birth and Progreſs of Hereſy, book ii, ch. ix, pag. m. 186, 187.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

putes about religion in his kingdom, and desired him to come thither [F]. The king of England also desired to see him (q), but neither of these two monarchs did ever see him. As I intend to mention, but some of his principal actions, I shall only say, that, in 1541, he assisted at the conferences of Ratisbon, where the controversies between the Catholics and Protestants were warmly disputed, and that, in the year 1543, he went to the archbishop of Cologne, to assist him in introducing a reformation into his diocese, which turned to no account. The affair of the Interim took up much of his time. He attended at seven conferences upon this subject in the year 1548, and wrote all the pieces that were presented there, and the censure of that Interim (r). He was one of the deputies whom Maurice, elector of Saxony, was to send to the council of Trent in the year 1552. He waited some time at Nuremberg for a safe conduct, but because of the war which was ready to break out, he returned from thence to Wittemberg (s). His last conference with the Doctors of the Romish communion was at Worms, in 1557; and of the dissensions which afflicted him, there was none more violent than that which was raised by Flacius Illyricus. He died at Wittemberg April the nineteenth, 1560, which was the sixty third day of his sixty fourth year (t). He was buried near Luther in the church of the castle, two days after. His funeral oration was spoken by Winshemius, a Doctor of Physic, and professor of the Greek tongue. The testimonies of piety with which he ended his days, were admirable (u); and it is observable, that one thing which made him

(q) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 336.

(r) Id. ib. pag. 343.

(s) Id. ib. pag. 343, 346.

(t) Ætatis fuæ climactericum diebus LXIII egressus. Thuan. lib. xxvi, sub fin. pag. m. 538. Du Rier, in Teissier's Elogies, Tom. i, pag. 183, translates it ill by he died the sixty third day of his climacterical year.

(u) See Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philos. pag. 202.

* See Morus, lib. ii, de Miss. & Francis Montagnes, in his book intituled, la Verité defendue.

'* My son, you seem to me to be upon the point of '.... leaving this world, to go and give an account 'to the great judge of what you have done. You know 'I was a Catholic, and you induced me to change my 'religion, and to embrace one that is different from that 'of my fore-fathers. I adjure you by the living GOD, 'to tell me now which is the best, and do not conceal 'it from me. Ha! said Melanchthon, the new doctrine 'is more plausible, but the old is more safe and certain: 'And turning himself about, he said aloud, Hæc plausibilior, illa securior, this is the more plausible, that 'the more safe.' It is false, that Melanchthon induced his mother to change her religion, and it is certain she died above thirty years before her son.

[F] Francis I, thought him a proper person ..... and desired him to come into France.] Let us here recite the paraphrase which Maimbourg has made upon the narrative of Florimond de Remond. *The queen of Navarre, who knew that the king her brother passionately desired the peace of the church, hoped she might be able to gain him by that means: For that end, she often talked to him of a very good man, as she said, who was called Philip Melanchthon, whom she was continually praising as the most learned man of his time, who does not indeed approve, added she very dextrously, certain abuses which are manifestly to be seen in the doctrine, manners, and discipline of the Christians of these latter ages; but then he detests the schism which has been made upon this occasion in Germany, and which he has always endeavoured to extinguish by all sorts of means. She assured him that he was a peaceable man, of a mild temper, who had nothing of that fierce and violent spirit of Luther and Zuinglius, one who had always endeavoured to reconcile them among themselves, and with the Catholics, that he might re-unite all mens minds in one and the same belief, and restore to the church peace and union, which he continually wished for; that she did not doubt but if so holy and able a man could confer with the Doctors of the Sorbonne, who desired also nothing but peace, they would quickly find the means of procuring it to the church, and of destroying a schism, which might easily spread from Germany into France, and produce there the same troubles and disorders, which were to be seen in the empire. In fine, she told him so many things to Melanchthon's advantage, and gave him so great hopes of being able to put an end, by his means, to the differences which begun to arise in France, as well as in Germany, about several articles of religion, that he was persuaded to it. Whereupon this prince, who otherwise had a great desire to bring into France the ablest men of his time, wrote to Melanchthon ‡, and invited him to come to Paris, to join his endeavours with our divines to restore the ancient discipline of the church (30). He relates afterwards how the cardinal of Tournon warded off the blow, and persuaded the king to revoke immediately the leave he had granted to Philip Melanchthon (31). In fine, he affirms, that this change at first astonished the Heretics; but that as soon as they had recovered themselves from this surprize ... they had the confidence to post up placards full of blasphemies at the gates of the Louvre, and even at the king's chamber-door. You see then the order in which this Jesuit placed these particulars. 1. The queen of Navarre persuaded the king to send for Melanchthon. 2. The king wrote to this Doctor. 3. The cardinal of Tournon changed this design of the king. 4. The innovators set up placards. 5. These four things happened in the year 1534. Florimond de Remond places them in the same order. Now I will shew they are mistaken, and I am much surprized that Beza should commit the same error; he says also (32), that the business of the placards was posterior to the resolution which Francis I. had taken to send for Melanchthon. Note, that he observes that those placards were fixed up in the month of November 1534.

Here follows a better Chronology of all these matters. The placards were posted up at the time observed by Theodore Beza. Francis I. assisted at a famous procession January 21, 1535, and caused some Heretics to be burnt. Melanchthon was exhorted to endeavour to mitigate the king's anger: He wrote a letter to John Sturmius, who was then in France, and another to John du Bellai, bishop of Paris (33). A gentleman (34) whom Francis I. had sent into Germany spoke to Philip Melanchthon of the journey to France, and assured him, that the king should write to him about it himself, and would furnish him with all necessary safe conducts (35). When he returned into France, he assured the king, that Melanchthon would undertake the journey, if the king would do him the honour to write to him about this matter (36). The prince dispatched immediately the gentleman to carry to Melanchthon the letter he wrote to him. It is dated at Guise the twenty-eighth of June 1535 (37), and declares the pleasure the king had when he understood by the gentleman, and by the letter which William du Bellai had received from Melanchthon, that this Doctor was disposed to come into France, to endeavour to pacify the controversies. Melanchthon wrote to the king the twenty-eighth of September the same year (38). He assured him of his good intentions, and that he was sorry he could not as yet surmount the obstacles to his journey. The gentleman who carried this letter to the king, found him very busy about his preparations for the war in Italy (39), and besides Melanchthon could never obtain leave from the duke of Saxony to go to the court of Francis I (40), although Luther had earnestly exhorted that elector to consent to this journey, by representing to him, that the hopes of seeing Melanchthon had put a stop to the persecution of the Protestants in France, and that there was reason to fear, they would renew the same cruelty when they should know that he would not come (41). The elector had very good reasons not to suffer this journey (42), for he was afraid to expose himself to the resentment of Charles V, and he saw no probability that Melanchthon could do any thing for the interest of religion. He wrote to Francis I, an excuse that he could not suffer Melanchthon to go into France (43). His letter is dated the twenty-eighth of August 1535. Note, that, in the month of December the same year, Langei solicited

(32) Bera, Hist. Ecclesiast. lect. i, pag. 15, 16.

(33) Camerar. ubi supra, pag. 144.

(34) Called Barnabas Voré, Sieur de la Fosse.

(35) Camerar. ib. pag. 146.

(36) Id. ib. pag. 151.

(37) It is the twenty ninth of the first book among the letters of Melanchthon.

(38) This letter is the thirtieth of the first book of those of Melanchthon.

(39) Camerar. ibid. pag. 153.

(40) Id. ib. pag. 151.

(41) Luther, Tom. vii, fol. 491, apud Seckendorf. Hist. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 107.

(42) See Seckendorf, ibid. pag. 109.

(43) Seckendorf, ubi supra. pag. 110.

‡ Epist. Francisc. Reg. ad Phil. Melanc. apud Flor. Ræm. lib. viii, cap. iv.

(30) Maimb. Hist. of Calvinism, book i, pag. 25, at the year 1534.

(31) Id. ib. pag. 29.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him look upon death as a happineſs, was, that it delivered him from Theological perſecutions [G]. He had married the daughter of a burgomaſter of Wittemberg, in the year 1520, who died in the year 1557 (x). He had two ſons and two daughters by her [H]. As the deſcription of his moral accompliſhments, may be found in a book more eaſie to be conſulted than this Dictionary (y), I ſhall ſay nothing of them. But I will obſerve, that he was credulous, as to prodigies, Aſtrology (z), and Dreams (aa); and I will make ſome reflexions upon the inclination to Pyrrhoniſm, (x) Id. ib. pag. 190.

(y) In the additions of Mr Teſſier to the Eloges taken out of Thuanus, Tom. i. pag. 187, Edit. 1696.

(z) See the proofs of it in the Hiſtory of the Variations by the biſhop of Meaux, lib. v, num. 34.

(aa) See Melch. Adam, in ejus Vita paſſim.

licited in Germany, that Melanchthon, or ſome other Divines, ſhould be ſent to the king, his maſter (44). How will you make this agree with the narrative of Maimbourg, or with the account of Mezerai, who affirms (45), that, in 1533, the king wrote to Melanchthon by William du Bellai Langei (46), but that the cardinal of Tournon, and the Divines of Paris, perſuaded him to ſend word, that he did excuſe him from this trouble? I do not meddle with the confuſions of Mr Varillas; they ſhall be ſhewn afterwards (47). Note alſo, that Melanchthon ſent into France, a ſmall piece, which contained his advices about the reconciling of the controverſies. He did not publiſh it, but it is to be found in the collection of Pezelius (48).

(44) Id. ib.

(45) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. vi, pag. m. 407, 408.

(46) It was not he who carried the king's letter.

(47) In the remark [N].

(48) Seckendorf, lib. iii, pag. 208.

I have read in a letter written to Eraſmus by Sir Thomas More (49), that Tyndal had ſent word that Melanchthon was at the court of France, that he ſpoke to him, and that he had ſeen him enter Paris accompanied with 150 Horſe. 'Tyndalus hæreticus noſtras, qui & nuſquam & ubique exulat, ſcripſit huc nuper Melanchthonem eſſe apud Regem Galliæ: ſemet collocutum cum eo, qui illum vidiſſet exceptum Pariſiis, comitatu C L. equorum: addebat ſe timere Tyndalus, ne ſi Gallia per illum reciperet verbum Dei, confirmaretur in fide Euchariſtiæ contra Vicleficam ſectam. - - - - Tindal added he was afraid, if France ſhould receive the word of GOD by him, it would be confirmed in the faith of the Euchariſt contrary to the ſect of the Wickliffites.' Is it poſſible that perſons of merit dare to ſend ſuch lies to their friends?

(49) It is the tenth in the twenty ſeventh book of the letters of Erſmus, pag. 1510.

[G] He ſaid . . . . that death would deliver him from Theological perſecutions.] Some days before he died, he wrote upon a piece of paper in two columns the reaſons why he ought not to be ſorry for leaving this world. One of thoſe columns contained the bleſſings which death would procure him; the other contained the evils from which death would deliver him (50). He put only two articles into the latter; I. That he ſhould ſin no more. II. That he ſhould be no longer expoſed to the vexations and rage of the Divines (51). The other column contained ſix heads: I. That he ſhould come to the light. II. That he ſhould ſee GOD. III. That he ſhould contemplate the Son of GOD. IV. That he ſhould underſtand thoſe admirable myſteries which he could not comprehend in this life. V. Why we are created ſuch as we are. VI. What is the union of the two natures in JESUS CHRIST (52). Note, that the ſtate of man appeared to this great Divine one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries of religion; and yet there is not one among thoſe who believe without examining, who imagines there is any difficulty in it. From hence it came to paſs, that ſome were ſo ſurprized to find by my Dictionary, that the Manichees could raiſe puzzling objections. But let us keep to our text, and add, that nature which gave Melanchthon a peaceable temper, made him a preſent ill ſuited with the time in which he was to live. His moderation ſerved only to be his croſs. He was like a lamb in the midſt of wolves; no body liked his mildneſs, which expoſed him to all ſorts of ſlander, and deprived him of the means of anſwering a fool according to his folly. The only advantage it procured him was to look upon death without fear, by conſidering that it would ſecure him from the Odium Theologicum - - - hatred of Divines, and from the infidos agitans diſcordia fratres (53) - - - diſcord of falſe brethren. I ſhall ſpeak below (54) of the ſlavery wherein he lived. He ſaid in one of his works, that he had held his profeſſor's place forty years, without ever being ſure that he ſhould not be turned out before the end of the week. Publice non dubitavit affirmare †, ego jam ſum hic, Dei beneficio, quadraginta annos: & nunquam potui dicere aut certus eſſe me per unam ſeptimanam manſurum eſſe (55).

(50) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſ. pag. 202.

(51) Diſcedes à peccatis, literaveris ab erroribus & à rabie Theologorum. Id. ib.

(52) Id. ib.

(53) Virgil. Georg. lib. ii, ver. 496.

(54) In the remark [L].

† Tom. i, Enarrat. Evangel. pag. 338.

(55) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 357.

[H] He had two ſons and two daughters.] I find nothing concerning his two ſons; but I know that Anne, his eldeſt daughter, was the wife of George Sabinus, one of the beſt Poets of his time. He married her at Wittemberg, November 16, 1536 (56), when ſhe was but fourteen years old. Her huſband carried her into Pruſſia to the great grief of Melanchthon, in the year 1543 (57). There had been ſeveral quarrels between the father-in-law and the ſon-in-law, becauſe the latter being very ambitious, wanted to raiſe himſelf to civil employments, and did not like the humility of Melanchthon, who confined himſelf to literary employments, and would be at no trouble to advance his children (58). Anne underſtood Latin well, and was very handſome (59). Her father loved her tenderly (60). Judge then of the grief he had when ſhe went ſo far from him in the year 1543 (61), and afterwards when ſhe died at Konigſberg in the year 1547 (62). And infer from all this, that he was neither happy at home nor abroad. 'Narrationem talium ideo nequaquam omittendam duco . . . . ut hujuſmodi quaſi vulneribus inſpectis quam miſera interdum vita ſit magnorum virorum intelligatur, cum ad onera Republicæ pondus etiam domeſtici doloris adjicitur (63). - - - - I think all theſe things ought to be mentioned, and by no means to be omitted . . . that by viewing, as it were, ſuch wounds, we may ſee how miſerable ſometimes the life of great men is: ſince to the burden of the common-wealth the weight of domeſtic trouble is likewiſe added.' His other daughter was married in the year 1550 to Gaſpar Peucer, who was an able Phyſician, and very much perſecuted (64). If you ſhould doubt whether Melanchthon was a good father, I would deſire you to conſider, that a Frenchman found him one day holding a book in one hand, and rocking a child with the other. Melanchthon ſeeing him ſurprized at this, made ſuch a pious diſcourſe to him about the duty of a father, and the ſtate of grace in which children are with GOD, that this ſtranger went away much more learned than when he came in (65).

(56) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſ. pag. 227.

(57) Camerar. ubi ſupra, pag. 206.

(58) Id. ib. pag. 207.

(59) Melch. Adam. ibid.

(60) Camerar. ibid. pag. 208.

(61) See what he wrote to Camerar. apud Melchior Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 358.

(62) Id. lb.

(63) Camerar. ib. pag. 207.

(64) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Medic. pag. 377.

Let us not forget this reflexion. It is a great happineſs to ſtudious men to be free from ambition and avarice. This ſaves them much time, preſerves them from mean ſubmiſſions, and many troubles. But that a man may enjoy the benefit of this good diſpoſition, it is not ſufficient that he himſelf poſſeſs it; his kindred alſo muſt be provided with it; for a wife, a ſon-in-law, a ſon, a near kinſman, who want to get an eſtate, or advance themſelves to honours, will not ſuffer the man of learning to be at reſt; they will have him to ſollicit, to canvaſs, to make his court, and if he does it not they grumble and quarrel. Melanchthon and his ſon-in-law are a proof of this. 'Inter ſocerum ac generum non quidem odium aut ſimultas, ſed alienatio tamen quædam & prope diſſidium ortum fuit . . . . Fons autem erat omnium, quod Sabinus ſocero nimia cupiditate Illuſtris fortunæ videbatur ardere. Ille autem non tantum adjuvari & quaſi promoveri ſe ab ipſo quantum optabat & poſſe arbitrabatur, ægre ferebat (66). - - - - There happened between the father-in-law, and the ſon-in-law, not indeed hatred or enmity, but a kind of averſion, and almoſt an open breach . . . . The foundation of all was, becauſe the father-in-law thought Sabinus to be too ambitious of honour. And Sabinus took it ill, that he was not ſo much aſſiſted, and, as it were, promoted by the other, as he wiſhed and imagined might have been done.' From whence I conclude, that it is a difficult matter to live happily in this miſerable world, ſince a happy life requires not only that a man ſhould govern his own paſſions, but alſo that thoſe of his relations ſhould be well governed.

(65) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſ. pag. 198.

(66) Camerar. ubi ſupra, pag. 207.

[I] I will

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

nism, for which he is blamed [I]. Some h

[I] I will make some reflexions upon the inclination to Pyrrhonism for which he is blamed.] 'He seemed 'to have been brought up in the school of Pyrrho, 'for a thousand doubts befet his soul, for fear, said 'he, of erring. His writings were a continual jum-'ble of uncertainties (67).' The author who says this, cites some authorities, and tells us no more than what an infinite number of writers have observed. See in the last place the bishop of Meaux in his Histoire des Variations. I believe they exaggerate the matter, but at the same time I think Melanchthon was not free from doubts, and that there were many points about which he could not positively say, It is so, and it cannot be otherwise. He was of a mild and peaceable disposition, he had a great deal of wit, much reading, and a vast knowledge. Such a mixture of natural and acquired qualities is commonly a source of irresolution. A great genius, supported with a vast knowledge, will scarce find error to be altogether on one side. He discovers a strong and a weak side in each party, he understands what is most specious in the objections of his adversaries, and what is not solid in his own proofs; he does, I say, all this, provided he be not of a choleric temper; for if he be, he is so prepossessed in favour of his own party, that his knowledge is of no service to him. He does not only persuade himself that he is in the right, but he has such a fondness for his own sentiments, as moves him to hate bitterly the doctrine that opposes them. From the hatred of opinions he quickly proceeds to hate the persons; he aspires to triumph, and being heated with dispute, he is fretted till he obtains the victory: he is angry with those who represent to him, that it is for the interest of heavenly truth, that we should not have recourse to expedients of human policy. He is no less troubled if he hears any body say, that his doctrines are not certain and evident, and that the contrary party can alledge good reasons. Being of such a temper, he examines things only for this end, that he may be more and more convinced, that the doctrines he has embraced are true, and he does not fail to find much solidity in his own arguments; for there is no mirror so flattering as prepossession: it is a paint that embellishes the ugliest faces; it does the same offices to a doctrine that the Venus of the Roman Poet did to her son.

(67) Flor. de Remond, ubi supra, book ii, cap. ix, pag. 181.

Restitit Æneas, claraque in luce refulsit;
Os humerosque Deo similis: namque ipsa decoram
Cæsariem nato genitrix, lumenque juventæ
Purpureum, & lætos oculis afflarat honores.
Quale manus addunt ebori decus, aut ubi flavo
Argentum, Pariusve lapis circumdatur auro (68).

Confess'd Æneas stood, and shone in light
Serene, in shape, and features like a God:
For Venus with the rosy bloom of youth
Had flush'd her son, with graceful looks adorn'd,
And breath'd a sparkling lustre on his eyes.
Such is the beauty which the artist's hands
To polish'd ivory lends: so silver shines,
Or Parian stone, enchas'd in yellow gold. TRAPP.

(68) Virgil Æn. lib. i, ver. 588.

Melanchthon not having this temper, could not be so steady in his opinions. He was so cool, that he examined matters freely pro and con; and because he loved peace, and deplored the confusions which the schism gave birth to, he was more disposed to judge favourably of several doctrines, which hot men made the foundation of a rupture, and which he would have had tolerated to facilitate a re-union. His modesty and experience rendered him a little distrustful. He was persuaded that his knowledge might increase every day, for he remembered that he had corrected many things in his own writings, which he believed to be good when he first published them; but time taught him to withdraw his approbation, and to apply to himself a fine passage of Terence Nunquam ita quisquam bene subducta ratione ad vitam fuit.

Quin res, ætas, usus, semper aliquid apportet novi,
Aliquid moneat: ut illa, quæ te scire credas nescias
Et quæ tibi putâris prima, in experiundo ut repudies.
Quod mihi evenit nunc - - - - (69).

(69) Terent. Adelph. act v, sc. iv. init.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Peripatetic Philoſophy [K]. There is infinitely more reaſon to pretend that he did not believe

'trantur quicquam intereſt, niſi quod illi non dubitant 'quin ea vera ſint quæ defendunt: Nos probabilia 'multa habemus, quæ ſequi facile, affirmare vix poſ- 'ſumus. Hoc autem liberiores & ſolutiores ſumus, 'quod integra nobis eſt judicandi poteſtas, neque ut 'omnia quæ præſcripta & quaſi imperata ſint, de- 'fendamus, neceſſitate ulla cogimur. Nam cæteri 'primum ante tenentur aſtricti, quam quid eſſet op- 'timum, judicare potuerunt. Deinde infirmiſſimo 'tempore ætatis aut obſecuti amico cuidam, aut una 'alicujus quem primum audierunt, ratione capti, de 'rebus incognitis judicant, & ad quamcunque ſunt 'diſciplinam quaſi tempeſtate delati, ad eam tanquam 'ad ſaxum adhæreſcunt. Nam quod dicunt, omnino 'ſe credere ei, quem judicent fuiſſe ſapientem, proba- 'rem, ſi id ipſum rudes & indocti judicare potuiſſent. 'Statuere enim quid ſit ſapiens, vel maxime videtur 'eſſe ſapientis. Sed ut potuerunt omnibus rebus au- 'ditis, cognitis etiam reliquorum ſententiis judicave- 'runt, aut re ſemel audita ad unius ſe authoritatem 'contulerunt. Sed neſcio quomodo plerique errare 'malunt, eamque ſententiam quam adamaverunt, pug- 'naciſſime defendere, quàm ſine pertinacia quid con- 'ſtantiſſime dicant exquirere. - - - - The deſign of our 'diſputations is nothing elſe, but by arguing and hearing 'both ſides of the queſtion, to draw forth, and as it were 'to ſqueeze out, the truth, or what comes very near it. Nor 'is there any difference between us and them, who think 'themſelves knowing, but that they entertain no doubt 'about the truth of what they defend: and we think 'many things probable, which we can readily follow, 'but can hardly aver for certain. In this however 'we are more free and independent, that we have 'entire liberty to judge, and are by no means compelled to 'defend all that is preſcribed, and in a manner com- 'manded. For the others are pre-engaged before they could 'judge what was beſt. And moreover, being ſwayed 'in the weakeſt time of life by ſome friend, or led away 'by the firſt that inſtructed them, they judge of things 'without examination, and whatever opinion they are 'caſt upon, as it were by a tempeſt, they cleave to it as 'to a rock. And as to what they ſay, that they entire- 'ly believe him, whom they judge to have been a wiſe 'man, I ſhould approve it, if ignorant and illiterate 'perſons were capable of judging that. For to deter- 'mine what a wiſe man is, ſeems chiefly to be the pro- 'vince of a wiſe man. But I know not how it is, moſt 'people chuſe rather to err, and ſtiffly to defend the opinion 'they love, than, without partiality, to ſearch out what 'they may ſtedfaſtly maintain.'

[K] Some have falſly accuſed him of hating the Peripatetic Philoſophy.] I have cited elſewhere (74) Father Rapin, who places Melanchthon in the catalogue of the modern Heretics, who have declamed againſt Ariſtotle and his Philoſophy. This accuſation is not well grounded, as I ſhall ſhew hereafter (75), and would be ſufficiently refuted by ſetting down here what Melanchthon wrote to the chancellor of Bavaria in 1535. 'Vere judicas plurimum intereſſe Reipublicæ ut Ari- 'ſtoteles conſervetur, & extet in ſcholis ac verſetur in 'manibus diſcentium. Nam profecto ſine hoc autore, 'non ſolum non retineri pura philoſophia, ſed ne qui- 'dem juſta docendi aut diſcendi ratio ulla poterit (76). '- - - You judge truly that it very much concerns the 'State, that Ariſtotle be preſerved, and that it remains 'in ſchools, and be much read by ſcholars. For indeed 'without this author, neither pure Philoſophy, nor even 'a juſt method of teaching and learning can be kept up.' The Logic of the ſchools, of all the parts of Philoſophy, was that which was leaſt grateful to the Reformers; for they looked upon it as the ſource of vain ſubtilties, which made young people loſe a great deal of time, and corrupted Theology; yet Melanchthon declared for Logic. His teſtimony was cited by Caramuel in the catalogue he has given us of ſome Proteſtant Doctors, who recommend the ſtudy of that part of Philoſophy. 'Philippus Melanchthon, ſays he (77), Lutheri diſ- 'cipulus fuit, & tametſi Magiſter parvi Logicam pen- 'deret, ipſe maximi eam fecit, & inter alia in præfatione 'Erotem. Dialect. hæc ſcripſit. Hos & adhortor, & prop- 'ter gloriam Dei, ac propter Eccleſiæ ſalutem obteſtor ne di- 'alecticen negligant, nec applaudant inſulſis ſermonibus eo- 'rum qui vituperant eam & Eccleſiæ inutilem eſſe &c. 'imo Dialectica opus eſt non ſolum ut doctrina lucem ha- 'beat, ſed etiam ut ſit concordiæ vinculum - - - Philip 'Melanchthon was the diſciple of Luther, and tho' his 'maſter undervalued Logic, he himſelf had a vaſt o- 'pinion of it; and, among other things, he wrote thus: 'I exhort and beſeech them, both for the glory of 'God, and the welfare of the church, not to neglect 'Logic, nor applaud the fooliſh diſcourſes of thoſe who 'reproach it, and ſay it is uſeleſs to the church, &c. 'Nay, Logic is not only neceſſary, that the doctrine 'may receive light, but alſo that it may be the bond 'of peace.' The Jeſuit James Gretſer, deſigning to combat the hatred which Luther expreſſed againſt the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle, oppoſes Melanchthon to him and cites a long paſſage out of this diſciple of Luther: 'A quo, ſays he (78), hanc Apologiam mutuabimur, 'niſi ab illo, cui Lutherus plurimum tribuere ſolebat: 'quique ea, quæ olim in Ariſtotelem conjecerat, ma- 'ledicta laudibus poſtea diſpunxit? Is eſt Melanchthon 'qui in oratione de Ariſtotele * à Flocco quodam 'Norimbergenſi recitata his verbis Logicam Ariſtote- 'licam adverſus Lutheri criminationes nobis dat de- 'fenſam. Nunc quædam de genere Philoſophiæ addam 'cur Ariſtotelicum maxime nobis in Eccleſia uſui eſſe 'arbitremur. Conſtare arbitror inter omnes, maxime no- 'bis in Eccleſia opus eſſe Dialectica, quæ methodos recte 'informat, quæ dextre definit, juſte partitur, apte con- 'nectit, judicat, & divellit monſtroſas connexiones. 'Hanc artem qui non norunt lacerant materias expli- 'candas, ut cuculi panniculos. Libet enim uti Platonis 'ſimilitudine. Vere eam Plato laudibus effert, inquiens 'igniculum eſſe, quem Prometheus è cælo attulerit, ut 'in mentibus hominum lumen accenderet ad recte judi- 'candum. Sed artis præcepta nuſquam tradit. Ca- 'rere igitur Ariſtotelis monumentis non poſſumus. Stoi- 'ca non extant, & apparet intricatos Labyrinthos, & 'corruptelas artis fuiſſe, non ſimplicem diſſerendi viam, 'utilem explicationi magnarum rerum. Hæc Philip- pus pro Ariſtotelis Logicâ contra Lutheri amentiam: '- - - From whence ſhall we borrow this apology, but from 'him, for whom Luther uſed to have a vaſt eſteem; 'and who afterwards cancelled with praiſes, thoſe re- 'proaches he had formerly thrown upon Ariſtotle? It is 'Melanchthon, who, in an oration on Ariſtotle, ſpoken 'by one Floccus of Nuremberg, defends, the Logic of A- 'riſtotle againſt the charge of Luther in the following 'words: Now I will add ſomething concerning Phi- loſophy, why I judge that of Ariſtotle to be moſt 'uſeful in the church. I think it is agreed by all, that 'Logic is moſt neceſſary for us in the church, becauſe 'it teaches method and order, it defines fitly, divides 'juſtly, connects aptly, judges, and ſeparates mon- 'ſtrous connexions. Thoſe who are ignorant of this 'art, tear the ſubject to be treated on, as puppies do 'rags. For I like to uſe Plato's ſimilitude. Plato 'juſtly extols it by calling it the fire, which Pro- 'metheus brought from Heaven, to kindle a light in 'the minds of men to enable them to judge rightly. 'But he no where gives the precepts of the art. We 'cannot therefore be without Ariſtotle's Logic. That 'of the Stoics is not extant, and it appears to have 'been intricate, and a corruption of the art, not a ſim- 'ple way of reaſoning, fit for explaining great things. 'Thus far Philip for Ariſtotle's Logic againſt the madneſs 'of Luther.' The ſequel of this paſſage of Melanch- thon recited by Gretſer, contains great praiſes upon the Phyſics and Moral Philoſophy of Ariſtotle.

It is not therefore neceſſary to juſtify Melanchthon upon this head, his own works ſufficiently juſtify him; but I muſt not forget a miſtake of Father Rapin. He cites (79) a Theſis maintained by Luther at Heidelberg in the year 1518, wherein Ariſtotle was ill- uſed. 'Luther, continues he, lets no occaſion ſlip in 'his books of inveighing againſt this Philoſopher, 'wherein he is followed by Zuinglius, Peter Martyr, 'Zanchius, Melanchthon, and by all thoſe who 'have oppoſed the doctrine of the Romiſh church: 'which made Melchior Canus ſay, &c.' All this, and what he had juſt ſaid of the Anabaptiſts, is taken out of a book of George Hornius, which he cites. Now the words of that author are theſe: 'Ibique '(Lutherus) pluribus Ariſtotelem exagitat. Zuin- 'glius etiam, P. Martyr, Zanchius & alii excelſiſſime 'florebant

(74) In the remark [T] of the article ARISTOTLE.

(75) At the end of this remark.

(76) Melanchth. Epiſt. ad Leonhardum Eccium. It is the 116th of the firſt book, pag. m. 165.

(77) Jo. Caramuel, Theolog. Rational. Tom. 1, pag. 42. Edit. Francof. 1654, in folio.

(78) Jacob. Gretſer. inaugur. Doctor. pag. 60, 61.

* Melanchth. Tom. iii, Declamat.

(79) Rapin, Reflexions ſur la Philoſophie, pag. m. 451.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google believe the real presence [L], nor that Grace was irresistible (bb). Frier de St Romuald affirms, florebant Philosophiæ laudibus. Omnes tamen exsuperavit divinum Philippi Melanchtonis ingenium, qui scriptis suis totam Philosophiam ita illustravit, ut vere author ejus & fatalis in Germania instaurator dici possit. Illustravit Dialecticam, Ethicam, Physicam, & Mathematicas disciplinas: expurgavit spinas Philosophorum: id denique effecit, ut Philosophia mox florentissima efficeretur (80). - - - - And there Luther inveighs much against Aristotle. Zwinglius also, P. Martyr, Zanchius, and others eminently distinguished themselves in Philosophy. But the divine genius of Philip Melanchthon surpassed them all, who by his writings has so illustrated all Philosophy, that he may be truly called the author, and destined restorer of it in Germany. He has illustrated Logic, Ethics, Physics, and Mathematics: he has cleared the intricacy of the Philosophers, and, in fine, brought Philosophy to the most flourishing condition.' The particle etiam being put a little after the words which signify that Luther inveighed against Aristotle, made Rapin think, that Zuinglius, and the other reformers named by Hornius, inveighed also against Aristotle; but he might easily have known that this was far from the thoughts of Hornius. The elogium he bestowed upon Melanchthon might be still further enlarged; for this great man did not only illustrate all the parts of Philosophy; but there is scarce any art or science about which he did not write, and endeavour to facilitate the study of them by easy and plain methods. What shall we say then of those who were so impudent as to publish, that Melanchthon and Carlostad cried down all the sciences, that they turned artificers, and rendered all the schools like a desart, so that there was nothing to be seen in them but cobwebs (81)? It would be difficult to find professors who read so many lectures, and to so many people as he did (82). He often read three or four lectures in a day (83), and there is reason to believe, that when he married he did not interrupt his academic exercises, except on his wedding-day, which may be inferred from this distich:

(bb) See the article SYNERGISTS.

(80) Georg. Hornius, Hist. Philos. lib. vi, cap. ix, pag. 315.

(81) The Jesuit Cresollius is one of them. See Morhoff. Polyhist. pag. 7, 8.

(82) See, below, in the remark [P] what Sabinus answered to cardinal Bembus.

A studiis hodie facit ocia grata Philippus,
Nec vobis Pauli dogmata sacra leget.

Rest from your studies: Philip says you may.
He'll read no lectures on St Paul to day.

(83) Konig. Bibl. pag. 527. See below, citation (85).

This was the notice which was given on that day to his auditors (84). He was the prineipal support of the university of Wittemberg. ' Sua industria atque eruditione Wittembergicam Academiam præcipuè sustinuit: nec passus est vel bellis civilibus, vel intestinis odiis sese ab ea abstrahi: binas, ternas, quaternas quotidie scholas habuit easque frequentissimas: nullam autem horam vacuam à legendo, scribendo, disserendo, consulendo (85). - - - - By his industry, and learning he principally supported the university of Wittemberg: nor did he suffer himself to be drawn away from it either by civil wars or intestine quarrels: he gave lectures twice, thrice, or four times a day, and that to a numerous audience, and not an hour did he spend without reading, writing, discourfing, or consulting.'

(84) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philos. pag. 190.

(85) Id. in Vitis Theol. pag. 355.

To speak the truth without dissimulation, I must here declare, that Melanchthon at the beginning followed the dance that Luther led him, and spoke ill of Aristotle: but he quickly changed his tone, and continued to recommend the Philosophy of this founder of the Lyceum. Wherefore Father Rapin had no ground for the accusation mentioned in the beginning of this remark; for we must not judge of a man by those opinions which he quickly forsakes; but by those wherein he continues all the rest of his life. Father Gretser might have taught Father Rapin how to speak about this matter. See what I have already cited from that German Jesuit, and what I am going to take from the same author. ' Quid ad nos, quid Aristoteles impurus homo dicat? vociferatur Philippus †. Et in Locis Anno Christi, M D XXIII, Argentorati editis: ‡ Aristotelis doctrina est in universum quædam libido rixandi ut eum inter paræneticæ philosophiæ scriptores ne postremo quidem loco dignemur. Quid ad me quid senserit ille rixator? inquit in iisdem locis ‡ Philippus. Quanquam postea Vertumnus iste stylum vertit, & maledicta in benedicta convertit (86). - - - - What is it to us, what Aristotle, that vile fellow, says? cries Philip. And in his Common-places published at Strasburg, in the year 1523: The doctrine of Aristotle is in general a certain violent desire of quarrelling; so that I do not think him worthy even of the last place among the writers of the Parenetic Philosophy. What is it to me, what the opinion of that quarrelsome fellow was? Says Philip in the same Common-places. Tho' afterwards that turn-coat changed his stile, and turned his curses into blessings.' See the margin (87).

† Phil. in Apolog. pro Luth. & in Ludo contra Parisiens.

‡ Tit. de Peccato.

‡ Tit. de Lege.

(86) Jacob. Gretser. ubi supra, pag. 45.

[L] There would be more reason to pretend that he did not believe the real presence.] Peucer was heard to say (88), I. That Melanchthon, his father-in-law, having read the dialogue of Oecolampadius de Cœna Domini, forsook the opinion of the oral manducation, and that afterwards he triumphed in the argument from the authority of the Fathers. ' Patribus doctrina ' Synusiastarum fuit ignota: Augustinus crassissimus ' fuit Swinglianus, ergo, &c. - - - The doctrine of Con- ' substantiation was unknown to the Fathers: Augustin ' was a thorough-placed Zwinglian, therefore, &c.' II. That he did not believe a man could die with a greater glory than for the doctrine of the Eucharist, and that he was angry with himself that he did not show a greater courage in making an open profession of his opinion. ' Ah utinam possem esse fortior in confessione istius causæ, & alibi essem. Sed his moribus, his ' temporibus inter hos homines fieri id non potest, & habeo ' graves rationes mei consilii. Interim dico sententiam ' meam ubi video opus esse. - - - - - I wish I could ' be more courageous in the profession of that cause, and ' that I were somewhere else. But in these times, ' and considering the manners of these men, it cannot be ' done, and I have weighty reasons for thinking so. In ' the mean time I declare my sentiments when I see it ne- ' cessary.' III. That in the year 1544, he explained himself freely to an Hungarian, who asked his thoughts about the Eucharist, and that the thing being reported to Luther and Pomeranus, the latter one day addressed himself in this manner to the people in a sermon. Most dear brethren, the church is in great danger, pray to God Almighty for some great persons that are fallen into error. IV. That Melanchthon understanding this was meant of him, could not suppress his anger, but went out of the church in the sight of all the congregation; that he related this affair to Cruciger, and that they concluded to withdraw from Wittemberg; which they would have put in execution, if Luther had not passed his word, that the court of Saxony should do them no hurt upon this occasion. V. That Melanchthon lived under hard bondage at Wittemberg, and run the risque three times of being sent to prison (89). VI. That he disapproved the Concordate made in the year 1536, and the fearfulness of Bucer, which made him yield too much to Luther. ' Nec tacebat de con- ' cordia Wittembergica inter Lutherum & Bucerum ' anno 1536, inita. Melanchthonem aiebat Bucerum ' sæpe hortatum fuisse ne tantum Luthero largiretur, ' sed Bucerum fuisse timidum, circumseptum ab inimicis. Reliquos etiam superioris Germaniæ Theologos nimis fracto & demisso animo fuisse. - - - - - ' Nor did he conceal his dislike of the Concordate, made at ' Wittemberg in the year 1536, between Luther and Bucer. He said Melanchthon had often exhorted Bucer not ' to yield so much to Luther, but that Bucer was fearful, ' being surrounded by enemies. That the other Divines of ' Upper-Germany were likewise too mean spirited.' These are the discourses which Peucer had with Scultetus, who went to see him at Dessau in the year 1589.

(87) This may be confirmed by these words of Erasmus, Epist. ad fratres Germaniæ inferioris, pag. m. 2127. Nonne Melanchthon aliquando damnavit scholas publicas? Nunc hic dicit, maneant scholæ quæ bonæ sunt, vitia corrigantur. - - - Did not Melanchthon once condemn the public schools? Now he says, let good schools remain, and faults be corrected.

(88) Abraham Schultetus, Narrat. Apologet. pag. 20, & seq.

(89) A Joanne Friderico Electore ter illi decretum fuisse carceremo. - - - John Frederic the elector, determined three times to put him in prison. Id. ib.

But if one would be assured of the sincerity of this relator, he needs only read the works of Peucer (90), and particularly that which was printed in 1596, by the care of Quirinus Reuterus, which is intituled, Tractatus historicus de clarissimi viri Philippi Melanchthonis sententia de controversia cœnæ domini, à D. Casparo Peucero ante plures annos scriptus, sed jam primum seperatim boni publici ergo excusus: Cum appendice selectarum epistolarum & judiciorum aliquot Philippi, aliorumque præstantium virorum de eadem materia. - - - - - An historical treatise of the opinion of of the famous Philip Melanchthon, on the controversy about the Lord's Supper, written several years ago by the D. Casparius Peucer, but now first printed by itself, for the

(90) As the Historia Carcerum, and the preface to the treatise De præcipuis divinationum generibus.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google affirms, that his body was burnt at Munich [M]. This appears to me to be a very groſs fiction. Mr Varillas has publiſhed ſuch ſtrange falſhoods [N], that it may be juſtly the benefit of the public: with an appendix of ſome ſelect epiſtles and opinions of Philip, and other great men, on the ſame ſubject. Hoſpinian (91) will prove to you at large, that Melanchthon was undeceived and turned from Lutheraniſm, as to the point of the real preſence, although the fear of oppreſſion did not ſuffer him to declare his judgment openly. He hath collected together ſeveral proofs of this fear (92). The famous Melanchthon being threatned with baniſhment, declared at laſt, that he wiſhed for it as a kind of deliverance (93). He ' knew of no other remedy for all thoſe evils, but ' flight, and his ſon-in-law Peucer †† informs us, ' that he was reſolved upon it. ' He himſelf writes ‡‡, ' that Luther was ſo enraged againſt him, about a ' a letter received from Bucer, that he thought of no- ' thing but withdrawing himſelf for ever from his ' preſence. He lived under ſuch continual conſtraint ' with Luther, and the heads of the party, and was ' ſo oppreſſed with labour and vexation, that, being ' quite ſpent, he wrote to his friend Camerarius: I am, ' ſays he ‡‡, in bondage, as if I were in the cave of ' the Cyclop; for I cannot diſguiſe my ſentiments to you, ' and I have often thoughts of making my eſcape. Lu- ' ther was not the only perſon that was violent againſt ' him. Every one has the command at certain times ' among thoſe who forſake the lawful authority, and ' the moſt moderate are always the moſt enſlaved (94).' Note, that this paſſage of the biſhop of Meaux does not concern the conſtraint Luther was in, with reſpect to his doctrine of the Lord's Supper.

(91) See his ſecond volume Hiſtoriæ Sacramentariæ, pag. 234, & paſſim alibi. Conſult alſo the biſhop of Meaux, Hiſt. des Variat. livr. viii, num. 39.

(92) See particularly, pag. 428. & ſeq. Hiſt. Sacrament. Tom. ii.

(93) Hoſpin. ib. pag. 430.

†† Peuc. Ep. ad Vit. Theod. Hiſp. pag. 2, fol. 193, & ſeq.

‡‡ Mel. lib. iv, Epiſt. 315.

†† Lib. iv, 355.

(94) The biſhop of Meaux, Hiſt. des Variations, livr. v, num. 16.

[M] St Romuald affirms, that his body was burnt at Munich.] ' Philip Melanchthon, a native of Breſſe (95) ' in Germany, died at Wittemberg, being a little ' above ſixty three years of age. He was the conſtant ' companion of Martin Luther. He was buried like ' him, honourably enough by people of their own ' ſtamp; but ſome time after, the Catholics * dug up ' his body and burnt it with great zeal at Munich: ' And becauſe in the mean time the caſtle took fire, ' and the lyons eſcaped, not without great danger to ' the inhabitants of the city, Du Pleſſis-Mornai took ' occaſion from thence to cry out, Juſta Domini ' judicia, the juſt judgment of God. This is in a letter ' he wrote to the Sieur Languet of Burgundy (96).' This good Monk quotes no body, and ſets down the year 1597, which is a good proof of his ignorance; for Languet died in 1581.

(95) He ſhould have ſaid Breton.

* In the year 1597.

(96) Peter de St Romuald, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. iii, pag. m. 328. ad ann. 1580.

[N] Mr Varillas has publiſhed ſuch ſtrange falſhoods.] ' They give no leſs different accounts of Melanchthon's ' death, which happened almoſt at the ſame time; he ' was then ſixty three years and three days old (97). ' His mother, who attended him, having conjured ' him at his death to declare which of the religions ' was the beſt; he anſwered her, that the new ' was more plauſible, but the Catholic was more ' ſafe. Yet that which was moſt ſurprizing in him ' was, that his inconſtancy in matters of religion, ' did not hinder him from ſhowing a great firmneſs ' of ſoul under adverſity. He ſpent all his life in ' ſtudy, and ſeemed not to be capable of any other ' labour. He ſubſiſted with his wife and ſeveral ' daughters he had (98), upon the ſalary he received ' from John Frederic elector of Saxony, as profeſſor ' of Divinity, in the univerſity of Wittemberg. This ' ſalary was juſt ſufficient to maintain Melanchthon's ' family, who receiving it punctually every quarter, ' never troubled himſelf much about the time to come, ' becauſe he ſuppoſed this would be an inexhauſtible ' ſpring to ſupply him. But it happened, as we have ' ſhown in the 16th book of this hiſtory, that the ' elector of Saxony loſt his dominions and his liberty, ' and Melanchthon's ſalary was no longer paid. His ' houſhold-goods were of ſo little value, that they ' were not ſufficient to maintain him for any long time; ' and within a few months he was reduced to the ' neceſſity of begging or importuning his friends, every ' one of whom had ſuffered conſiderable loſſes in the ' general revolution of Saxony. Both theſe extremi- ' ties were equally unpleaſant to him; and therefore ' he choſe rather to get his livelihood with the ſweat ' his brows, by going into a profeſſion very different ' from his own. He hired himſelf to a Brewer of ' beer, and ſerved three whole years in the brew-houſe, ' till duke Maurice being put in poſſeſſion of the elec- ' torate of Saxony, re-eſtabliſhed the univerſity of ' Wittemberg, and the ſalary of Melanchthon (99).' Note, that the mother of Melanchthon died in 1529, how then could ſhe aſk any queſtion in 1560? See, above, what I have ſaid in the remark [E] (99). againſt Florimond de Remond. I will not trouble myſelf with proving that he never hired himſelf to a Brewer: This is a ſtory whoſe falſity may be diſcovered by the bare inſpection of the courſe of the life of this learned Perſon. I ſhall add, by the by, that thoſe who ſay that, in the year 1524, Luther took Melanchthon out of a Baker's ſhop (100), to whom he had bound himſelf apprentice to get a livelihood (101) with the ſweat of his brows, are groſsly miſtaken.

(97) He ſhould have ſaid ſixty three days.

(98) He had but two.

(99) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hérèſie, Tom. v, book xxiv, pag. 277, Dutch Edit.

(99) Citat. (29).

(100) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, livr. i, cap. ii, pag. 95.

Not to ſeparate the faults of Varillas, I referred to this place the narrative he has given us of the deſign of Francis I, with reſpect to Melanchthon. He ſuppoſes that the ſiſter (102), and the miſtreſs (103) of this prince, intrigued mightily to introduce the new religion into the kingdom (104), and that not ſucceeding in their attempt, built upon a ſermon of the curate of St Euſtache, they made uſe of another device, which was to perſuade the king to gain the Proteſtants of Germany, which would be very advantageous to him for oppoſing the too great power of Charles V, and they repreſented to him, that nothing would be more effectual to gain them, than to ſhew a great deſire of having a conference with Melanchthon (105). The firſt ſtep which this prince made in ' this affair, was the order which Langey received, ' who had known this divine in Saxony, to ſound him ' if he were inclining to change his chair of Theology ' at Wittemberg, whoſe income was only two hun- ' dred crowns a year, for a Royal Profeſſor's chair ' in the univerſity of Paris, at twelve hundred crowns ' a year (106).' The ſecond ſtep that he made was ' to commiſſion Langey to uſe his endeavours at the ' court of Saxony, to obtain the leave that Melanch- ' thon deſired, and to give him a letter for this famous ' divine, ſigned with the king's own hand .... The ' elector of Saxony did no ſooner hear what the moſt ' chriſtian king deſired of him to let Melanchthon ' come, but he imagined that this would make all ' France turn Lutheran ..... He did not deliberate ' an inſtant upon the requeſt that was made to him, ' and not only parted with a man, whom he believed ' to be ſtill very neceſſary to him, but alſo exhorted ' him to ſet out immediately on his journey. But ' Luther, who could not be without Melanchthon, de- ' tained him a long time, upon pretence that he was ' to concert, or, to ſpeak more properly, to poliſh ' with him, his laſt book againſt the Anabaptiſts ' (107).' Melanchthon wrote a civil anſwer to Fran- ' cis I, and concludes ' with an excuſe for not coming ' away the minute the elector, his maſter, had given him ' leave (108).' The cardinal of Tournon had the courage to oppoſe this intrigue of the queen of Navarre, and the ducheſs of Etampes (109). He made a diſ- courſe which Francis I. reliſhed well; ' but the virtue ' which this prince affected moſt was to keep his ' word, and he ſuppoſed that it would be thought the ' more ſtrange, if he ſhould break it with reſpect to ' Melanchthon, becauſe that divine had not attempted ' of himſelf to come to Paris, neither had he conſented ' to do it, till he was invited in an honourable way. ' There was nothing therefore reſolved upon, and his ' majeſty's indifference had probably continued longer, ' if the ſame Lutherans who had ſo dextrouſly in- ' ſpired him with the deſire of ſeeing Melanchthon, ' had not made him averſe to it by an inſolent action, ' which put him quite out of conceit with them ' (110).' They had already poſted up ſome placards at his cloſet door, which had made him very angry; but he was much more offended ' at the printed bills ' which they ſlipt into the caſket that contained the ' linnen for the king's table, by means of Ferret a ' ſervant to his Apothecary. It was ſuſpected that ' they were compoſed by Farel .... The reading of ' theſe bills finiſhed the work which the cardinal of ' Tournon had begun, and Melanchthon was counter- ' manded. The ſpreaders of theſe bills were ſearched ' for, and a very ſevere edict was publiſhed, which (101) Id. ib. book ii, cap. ii, pag. 126.

(102) Margaret queen of Navarre.

(103) The ducheſs of Etampes.

(104) Varillas, ibid. Tom. ii, book x, pag. 312.

(105) Id. ib. pag. 317, 319.

(106) Id. ib. pag. 321.

(107) Id. ib. pag. 322.

(108) Ib. pag. 323.

(109) Ib. p. 324.

(110) Ib. p. 325.

' the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google justly thought a needless labour to confute them. The violence wherewith Melanchthon was calumniated during his life, persecuted him even after his Death (cc). It is astonishing, that amidst so many other occupations he could write so many books. The number of them is prodigious; a Chronological catalogue of them was published in the year 1582 (dd). As he saw that his works, tho' he did not finish them, nay tho' he published them pretty imperfect, were nevertheless profitable to the youth, he rather chose to print many of them, than to perfect a small number (ee). And so he preferred the advantage of the public to his own glory. We may believe also that the happy genius wherewith he was naturally endowed, gave him some assurance that his works would be esteemed, tho' they were not finished (ff). His Latin verses pleased the hypercritical Julius Cæsar Scaliger (gg). He sometimes assumed a false name in the title of his books [O]. Cardinal

(cc) See Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. pag. 357, 358, & Bucholcher. Ind. Chron. ad ann. 1560, pag. m. 600.

(dd) Mar. Mylius is the author of that catalogue. See Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 347.

(ee) See Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 361.

(ff) See Erasmus, in Ciceroniano.

(gg) Jul. Cæsar Scalig. Poet. lib. vi, pag. m. 736.

'the cardinal, chancellor Duprat, had drawn up against 'the Lutherans. On the twenty ninth of January '1535, there was a solemn procession, at which the 'king assisted on foot bare-headed, and with a wax-
(111) Ib. p. 326. 'taper in his hand (111).'

There are many falsehoods in this narrative. In the 1st place I desire a good warrant, before I believe upon
(112) Note, that Florimond de Remond, book vii, cap. iii, says the same thing, but his authority requires another to support it. the authority of Varillas (112), that the duchess of Etampes concerned herself out of love to the Protestants, among other intrigues, in that of Melanchthon's journey, and that he was offered the chair of Regius professor. II. It appears by the kings letter to Melanchthon, that he who carried it was called la Fosse: And therefore it was not given to Mr de Langey. III. The elector of Saxony was so far from believing that Melanchthon's journey would make all France Lutheran, that one of the reasons why he would not consent to it, was, that he thought it would rather hinder than further the progress of the Reformation. This appears by the original letters which he wrote upon this occasion (113.) IV. He was so far from granting Melanchthon the liberty that was necessary without deliberating a moment, and moreover from exhorting him to set forward on his journey presently, that, on the contrary, he could not be prevailed upon, neither by the intreaties of that Professor, nor by those of Luther, nor by the good offices of the ambassador of France (114.) He wrote his excuses to Francis I, the 28th of August 1535 (115). The ambassador continued still to sollicit, and all to no purpose, till the month of December the same year (116). V. Luther did not detain Melanchthon a long time, but, on the contrary, made repeated instances to the court of Saxony for his journey. 'Exstant Lutheri ad electorem literæ d. 17. Aug. datæ tom. 'vi. fol. 491. in quibus repetitis & enixissimis precibus 'contendit ut Philippus ad tres menses dimittatur
(117) Ib. p. 107. '(117). - - - - - - Luther's letter to the elector dated the '17th day of August, is to be seen tom. vi. fol. 491. in 'which he most earnestly begs, again and again, that 'Philip might be sent in three months time.' VI. It is horrible impudence to say, that Melanchthon in a letter to the king, concluded with an excuse that he had not come away the very minute the elector, his master, had given him leave. There is no such thing in his letter, and he could not, without telling a lye, mention the permission of his master. VII. The time of the placards ought not to be distinguished from that wherein the bills were slipt into the casket of Francis I, and if Varillas had a mind to have made a distinction, the bills should have preceded the placards. And indeed Florimond de Remond, whom Varillas here does only paraphrase upon, supposes that the Heretics did not post up any placards (118), till after they had dispersed several books here and there . . . . . and caused their articles of faith to be thrown into the king's closet by his Apothecary's servant called Ferret, and even little bills into the casket that contained the linnen for his table (119). VIII. The sharpest things that were said against the mass and the priests, were not in those bills, but in the placards (120). IX. Varillas cannot prove that Francis I. countermanded Melanchthon; he still desired to have him in the month of December 1535, after the letter he received from the elector of Saxony, full of excuses for not granting to this doctor leave to go into France. It is therefore very probable that Francis I. was never under a necessity to countermand him. X. It is very certain that the placards did not induce him to it, for they were posted up in the month of November 1534. The king punished this insolence, and expiated that affront to the host, in the month of January following; and he wrote to Melanchthon five months after. Can one sufficiently wonder at the negligence of Mr Varillas? He gives the substance of the letter which Francis I. wrote to Melanchthon, and he might have seen that it is dated the twenty eighth of June 1535. He says (121), that the expiatory procession for the placards was made the twenty ninth of January 1535 (122), and yet he affirms, that the occasion of the procession was the cause why the German Divine received a counter-order.

(118) Florimond de Remond, ubi supra, book vii, cap. v, pag. 859.

(119) Varillas attributes this to the servant, and so does not keep to his original.

(120) Florimond de Remond, ubi supra.

(121) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 326.

(122) Beginning the year with the month of January.

If he had complained that his History of Heresy had been taken for a Romance, he would hardly have had more reason for doing so, than la Calprenede had, who took it very heinously, that his Cassandra and Cleopatra were not looked upon as Histories. 'Nay, I will 'say, for the honour of these works, says he (123), 'that justice is not done them by the name that is 'given them, though perhaps they have been pretty 'well received in the world, and that instead of call-'ling them Romances, as the Amadis, and other such 'like, wherein there is neither truth, nor probability, 'nor Geography, nor Chronology, they may be 'looked upon as histories embellished with some inven-'tion, which by these ornaments lose nothing of their 'beauty. And indeed I can justly say, that in Cassan-'dra and Cleopatra, there is not only nothing con-'trary to truth, although there be some things be-'yond it; but that there is not any place wherein I 'can be convicted of a lie, and which I am not able 'to maintain, by all the circumstances of the history, 'to be true when I please. And there are several 'intelligent persons too, who have formed the same 'judgment of them, and who have looked upon me 'as a man better skilled in the affairs of the courts 'of Augustus and Alexander, than those who have 'writ their histories.' This is an arrant rodomontade, and there are very few things more romantic than this in the works of that author. Nevertheless I dare repeat it, that Mr Varillas could not make the like complaints with much more reason. For the rest, it is matter of astonishment, that so many French writers should be guilty of the sophism à non causa pro causa, to assign for a cause what is not so, speaking of this affair of Melanchthon. They pretend that the fixing up of placards by the Protestants hindered his journey; and yet it is certain that by accident it was the cause why he was sent for. How much soever they are to blame; they are less so than the Jesuit Sandæus (124), who durst call in question what Thuanus relates, that Francis I. wrote to Melanchthon, &c. Consult Mr Crenius, who solidly refutes the impudence of this writer, and his unjust contempt of Melanchthon (125).

(123) La Calprenede, preface to Pharamond.

(124) Maximil. Sandæus in pedia Academici Christiani, Commentat. vii, pag. 250, Edit. Colon. 1638, in 8vo, apud Crenium ubi infra.

[O] He sometimes assumed a false name in the title page of his books.] He called himself Didymus Faventinus in the answer he wrote in 1520, to an oration which Thomas Rhadinus, a Dominican and Professor of Divinity at Rome, had published against Luther. You will find an abridgment of that answer in Mr Seckendorf (126). But let no man think, because the author declaims very sharply against the errors of the school-men, that I was to blame in maintaining, that he did not disapprove Aristotle's Philosophy. To know exactly the sentiments of an author, we must not insist upon what he says in an invective written against another invective; but we must learn his judgment from his didactical writings or his letters, or, in general, from such works as do not savour of declamation. Every one knows how a man grows warm and exaggerates matters in harangues. After all, because a man censures very sharply the dangerous impertinencies wherewith the school-mens Philosophy is stuffed, it does not follow that he condemns Aristotle's Philosophy. Mr Placcius having observed (127) that Hoornbeeck attributed to Melanchthon

(125) Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. Part ii, pag. 21, & seq.

(126) Seckendorf, ubi supra, lib. i, pag. 108, & seq.

(127) Placcius de Pseudonymis, pag. 185, 186.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Cardinal Bembus asked three questions which deserve to be related [P].

Melanchthon the Greek version of the Augsburg Confession, which appeared under the name of Paul Dolscius (128), believed that the translation of Ecclesiasticus and the Psalms into Greek verse, was the work of Melanchthon, though the name of Paul Dolscius is prefixed to them. This opinion of Placcius, which was adopted by Mr Teissier (129) and Mr Crenius (130), is found to be false. Mr Lyserus (131) ecclesiastic counsellor to H. E. H. the duke of Hanover, has proved, that the translations of the Psalter, Ecclesiastes, and Ecclesiasticus, into Greek verse, and of the Augsburg Confession into Greek prose, do really belong to Paul Dolscius (132), whose name they bear. See the letter which he wrote to Mr Crenius (133). Here let us observe a piece of negligence in Melchior Adam. He affirms, that in 1559 Melanchthon wrote in Greek to the patriarch of Constantinople, and sent him a copy of the Greek version of the Confession of Augsburg (134), which version, adds he, had been made by Melanchthon, although it was published under the name of Dolscius: And presently after he cites these words. 'Mitto tibi 'interpretationem Græcam confessionis sine meo con-'filio editam. Probo tamen phrasin, ac misi Constan-'tinopolim (135). - - - I send you the Greek version of 'the Confession, which was published without my advice. 'However, I like the style, and have sent it to Con-'stantinople.' These words are Melanchthon's, and show that he did not make this version. Wherefore we may say, that Melchior Adam produces a witness against himself, when he thought to prove what he had affirmed.

(128) Hornbeeck Summa Controvers. lib. ii, pag. 979, Edit. 2.

(129) Teissier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 152.

(130) Crenius, Animadv. Philol. & Histor. Part ii, pag. 25.

(131) Great grandson of Polycarp LYSERUS, of whom I have given an article.

It is pretended, that Melanchthon sometimes called himself Hippophilus Melangæus (136); but I have seen nothing of his under this disguise.

[P] Cardinal Bembus asked three questions which deserve to be related.] Melanchthon wrote to him a letter, to recommend to him George Sabinus, who was going to see Italy (137). The cardinal had a great regard to this recommendation, he showed much civility to Sabinus, and invited him to dine with him. He asked him several questions during the time of dinner, and particularly these three: What is the salary of Melanchthon? What is the number of his auditors? And what is his judgment concerning another life and the resurrection? To the first Sabinus answered, that Melanchthon's salary was but three hundred florins a year. O ungrateful Germany, said the cardinal, which purchases at so cheap a rate so many works of such a great man! The answer to the second question was, that Melanchthon had commonly fifteen hundred auditors. I cannot tell how to believe it, replied the cardinal, for I know not in all Europe any university, besides that of Paris, where the auditory of a professor is so numerous. Yet Melanchthon had often two thousand five hundred persons at his lectures. To the third question it was answered, that the writings of Melanchthon testify sufficiently his full persuasion as to those two articles. I should have a better opinion of him, replied the cardinal, if he did not believe this (138). I give you this story as I find it in Melchior Adam.

(136) See Moreri at the word Melanchthon, and Mr Baillet in the catalogue of authors disguised.

(137) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 360.

(138) Haberem virum prudentiorem si hoc non credereto. - - - - I should have a better opinion of his judgment, if he did not believe this. Id. ib.

(132) He was rector of the college of Hall in Saxony, and then Physician, and at last burgo-master of the same city. He died in the year 1589. (133) It is at the end of the third part of the Animadversions of Mr Crenius. (134) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 351. (135) Melanchth. Epist. ad Bordingum apud Melch. Adamum, ibid.

MELCHIORITES, an imaginary sect, wherewith Prateolus, and the Jesuit Gaultier have enlarged their catalogues of Heretics, the latter upon the authority of the former, and he again by copying the very words of Lindanus. They pretend that the founder of this sect was the Anabaptist Melchior HOFMAN, of whom I have spoken in his place. But the Printer of Father Gaultier, having put Hosmannus instead of Hofmannus, was the reason that Mr Moreri has given us (a) a chimerical Heresiarch called Melchior Hosman. And thus it is that typographical errors multiply persons. If he had read the writer whom he quotes (b), he would perhaps have avoided this fault.

(a) Under the word Melchior.

(b) He quotes Prateole V. Melch. Now it is in Prateolus, Melchiore Hofmanno, and not Hosmanno. Note, that in the Paris edition 1699, instead of V. Melch. it is put Vit. Melch. This is a fault. The letter V signifies there Voce, i. e. the word, and not Vita, i. e. Life.

MEMNON, General of the army of Darius the last King of Persia, was of the isle of Rhodes. He understood the art of war perfectly well, and gave his master the best advices that could be given him in the conjuncture of Alexander's expedition. Had he lived but a few years longer, the successes of this conqueror had not been so swift, and even the whole face of affairs perhaps might have been changed. His design was to carry the war into Macedonia [A], whilst the Macedonians were making war against the king

[A] His design was to carry the war into Macedonia.] This was the way the Romans used to force the terrible Hannibal to abandon Italy: they sent a good army into Africa under the conduct of Scipio, which so alarmed Carthage, that they recalled Hannibal. This sort of diversion has been practised a hundred times to good purpose. Memnon, who intended to make use of it, thought it to be the surest expedient that he could take for supporting the affairs of Persia. He considered that no decisive battle could be fought against the Macedonian forces, as long as they were only opposed in Asia; there would be only interchanged blows, towns besieged, and sieges raised. At the beginning of the war he had attacked Cyzicus, and could not make himself master of it (1); but a little while after he forced Parmenio to raise the siege of Pitane (2). These little successes on each side serve only to perpetuate the war. And therefore when it was debated what course should be taken against the king of Macedonia, who had already passed the Hellespont, and was advancing as far as he could toward the provinces of the king of Persia, his advice was, that they should destroy all the frontiers, and embark all the troops to transport them into Macedonia. By this means Europe would be made the seat of war; Asia would be at peace; the enemy not finding any means of subsistence in a country that had been wasted, would be forced to march back and return into Europe to secure his own kingdom. And certainly it was the safest course the Persians could take; but the other generals did not like this advice; they thought it not becoming the grandeur of their monarch, and therefore they concluded that they ought to fight the enemy. Persarum duces . . . . quam belli contra Alexandrum gerendi inirent rationem, congressi deliberarant. Memnon ibi Rhodius, imperatoriis artibus perquam celebris, ne collatis signis dimicarent, sed agris longe lateque pervastatis, necessariorum inopiâ ulterius progrediendi facultatem Macedonibus intercluderent, navalibusque simul & terrestribus copiis in Macedoniam deportatis, totam belli molem in Europam transferrent censebat. Etiamsi vero consilium hujus viri optimum erat (ut eventus postea docuit) reliquorum tamen ducum assensionem impetrare nequivit, ac si consuleret ea quæ magnitudini animorum in Persis neutiquam convenirent. Quare cum sententia de conflictu cum hostibus ineundo perviciisset, accitis undique copiis, &c (3). The governour of Phrygia declared, that he would never suffer the smallest cottage under his government to be set on fire (4). Arsanes was wiser some time after, for he practised in Cilicia, what Memnon had advised (5). O how strange a thing is war! when the

(1) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii, cap. xxi.

(2) Id. ib.

(3) Id. ib. cap. xviii, pag. m. 826, 827.

(4) Arsites Phrygiæ Satrapa nec unum quidem tugurium eorum qui sibi subessent incendi se passurum adfirmaverat, inque ejus sententiam cæteris itum erat. Freinshem. Supplem. ad Curtium, lib. ii, cap. v, num. 10. He cites Arrian. 1, 4, 20.

(5) Q. Curtius, lib. iii, cap. iv.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

juſtly thought a needleſs labour to confute them. The violence wherewith Melanchthon was calumniated during his life, perſecuted him even after his Death (cc). It is aſtoniſhing, that amidſt ſo many other occupations he could write ſo many books. The number of them is prodigious; a Chronological catalogue of them was publiſhed in the year 1582 (dd). As he ſaw that his works, tho' he did not finiſh them, nay tho' he publiſhed them pretty imperfect, were nevertheleſs profitable to the youth, he rather choſe to print many of them, than to perfect a ſmall number (ee). And ſo he preferred the advantage of the public to his own glory. We may believe alſo that the happy genius wherewith he was naturally endowed, gave him ſome aſſurance that his works would be eſteemed, tho' they were not finiſhed (ff). His Latin verſes pleaſed the hypercritical Julius Cæſar Scaliger (gg). He ſometimes aſſumed a falſe name in the title of his books [O]. Cardinal

(cc) See Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. pag. 357, 358, & Bucholcer. Ind. Chron. ad ann. 1560, pag. m. 600.

(dd) Mar. Mylius is the author of that catalogue. See Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 347.

(ee) See Melch. Adam. ibid. pag. 361.

(ff) See Eraſmus, in Ciceronian.

(gg) Jul. Cæſar Scalig. Poët. lib. vi, pag. m. 736.

'the cardinal, chancellor Duprat, had drawn up againſt 'the Lutherans. On the twenty ninth of January '1535, there was a ſolemn proceſſion, at which the 'king aſſiſted on foot bare-headed, and with a wax-'taper in his hand (111).'

(111) Ib. p. 326.

There are many falſhoods in this narrative. In the Iſt place I deſire a good warrant, before I believe upon the authority of Varillas (112), that the ducheſs of Etampes concerned herſelf out of love to the Proteſtants, among other intrigues, in that of Melanchthon's journey, and that he was offered the chair of Regius profeſſor. II. It appears by the kings letter to Melanchthon, that he who carried it was called la Foſſe: And therefore it was not given to Mr de Langey. III. The elector of Saxony was ſo far from believing that Melanchthon's journey would make all France Lutheran, that one of the reaſons why he would not conſent to it, was, that he thought it would rather hinder than further the progreſs of the Reformation. This appears by the original letters which he wrote upon this occaſion (113.) IV. He was ſo far from granting Melanchthon the liberty that was neceſſary without deliberating a moment, and moreover from exhorting him to ſet forward on his journey preſently, that, on the contrary, he could not be prevailed upon, neither by the intreaties of that Profeſſor, nor by thoſe of Luther, nor by the good offices of the ambaſſador of France (114.) He wrote his excuſes to Francis I, the 28th of Auguſt 1535 (115). The ambaſſador continued ſtill to ſollicit, and all to no purpoſe, till the month of December the ſame year (116). V. Luther did not detain Melanchthon a long time, but, on the contrary, made repeated inſtances to the court of Saxony for his journey. 'Extant Lutheri ad electorem literæ d. 17. Aug. datæ tom. 'vi. fol. 491. in quibus repetitis & enixiſſimis precibus 'contendit ut Philippus ad tres menſes dimittatur '(117). - - - - - - Luther's letter to the elector dated the '17th day of Auguſt, is to be ſeen tom. vi. fol. 491. in 'which he moſt earneſtly begs, again and again, that 'Philip might be ſent in three months time.' VI. It is horrible impudence to ſay, that Melanchthon in a letter to the king, concluded with an excuſe that he had not come away the very minute the elector, his maſter, had given him leave. There is no ſuch thing in his letter, and he could not, without telling a lye, mention the permiſſion of his maſter. VII. The time of the placards ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from that wherein the bills were ſlipt into the caſket of Francis I, and if Varillas had a mind to have made a diſtinction, the bills ſhould have preceded the placards. And indeed Florimond de Remond, whom Varillas here does only paraphraſe upon, ſuppoſes that the Heretics did not poſt up any placards (118), till after they had diſperſed ſeveral books here and there . . . . . and cauſed their articles of faith to be thrown into the king's cloſet by his Apothecary's ſervant called Ferret, and even little bills into the caſket that contained the linnen for his table (119). VIII. The ſharpeſt things that were ſaid againſt the maſs and the prieſts, were not in thoſe bills, but in the placards (120). IX. Varillas cannot prove that Francis I. countermanded Melanchthon; he ſtill deſired to have him in the month of December 1535, after the letter he received from the elector of Saxony, full of excuſes for not granting to this doctor leave to go into France. It is therefore very probable that Francis I. was never under a neceſſity to countermand him. X. It is very certain that the placards did not induce him to it, for they were poſted up in the month of November 1534. The king puniſhed this inſolence, and expiated that affront to the hoſt, in the month of January following; and he wrote to Melanchthon five months after. Can one ſufficiently wonder at the negligence of Mr Varillas? He gives the ſubſtance of the letter which Francis I. wrote to Melanchthon, and he might have ſeen that it is dated the twenty eighth of June 1535. He ſays (121), that the expiatory proceſſion for the placards was made the twenty ninth of January 1535 (122), and yet he affirms, that the occaſion of the proceſſion was the cauſe why the German Divine received a counter-order.

(112) Note, that Florimond de Remond, book vii, cap. iii, ſays the ſame thing, but his authority requires another to ſupport it.

(113) See Seckendorf, Hiſtor. Lutheraniſmi, lib. iii, pag. 109, 110.

(114) Seckend. ib. pag. 107.

(115) Ib. p. 110.

(116) Ibid.

(117) Ib. p. 107.

(118) Florimond de Remond, ubi ſupra, book vii, cap. v, pag. 859.

(119) Varillas attributes this to the ſervant, and ſo does not keep to his original.

(120) Florimond de Remond, ubi ſupra.

(121) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 326.

(122) Beginning the year with the month of January.

If he had complained that his Hiſtory of Hereſy had been taken for a Romance, he would hardly have had more reaſon for doing ſo, than la Calprenede had, who took it very heinouſly, that his Caſſandra and Cleopatra were not looked upon as Hiſtories. 'Nay, I will 'ſay, for the honour of theſe works, ſays he (123), 'that juſtice is not done them by the name that is 'given them, though perhaps they have been pretty 'well received in the world, and that inſtead of cal-'ling them Romances, as the Amadis, and other ſuch 'like, wherein there is neither truth, nor probability, 'nor Geography, nor Chronology, they may be 'looked upon as hiſtories embelliſhed with ſome inven-'tion, which by theſe ornaments loſe nothing of their 'beauty. And indeed I can juſtly ſay, that in Caſſan-'dra and Cleopatra, there is not only nothing con-'trary to truth, although there be ſome things be-'yond it; but that there is not any place wherein I 'can be convicted of a lie, and which I am not able 'to maintain, by all the circumſtances of the hiſtory, 'to be true when I pleaſe. And there are ſeveral 'intelligent perſons too, who have formed the ſame 'judgment of them, and who have looked upon me 'as a man better ſkilled in the affairs of the courts 'of Auguſtus and Alexander, than thoſe who have 'writ their hiſtories.' This is an arrant rodomontade, and there are very few things more romantic than this in the works of that author. Nevertheleſs I dare repeat it, that Mr Varillas could not make the like complaints with much more reaſon. For the reſt, it is matter of aſtoniſhment, that ſo many French writers ſhould be guilty of the ſophiſm à non cauſa pro cauſa, to aſſign for a cauſe what is not ſo, ſpeaking of this affair of Melanchthon. They pretend that the fixing up of placards by the Proteſtants hindered his journey; and yet it is certain that by accident it was the cauſe why he was ſent for. How much ſoever they are to blame; they are leſs ſo than the Jeſuit Sandæus (124), who durſt call in queſtion what Thuanus relates, that Francis I. wrote to Melanchthon, &c. Conſult Mr Crenius, who ſolidly refutes the impudence of this writer, and his unjuſt contempt of Melanchthon (125).

(123) La Calprenede, preface to Pharamond.

(124) Maximil. Sandæus in præfat. Academici Chriſtiani, Commentat. vii, pag. 250, Edit. Colon. 1638, in 8vo, apud Crenium ubi infra.

[O] He ſometimes aſſumed a falſe name in the title page of his books.] He called himſelf Didymus Faventinus in the anſwer he wrote in 1520, to an oration which Thomas Rhadinus, a Dominican and Profeſſor of Divinity at Rome, had publiſhed againſt Luther. You will find an abridgment of that anſwer in Mr Seckendorf (126). But let no man think, becauſe the author declaims very ſharply againſt the errors of the ſchool-men, that I was to blame in maintaining, that he did not diſapprove Ariſtotle's Philoſophy. To know exactly the ſentiments of an author, we muſt not inſiſt upon what he ſays in an invective written againſt another invective; but we muſt learn his judgment from his didactical writings or his letters, or, in general, from ſuch works as do not favour of declamation. Every one knows how a man grows warm and exaggerates matters in harangues. After all, becauſe a man cenſures very ſharply the dangerous impertinencies wherewith the ſchool-men Philoſophy is ſtuffed, it does not follow that he condemns Ariſtotle's Philoſophy. Mr Placcius having obſerved (127) that Hoornbeeck attributed to Melanchthon

(125) Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. Part ii, pag. 24, & ſeq.

(126) Seckendorf, ubi ſupra, lib. i, pag. 108, & ſeq.

(127) Placcius de Pſeudonymis, pag. 185, 186.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Cardinal Bembus asked three questions which deserve to be related [P].

Melanchthon the Greek version of the Augsburg Confession, which appeared under the name of Paul Dolscius (128), believed that the translation of Ecclesiasticus and the Psalms into Greek verse, was the work of Melanchthon, though the name of Paul Dolscius is prefixed to them. This opinion of Placcius, which was adopted by Mr Teissier (129) and Mr Crenius (130), is found to be false. Mr Lyserus (131) ecclesiastic counsellor to H. E. H. the duke of Hanover, has proved, that the translations of the Psalter, Ecclesiastes, and Ecclesiasticus, into Greek verse, and of the Augsburg Confession into Greek prose, do really belong to Paul Dolscius (132), whose name they bear. See the letter which he wrote to Mr Crenius (133). Here let us observe a piece of negligence in Melchior Adam. He affirms, that in 1559 Melanchthon wrote in Greek to the patriarch of Constantinople, and sent him a copy of the Greek version of the Confession of Augsburg (134), which version, adds he, had been made by Melanchthon, although it was published under the name of Dolscius: And presently after he cites these words. 'Mitto tibi 'interpretationem Græcam confessionis sine meo con-'silio editam. Probo tamen phrasin, ac misi Constan-'tinopolim (135). - - - I send you the Greek version of 'the Confession, which was published without my advice. 'However, I like the style, and have sent it to Con-'stantinople.' These words are Melanchthon's, and show that he did not make this version. Wherefore we may say, that Melchior Adam produces a witness against himself, when he thought to prove what he had affirmed.

(128) Hornbeck Summa Controvers. lib. ii, pag. 979, Edit. 2.

(129) Teissier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 192.

(130) Crenius, Animadv. Philol. & Histor. Part iii, pag. 25.

(131) Great grandson of Polycarp LYSERUS, of whom I have given an article.

(132) He was rector of the college of Hall in Saxony, and then Physician, and at last burgo-master of the same city. He died in the year 1589. (133) It is at the end of the third part of the Animadversions of Mr Crenius. (134) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 351. (135) Melanchth. Epist. ad Bordingum apud Melch. Adamum, ibid.

It is pretended, that Melanchthon sometimes called himself Hippophilus Melangæus (136); but I have seen nothing of his under this disguise.

(136) See Moreri at the word Melanchthon, and Mr Baillet in the catalogue of authors disguised.

[P] Cardinal Bembus asked three questions which deserve to be related.] Melanchthon wrote to him a letter, to recommend to him George Sabinus, who was going to see Italy (137). The cardinal had a great regard to this recommendation, he showed much civility to Sabinus, and invited him to dine with him. He asked him several questions during the time of dinner, and particularly these three: What is the salary of Melanchthon? What is the number of his auditors? And what is his judgment concerning another life and the resurrection? To the first Sabinus answered, that Melanchthon's salary was but three hundred florins a year. O ungrateful Germany, said the cardinal, which purchases at so cheap a rate so many works of such a great man! The answer to the second question was, that Melanchthon had commonly fifteen hundred auditors. I cannot tell how to believe it, replied the cardinal, for I know not in all Europe any university, besides that of Paris, where the auditory of a professor is so numerous. Yet Melanchthon had often two thousand five hundred persons at his lectures. To the third question it was answered, that the writings of Melanchthon testify sufficiently his full persuasion as to those two articles. I should have a better opinion of him, replied the cardinal, if he did not believe this (138). I give you this story as I find it in Melchior Adam.

(137) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 360.

(138) Haberem virum prudentiorem si hoc non crederet. - - - - I should have a better opinion of his judgment, if he did not believe this. Id. ib.

MELCHIORITES, an imaginary sect, wherewith Prateolus, and the Jesuit Gaultier have enlarged their catalogues of Heretics, the latter upon the authority of the former, and he again by copying the very words of Lindanus. They pretend that the founder of this sect was the Anabaptist Melchior HOFMAN, of whom I have spoken in his place. But the Printer of Father Gaultier, having put Hosmannus instead of Hofmannus, was the reason that Mr Moreri has given us (a) a chimerical Heresiarch called Melchior Hosman. And thus it is that typographical errors multiply persons. If he had read the writer whom he quotes (b), he would perhaps have avoided this fault.

(a) Under the word Melchior.

(b) He quotes Prateole V. Melch. Now it is in Prateolus, Melchiore Hofmanno, and not Hofmanno. Note, that in the Paris edition 1699, instead of V. Melch. it is put Vit. Melch. This is a fault. The letter V signifies there Voce, i. e. the word, and not Vita, i. e. Life.

MEMNON, General of the army of Darius the last King of Persia, was of the isle of Rhodes. He understood the art of war perfectly well, and gave his master the best advices that could be given him in the conjuncture of Alexander's expedition. Had he lived but a few years longer, the successes of this conqueror had not been so swift, and even the whole face of affairs perhaps might have been changed. His design was to carry the war into Macedonia [A], whilst the Macedonians were making war against the king

[A] His design was to carry the war into Macedonia.] This was the way the Romans used to force the terrible Hannibal to abandon Italy: they sent a good army into Africa under the conduct of Scipio, which so alarmed Carthage, that they recalled Hannibal. This sort of diversion has been practised a hundred times to good purpose. Memnon, who intended to make use of it, thought it to be the surest expedient that he could take for supporting the affairs of Persia. He considered that no decisive battle could be fought against the Macedonian forces, as long as they were only opposed in Asia; there would be only interchanged blows, towns besieged, and sieges raised. At the beginning of the war he had attacked Cyzicus, and could not make himself master of it (1); but a little while after he forced Parmenio to raise the siege of Pitane (2). These little successes on each side serve only to perpetuate the war. And therefore when it was debated what course should be taken against the king of Macedonia, who had already passed the Hellespont, and was advancing as far as he could toward the provinces of the king of Persia, his advice was, that they should destroy all the frontiers, and embark all the troops to transport them into Macedonia. By this means Europe would be made the seat of war; Asia would be at peace; the enemy not finding any means of subsistence in a country that had been wasted, would be forced to march back and return into Europe to secure his own kingdom. And certainly it was the safest course the Persians could take; but the other generals did not like this advice; they thought it not becoming the grandeur of their monarch, and therefore they concluded that they ought to fight the enemy. Persarum duces . . . . quam belli contra Alexandrum gerendi inirent rationem, congressi deliberarant. Memnon ibi Rhodius, imperatoriis artibus perquam celebris, ne collatis signis dimicarent, sed agris longe lateque pervastatis, necessariorum inopiâ ulterius progrediendi facultatem Macedonibus intercluderent, navalibusque simul & terrestribus copiis in Macedoniam deportatis, totam belli molem in Europam transferrent censebat. Etiamsi vero consilium hujus viri optimum erat (ut eventus postea docuit) reliquorum tamen ducum assensionem impetrare nequivit, ac si consuleret ea quæ magnitudini animorum in Persis neutiquam convenirent. Quare cum sententia de conflictu cum hostibus ineundo perviciisset, accitis undique copiis, &c (3). The governour of Phrygia declared, that he would never suffer the smallest cottage under his government to be set on fire (4). Arsanes was wiser some time after, for he practised in Cilicia, what Memnon had advised (5). O how strange a thing is war! when the

(1) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii, cap. viii.

(2) Id. ib.

(3) Id. ib. cap. xviii, pag. m. 826, 827.

(4) Arsites Phrygiæ Satrapa nec tamen quidem tu-gurium eorum qui sibi subessent incendi se passurum adfirmaverat, inque ejus sententiam à ceteris itum erat. Freinshem. Supplem. ad Curtium, lib. ii, cap. v, num. 10. He cites Arrian. 1, 4, 20.

(5) Q. Curtius, lib. iii, cap. iv.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

king of Persia in Asia. He had already performed great exploits in the isle of Lesbos, which had very much terrified the other isles; and he sowed discord among the Grecians, to make a party there against Alexander: but this great design was ruined by his death. He had the advantage to know, by the conduct of Alexander with respect to him [B], that he was highly esteemed, and even much feared by this great monarch. He performed his duty very well at the battle of Granicus (a), where the Persians were so unfortunate as not to hinder the enemy from passing over the river, and getting the victory. He signalzed himself afterwards in the defence of Halicarnassus (b). He acted like a person of honour and a brave soul, in chastising a soldier who railed at Alexander [C]. His widow the most charitable thing that can be done, is very often to set fire to great cities, and to burn all in many provinces, because without this the whole kingdom would be lost; and the pity which one should show to one of the members, would be a cruelty to the whole body (6). It is then pity to the whole, which inspires men with cruelty to a part. Unhappy necessity! This is a fatal maxim when applied to matters of religion, as was done by Catherine de Medicis. 'The king being somewhat doubtful, 'the queen to encourage him, among other things, 'spoke these words; Will it not be better, said she, to 'tear in pieces those rotten members, than the bosom of 'the church, which is the Spouse of our Lord? She con-'cluded with a sentence taken from one of the ser-'mons of the bishop of Bitonto, in these words: Che 'pieta lor fer crudela? Che crudelta lor fer pietoso (7)? '- - - - Pity would be cruelty. Cruelty would be pity.' Let us return to Miletus (8); he defended like a brave and skillful general the city of Halicarnassus: and not being able to force the enemy to raise the siege, he left a good garrison in the citadel, and transported the inhabitants, with their effects, to the isle of Cos (9): He thought always of the project he had proposed in the great council of war, and that he might move Darius to put an entire confidence in him, he sent to the court of Persia his wife and children, as a pledge of his fidelity (10). Having received great sums of money, and the post of generalissimo (11), he made great preparations by sea and land; he subdued the isles of Chios and Lesbos; he threatened also Eubœa; he held correspondence with the Grecians, and corrupted many of them with his presents. In a word, he was ready to cut out a great deal of work for his king's enemies in their own country, when a sickness suddenly seized him, and carried him off in a few days. 'Chium itaque sibi 'adjungit, & Lesbum cum classe petens, Antissam, 'Methymnum, Pyrrhum & Eressum, non magno ne-'gocio, capit. Sed Mitylenen & Lesbum, quia ma-'jor erat, magnoque apparatu & propugnatorum mul-'titudine probe instructa, per multos dies oppugna-'tam, post magnam suorum jacturam difficulter tan-'dem expugnat. Cujus strenuitatis fama, cum subito 'percrebuisset, Cycladum Insularum pleræque de pa-'ctionibus ineundis legationes miserunt. Rumor tunc 'allapsus erat Græciæ, Memnonem totâ cum classe 'Eubœam invasurum: unde factum, ut magno Insulæ 'civitates metu perculsæ essent, & Græcorum nonnulli 'Persarum societatem amplexi, animos rerum novarum 'spe arrectos haberent. Huc accessit, quod Memnon 'Græcorum non paucis largitione corruptis, ut suas ad 'Persarum spes aggregatas vellent, persuaserat. At-'qui viri hujus virtutem ad ampliora progredi for-'tuna non permisit, cum enim in valitudinem ad-'versam incidisset, periculoso quodam morbo correp-'tus, è vita decessit, ejusque morte res Darii labe-'factatæ sunt. Rex enim totam belli molem ex Asiâ 'in Europam translatum iri sperabat (12). - - - - So 'he subdued Chios, and going to Lesbos with a fleet, he 'took Antissa, Methymna, Pyrrhus, and Eressus, with-'out great difficulty. But as Mitylene was larger, and 'well fortified and defended with a numerous garrison, 'it cost him much trouble. However at last he forced 'it to surrender, after he had besieged it a long time, and 'lost a great number of his men. The fame of his 'bravery was soon spread abroad, which induced most 'of the islands of the Cyclades to send ambassadours 'to treat of an accommodation. At the same time a re-'port was spread in Greece, that Memnon was coming 'with his whole fleet to invade Eubœa; which struck 'the cities of that island with great fear, and some 'Grecians, having made an alliance with the Persians, 'had great expectations from a change of affairs. And 'moreover, Memnon having corrupted many of them 'with presents, persuaded them to join the Persians. 'But fortune stopt the progress of this great man's va-'lour; for he was seized with a dangerous illness which 'put an end to his life, and, by his death, the affairs of 'of Darius were brought low. For the king had hopes 'to carry the whole strength of the war out of Asia into 'Europe.'

(a) He commanded the left wing in that battle. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii, cap. xix.

(b) Id. ib. cap. xxiv, & seq.

(6) See in the Supplements of Freinshemius to Q. Curtius, lib. ii, cap. iv, the reasons upon which Memnon built his opinion.

(7) D'Aubigné, Tom. ii, book i, cap. iv, pag. m. 542.

(8) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvii, cap. xxii.

(9) Id. ib. cap. xxiv, & seq.

(10) Id. ib. cap. xxiii.

(11) Ibid. cap. xxix.

(12) Ib. pag. m. 834, 835.

[B] The conduct of Alexander with respect to him.] This young prince marching with his army near the territories of Memnon, strictly forbad his soldiers to commit the least disorder in them. His design was either to render him suspected to the Persians, or to draw him to his own party. 'Alexander quum inter pro-'grediendum agrum a Rege Persarum Memnoni dono da-'tum adtigisset, maleficio † abstineri jubet, coloniisque & 'fructibus parcit: callido commento suspectum facturus ho-'minem industrium, & quem ‡ ex omnibus hostium du-'cibus unum non contemneret; si in suas partes transdu-'cere nequivisset. Quumque lenitatem regis admirati qui-'dam, acerrimum ‡ callidissimumque Macedonum hostem, 'quam primum in potestatem redactus esset, interficien-'dum, atque interim quibus posset cladibus vexandum 'esse dicerent: quin, inquit, potius beneficiis supplanta-'mus hominem, & amicum ex inimico facimus, eadem 'virtute & solertia pro nobis staturum (13). - - - And 'as some wondered at the king's lenity, and said, that 'such a violent and subtile enemy of the Macedonians 'ought to be put to death as soon as he was in their 'power, and in the mean time to be distressed by all 'ways possible: but, answered he, we rather under-'mine him by good turns, and make him a friend of 'an enemy, that he may use the same valour and sub-'tilty in our behalf.' I have put in the margin the words of Quintus Curtius, which Freinshemius refers to (14).

† Polyæn. 4, 3, 15.

‡ Curtius, 3, 1, 31.

‡ Them. Orat. 9.

(13) Freinshemius, ubi supra, lib. ii, cap. v, initio.

(14) Nondum Memnonem vita excessisse cognoverat (Alexander) in quem omnes intenderat curas, satis gnarus cuncta in expeditio fore si nihil ab eo moveretur.

[C] He chastised a soldier who railed at Alexander.] I have not taken you said he to him, striking him with his javelin, to rail at this prince, but to fight against him. Μισθοφόρον τινὰ πολλὰ βλάσφημα καὶ ἀσελγῆ περὶ Ἀλεξάνδρου λέγοντα τῇ λόγχῃ παταξας, Ἐγώ σε (εἶπε) τρῶσω μαχόμενον, ἀλλ' οὐ λοιδορούμενον Ἀλεξάνδρῳ. Militem quendam mercenarium suum, qui multis & impuris convitiis Alexandrum proscindebat, lancea feriens, Ego, inquit, te alo, non ut maledicas Alexandro, sed ut contra eum pugnes (15). This is a good maxim, but it was not much practised in the time of Francis I, and Charles V, and I know not whether it be more practised at present. Freinshemius observes, that Memnon vigorously opposed some fugitive Grecians, who were so full of hatred against the Macedonians, that they were not for suffering Alexander to bury his dead, though by that permission they might boast of the victory. Memnon would not listen to the passion of these fugitives, and granted a cessation of arms, and the dead bodies which Alexander demanded. This was done at the siege of Halicarnassus. Read what follows: 'Alexander quam-'quam ea res opinione Græcorum * de victoria conce-'dentis videretur; corpora suorum, qui sub ipsis mœ-'nibus oppetierant, induciis postulatis ab hoste repe-'tere, quam inhumata dimittere maluit. At  qui 'cum Persis erant, Ephialtes & Thrasybulus Athenien-'ses, quum plus apud ipsos odium adversus Macedo-'nas, quam humanitatis ratio valeret, negabant in-'dulgendum hoc esse infestissimis hostibus. Non tamen 'permoverunt Memnonem, quin Græcorum moribus 'indignum esse diceret, sepulturam invidere cæsis hosti-'bus. ARMIS ET viribus in adversos & obsistentes 'utendum: neque contumeliis pugnandum in eos, quos 'bonis malisque nostris sua dies eximisset (16). - - - - - Alexander, tho' it might seem in the opinion of the 'Greeks to be yielding the victory, chose rather to de-'mand

(15) Plut. in Apoph. pag. 174.

* Justin. 6, 6, 9.

 Diodor. 17, 25.

(16) Freinshem ibid. cap. ix.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google widow was the first woman whom this conquerour knew [D]. Mr Moreri has not clearly expressed himself [E], when he mentions the advice which this General gave, to destroy all the country through which the enemies troops were to march. I ought not to forget, that Mentor, the brother of Memnon, did very great services to king Artaxerxes Ochus, and was well rewarded for it (c). He restored his brother and brother-in-law (d) to the favour of this Monarch; for he caused them to be recalled from the Court of Macedonia, whither they had fled, after their bad success in a civil war (e).

(c) See Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvii.

(d) He was called Artabazus; and married the sister of Memnon, and had by her eleven sons and ten daughters. Id. ib. cap. liii.

(e) Id. ib.

Mr Chevreau affirms (f), that MEMNON, general of an army, who is mentioned at the end of the twelfth book of the expedition of Cyrus, by Xenophon, was deceitful, covetous, ambitious, a slanderer, and an impostor. Thus he gives the character of this wicked wretch; but he should have observed that Xenophon calls him Menon, and not Memnon.

(f) Chevræana, Part ii, pag. 55, Dutch Edit.

'mand a truce of the enemy and to fetch away the 'bodies of his men, who died under the very walls, 'than to leave them unburied. But Ephialtes and 'Thrasybulus, both Athenians, who were then with the 'Persians, being swayed more by their hatred to the Ma- 'cedonians, than by the consideration of humanity, were 'against granting this indulgence to their mortal enemies. But yet they could not prevail upon Memnon, 'who told them, it was unworthy the manners of the 'Greeks to refuse their slain enemies burial. We 'ought to use ARMS AND forces, says he, against 'such as oppose and resist us; and not to insult those, 'whom death has removed from the good and evil we 'can do them.'

[D] His widow was the first woman whom Alexander knew.] Plutarch assures us of this: Οὔτε τῶν ἐθιγεν ἔτε ἄλλην ἔγνω γυναῖκα πρὸ γάμου, πλὴν Βαρσίνης. Nec has attigit, nec mulierem ante nuptias cognovit ullam, excepta Barsene (17). - - - - - Neither did he touch them, nor did he know any woman before marriage except Barsene. She was called Barsene, and was the daughter of Artabazus, whose mother was a daughter of a king of Persia. She was mild and civil, and understood Greek and the manners of the Grecians, and was very beautiful: So that Parmenio considering that, besides all this, she was of high birth, exhorted the king, his master, to divert himself with this prisoner (18). She was taken at the same time with the mother, the wife, and daughters, of Darius (19). The counsel of Parmenio was followed, which had fruitful consequences, since Barsene bore a son (20) to Alexander. She had two sisters (21) whom this prince married very advantageously.

(17) Plut. in Alexand. pag. 676.

(18) Id. ib.

(19) Curtius, lib. iii, sub fin. Plutarch, ibid. says that she was taken at Damascus.

(20) Called Hercules, Plut. ubi infra.

(21) One was the wife of Eumenes, and the other of Ptolomy. Plut. in Eumene, init. pag. m. 583.

[E] Mr Moreri has not clearly expressed himself.] These are his words in the article of Alexander: Darius would not make a devastation in Asia, according to the advice of Memnon. This is equivocal; for if I should write to a man, I have not answered that letter according to your advice, or following your advice, those who should read these words, would rather think that he advised me not to answer, than to do it. At least they would think the first sense as good as the other; and therefore I may affirm, that if one did not know what Memnon advised, he could not certainly understand what Moreri meant. So necessary it is to place our words right, if we would be understood, even when we use the reader's mother-tongue.

MENAGE (GILES), in Latin Ægidius Menagius, was one of the most learned men of his time, and the Varro of the XVIIth century. It would be needless here to give his elogium and an abridgment of his life; which is to be found in books that are every where dispersed (a), and which may be more easily transported into the remotest countries, than this great Dictionary. His illustrious friends erected a very glorious monument to him, in the collection intituled Menagiana [A], which has already passed through every one's hands. Had it not been for this, I should have taken pleasure, and thought it my particular duty to put here a long article of Mr Menage. I should have insisted upon the

(a) Moreri, Baillet, Niceron, Augustin Lemaire, Le Clerc, Gallandius, and the same year. See the continuation of the Menagiana at the beginning.

[A] The collection, intituled Menagiana.] Those who can judge of things aright, will confess, that this collection is very proper to shew the extent of genius and learning, which was the character of Mr Menage. And I may be bold to say, that the excellent works which he published will not distinguish him from other learned men so advantageously as this. To publish books of great learning, to make Greek and Latin verses exceeding well turned is not a common talent, I own; neither is it extremely rare. It is incomparably more difficult to find men, who can furnish discourse about an infinite number of things, and who know how to diversify them an hundred ways. How many authors are there, who are admired for their works upon the account of the vast learning that is displayed in them, who are not able to sustain a conversation? Some have a memory full of holes like a sieve, or like the cask of the Danaides, which receives every thing, but retains nothing; all would run out, and be entirely lost, if they had not some reservoirs just ready. These are their collections, which are treasures that fail not in time of need, when one writes a book, but are very needless in familiar discourses about learning. Those who know Mr Menage, only by his books, might think he resembled those learned men: but if you shew the MENAGIANA, you distinguish him from them, and make him known by a talent that is given to very few learned men. There it appears, that he was a man who spoke off-hand a thousand good things. His memory extended to what was antient and modern, to the court and to the city, to the dead and to the living languages, to things serious and things jocose; in a word, to a thousand sorts of subjects. That which appeared a trifle to some readers of the Menagiana, who did not consider circumstances, caused admiration in other readers, who minded the difference that is to be made between what a man speaks without preparation, and that which he prepares for the press. This Menagiana contains things of that kind, whereof one may say what one of the antients said of insects. 'Turrigeros elephantorum miramur humeros, 'taurorumque colla, & truces in sublime jactus, tigrium 'rapinas, leonum jubas, cum rerum natura nihilquam 'magis, quam in minimis, tota sit (1). - - - We admire the tower-bearing shoulders of elephants, and the 'necks of bulls, and the furious tossings of their heads, 'the ravenings of tygers, and the manes of lions, tho' 'nature is never more compleat, than in the smallest 'animals.' Aristotle also said, Μᾶλλον ἐπὶ τῶν ἐλαττόνων ἢ μειζόνων ἴδοι τις ἂν τὴν τῆς διανοίας ἀκρίβειαν. Magis in minore genere (brutorum) quam in majore videris intelligentiæ rationem *. - - - You may see more understanding in the smaller kind of brutes than in the greater. And therefore we cannot sufficiently commend the care which his illustrious friends took to erect to him a monument so capable of giving him immortal glory. They were not obliged to rectify what they had heard him say; for in so doing, they had not been faithful Historians of his conversations. The most happy memories are liable to be deceived, and besides Mr Menage spoke sometimes concerning certain persons, what other people, being ill informed, had told him. We must not therefore wonder, that there are some mistakes in the Menagiana, and some things false in point of personality. He is mistaken in what he says of me.

(1) Plin. lib. xi, cap. ii.

* Aristot. Hist. Animal. lib. ix, cap. vii.

[B] The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the diſputes he had with perſons of great merit; but I would have paſſed lightly over the difference he had with the count de Buſſi Rabutin [B].

Some perſons, whom I infinitely eſteem, did not approve of making the article of Mr Menage ſo ſhort in this Dictionary, and oppoſed the reaſons I have given for my brevity. They think, that the three books to which I refer the reader, will not be in the hands of all thoſe who will ſeek here for the hiſtory of this learned man. I do not agree to their opinion; and if I enlarge this article in this ſecond edition, it is only to ſet down a circumſtance which the three authors referred to (b) do not relate; it concerns the good fortune of Mr Menage as to his memory. This was a gift which he eminently poſſeſſed and which he preſerved to old age, and what is more rare, he recovered it after ſome interruption [C]. There

(b) Add to thoſe three, two others that have appeared ſince the firſt edition of my work, viz. Moreri of the Paris Edition, 1699, and the Elogies of Mr Perrault.

[B] The difference he had with the count de Buſſi Rabutin.] This difference may paſs for a quarrel of authors, altho' this count was a military man, and had a high poſt in the French army. This affair was decided by the ſtrokes of the pen. He firſt attacked Mr Menage in writing, and offended him grievouſly; but the verſes which Mr Menage printed againſt him, were the moſt contumelious and bloody that could be made. Here is the attack; afterwards we ſhall ſee the return. 'Menage being in love with 'Madam de Sevigny; his birth, his age, and his 'figure, obliged him to conceal his love as much as 'he could: and being one day with her, when ſhe 'was going out to buy ſome things, as her woman 'could not attend her, ſhe bid Menage go in the 'coach with her. He ſeeming to be in jeſt, but, in 'reality, being vexed, told her, it was very hard for 'him to find, that ſhe was not ſatisfied with the 'ſeverity ſhe had uſed him with for ſo long a time, 'but ſtill deſpiſed him, by thinking that none could 'ſpeak ill of him and her. Come, ſaid ſhe, come 'into the coach, if you vex me, I will go and viſit 'you at your own houſe (2).' Thus you ſee that the provocation was very great; but the Latin epigram of the perſon provoked far exceeded it.

(2) Hiſtoire Amoureuſe des Gaules, pag. m. 189, 190.

FRANCORUM proceres, media (quis credat?) in aula
Buſſiades ſcripto læſerat horribili
Pœna levis: LODOIX nebulonem carcere claudens,
Detrahit indigno munus equeſtre Duci.
Sic nebulo, gladiis quos formidabat Iberis;
Quos meruit, Francis fuſtibus eripitur (3).

(3) Menage, Epigr. cxxxviii, pag. 147, 148, Edit. Amſtel. 1687.

Buſſi Rabutin in writings vile,
Had, ev'n at court, the peers of France abus'd.
Lewis to priſon the worthleſs ſcoundrel ſent,
And from him took his military poſt.
Slight puniſhment! for, this the raſcal ſav'd
From Spaniſh ſwords, which coward-like he fear'd,
And from French cudgels, which he had deſerv'd.

If the author of theſe Latin verſes had had a benefice with cure of ſouls; if he had been not only a curate, but a true curate; he would have taken the meer accuſation of making love to Madam de Sevigny, as a horrid injury; but as his engagement in the clerkſhip, went no farther than his being qualified to enjoy ſome penſions out of benefices, without acting againſt the modern diſcipline, that which vexed him in the diſcourſe of count Rabutin, was ſomething elſe than what is contained in the firſt four or five words. He made no ſcruple to confeſs, that he had been in love, which I do not prove by his poems, for that proof would be ambiguous, that language is deceitful; but he affirms it in a very ſerious Epiſtle Dedicatory. 'I pray you to remember, ſays he, ſpeaking to the 'chevalier de Meré (4), that when we made our court 'together to a lady of great quality and merit, 'whatever paſſion I had for that illuſtrious perſon, 'I willingly ſuffered that ſhe ſhould love you more 'than me, becauſe I loved you more than myſelf.' He promiſed a work which he never publiſhed, wherein he would have given an account of his amours: and the reaſon why I believe ſo, is taken from theſe words: 'Why did he not mention 'Madam de la Fayette and Madam de Sevigny, who 'are his acquaintance?' It is Father Bouhours who aſked this queſtion. Mr Menage anſwered him:

(4) Menage, Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Obſervations upon the French tongue, fol. a iij. See alſo what he confeſſes in a dialogue of Sarraſin, pag. m. 146, and which is mentioned in the new letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 777.

Pater Bohurſe, flos Scholæ Pariſius,
Deſideramus hic tuam prudentiam.

Father Bouhours, the ornament of Paris, in this I want your diſcretion.

'The reverend Father Bouhours accuſes me in this 'place of having been in love with Madam de 'Sevigny and Madam de la Fayette. I will anſwer 'this accuſation in the defence of my behaviour; 'and I will make ſuch an anſwer, that the laugh which 'Father Bouhours courts ſo much, ſhall not be on 'his ſide (5).' After all, the friendſhip between Mr Menage and ſome ladies of great wit, have done him much honour in the world, and will be glorious to him hereafter: For it is ſo rare, that ſo much Greek and Grammar as he had, ſhould not quite ſtifle the talents which are neceſſary for a polite and genteel converſation with ladies of quality, that this is a kind of prodigy. For the reſt, the keen reſentment which he expreſſed in his Latin verſes, did not hinder him from acknowledging the merit of the author who had offended him. 'Mr de Buſſy Rabutin 'is a fine wit, ſaid he (6), and I cannot but do him 'this juſtice, altho' he has endeavoured to ridicule 'me in his Hiſtoire des Gaules. No man can write 'with more ſpirit and fire than he has done in that 'hiſtory.' This looks like a man that is very ready to be reconciled. Such a reconciliation would not have been thought ſtrange, ſince Madam de Sevigny, who had been ſo ill treated in the ſame work, forgot the affront, and lived with the author as a very good kinſwoman. This appears by the letters ſhe wrote to him, and which were printed with thoſe of Mr de Rabutin.

(5) Id. Obſervations upon the French Tongue, Tom. ii, pag. 211, 212.

(6) Continuation of the Menagiana, pag. 356, Dutch Edit.

[C] Memory was a gift which he eminently poſſeſſed, and which he preſerved .... and which he recovered after ſome interruption.] That he ſhould remember things happily in his youth is not a rarity: but it was a peculiar favour of his ſtars, that when he began to grow old he did not perceive his memory to decay much, which is the too common misfortune of learned men. We will here cite a thing which was publiſhed in the year 1685. Several Hiſtorians are guilty of a very abſurd fault, which is this: 'They 'relate the ſame thing ſometimes one way, and ſome-'times another. It would be more for the honour of 'their memory, that they were always miſtaken; 'but on the other ſide it may be ſaid, that ſince the 'memory is the firſt thing that dies in a learned man, 'and the faculty which is the leaſt poſſible to be retained, we muſt not examine too rigorouſly the ſlips 'which forgetfulneſs may occaſion. Methinks we 'ought to have the ſame indulgence for theſe faults, 'as for thoſe which divines call quotidianæ incurſionis, 'daily infirmities; ſince it is certain, that forgetfulneſs is an imperfection into which we relapſe 'every moment. From whence it appears, that the 'ſciences are not proper to make a man happy in 'this life; for as that which is moſt agreeable in 'learning, is to remember many things, and as this 'talent is the ſooneſt weakened and deſtroyed, a 'learned man ſees himſelf every day expoſed to the 'mortification of finding that what was moſt com-'fortable to him, forſakes him. Happy is the man, 'who, like the illuſtrious Mr Menage, makes no 'fine verſes to complain of the decay of his memory, 'till after he has enjoyed it a long time (7).' What has been juſt now ſaid, that memory is the firſt thing that dies in a learned man, was obſerved by Thuanus, 'Memoria in longævis ex omnibus animi facultatibus 'prima debilitatur & vacillat (8). - - - - Memory in old 'men is the firſt of all the faculties of the mind that 'fails and declines.' Seneca, the father, made the ſame obſervation, after he had experienced in his own perſon this bad effect of old age. 'Cum multa jam 'mihi,

(7) Nouvelles de la Republique de Lettres, June 1685, art. 1, pag. 602, of the ſecond edition.

(8) Thuan. lib. cxxxiv, pag. 1082, col. 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

There are many people who wiſh, he had publiſhed ſome of his pleas [B].

(9) Seneca Pater Præfat. lib. i, Controvers. pag. m. 70.

'mihi, ſays he (9), ex me deſideranda ſenectus fecerit, 'oculorum aciem retuderit, aurium ſenſum habetave-'rit, nervorum firmitatem fatigaverit, inter ea quæ 'retuli memoria eſt, res ex omnibus partibus animi, 'maxime delicata & fragilis: in quam primam ſe-'nectus incurrit. - - - - As old age has already brought 'many infirmities upon me, as dimneſs of ſight, dul-'neſs of hearing, and weakneſs of nerves, among the 'reſt is the defect of memory, which is the moſt delicate 'and brittle of all the faculties of the mind, and which 'old age attacks the firſt.' The paſſage which I have cited from the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, informs us, that Mr Menage made ſome verſes, complaining of the decay of his memory: they are to be ſeen in the firſt book of his poems at p. 13, of the Amſterdam edition, 1687. My reader, if I miſtake not, will be glad to ſee ſome of them here; and they will not be ſuperfluous, ſince they contain a deſcription of this fine talent, whereof Mr Menage, as I have ſaid, was poſſeſſed. Here follows then the beginning of the hymn which he addreſſed to the goddeſs of Memory.

Muſarum veneranda parens, quam Juppiter ipſe,
Ille pater Divûm, magno dilexit amore,
MNEMOSYNE, fidum tu me patrona clientem
Deſeris? Ah memini, juvenis cùm mille Sophorum,
Mille recenſerem Sectarum nomina: mille
Stemmata narrarem, totaſque ex ordine gentes.
Nunc oblita mihi tot nomina. Vix mihi nomen
Hæret mente meum. Memini, cum plurima Homeri,
Plurima Peligni recitarem carmina Vatis:
Omnia Virgilii memori cum mente tenerem.
Nunc oblita mihi tot carmina. Non ego poſſim,
Condita quæ nuper mihi ſunt, meminiſſe meorum,
Gallia quem ſtupuit, ſtupuit me maximus ille
BIGNONIDES, legum capita omnia commemorantem.
Fabellas lepidas & acute dicta Sophorum,
Narrabam juvenis, juvenum mirante caterva,
Ingenii pars illa mei, placuiſſe puellis
Quâ potui, periit: nunc illis fabula ſio.
Pendebant olim, memini, narrantis ab ore.
Fabellas eaſdem, verſus eoſdem repetentem
(Has narraſſe ſemel, ſemel hos recitaſſe putabam?
Id me hodie monuit fiduſque vetuſque ſodalis)
Nunc me faſtoſæ medio in ſermone relinquunt (10).

(10) Menage, Poëmat. lib. i, pag. m. 13.

O venerable parent of the nine,
Belov'd by Jove, the father of the gods,
MNEMOSYNE, my patroneſs moſt kind,
Me, thy faithful client, doſt thou forſake?
Ah! I remember in my youthful days,
I could by heart rehearſe and reckon up
A thouſand ſages, and a thouſand ſects;
Whole nations in order, with their kings
Ev'n to a thouſand I could tell, but now
Scarce one of all thoſe names do I retain.
I know the time, when many an hundred lines
Of Homer, and of Ovid I could ſay,
And Virgil's whole poem with eaſe repeat;
All which I have forgot. What I myſelf
But lately wrote, I cannot recollect.
That great man, BIGNON'S SON, whom France admir'd,
Was much ſurpriz'd to hear me ſay by heart
All the heads of law. Crowds of wondring youth,
Then but a youth myſelf, attentive heard
When merry tales and apophthegms I told.
Young maids with liſtning ears upon me hung,
But now to them I am a joke become.
Now with contempt they leave me as I tell
The ſelf-ſame ſtories, and as I repeat
The ſelf-ſame verſes, which I thought but once
I had to them rehears'd. A faithful friend,
And old, with this acquainted me to-day.

You ſee, that among other things, he owns he was informed, that he repeated the ſame ſtories, thinking it was the firſt time he had told them. Aftewards he ſupplicates the goddeſs, either that ſhe would not abandon him, or that ſhe would ſo utterly forſake him, that he ſhould not ſo much as remember he had ever known any thing.

Si tales tu, Diva, preces audire recuſas
Diva, precor, memorem omnem nobis eripe mentem. (11) Id. ib. pag. m. 7.
Orbilius fiam, cunctarum oblivio rerum:
Nec meminiſſe queam, tot rerum non meminiſſe (11).

If theſe my prayers thou doſt refuſe to hear,
O goddeſs, take all mem'ry from me quite,
That of my loſs I may not conſcious be.

His prayer was heard in the moſt favourable ſenſe, his memory returned to him; and he did ſolemnly and publickly thank the deity which was ſo propitious to him. Here follows the beginning of the thankſgiving, which he publiſhed November 27, 1690, aged ſeventy ſeven years, three months, and ſeven days.

MUSARUM veneranda parens; quam Juppiter ipſe,
Ipſe pater Divûm, tenero dilexit amore;
Audiſti mea vota. Seni memorem mihi mentem
Diva redonaſti. Magnorum nomine mille,
Et proceres omnes ab origine Sablolienſes,
Leges Romanas, Sectas memorare Sophorum,
Tulli mille locos, & Homeri carmina centum,
Et centum poſſum verſus recitare Maronis.
Ingenii pars illa mei, juvenis placuiſſe
Quâ potui, ecce redux. Tua ſunt hæc munera, Diva.
Ingenii per te nobis renovata juventa eſt.

O venerable parent of the nine,
Belov'd by Jove, the father of the gods,
My prayers are heard; thou haſt to me reſtor'd
The gift of mem'ry. Now I can relate,
Tho' far in years, a thouſand famous names,
And all the nobles of the Sablyan race,
The Roman laws, and various ſects of old,
A thouſand paſſages of Tully's works.
Of Homer's poem, and of Virgil's too,
An hundred lines I can by heart repeat:
That faculty, with which I gave delight
When young, is now return'd. It is thy gift,
Who haſt renew'd the vigour of my mind.

Let us alſo ſet down the concluſion of this little poem, wherein the author ſupplicates the deity, which had reſtored to him the remembrance of ſo many things, to take from him the remembrance of the injuries he had received.

Muſarum veneranda parens, quam Juppiter ipſe,
Ipſe pater Divûm, tenero dilexit amore;
O diva, ô noſtræ meritò pars maxima famæ,
Eſt aliud ſupplex quod ego tu numina poſco.
Si te non pigeat, ſi non indebita poſco,
Quæ mihi tot rerum, rerum mihi jucundarum
Quas oblitus eram, rurſum meminiſſe dediſti,
Da, Dea; da nobis, atrocia tot nebulonum,
Immeritum qui me pergunt vexare libellis,
Dicta oblivíſci, memori mihi condita mente.

O venerable parent of the nine,
Belov'd by Jove, the father of the gods,
O thou, to whom I chiefly owe my fame,
Another thing I humbly thee beſeech,
If it be lawful, and without offence.
O goddeſs kind, who haſt again beſtow'd
The precious gift of memory, which was loſt,
Grant, I pray thee, grant, that I may forget

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And blot out from my mind the vile abuse
With which base wretches in their books me load.

But notwithstanding this happy restoration, there is proof that Mr Menage did not speak exactly of the affair. Consider a little these words of the Menagiana. ‘ I said some years ago, that I had lost one half of ‘ my memory, because I remembered very well what ‘ I had lent, and did not at all remember what I ‘ had borrowed. This was reported in Holland, ‘ and those who knew me, bewailed my condition, ‘ thinking that I had entirely lost it. Yet still I retain ‘ it pretty well, and have given sufficient proofs of it ‘ by the books I have published since that time (12.)’ How could he think, that the report of a discourse in conversation should persuade any in Holland, that he had entirely lost his memory? had they not seen his hymn to Mnemosyne, wherein he declared to all the world that he remembered nothing. To know the strength and reach of his memory, one needs only consider what he says of it, and what the abbot du Bois adds at the 309, 310, 311, pages of the first Dutch edition of the Menagiana.

(12) Menagiana, pag. 31, 32, of the first Dutch Edition.

[D] Many people wish he had published some of his pleas.] His first profession was that of an advocate, as we learn from himself in this passage of his Origines. In 1632, I was admitted advocate at Angers, which is the place of my birth, and there I pleaded my first cause against Mr Ayrault, my cousin-german, who was since counsellor in the parliament of Bretagne, and commissary in the chamber of Justice. I came to Paris the same year held I was also admitted advocate. and where I pleaded for several years. In 1634, the parliament of Paris were their extraordinary sessions at Poitiers, where I pleaded also. And this made Mr Costar say, that as there where serjeants serving warrants through all the kingdom, so I was an advocate pleading through all the kingdom, and upon the same account Father Jacob, a Carmelite, told me, in one of his catalogues of new books, which he did me the honour to inscribe to me, Atque erit in triplici par tibi nemo foro (13). - - - - - And at the triple bar you'll find no match. The memoirs for the Life of Menage, printed at the beginning of the continuation of the Menagiana, inform us, that he pleaded several causes in the parliament of Paris, one among the rest for Mr Sengebere, who taught him the Civil-Law, and had a mind to divorce his wife for adultery. I am sure this plea would be very acceptable to many people, if it were printed.

(13) Menage Origines de la Langue Françoise, at the word Rachat, pag. 611, Edit. of 1694. See the Memoires of Mr Maroles, pag. 96.

MENANDRINO (MARSILIUS DE) better known by the name of Marsilius of Padua, the city where he was born, was one of the most learned Civilians of the XIVth century (a). He studied at the university of Orleans (b), and was counseller to the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and wrote an apology for this prince in the year 1324 [A], in which he maintained that the Pope ought to be subject to the Emperor, not only with regard to temporal things, but likewise with regard to the outward discipline of the church. He displayed in a lively manner the pride, luxury, and the other irregularities, of the court of Rome, and proved that, by divine right, all bishops are equal to the Pope. John XXII, who possessed at that time the see of Rome, was so enraged at this doctrine of Marsilius of Padua, that he issued out against him a long decree, wherein he endeavoured to refute him, and by which he excommunicated him in the year 1327. Our Marsilius died in the month of September in the year 1328, at Montemalto (c). He is quoted by cardinal Zabarella (d), among those who wrote to prove that the monks of St Francis could have no property in any thing. I do not believe that he taught, as it is affirmed in Moreri, that neither bishops nor priests can possess estates. In this, as well as all the rest of the article, Moreri copied Father Gaultier, the transcriber of Prateolus.

(a) Father Gaultier deceived by Prateolus, and Moreri deceived by both have placed him wrong, in the beginning of the XIIth century.

(b) Marsilius Patavinus, in Defensore Pacis, part ii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 296.

(c) Taken from the Appendix of Dr Cave's Hist. Litterar. Script. Eccles. pag. 23.

(d) Zabarella, in Clementin. Exivit & de Electione.

[A] He wrote an apology for the emperor Lewis of Bavaria in the year 1324.] The Protestants have frequently quoted it, and took care to publish it soon; for, in the year 1522, they put forth an edition of it, in folio at Basil, with a preface, the author of which calls himself, Licentius Evangelius sacerdos (1). Mr Wharton (2) has taken notice not only of this edition, but also of those of Francfort 1612, 1623, in 8vo; and has not forgot to observe, that this work was inserted by Goldast in the second tome of his Monarchy; but makes no mention of the edition of Francfort, 1592, in 8vo, apud Jo. Wechelum, which was procured by Francis Gomarus. The title of it is this: Defensor Pacis, sive adversus usurpatam Rom. Pontificis Jurisdictionem, Marsilii Patavini pro invictiss. & constantiss. Rom. Imperatore Ludovico IV Bavarico, à tribus Rom. Pontificibus indigna perpessо, Apologia, qua Politicæ & Ecclesiasticæ potestatis limites doctissime explicantur: circa annum Domini 1324 conscripta, nunc vero ad omnium Principum, Magistratuum, & Ecclesiæ Catholicæ, ac nominatim Christianiss. Galliarum & Navarræ Regis &c. Henrici IV (à tribus etiam Rom. Pontificibus iniquè oppugnati) ejusque Regni & Ecclesiarum autoritatem ac libertatem demonstrandum utilissima. Franciscus Gomarus Brugensis recensuit, Capitum Argumentis & Notis ad marginem illustravit. I have compared this edition with that which is intituled. Marsilii de Menandrino, Patavini vulgo dicti, DEFENSOR PACIS, five Apologia pro Ludovico IV Imp. Bavaro. Tractatus de Translatione Imperii, ante CCC prope annos scripta. Ex Bibliopolio Comeliano MDXCIX; and they seem to me to differ only with regard to the preambles; that is to say, the title only, and not the body of the book was reprinted: the epistle dedicatory in verse, subscribed Franciscus Gomarus, and addressed to the elector Palatine Frederic IV, was taken away: the advertisment to the reader was a little changed: and the Testimonia Autorum, and the treatise de Translatione Imperii, which contains but twenty six pages, were added. This treatise was wrote by our Marsilius of Padua, who besides that composed a book de Jurisdictione Imperiali in Causis Matrimonialibus.

(1) See the Biblioth. de Gesner, fol. 499 verso: and the Epitome, pag. m. 574, 575.

(2) Wharton, in Append. ad Cave, pag. 23.

Note that the Parenthesis (3), where it is observed in the title of the Defensor Pacis, that Lewis of Bavaria, had been persecuted by three Popes, could not have been in the manuscript of the author; for when he wrote this book, Lewis of Bavaria had quarrelled only with Pope John XXII. This work having been translated into French by an anonymous author, Pope Gregory XI (4) complained of it to the deputies of the faculty of Theology at Paris, who declared by an authentic act, that none of their members had been concerned in this version, and that Marsilius of Padua, and John de Jande, who was thought likewise to have had a hand in writing that book, were not of their body (5).

(3) It is even in the edition of Basil of the year 1522.

(4) He sat in the Papal chair, from the year 1370 to 1378.

(5) Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. xi, pag. 127. Amsterd. Edit.

MENDOZZA (JOHN GONZALES DE) an Augustin Frier of the province of Castille, was chosen by the king of Spain to be embassador to the emperor of China in the year 1584. He was made bishop of Lipari in Italy in the year 1593, bishop of Chiapa in New Spain in the year 1607, and bishop of Popajan in the West Indies in the year 1608. He wrote in Spanish an History of China [A], which has been translated into several

[A] He wrote an History of China.] One may form a general idea of it by the bare title of the French translation, which is to this purpose: The History of the great kingdom of China, in the East-Indies, in two parts: the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google several languages (a). The French translation, done by Luke de la Porte, a Parisian, Doctor of the Laws, was printed at Paris in the year 1589 in 8vo.

(a) Taken from Philip Elsius, Encomast. Augustin. p. 379.

the first containing the situation, antiquity, fertility, religion, ceremonies, sacrifices, kings, magistrates, manners, customs, laws, and other memorable things of the said kingdom: and the second three voyages to it in the years 1577, 1579, and 1581, with the most remarkable rarities, either seen or heard of there: together with an itinerary of the New World, and the discovery of New Mexico in the year 1583.

MESPLEDE (LEWIS) a French Dominican, and provincial of his order in the province of Languedoc in the XVIIth century, published some books [A], as will be seen below.

[A] He published some books.] He printed at Paris in the year 1643 Catalonia Galliæ vindicata, sive Dissertatio Historica de legitimo Regum Francorum in eam Provinciam imperio, in 8vo. Mr Chantereau le Febvre assures us, that it is a book full of learned and useful inquiries, which tend to shew the right that the crown of France, has to the county of Catalonia, and the city of Barcelona, and to prove the forgery and falsehood of the titles which the enemies of the crown produce against it, in order to cloke their usurpation of this county to it's prejudice (1). Whilst Father Mesplede was provincial, he dedicated a piece to the chapter-general of his order, concerning the reformation which he thought was necessary to be introduced into it (2). He got this piece approved by five professors, three of which were priors. I shall quote a passage out of it, which acquaints us with the dissentions of the Dominicans.

(1) Chantereau le Febvre, Question Historique si les Provinces de l'ancien Royaume d'Austrasie doivent estre appellées Terres de l'Empire, pag. 81, Paris Edition 1644, in 8vo.

(2) See the Extrait de l'Hist. des Congreg. de Auxil. pag. 46, Edit. of Liege 1702, in 8vo.

'The doctrine of St Thomas would be sufficient alone
'to form great men, if it were taught altogether
'pure, and such as it is in it's source. But I am afraid
'by making us follow the streams, we are made to 'drink muddy water. Our ordinary method of teach'ing Philosophy and Divinity is very bad: We do
'not keep to the originals. In the schools of St Tho'mas, disputations are held about the true sense of 'his doctrine, and our authors write against one ano'ther with as much heat as the Schotists and Thomists
'did formerly. . . . . We ruin our selves. Nations
'blindly engage against one another. The new inter-
'preters condemn the old. Cajetan thinks only of 'refuting Capreolus, Herveus, and others who were
'before him. Bagnez, and those who are after him,
'think only of refuting Cajetan (3).

(3) Mesplede, in Commonitorio: d Capitulum Generale de Reformatione in Ordinem inducenda: I use the translation which is given of this Latin passage, by the author of the Errata de l'Histoire des Congregations de Auxiliis, writ by the abbot Le Blanc.

MESTREZAT (JOHN), a minister of the church of Paris, and descended from a very good family [A], was born at Geneva in the year 1592. He was sent very young to the academy of Saumur; and there he gave singular proofs of his excellent genius at a public disputation [B]. He was but eighteen years old when he was offered a professorship in Philosophy; and he was appointed to be minister to the church of Paris, as soon as he was admitted into Orders [C], a thing altogether extraordinary. They had no cause to repent of having called him so early; for his conferences with the Roman Catholics [D], his deputations, [E], his sermons and his books [F], shewed him to be one of the ablest men

[A] He was descended from a very good family.] AMI MESTREZAT, his father, was first syndic of Geneva, and had another son who was syndic of the same city; which is one of the principal offices of that state. PHILIP MESTREZAT, nephew to the minister of Charenton, was a famous professor of Divinity at Geneva (1). His eldest son, who died a few years ago (2), had exercised the office of syndic of the Republic with great honour. N. MESTREZAT, the other son of Philip, is at this time an able Physician in his own country (3).

(1) See the Epistle Dedicatory of a volume of his uncle's sermons upon the Epistle to the Hebrews.

(2) I write this in 1697.

[B] He gave proofs of his excellent genius at a public disputation.] He observed, that the professor of Philosophy, who presided at the disputation, answered to an argument, transeat major, nego minorem, ... let the first proposition pass, I deny the second, and he rose up to argue, after the opponent had made an end. His subject was, that the second proposition could not be denied, if the first was granted, and he maintained this with so much strength of reason, that he obliged the professor to own it was a fault. Mr du Plessis Mornai was present at this Act (4).

(3) Taken from a Memoir sent by Mr Pictet. Note, that since this Memoir was communicated to me, I heard that Mr Mestrezat, the Physician, was promoted to the office of counsellor to the republic.

(4) A Memoir communicated by Mr Pictet.

[C] He was appointed minister of the church of Paris as soon as he was admitted into Orders.] He presented himself to the synod of Charenton to be received into the ministry. Mr du Moulin, who was commissioned to find a pastor for the church of Orleans, had cast his eyes upon him for this office; but young Mestrezat being examined in the consistory of Charenton, shewed so much learning, that this church thought fit to keep him for their own service (5).

(5) Ibid.

[D] His conferences with the Roman Catholics.] I have been told that his conference with F. Veron was printed, and that he gloriously triumphed over this famous disputant. That which he had with the Jesuit Regourd, in the presence of queen Anne of Austria, was never published, and it is a common tradition among the Reformed in France, that this princess, being astonished to find that this Jesuit who had boasted he could easily confound all the ministers, was reduced to the greatest confusion by Mestrezat, required that the acts of this dispute should not be printed, which those of the Reformed religion punctually obeyed (6).

(6) See du Moulin, des Traditions, pag. 79.

[E] His deputations.] It is said, that being deputed by a national synod to Lewis XIII he answered admirably to three questions, which cardinal Richelieu suggested to that monarch to be put to him. I. Why do you make use of the liturgy of Geneva? II. Why do you join in your prayers the Papists with the Turks and Pagans? III. Why do you suffer ministers that are not natives of France? He answered, I. That since they professed the same religion with those of Geneva, it was not surprising that they should make use of the same liturgy. II. That it was no wonder, that at a time when those of the Romish communion treated the Protestants as Turks and Pagans would have done, they should join the Papists with those Infidels; but that they had taken the word Papists out of the new editions, even under the reign of Henry IV, and that if it remained still in some, they had not been printed in France. III. That it were to be wished, that so many Italian Monks who were then in France, had as great a zeal for his majesty, as these foreign ministers had, who acknowledged no other sovereign in the kingdom but the king. Whereupon cardinal Richelieu, putting his hand on his shoulder, said, behold the boldest minister in France (7).

(7) A Memoir of Mr Pictet.

[F] His sermons and his books.] His language did not come near the polite and clean style of Mr Daillé, but he preached with greater depth of reasoning, and with more learning than he did. There are no sermons that contain a more sublime Theology than those he preached upon the epistle of St Paul to the Hebrews, which were printed in several volumes. It is said (8), that having met in the street an ecclesiastic of his acquaintance, who had preached a whole Lent with applause, and having congratulated him upon it, I took, answered the other, out of your sermons, the best things that I said in mine. He handled the controversy about the authority of the scripture (9), and the authority of the church (10), with a peculiar strength of reason, and refuted upon those important subjects all the subtilties of Father Regourd and Cardinal du Perron. He showed by these works that he was very well versed in the Fathers, and understood Philosophy and the Scripture very well. His treatise concerning our communion

(8) Ibid.

(9) In the book intituled, A treatise of the Holy Scripture, wherein is shown the certainty and fulness of the faith, and it's independence on the authority of the church. At Geneva 1632, in 8vo.

(10) In his treatise of the church, printed at Geneva in 1649, in 4to.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(a) He married her to James Maubert, Sieur de Boiſgibaut.

men the Reformed had in France. They relate a very particular circumſtance in a tryal he had in the parliament of Paris [G]. He died the ſecond of May 1657, in the forty third year of his miniſtry. He left but one (a) daughter (b).

(b) Taken from a Memoir ſent to me from Geneva by Mr Pictet, profeſſor of Divinity.

(11) Printed at Sedan 1625, in 8vo.

(12) Memoir of Mr Pictet.

(13) Some of them are printing at Geneva, with others of Mr Daillé. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, November 1700, pag. 586.

munion with Jeſus Chriſt in the ſacrament of the Euchariſt (11), is highly eſteemed. His heirs have ſtill by them ſeveral manuſcripts, which were found in his ſtudy (12), his ſermons upon the Catechiſm (13), the explication of the Epiſtle of St Paul to the Galatians, and of ſome chapters of the Epiſtle to the Epheſians; ſome ſermons upon divers texts, and ſeveral ſmall pieces. Note, that he publiſhed at Sedan a volume of ſermons in the year 1625, in 8vo. Thoſe he wrote upon the firſt Epiſtle of St John are in two volumes.

[G] They relate a very particular circumſtance in a tryal he had in the parliament of Paris.] The preſident of the court, where the cauſe was pleaded, having obſerved by his looks that he was not well ſatisfied with his advocate, interrupted him, and addreſſing himſelf to the miniſter, methinks, ſaid he to him, you do not ſeem pleaſed with what is alledged for your cauſe; the court gives you leave to plead for your ſelf. It is ſaid, that Mr Meſtrezat urged his arguments ſo finely, that he carried his cauſe without any difficulty (14).

(14) Memoir of Mr Pictet.

METEL (JOHN) was of Franche-Comté, and made a figure among the learned of the XVIth century. He ſtudied the Law at Bologna, and there contracted a very intimate friendſhip with Anthony Auguſtin and Jerom Oſorius. This appears by the dialogues of the latter de Gloria, wherein the two others are the interlocuters (a). Metel was in ſeveral places with Anthony Auguſtin, at Florence, Venice, Rome, and in the Low-Countries, and he accompanied him to England, when Auguſtin was ſent thither by the Pope to Philip II (b). He likewiſe correſponded much with Caſſander. Some letters that he wrote to him are publiſhed, which are pretty curious.

(a) Oſorius de Gloria, lib. i, pag. m. 87.

(b) Bartholom. Bodegem. Delphus, Epiſt. Dedic. Libri Oſorii de Gloria, in Edit. Baſil. 1584.

METELLA. There were ſome ladies of this name in ancient Rome, who had a very bad reputation. CÆCILIA METELLA, the ſiſter of Quintus Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus, married Lucius Lucullus. From their marriage proceeded the famous Lucullus, who made war againſt Mithridates (a). We learn from Plutarch, that this Metella was infamous for her bad life (b). I cannot believe that it was ſhe whom Horace and Valerius Maximus have mentioned [A]. CÆCILIA METELLA, the daughter of Quintus Cæcilius Metellus Pius, the ſon of Numidicus, married firſt Marcus Æmilius Scaurus, and in a ſecond marriage the famous Sylla. She had by her firſt huſband, a ſon and a daughter. The ſon, Marcus Æmilius Scaurus, diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many accounts, and chiefly by the magnificent theatre which he built. The daughter, called Æmilia, was firſt married to Marcus Acilius Glabrio, and afterwards to Pompey the Great, and died in child-bed (c). Theſe two children found Sylla, the ſecond huſband of their mother, to be a good patron; for though Metella did not behave herſelf well, nevertheleſs ſhe was much reſpected by Sylla (d). This was, as it is ſaid, becauſe he knew nothing of the debauchery of his wife, which he firſt heard the news of at the ſiege of Athens. He treated this city very harſhly becauſe of the abuſive language they uttered againſt Metella upon the ramparts (e). Having had twins by this wife, a ſon and a daughter, he gave the name of Fauſtus to the ſon, and that of Fauſta to the daughter (f). The latter

(a) Plut. ubi infra.

(b) Ἠδοξησεν ὡς ὑ βοβιωκυῖα σωφρόνως. Fuit ob vitam probroſam infamis. Plut. in Lucullo, init. pag. 491.

(c) Plut. in Sylla, pag. 473.

(d) Ib. p. 455.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ib. p. 473.

[A] I cannot believe that it was ſhe whom Horace and Valerius Maximus have mentioned.] Horace tells us, that Æſop's ſon diſſolved in vinegar a pearl of great price, and drank it off; and he obſerves that this pearl had ſerved for an ear-ring to Metella (1). An old ſcholiaſt upon Horace ſays, that this Metella was the wife of Æſop's ſon. I ſhould rather believe that there was only an unlawful commerce between them; and this is alſo the opinion of Mr Dacier. He doubts whether this Metella was not the ſiſter of Q. Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus, who was married to L. Lucullus (2). I cannot believe it was ſhe, for the wife of this Lucullus was probably old, when the ſon of Æſop begun to be capable of making love. She had a grand niece who married Sylla in the year 665 of Rome, and who had by another huſband two children fit for marriage. We have ſeen (3) that the daughter of Sylla's wife was married to Pompey: but ſhe had been married to another huſband; and we know that Sylla, who cauſed her to marry Pompey, died in the year 672. If the grand-niece was a grandmother at that time, we may reaſonably think, that the great aunt was ſcarce a fit object to be courted. Add to this, that Lucullus the ſon of Metella, the great aunt, commanded the Roman army againſt Mithridates, as conſul in the year of Rome 679; and that Cicero, ſome years after the battle of Pharſalia, (4) makes mention of Æſop's ſon, as one that created him much trouble (5). It is not eaſy therefore to adjuſt the times of the love of theſe two perſons.

As for what concerns Valerius Maximus, I find in the Onomaſticon of Glandorp a period that is liable to cenſure; which is this: Eamdem eſſe volunt de qua Valerius libro primo capite quinto, auctor de viris illuſtribus capite ſexageſimo ſecundo, ut viris duobus nuptam fuiſſe intelligamus (6). He means that Metella, the ſiſter of Metellus Numidicus, and mother to Lucius Lucullus (7), was the ſame with her, whom Valerius Maximus and Aurelius Victor have ſpoken of. This is not amiſs as to the laſt author, ſince it is certain that he ſpoke expreſsly of Metella, the ſiſter of Metellus Numidicus: but the other writer ſpoke in ſuch an indefinite way, that he may be conjectured to be as well for as againſt it; and ſo Glandorp ſhould not have ſtuffed his paper with conjectures about the things he mentions. But I may relate the matter of fact, which is curious.

Cæcilia, the wife of Metellus, had a niece fit for marriage: ſhe carried her one night into a chapel to ſeek for nuptial preſages. This was the cuſtom when a young woman was intended for marriage. The aunt ſat down and the niece ſtood by her: they liſtened a long time without hearing any thing. The young lady finding herſelf weary with ſtanding, deſired her aunt to let her ſit down a few minutes: with all my heart, replyed the aunt, I will give you my place. Theſe words were the omen they ſought for: Cæcilia died quickly after, and her huſband married the young niece. This is what Valerius Maximus (8) relates. Cicero (9) mentions it alſo: He had it from Lucius Flaccus a prieſt of Mars (10). There is a note of Pighius in Valerius Maximus Variorum, which ſays, that this Lucius Flaccus was conſul in the year 622. But this was a long time before Cicero was capable of converſing with great men. Pighius adds, that Cæcilia, the ſiſter of Metellus Numidicus, is meant here, and he proves it by Aurelius Victor, who ſays, that this Metellus would not make a funeral oration for Metellus, his brother-in-law (11). But Aurelius Victor has not named this brother-in-law, and ſo the learning

(1) Filius Æſopi detractam ex aure Metellæ (Scilicet ut decies ſolidum exſorberet) aceto Diluit inſignem baccam. Horat. Sat. iii, lib. ii, ver. 239.

(2) Remarks upon that paſſage of Horace, Tom. vii, pag. m. 301, 302.

(3) In the text of this article.

(4) It was fought in 705.

(5) Quin etiam Æſopi filius me excruciat. Cicero ad Atticum, Epiſt. xv, lib. xi.

(6) Gland. pag. 170.

(7) He who overcame Mithridates.

(8) Lib. i, cap. v, num. 4.

(9) De Divinat. lib. i, cb. xlvi.

(10) L. Flaccum flaminem Martialem ego audivi quum diceret. Ibid.

(11) Ipſam vero Cæciliam Q. Numidici ſororem fuiſſe ex auctore de viris illuſtribus eſt colligere, qui cap. lxii, ſcribit Numidicum ſororis ſuæ virum Metellum laudare noluiſſe, quod is olim ſuum judicium & leges detrectarat. Pighius in Val. Maximum, lib. i, cap. v, num. 4.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google latter did not at all degenerate [B]: but even out-did her mother. Since Metella was of an age to have children, I do not underſtand the reflexion of Plutarch [C]. Metella fell dangerouſly ill, at a time when her huſband gave entertainments to the people upon occaſion of a great vow. He had conſecrated to Hercules the tenth part of his whole eſtate, and treated the people magnificently for ſeveral days. The prieſts declared to him that it was not lawful for him to go and ſee his wife, nor to ſuffer his houſe to be defiled by the death of any one whatſoever. Whereupon he ſent a letter of divorce to Metella, and learning of Pighius is founded upon a falſe ſuppoſition. 'Metellæ ſororis ſuæ virum laudare noluit. quod is 'ſolus judicium contra leges detrectaret. - - - He would 'not commend his ſiſter Metella's huſband, becauſe he a-'lone declined judgment againſt the laws.' Theſe are the words of Aurelius Victor in the good editions. What ſeems to me moſt memorable in this fact, is the ſtrange ſuperſtition of ancient Rome. Not only ſervant maids ſought after omens for marriage, but ladies of the firſt quality, and thoſe who were of a rank equal to that of our ducheſſes, amuſed themſelves with thoſe fooleries, and went to lie upon the catch of the firſt word that fortune ſhould make them hear. Even at this day the quality of a ducheſs does not free one from theſe fortune-telling ſuperſtitions, wherewith the citizens wives are infatuated.

[B] Fauſta did not at all degenerate.] She was one of the moſt lend women of her time; and it was at leaſt true with reſpect to her and Metella, her mother, that the world grows worſe and worſe. Metella was a looſe woman; but mox datura progeniem vitioſiorem (12). - - - Was ſoon to bring forth a child more vitious. Fauſta had for a third huſband the famous Milo, whom the murder of Clodius and the oration of Cicero have made ſo well known. It was not ſafe to meddle with him; however his wife did not fear him much; for ſhe admitted her galants with ſo little precaution, that one of them was one day catched by Milo. He would have been killed if he had not had a good deal of money; but he redeemed his life by paying the ſum to which Milo condemned him, after he had ſoundly laſhed him. M. Varro in litteris atque vita ſide bomo multa & gravis, in libro, quem ſcripſit Pius aut de pace, C. Salluſtium ſcriptorem ſeriæ illius & ſeveræ orationis, in cujus hiſtoria notiones cenſorias fieri atque exerceri videmus, in adulterio deprenſum ab Annio Milone loris bene cæſum dicit, & quum dediſſet pecuniam, dimiſſum (13). It is a ſad thing that this ſhameful diſgrace ſhould happen to a great author; for it was Salluſt the Hiſtorian who was ſo ill treated at Fauſta's houſe. But the galants did not profit by this example; for one Villius is ſaid to have been heartily cuffed in the ſame place, and to have narrowly eſcaped being ſtabbed.

(12) See Horace, Ode VI, lib. iii.

(13) Aul. Gellius, lib. xvii, cap. xviii.

Villius in Fauſta Syllæ gener (hoc miſer uno Nomine deceptus) pœnas dedit uſque ſuperque
Quam ſatis eſt pugnis cæſus, ferroque petitus
Excluſus fore quum Longarenus foret intus (14).

(14) Horat. Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 64.

Some ſay, it was Milo that treated him after this manner (15). It was well for him that he was robuſt, for if he had not, his arms would not have been able to drub as often as was neceſſary ſuch as came to kiſs his wife. But others think with more probability, that he who thus treated the unfortunate Villius, was another galant of Fauſta, who being with her when Villius came in, drove him away diſgracefully. This Villius kept company with Fauſta, chiefly becauſe ſhe was of the firſt quality. Horace laughs at this fooliſh conceit, and ſhows that it does not proceed from nature, and that greater charms are often found among the meaner ſort

(15) Vetus interpres Horatii.

Huic ſi Mutonis verbis mala tanta videntis
Diceret hæc animus: quid vis tibi? nunquid ego à te
Magno prognatum depoſco conſule cunnum
Velatumque ſtola, mea cum conferbuit ira?
Quid reſponderet? magno patre nata puella eſt,
At quanto meliora monet pugnantiaque iſtis
Dives opis natura ſuæ . . . . . (16).

(16) Horat. Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 68.

Nec magis huic inter niveos viridiſque lapillos.
(Sit licet hoc Cerinthe tuum) tenerum eſt femur aut crus
Reſtius, atque etiam melius perſæpe togatæ (17).

(17) Ib. ver. 80.

This cenſure proved uſeleſs, and Perſius was obliged to renew it.

- - - - - Nunc nunc impenſius unge
Unge puer caules. Mihi feſta luce coquatur
Urtica, & fiſſa fumoſum ſinciput aure;
Ut tuus iſte nepos olim ſatur anſeris extis;
Cum moroſa vago ſingultiet inguine vena,
PATRICIÆ immejat vulvæ (18).

(18) Perſius, Sat. VI, ſub fin.

Pour oil, and pour it with a plenteous hand
Upon my ſallads, boy; ſhall I be fed
With ſodden nettles, and a ſing'd ſow's head?
'Tis holiday, provide me better chear,
'Tis holiday, and ſhall be round the year.
Shall I my houſhold gods, and genius cheat,
To make him rich, who grudges me my meat?
That he may loll at eaſe, and pamper'd high,
When I am laid, may feed on giblet pye?
And when his throbbing luſt extends the vein,
Have wherewithal his whores to entertain?
DRYDEN.

'And there are ſtill many people like Villius, 'who like nothing in their miſtreſs but their name 'and their quality.' Theſe are the words of an able commentator (19). I have not yet named all the galants of our Fauſta, whoſe memory is tranſmitted to us in books. She had two at the ſame time, whoſe names gave occaſion to a witty ſaying of her brother. Fauſtus Sullæ filius cum ſoror ejus eodem tempore duos mœchos haberet, Fulvium fullonis filium & Pompejum Maculam, miror, inquit, ſororem meam habere Maculam cum fullonem habeat (20). I wonder, ſaid he, that my ſiſter ſhould have a ſpot, ſince ſhe has a ſcourer. But the Latin is infinitely more graceful.

(19) Mr Dacier on Horace, Tom. vii, pag. 145.

(20) Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. 324.

[C] I do not underſtand the reflexion of Plutarch.] He ſays, that Sylla before he married Metella had three wives, whereof the laſt called Cœlia, was decently divorced upon pretence of barrenneſs; but, adds Plutarch, the marriage which Sylla contracted a few days after with Metella, ſhows that he had unjuſtly alledged againſt Cœlia this reaſon of divorce. Ὀλίγαις δὲ ὕστερον ἡμέραις ἀγαγόμενος τὴν Μετέλλαν ἔδοξε διὰ τοῦτο τὴν Κοίλιαν ὑ καλῶς αἰτιάσασθαι. Verum quod paucis diebus poſt Metellam duxit, apparuit eum immerito illam cauſam in Cœliam prætendiſſe (21). To make this reaſoning of Plutarch good, we muſt ſuppoſe, that a man who has divorced his wife for barrenneſs, if he acts naturally and diſcreetly, will not make haſte to take another: but common ſenſe tells us, that this cannot be ſuppoſed without falling into an error; for every one that divorces his wife, and does it only upon account of barrenneſs, teſtifies by that, that he wiſhes to have children. And therefore reaſon requires that he ſhould marry again quickly another woman, who is like to be fruitful: and if he ſhould not marry again at all, or delay for a long time to do it, he would thereby plainly declare, he had given a falſe reaſon for his divorce. What did it ſignify, might one ſay, whether his wife was barren or no, ſince after her divorce he continues unmarried? And therefore it is not true, that Sylla's marrying quickly Metella, was a confutation of the reaſon for which he ſaid he divorced Cœlia; on the contrary, that marriage did confirm it, and juſtify his conduct. The reaſon of Plutarch would be good, if Metella had been paſt the age of child-bearing; but he informs us himſelf that ſhe was brought to bed of twins. That which deceived him, ſeems to be this: he reaſoned in this manner with himſelf; Sylla would not have concluded his marriage with Metella a little while after Cælia's divorce, if he had not been in love with her ſome time before, and even prepared things for his

(21) Plut. in Sylla, pag 453.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and ordered that ſhe ſhould be carried out of his Houſe before ſhe died. Superſtition moved him to do all theſe things againſt his inclination; for he was much afflicted to loſe his wife, and he made her a very magnificent funeral to eaſe his grief (g). Upon the ſame account he made great feaſts for his friends, without any regard to the ſumptuary laws, which he himſelf had enacted (b). Theſe he tranſgreſſed boldly, tho' he durſt not violate the ridiculous and barbarous ceremonies which the prieſts had taught him. If the ſon of Æſop was beloved by one Metella [D], as there is ſome probability, I am ſtrongly inclined to think, that the two gallant ladies I have ſpoken of, are not the only perſons of that name who behaved themſelves ill.

funerariam, quam tulerat ipſe, convulſit nullo habito ſumptus modo. Ibid. pag. 474. B.

(b) Id. ib.

(g) Καὶ τοῦτο μὲν ἀκριβῶς τὸ νομιμον ὑπὸ δεισιδαιμονίας ἐτήρησε. τὸν δὲ τῆς ταφῆς ὁρίζοντα τὴν δαπάνην νομον αὐτος παρεισεγνωκὼς παρέβη μηδενὸς ἀναλώματος φειδάμενος. Atque hac in re leges curioſe ex ſuperſtitione ſervavit: at legem

Some authors have given the name of METELLA to one of Pompey's wives, whom he divorced on account of her leudneſs (i); but ſhe ſhould rather be called Mucia: and I ſpeak of her under that word.

(i) See Biſſelius, Ruinar. illuſtr. Decade iv, part iv, pag. 298.

his new marriage before the diſſolution of the former. It was therefore his deſire to marry Metella, that puſhed him on to a divorce; and ſo the barrenneſs of Cœlia was only a vain pretence. Plutarch might have reaſon at the bottom; perhaps the only motive of Sylla was the deſire he had to marry Metella. However, ſince Plutarch builds his propoſition upon a very ambiguous proof, and which, according to the order of nature and good ſenſe, muſt needs be falſe, he is guilty of a paralogiſm. I have ſaid elſewhere, that ſuch a criticiſm as this, which may be called logical, may do young readers more ſervice than a grammatical criticiſm.

[D] If the ſon of Æſop was beloved by one Metella.] That which makes me expreſs myſelf after this manner is, that the words of Horace do not neceſſarily imply, that the lady whoſe pearl was ſwallowed by Æſop's ſon, was in love with him. Horace might have mentioned Metella, in caſe ſhe had been a lady who delighted to be pompouſly adorned with jewels; for ſince he deſigned to expoſe the extravagant prodigality of Æſop's ſon, he was to deſcribe the pearl by ſuch ſtrokes as might affect the reader. If then there had been a lady called Metella, famous for the magnificence of her jewels, he would have given a great idea of the value of a pearl, by ſaying, it was the earring of ſuch a lady; and ſo the expreſſion of Horace, detractam ex aure Metellæ, - - - - taken from Metella's ear, would not be uſeleſs, even tho' it ſhould be ſuppoſed that the ſon of Æſop did not become maſter of that pearl but by purchaſe. Yet I think it very probable, that this Metella behaved herſelf very ill with the ſon of this comedian: and it may very well be that ſhe was the ſame with that Metella who is mentioned in Cicero's letters. There are ſome commentators who think, 1. that when Cicero complains of being tormented by the ſon of Æſop (22), he means that this man was a companion of Dolabella in the debaucheries which ſo much vexed Tullia (23), and which were one of the cauſes of diſſolving her marriage with Dolabella. II. That theſe debaucheries were the intrigues of Dolabella with ſome ladies of pleaſure, and particularly with Metella. This conjecture is grounded upon a paſſage in another letter of Cicero, wherein Metella is reckoned among the cauſes of the divorce of Tullia. Melius quidem in peſſimis nihil fuit diſcidio: aliquid feciſſemus ut vivi, vel tabularum novarum nomine, vel nocturnarum expugnationum, vel Metellæ, vel omnium malorum (24). Some (25) think that this Metella was ſhe whom Lentulus Spinther divorced, and that the Metella of Æſop's ſon was ſhe that was divorced by this Lentulus (26). What is certain is, that there was about that time a very intriguing lady called Metella, whoſe amours afforded as much matter to the Poets, as Madam d'Olonne has done to the writers of the XVIIth century. Here follow two verſes of Ovid, taken out of the ſecond elogy of the ſecond book de Triſtibus, ver. 437.

(22) Quin etiam Æſopi filius me excruciat. Cicero ad Attic. Epiſt. xv, lib. xi.

(23) Quia ſocius Dolabellæ in adulteriis Pelicum Tulliæ, ut Metellæ de qua Epiſt. xxiii. Popma, in Editione, Epiſt. Cicer. ad Atticum Græviana, Tom. ii, pag. 248.

(24) Cicero, ad Attic. lib. xi, Epiſt. xxiii.

(25) Corradus, in Cicer. ad Attic. Epiſt. vii, lib. xiii.

(26) Et Lentulum cum Metella certe feciſſe divortium. Cicero, ibid. Epiſt. vii, lib. xiii. See alſo Epiſt. li, lib. xii.

Et quorum libris modo diſſimulata Perillæ
Nomine nunc legitur dicta, Metelle, tuo.

And thoſe who falſly put Perilla's name,
With whom, we read, Metella is the ſame.

We learn from Apuleius, how the author was called who diſguiſed the name of Metella by that of Perilla. 'Eadem opera accuſent, ſays he, p. 279 of his apology, C. Catullum quod Leſbiam pro Clodia nominavit, & Ticidam ſimiliter quod quæ Metella erat, Perillam ſcripſerit. - - - - The ſame works accuſe C. Catullus of naming Leſbia inſtead of Clodia, and likewiſe Ticida of writing Perilla inſtead of Metella.'

(a) In 690.

(b) Salluſt. in Bell. Catilin. pag. m. 81, 176.

(c) Cicero pro Cœlio, pag. 518. Edit. Abrami.

METELLUS CELER (QUINTUS) conſul in the year of Rome 693, diſcharged the office of pretor in the year of Cicero's conſulſhip (a), and did good ſervice to the commonwealth in oppoſing the troops of Catiline, which intended to paſs into Gallia Ciſalpina (b). He obtained the government of that province after his pretorſhip. He was a perſon of merit, but very unhappy in chooſing a wife; for he married a ſiſter of Clodius [A], who firſt diſgraced him by her leudneſs, and then poiſoned him. She was his couſin german (c). It is ſhe that, under the name of Leſbia, is ſo much defamed by [A] He married a ſiſter of Clodius.] This is the Clodia whom Cicero has ſo well deſcribed in his defence of Cœlius, a fine country youth, who was accuſed of ſeveral crimes, and among the reſt of having a deſign to poiſon Clodia, that he might not be obliged to pay the ſums of money which he had borrowed of her. Cicero was his advocate, and pleaded for him with ſo much ſtrength of reaſoning, that he was acquitted. Clodia undertook this affair, only to be revenged upon him for a grievous affront he had put upon her, which was, that Cœlius, after he had taken his pleaſure with her as much, and as long as he would, at laſt grew weary of her, and forſook her, in order to make his courtſhip elſewhere. Plutarch (1) relates, that ſhe was ſirnamed Quadrantaria, becauſe one day one of thoſe who had lain with her, paid her in very bad money. He put into his purſe, not pieces of ſilver, but ſmall pieces of copper (2), much like farthings. Apuleius (3) informs us, ſhe was the lady whom Catullus has ſo much celebrated under the name of Leſbia: and ſo ſhe deſerved, for many reaſons, the title Plutarch has given her; for the Leſbia of Catullus was, at laſt, a ſtreet-walker, and waited for her prey at the corner of the ſtreets. She was for the firſt ſhe met, and without doubt took what was offered her. She would accept of a glaſs of the ſmalleſt liquor, and proſtitute her ſelf for a trifle, Scortum diobolare, aut triobolare; - - - a penny, or a three half-penny whore. Did ſhe not therefore deſerve the ſirname of Quadrantaria: See in the margin the verſes of Catullus, which were probably addreſſed to Cicero's client (4). She purchaſed a garden on the banks of the Tiber, that ſhe might have an opportunity of ſeeing thoſe that came to ſwim in the river, and the better to choſe the prey ſhe had a mind to draw into her net. Habes hortos ad Tiberim: ac diligenter eo loco paraſti quo omnis juventus natandi cauſſa venit, hinc licet conditiones quotidie legas (5). Of all the ſiſters of Clodius this was the moſt ſuſpected of inceſt with him (6). Being yet very young, he pretended to be fearful, that he might have leave to ſleep with his ſiſter. Propter neſcio quam, credo, timiditatem, & nocturnos quoſdam inanes metus, tecum ſemper pufio cum majore ſorore cubitavit

(1) Plutarch. in Ciceron. Vita, pag. 875.

(2) Which they called at Rome Quadrantes.

(3) Apuleius, in Apol. pag. m. 279. I have cited his words in the remark [D] of the preceding article.

(4) Cœli, Leſbia noſtra, Leſbia illa, Illa Lesbia quam Catullus unam Pluſquam ſe atque ſuos amavit omnes; Nunc in quadriviis & angiportis Glubit magnanimos Remi Nepotes. Catull. Epigr. lix.

(5) Cicero, pro Cœlio, pag. 445, Edit. Abrami. Compare with this what has been ſaid in the article LEWIS VII, citat. (3).

(6) Plut. ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by Catullus (d). Cicero loſt a very good friend by the death of this Metellus in 694 [B]. I ſhall obſerve a miſtake of Tuſnebus [C]. Our Metellus was of the college of the Augurs (e).

(d) See the remark [A], citation (3).

(e) Cicero in Vatinium, pag. 306, ejſudem Edit.

(7) Cicero, ibid.

(8) It is the thirtieth.

(9) It is not a proper name as ſeveral have believed. See Muret upon this Epigram.

tavit (7). There is an epigram in Catullus (8) which ſhews, that he loved Clodia; and that he fell out with her before the death of her huſband.

Leſbia mi, præſente viro, mala plurima dicit,
Hæc illi fatuo maxima lætitia eſt.
Mule (9), nihil ſentis. Si noſtri oblita taceret,
Sana eſſet, quod nunc gannit & obloquitur
Non ſolum meminit, ſed quæ multo acrior eſt res
Irata eſt: hoc eſt uritur & loquitur.

Before her huſband, Leſbia calls me names,
And at the leudneſs of the town exclaims;
This tickles the poor cuckold to the life,
And he thanks Heav'n for ſuch a virtuous wife.
Contented fool! . . . . indeed, you reaſon wrong,
If ſhe were virtuous, ſhe would hold her tongue.
Scandal and noiſe do not her virtue prove,
But are the marks of unextinguiſhed love.

[B] Cicero loſt a very good friend by the death of this Metellus in the year 694.] I will ſet down his own words, that we may know the merit of this Metellus, and his friendſhip for Cicero; and alſo the difference there is often between a man and a huſband. Metellus, with reſpect to Cicero, is an illuſtrious Roman; for Cicero conſiders him only as he is a man. But the ſame Metellus, with reſpect to Catullus, is a dunce, a fool, a mule (10), becauſe Catullus conſiders him only as a huſband. Catullus was convinced that the wife of Metellus was a worthleſs wretch. He knew ſo well all the effects of love, that he was perſuaded, that ſince ſhe ſpoke ſo ill of him, it was a ſign ſhe ſtill felt the flames of her paſſion. What eſteem then could he have for Metellus, who was catched in ſuch a miſerable trap, and ſuffered himſelf to be hornified, and then bubbled by his wife? Let us ſee the words of Cicero (11). 'Pro Dii immortales 'cur interdum in hominum ſceleribus maximis aut 'connivetis, aut præſentis fraudis pœnas in diem re'ſervatis? Vidi enim, vidi, & illum hauſi dolorem 'vel acerbiſſimum in vita, quum Q. Metellus abſtra'heretur è ſinu, gremioque patriæ: quumque ille vir, 'qui ſe natum huic imperio putavit, tertio die poſt'quam in Curia, in roſtris, in Republica floruiſſet, 'integerrima ætate, optimo habitu, maximis viribus 'eriperetur indigniſſime bonis omnibus, atque uni'verſæ civitati. Quo quidem tempore ille moriens, 'quum jam cæteris ex partibus oppreſſa mens eſſet, 'extremum ſenſum ad memoriam Reipublicæ reſerva'bat: quum me intuens flentem ſignificabat inter'ruptis, atque morientibus vocibus: quanta impen'deret procella urbi, quanta tempeſtas civitati: quum 'parietem ſæpe feriens eum, qui cum Q. Catulo fuerat 'ei communis, crebro Catulum, ſæpe me, ſæpiſſime 'Rempublicam nominabat: ut non ſe tam emori, 'quam ſpoliari ſuo præſidio quum patriam, tum 'etiam me doleret. Quem quidem virum ſi nulla vis 'repentini ſceleris ſuſtuliſſet, quonam modo ille furenti 'fratri ſuo patruelis Conſulari reſtitiiſſet, qui conſulem 'incipientem furere atque conantem, ſua ſe manu in'terfecturum, audiente Senatu dixerit? Ex hac igi'tur domo pregreſſa iſta mulier de veneni celeritate 'dicere audebit? nonne ipſam domum metuet, ne quam 'vocem eliciat? non parietes conſcios, non noctem 'illam funeſtam ac luctuoſam perhorreſcet? - - - - O 'immortal gods, why do ye ſometimes connive at the 'greateſt crimes of mankind, or defer the puniſhment of 'them? For I have ſeen, I have ſeen and endured the 'moſt bitter affliction of life, when Q. Metellus was drag'ged from the heart and boſom of his country; when he, 'who thought himſelf born for the ſervice of this Empire, 'on the third day after he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in 'the ſenate, the roſtra, and the commonwealth, in the 'very prime of his age, and of a vigorous and healthy con'ſtitution, was moſt baſely ſnatched away from all good 'men, and from all the citizens. In his dying moments, 'tho' his mind was in other reſpects oppreſſed, he re'tained the memory of the commonwealth: and, beholding 'me in tears, ſignified, with broken and imperfect words, 'how a great ſtorm threatened the city and ſtate: and 'ſtriking frequently the wall, which had been common to 'Q. Catullus and him, he often named Catullus and 'me, and very often the commonwealth: intimating, 'that he did not ſo much regret his own death, as that 'his country and I ſhould be deprived of his aſſiſtance. 'Had he not been violently and wickedly carried off, 'how would he have reſiſted his furious brother that 'had been conſul, who ſaid, in the hearing of the 'ſenate, that he would ſlay, with his own hand, the 'conſul that began to rage and diſpute. Will that woman 'then go from this houſe, and dare to plead the cauſe 'about poiſoning her huſband? Will ſhe not be afraid 'of the very houſe, leſt it utter ſome word againſt her? 'Will ſhe not dread the conſcious walls, and that fatal 'and ſad night?' Cicero obſerves in another place, that Clodia lived ill with her huſband. 'Ea eſt 'ſeditioſa: ea cum viro bellum gerit, neque ſolum 'cum Metello, ſed etiam cum Fabio (12). - - - She is 'a contentious woman: ſhe not only wages war with her 'huſband Metellus, but likewiſe with Fabius.'

(10) See Epigram lxxxv, in the preceding remark.

(11) Cicero, ubi ſupra, pag. 514.

(12) Id. Epiſt. i, ad Attic. lib. i, pag. m. 175.

[C] I ſhall obſerve a miſtake of Turnebus.] He believed that Catullus ſpoke of our Metellus Celer in epigram 68. Ita Cæcilio placeam, cui credita nunc ſum. - - - So may I pleaſe Cæcilius to whom I am truſted. The Poet brings in the door of a debauched woman ſpeaking thus: but this woman was not Leſbia, or Clodia, for the woman meant in this epigram, had married an impotent man, whoſe father was ſo officious, as to conſummate the marriage which his ſon had contracted. It is not known whether he did it becauſe he loved his daughter-in-law, or becauſe he was perſuaded his ſon was not able to do it. Conſult theſe verſes of Catullus:

Primum igitur virgo quod fertur tradita nobis,
Falſum eſt: nonque illam vir prior attigerat,
Languidior tenera cui pendens ſicula beta,
Nunquam ſe mediam ſuſtulit ad tunicam;
Sed pater ipſius nati violaſſe cubile
Dicitur, & miſeram conſceleraſſe domum:
Sive quod impia mens cæco flagrabat amore,
Seu quod iners ſterili ſemine natus erat:
Et quærendum aliunde foret nervoſius illud,
Quod poſſet zonam ſolvere virgineam
Egregium narras mira pietate parentem,
Qui ipſe ſui gnati minxerit in gremium (13).

(13) Catul. Epigr. lxviii.

Scaliger refutes Turnebus by two reaſons: the firſt is, that the ſcene of this adventure was Verona, and not Rome. The ſecond is, that nobody ever ſaid that Clodia committed inceſt with her father. Cicero had certainly objected it to her, if her character had ſuffered upon that account (14). Theſe two reaſons of Scaliger are very good; but he did not obſerve that it was with her huſband's father, and not with her own, that the woman, mentioned by Catullus, loſt her maidenhead.

(14) Alienum à vero prorſus ſcribit Adr. Turnebus, Gallorum doctiſſimus, hunc eſſe Cæcilium, cui Clodia nupſerit. Hoc enim non Romæ, ſed Veronæ manifeſto actum ſcribit Catullus. Deinde nihil tale de Clodia narratur, ut conſuetudinem ſtupri nefandam cum patre ſuo habuerit. Hoc enim non tacuiſſet capitalis hoſtis ejus fratris Clodii Cicero. Scalig. Not. in Catull. Epigr. lxviii.

METELLUS (Lucius) a tribune of the people, when Cæſar made himſelf maſter of Rome, at the beginning of the civil wars, had more courage than all the other magiſtrates. The city of Rome appeared ſo ſubmiſſive to the will of Cæſar at the very firſt [A], that it ſeemed as if ſhe had been a long time accuſtomed to the yoke of bondage. Metellus was the only perſon that durſt oppoſe Cæſar, who had a mind to ſeize the treaſure that was [A] The city of Rome appeared ſo ſubmiſſive to the will of Cæſar at the very firſt.] We muſt not wonder at this, for he was conſidered as a man that with an armed force had ſeized Rome, and it was feared he would have pillaged it.

Namque

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was kept in the temple of Saturn. Cæsar laughed at the opposition, and the laws which were objected to him [B], and went streight to the place where the treasure was deposited. He found it shut, and because the keys were refused him he ordered the doors to be broke open; whereupon Metellus renewing his opposition Cæsar threatened to kill him: Young man, added he, you know it would be more easy for me to do it than to say it. The tribune resisted no longer [C], but went away very quietly; and Cæsar took out of this treasury whatever he had a mind to (a). He was very careful not to tell how the thing happened; for he disguised it so in his History of the civil war (b) [D], that you can perceive

(a) Plut. in Cæsare. pag. 725.

(b) Lib. i.

Namque ignibus atris
Creditur, ut captæ rapturus mœnia Romæ
Sparsuruſque Deos: fuit hæc menſura timoris,
Velle putant quodcunque poteſt (1).

(1) Lucan. Pharſ. lib. III, ver. 99.

They think he comes to ravage, ſack, and burn,
Religion, gods, and temples to o'erturn.
Their fears ſuggeſt him willing to purſue
Whatever ills unbounded power can do.

ROWE.

The good fortune of Rome set bounds to his power, when the senate and people had set none to their submission. This will not be the last time, that even in circumstances, wherein effeminacy is more inexcusable than at that time, some will be less ashamed to suffer things to be taken, than others to take them, and that they will be beholden for their preservation to the discretion of others.

Omnia Cæſar erat, privatæ Curia vocis
Teſtis adeſt. Sedere patres cenſere parati
Si regnum, ſi templa ſibi, jugulumque Senatus
Exiliumque petat. Melius quod plura jubere
Erubuit, quam Rome pati (2).

(2) Id. ib. ver. 108.

Cæſar is all things in himſelf alone,
The ſilent court is but a looker on;
With humble votes obedient they agree
To what their mighty ſubject ſhall decree;
Whether as king or god he will be fear'd,
If royal thrones or altars ſhall be rear'd.
Ready for death or baniſhment they ſtand,
And wait their doom from his diſpoſing hand.
But he by ſecret ſhame's reproaches ſtaid
Bluſh'd to command what Rome would have obey'd.

ROWE.

[B] Cæsar laughed at . . . . the laws which were objected to him.] Appian (3) tells us, that after the fatal wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, certain sums of money were laid by at Rome, which it was forbid to touch, under pain of a public execration, except it were in case of a war against the Gauls. It was remonstrated to Cæsar, that their ancestors had given the curse of the country to any one that should touch this money, unless in this necessity. He made a jest of this curse, and said, that having subdued the Gauls, he had delivered Rome from the obligation, under which she might lie when she founded this treasury. Lucan has made an ingenious reflexion indeed, but I think it is a little strained. He says, that people have the laws, privileges, and liberty less at heart than money, and that it was only for the sake of this treasure that they attempted to resist Cæsar (4). He means the opposition of Metellus.

(3) Lib. ii, Bell. Civil. pag. m. 241.

(4) Uſque adeo ſolus ferrum, mortemque timere
Auri neſcit amor, pereunt diſcrimine nullo
Amiſſæ leges: ſed pars viliſſima rerum
Certamen moviſtis opes. Lucan. ubi ſupra, ver. 118.

[C] The tribune resisted no longer.] Lucan supposes, that Metellus was ambitious of the glory of being sacrificed to the violence of the tyrant, but that Cæsar did not think him worthy of that honour, and told him:

Vanam ſpem mortis honeſtæ
Concipis: haud (iniquit) jugulo ſe polluet iſto
Noſtra, Metelle, manus. Dignum te Cæſaris ira
Nullus honor facit, te vindice tuta relicta eſt
Libertas? non uſque adeo permiſcuit imis
Longus ſumma dies, ut non, ſi voce Metelli
Serventur leges, malint à Cæſare tolli (5).

(5) Ib. ver. 134.

Sooth not thy ſelf with hopes of death ſo vain,
No blood of thine my conquering ſword ſhall ſtain,
Thy titles and thy popular command
Can never make thee worthy Cæſar's hand.
Art thou thy country's ſole defender! Thou!
Can liberty and Rome be fallen ſo low!
Nor time nor chance breed ſuch confuſions yet,
Nor are the mean ſo rais'd, nor ſunk the great;
But laws themſelves would rather chuſe to be Suppreſs'd by Cæſar, than preſerv'd by thee.

ROWE.

This Poet supposes another thing, viz. that Metellus did not retire till after the strong remonstrances of Cotta. Liberty, said Cotta, ruins liberty, when the monarchical power curbs it; and if you would not quite destroy it, if you desire at least to retain the shadow of it, appear willing to do what is commanded you. This thought is very fine, and Lucan expresses it nobly.

Tum Cotta Metellum
Compulit audaci nimium deſiſtere cœpto.
Libertas, inquit, populi, quem regna coërcent,
Libertate perit; cujus ſervaveris umbram,
Si, quicquid jubeare, velis (6).

(6) Ib. ver. 143.

When Cotta to prevent the kindling fire,
Thus ſooth'd the raſh Metellus to retire.
Where kings prevail, all liberty is loſt,
And none but he who reigns can freedom boaſt.
Some ſhadow of this bliſs thou ſhalt retain Chuſing to do what ſovereign powers ordain.

ROWE.

[D] Cæsar . . . . . diſguiſes this action in his hiſtory of the civil war.] It is rather a total suppression than a disguising of it; for he is so far from granting, that he used threats against Metellus, and that he carried off in spite of him the money that was in the treasury, that he declares he went out of Rome, that he might not be a long time entangled in the disputes that his enemies raised against him by means of Metellus. Is not this an insinuation that he was so gracious and complaisant, that he chose rather to leave his country than to struggle with this tribune of the people? 'Subjicitur etiam L. Metellus Tribunus plebis ab inimicis Cæſaris, qui hanc rem diſtrahat, reliquaſque res quaſcunque agere inſtituerit, impediat. Cujus cognito conſilio, Cæſar fruſtra diebus aliquot conſumptis, ne reliquum tempus omittat, infectis iis quæ agere deſtinaverat, ab Urbe proficiſcitur (7). - - - - Lucius Metellus, tribune of the people, was engaged by Cæsar's enemies to protract the time, and oppose whatever Cæsar should offer; which resolution as soon as he perceived, having already spent some days to no purpose, he quitted the city that he might lose no more time, leaving the designs uneffected which had brought him thither.' If he mentions the public treasure, it is not to tell us that he seized upon it; but only, that the false report of his arrival so frighted his enemies, that the consul Lentulus, who went to the treasury to take thence the money he could find in it, in order to send it to Pompey, departed suddenly without putting his design in execution. According to all the editions of Cæsar, the fear of this consul was so great, that it did not give him leave to shut up the public treasury (8); but a judicious critic (9) is of opinion, that this passage should be corrected by inserting the particle non, and then the meaning of Cæsar will be, that the consul fled away before he had opened the treasury.

(7) Cæsar. de Bello Civ. lib. i, pag. m. 250.

(8) Quibus rebus Romam nunciatis tantus repente terror invaſit, ut cum Lentulus conſul ad aperiendum ærarium veniſſet ad pecuniam Pompejo ex Senatuſconſulto proferendam, protinus aperto fanctiore ærario ex urbe profugeret, Cæſar enim adventare jam jamque, & adeſſe ejus equites falſo nunciabantur. Ib. pag. 239.

(9) Philip Rubens Electus, lib. i, cap. xxiv apud Voſſium de Hiſtor. Lat. pag 63, would have it read protinus non aperto.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google perceive nothing of injuſtice or violence in it. This is the method of thoſe who write their own lives; they conceal ſuch circumſtances as do not tend to their honour.

treaſury. According to the editions, Cæſar tells a thing very different from what all the other Hiſtorians affirm. They obſerve, that he cauſed the doors of the public treaſury to be broke open, or that he threatened to do it when the keys were denied him (10). The common reading ſuppreſſes this violence, becauſe it ſuppoſes that the doors were left open. If we follow the conjecture of Rubeins, we ſhall leſſen the inſincerity of Cæſar's pen: But yet he will always be guilty of a notorious concealing of the truth; for he ſays nothing of his taking advantage of this circumſtance, and of his entring the treaſury which Lentulus had not ſhut. Voſſius, I think, has given no good reaſon againſt this correction of Rubeins. 'Sed profecto, 'ſays he, ſequentia refellunt, nam quia mirum poterat 'videri, quod relinqueret apertum ærarium profu-'giens, eo ſubjungit: Cæſar enim adventare, &c (11). '- - - - But indeed the following words refute it; for 'as it might ſeem ſtrange that he ſhould leave the 'treaſury open when he fled away, he adds: for it was 'reported that Cæſar was juſt a coming, &c.' This reaſon is taken from the words which Cæſar uſes to ſhow the cauſe of Lentulus's fright: But it is not very ſtrong; for it is very ſtrange, that when a great war is coming on, a conſul who is ready to take out the money of the treaſury, in order to ſend it to the general, ſhould fly away before he ſecures that money. So that if Cæſar had made uſe of a negative particle, as Rubeins ſuppoſes, he would have been obliged to give a reaſon for the fear of Lentulus; a fear which would not have allowed him the time neceſſary to provide himſelf with money. Voſſius therefore, without good ground, ſuppoſes that a needleſs reaſon would be alledged, if the fact which Cæſar relates was agreeable to the criticiſm of Rubeins. It appears to me alſo, that the common reading carries the matter to an hyperbole. For what probability is there, that a Roman conſul ſhould have been ſo frighted, that he could not ſee that the time which was neceſſary to ſhut up a door, was not a time to be made much of, I mean that it would not be ſo long as to hinder him from making his eſcape?

(10) See Lucan, Plutarch, and Appian, ubi ſupra, citat. (a), (3), (4). Dion, lib. xli, pag. 181. Cicero, ad Attic. lib. x, Epiſt. xv. Livius, lib. xxi, cap. ii, xxx, 21.

(11) De Hiſt. Latin. pag. 63.

METHYDRIUM, in Greek Μεθύδριον, a city of Peloponneſus in Arcadia, was ſo called upon the account of its ſituation between two rivers (a). Orchomenes, who was the founder of it, built it upon a riſing ground. There was near Methydrium a temple of Neptunus Equeſtris, and a mountain which was called Thaumaſius [A], that is, miraculous, to which it is pretended that Cybele fled, being got with child by Jupiter, and that Hoplodamus, and the giants in his retinue, prepared to aſſiſt her, in caſe Saturn, her huſband, ſhould offer her any violence [B]. It was not denied that ſhe was delivered upon mount Lyceus, but ſome maintained that ſhe deceived her huſband upon mount Thaumaſius [C], by giving him a ſtone inſtead of a child. On the top of this mountain the cave of Cybele was ſhown, in which no perſon was ſuffered to ſet a foot, except the women conſecrated to that goddeſs (b). Methydrium was nothing but a village in the time of Pauſanias, and belonged to the Megalopolitans (c). This article will diſpleaſe a great many people, becauſe it ſhews there were in the times of Paganiſm certain places of devotion, whoſe pretended ſanctity was grounded only upon ridiculous tales: for there are many reſemblances which are not liked at all. Pauſanias is a troubleſome author, and deſerved to be reviſed by the commiſſioners, Librorum expurgandorum, appointed to purge books.

(a) One was called Malœta, and the other Mylaon.

(b) Taken from Pauſanias, lib. viii, pag. 266.

(c) Id. ib. pag. 246.

[A] There was near Methydrium a temple . . . . and a mountain . . . . . called Thaumaſius.] I make this remark only to correct a word in the text of Pauſanias. This author ſays, that the town of Methydrium was ſituated between the river Malœta, and the river Mylaon (1), and that there was a temple upon the river Mylaon, and a mountain upon the river Molottus. It is plain, that here is a river too much, and that this paſſage of Pauſanias has been corrupted by the tranſcribers. I will ſet down the Greek. Ἔστι δὲ ἐν Μεθυδρίῳ, Ποσειδῶνός τε ἱππίου ναὸς, ἔστω μὲν ἐπὶ τῷ Μυλάονι ἐστὶ, τὸ δὲ ὄρος τὸ Θαυμάσιον καλούμενον, κεῖται μὲν ὑπὲρ τὸν Μολοῆτιν τὸν Μολοῆτιν. Eſt Methydrii Neptuni equeſtris ædes ad Mylaontem fluvium: mons vero Thaumaſius dictus ſupra Molottum amnem eſt. I believe, that inſtead of Μολοῆτιν, we ſhould read Μαλοιτάν, which is the name of the other river, whereof Pauſanias had ſpoken a little before. Note, that upon reading this a long time after it had been written, I thought it neceſſary to conſult Pauſanias printed at Leipſic in 1696, which did not come to my hands till a few months ago: and there I found a note which informs me, 1. That Stephanus Niger believes, that Malœta and Molottus, or Moloſſus, in Pauſanias were two different rivers; but that others think the fault of the tranſcribers happened in the word Μαλοιτὰ. 2. That Kuhnius is not poſitive in the caſe, and knows not what to make of certain names which occur but once.

(1) Μαλοιτᾶ τε συναμοῦ καὶ Μολόεντος μέσης. Medio loco inter Malœtan & Mylaontem fluvium. Pauſan. lib. viii, pag. m. 266.

[B] Hoplodamus, and the giants in his retinue, prepared to aſſiſt Cybele, in caſe Saturn . . . ſhould offer her . . . violence.] Natalis Comes underſtood not the paſſage of Pauſanias; for he ſuppoſes that the giants called in to the aſſiſtance of the goddeſs the mountain Thaumaſius. Qui mons fuit ab Hoplodamo, aliiſque illius ſociis Gigantibus in auxilium accitus, ſi forte Saturnus illi vim inferre paraviſſet (2).

(2) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ix, cap. v, pag. m. 959.

[C] It was not denied that ſhe was delivered upon mount Lyceus, but ſome maintained that ſhe deceived her huſband upon mount Thaumaſius.] This is the true ſenſe of the words of Pauſanias, and tho' it be not very clear with reſpect to the grammatical conſtruction, yet it is evident enough from the context, or the intention of the author. You ſee, however, what it is to expreſs one's ſelf ambiguouſly by the wrong placing of words, which leads aſtray the moſt learned men. I have juſt read a commentary which is full of profound learning, and there I find (3) it attributed to Pauſanias, that he ſaid, the cave of Rhea (4) was to be ſeen upon the brow of mount Lyceus, and that no perſon was permitted to enter into it, but only the women who ſacrificed to this goddeſs. Pauſanias ſays ſo only of mount Thaumaſius, for he affirms two things of the ſame mountain; one is, that Saturn was deceived there, taking a ſtone for the child his wife had brought forth; the other is, that the cave of that goddeſs was to be ſeen there. Now it was upon mount Thaumaſius that Saturn was thus deceived; Stephanus Byzantinus ſays ſo (5) therefore, &c. I know very well, that Pauſanias relates ſeveral wonders concerning mount Lyceus, that Jupiter was brought up in it; that there was to be ſeen there a fountain which cauſed rain, when a great drought obliged people to have recourſe to this remedy, by uſing the requiſite ceremonies; that there was alſo to be ſeen a place conſecrated to Jupiter, which all perſons were forbidden to enter, and that if any one was ſo bold as to enter it, in contempt of religion, he died infallibly the ſame year; and that the beaſts as well as men, which entered into it caſt no (6) ſhadow (7). But all this does no prejudice to the wonders of the other mountain.

(3) Ezekiel Spanhemius, Obſervat. in Callimachum, pag. 5. Friſchlin is in a like error. Not. in Hymn. Callim. in Jovem, pag. 372, Edit. Græv.

(4) She is the ſame with Cybele.

(5) Stephan. Byzantinus, in Θαυμάσιον.

(6) Οὐ παρέχεσθαι σκιὰν. Nullas è corporibus ſuis umbras reddere. Pauſan. lib. viii, pag. 269.

(7) Taken from Pauſanias, ubi ſupra, pag. 268, 269.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

METRODORUS of Chios, a disciple of Democritus, had among other disciples the Philosopher Anaxarchus and Hippocrates the Physician (a). Others affirm that he was the disciple of Nessas, who had been the disciple of Democritus, and that he was master to Diogenes, who had been the master of Anaxarchus (b). He taught the eternity of the world; for if the world, said he, had a beginning, it would have been produced out of nothing. He made it also infinite for a reason drawn from its eternity; and immovable, for a reason drawn from its infinity. He said that the clouds, and afterwards the rain, were formed of condensed air, and that the rain which fell upon the sun extinguished it, but that the rarefaction which succeeded this extinction kindled it again; that by length of time it grew thick with driness, and that the sparkling water served it for matter to produce stars. Thus he accounted for the alternate succession of day and night, and in general for the eclipses (c). He is thought to be one of those who denied Certainty; and a passage of Cicero is cited to that purpose [A]. There is no certain proof that Pliny quoted our Metrodorus, for he never gives the surname Chius to the person whom he cites. That surname is given him by Athenæus, together with a work intituled Τρωϊκὰ, that is An Account of the Affairs of Troy (d).

(a) Suidas, in Δημόκριτος.

(b) Euseb. Præpar. Evangel. lib. xiv, cap. xvi, pag. 758.

(c) Taken out of Plutarch, in Stromatis, apud Eusebium, ubi supra, lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 24, 25.

(d) Athen. lib. iv, cap. ult. pag. 184.

[A] He is thought to be one of those who denied Certainty, and a passage of Cicero is cited to that purpose.] Mr Menage commenting upon these words of Diogenes Laërtius: Ὅς (Μητρόδωρος) ἔλεγε μηδὲ αὐτὸ τοῦτο εἰδέναι ὅτι οὐδὲν οἶδε: Hic (Metrodorus) se ne id quidem scire dicebat quod nihil sciret (1), --- Metrodorus said he did not even know that he knew nothing, has these words: 'Chius Metrodorus initio libri qui est de natura: nego, inquit, scire nos, sciamusne aliquid, an nihil sciamus, ne id ipsum quidem nescire aut scire, scire nos, nec omnino sit ne aliquid, an nihil sit. --- Metrodorus of Chios, in the beginning of the book concerning nature says: I deny that we know, whether we know any thing or nothing, or that we can even determine that we know, whether any thing exists or nothing exists.' His citation is out of the fourth book (2) of the Academic Questions of Cicero. I have read again and again this passage, and it always seemed to me that it was Democritus, and not Metrodorus, of whom Cicero says this. It is true indeed, that Metrodorus was a Sceptic; for Sextus Empericus (3) reckons him among those who admitted no criterium, or rule, whereby the truth may be discerned. I cannot conceive how either Democritus or Metrodorus, or any other, could be so extravagant as to maintain, that they knew not whether any thing existed; for they could not doubt whether they doubted, nor imagine, that what doubts is not that they does not exist. It must therefore be owned, thing, and pretended to except their own existence. Note, that Aristocles may confirm the sense which Mr Menage gives to the words of Cicero; for after he had observed that Metrodorus of Chios admitted, as Democritus, his master, did, a Plenum and a Vacuum for two principles, one as a being, and the other as nothing (4); he adds that his book of nature began thus: Οὐδεὶς ἡμῶν οὐδὲν οἶδεν, οὐδ' αὐτο τοῦτο πότερον οἴδαμεν, ἢ οὐκ οἴδαμεν. Nemo nostrum quidquam novit, ne hoc ipsum quidem utrum aliquid noverimus necne. - - - - None of us knows any thing, not even whether we know any thing or not. It cannot be pretended that Metrodorus contradicted himself, affirming this on one side, and maintaining, on the other, that we must only believe our sensations and imaginations (5): for these two doctrines agree very well together. He said that all things are in a perpetual flux, and that upon this account Homer derived their original from the ocean. Protagoras inferred from this principle (6), that man is the measure of all things, that each of them is just what it appears to be, and that we can make no judgment of others. This is perfect Pyrrhonism; for there you find on one hand, that our senses are the only rule of our opinions; and, on the other, that nothing is certain, that there is nothing in the nature of things constant, nothing that does not undergo infinite changes.

(1) Diog. Laërt. in Anaxarcho, lib. ix, num. lviii.

(2) It is in my edition the second book, fol. 207. D.

(3) Sextus Empiricus, adverss. Mathemat. pag. 146, 153.

(4) Aristocles, apud Eusebium, Præpar. Evang. lib. xiv, cap. xix, pag. 765.

(5) Idem, apud eumdem, ibid. cap. xx, pag. 766.

(6) Ibid.

METRODORUS, a good Painter, and a good Philosopher; was chosen by the Athenians, to be sent to Paulus Æmilius, who, after he had taken Perseus king of Macedonia, desired them to send him two men, the one to instruct his children, and the other to paint his triumph. He told them he wanted a tutor that was an excellent Philosopher. The Athenians sent to him Metrodorus who excelled both in Philosophy and Painting, Paulus Æmilius was very well satisfied with their choice, as Pliny tells us [A]. We shall see in the remarks, whether it be true that Cicero speaks of this Metrodorus, as Father Hardouin pretends [B]. I should rather believe that he speaks of METRODORUS

[A] The Athenians sent him . . . . to Paulus Æmilius, who was very well satisfied with their choice, as Pliny tells us.] The reader will be pleased to see his own words: Ubi (Athenis) eodem tempore erat Metrodorus pictor, idemque Philosophus, magnæ in utraque scientia auctoritatis. Itaque cum L. Paulus devicto Perseo petisset ab Athenienses ut sibi quam probatissimum Philosophum mitterent ad erudiendos liberos, itemque pictorem ad triumphum excolendum, Athenienses Metrodorum elegerunt professi eundem in utroque desiderio præstantissimum: quod ita Paulus quoque judicavit (1). Vossius is mistaken when he affirms, that this Metrodorus was a Physician (2).

[B] We shall see . . . . whether it be true that Cicero speaks of this Metrodorus as Father Hardouin pretends.] Father Hardouin imagines, that this passage of Pliny concerns a man, who was a hearer of Carneades, and who wrote a book de Architectonice, and another de Poetis (3). Here are three things which he asserts of him; the first is founded upon the authority of Cicero in the first book de Oratore; the second upon the authority of Pliny, in the index of the thirty fifth book; and the third upon the testimony of Plutarch, in the book against the Epicureans. I shall examine these three things, by going backwards. It is plain, that that the Metrodorus cited by Plutarch (4), as having written concerning the Poets, is he who was a friend to Epicurus. He did not live therefore in the time of Perseus; for Epicurus, who survived him seven years (5), died in the second year of the CXXVIIth Olympiad (6), but Perseus was not taken by the Romans till about the end of the CLIId. The index of the thirty fifth book of Pliny contains nothing that obliges us to think the Metrodorus of Perseus, to be the author of the book about Architecture: and as to the passage of Cicero, which here follows, it does not seem to agree to this Metrodorus: 'Audivi summos homines quum quæstor ex Macedonia venissem Athenas florente Academia, ut temporibus illis ferebatur, quod eam Carneades, & Clitomachus, & Æschines obtinebant. Erat etiam Metrodorus qui cum illis una ipsum illum Carneadem diligentius audierat (7) - - - - When I came quæstor from Macedonia to Athens, I was a hearer of the greatest men, the academy being at that time in much repute, because Carneades, Clitomachus, & Æschines, taught there. Metrodorus also was a diligent hearer of Carneades with the other.' It is the Orator Crassus that speaks. The time he points to, in all appearance, is the year 650 of Rome. How then can one imagine that Perseus's Metrodorus was still alive, since he was sent to Paulus Æmilius about the year 585, as one of the most

(1) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. xi, pag. m. 230.

(2) Vossius, de Histor. Græcis, pag. 389.

(3) Harduin. in Plinium, ubi supra.

(4) Plutarch. non posse suaviter, vivi, pag. 1094, E.

(5) Diog. Laërt. lib. x, num. 23.

(6) Id. ib. num. 15.

(7) Cicero, de Orat. lib. i, cap. xi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

RUS of Stratonice [C], who forſook the Epicurean ſchool and followed Carneades.

moſt excellent Philoſophers that could be choſen in Athens? It is more eaſy to refute Volaterran, who did not only think that the Metrodorus, who was ſent to Paulus Æmilius, was the diſciple of Carneades mentioned by Cicero, but alſo that his artificial memory was commended by Cicero (8). The Metrodorus who was commended upon this account, was a native of Scepſis, and different from the diſciple of Carneades; of which I will here give you demonſtrative proof. Craſſus heard the latter in Athens (9), and the other in Aſia. 'Paulum, ſitiens, ſays 'he, (10) iſtarum artium de quibus loquor, guſtavi 'queſtor in Aſia quum eſſem æqualem fere meum 'ex academia rhetorem nactus Metrodorum illum 'de cujus memoria commemoravit Antonius. - - - - - 'Thirſting after thoſe arts, of which I ſpeak; I 'taſted a little when I was quæſtor in Aſia, having 'found Metrodorus, the Rhetorician, almoſt of the ſame 'age with my ſelf, whoſe memory Antonius has mentioned.' It is plain that he ſpeaks of Metrodorus of Scepſis; for Antonius the Orator had ſaid: 'Vidi ego ſummos 'homines & divina prope memoria, Athenis Carne- 'adem, in Aſia quem vivere hodie ajunt Scepſium 'Metrodorum, quorum uterque tanquam literis in cera, 'ſic ſe ajebat imaginibus in iis locis quos haberet, quæ 'meminiſſe vellet, perſcribere (11) - - - - I ſaw at A- 'thens Carneades and Metrodorus of Scepſis, who is ſaid 'to live now in Aſia; men of the greateſt abilities, and 'endowed with a memory almoſt divine; both which ſaid 'they wrote down in images, like letters on wax, thoſe 'things they deſired to remember.' A little after Craſſus ſpeaks after this manner: 'Audivi . . . . . & Athenis 'cum eſſem doctiſſimos viros, & in Aſia iſtum ipſum 'ſcepſium Metrodorum quum de his ipſis rebus diſpu- 'taret (12). - - - - I heard . . . when I was at Athens 'men of very great learning, and in Aſia Metrodorus of 'Scepſis, when he diſcourſed of thoſe very things.'

(8) Volaterr. lib. xxvi, pag. m. 456.

(9) See citat. (7).

(10) Cicero, ubi ſupra, lib. iii, cap. xx.

(11) Id. ib. lib. ii, cap. lxxxviii.

(12) Id. ib.

[C] . . . . I ſhould rather believe that he ſpeaks of METRODORUS of Stratonice.] We have already ſeen (13) that his Metrodorus followed Carneades with great application. He ſays in another book, that Metrodorus of Stratonice might very well know Carneades (14). It may therefore be imagined, that theſe two places concern the ſame perſon. Beſides, we ſee in Diogenes Laërtius, a Metrodorus of Stratonice, who forſook Epicurus to follow the ſchool of Carneades. The Hiſtorian is miſtaken as to the time, for the death of Epicurus preceded the birth of Carneades; but, however, his error ſerves to make one believe, that Metrodorus mentioned by Craſſus the Orator, was Metrodorus of Stratonice. As to the miſtake of Diogenes Laërtius, ſee Mr Menage (15), and the pieces inſerted in the Journal des Sçavans which I have cited in another place (16).

(13) In the preceding remark, citation (7).

(14) Bene autem noſſe Carneadem Stratoniceus Metrodorus putabatur. Cicero, Academic. Quæſt. lib. ii, fol. 203. B. Note, that theſe words have ſcarce any connexion with the preceding, ſo that one would think that there is ſomething left out.

(15) Menag. in Diog. Laërt. lib. x, num. 9.

(16) In the remark [N] of the article CARNEADES.

MEZIRIAC (CLAUDIUS GASPAR BACHET LORD OF) was one of the greateſt men of the XVIIth century. He was of Breſſe, of a noble and antient family (a) [A], as Mr Pelliſſon informs us, with ſeveral other curious particulars which I will not tranſcribe becauſe they are in a book (b), which is in every body's hands. I ſhall only take out of it two things; the firſt is, that Mr de Meziriac in his youth ſpent a great part of his time at Paris and at Rome, and that in this laſt place he made many Italian verſes, in emulation of Mr Vaugelas, who was there alſo. The ſecond is, that when he was at Paris, and it was ſaid that he was to be made preceptor to Lewis XIII, that this was the reaſon why he left the court in haſte; and he ſaid afterwards, that he never was in ſo much pain, for he thought he had already upon his ſhoulders the heavy burden of a whole kingdom. It is ſaid in Moreri's Dictionary (c) that afterwards he returned to Paris, and was a member of the French Academy. The latter of theſe two facts is true, and the former falſe (d): this learned man was choſen to fill up one of the places in the academy at its birth, although he was abſent; and when his turn came to make a diſcourſe there, he ſent one which was read in the aſſembly by Mr de Vaugelas (e). In a book of Colomiés we meet with a particular, which is not mentioned by Mr Pelliſſon, which is this, that Mr de Meziriac had been a Jeſuit at twenty years of age, and went thro' his firſt claſs at Milan, where falling ſick he became once more a ſecular (f). He died at Bourg in Breſſe (g), February the twenty ſixth 1638 (h), and left ſeveral children by his marriage with Philiberta de Chabeu (i). It will appear by the remark, which will be ſeen below concerning his writings [B], that he was a man of ſuch a large capacity,

(a) Pelliſſon, Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. m. 256.

(b) The Hiſt. of the French Academy.

(c) At the word Bachet.

(d) I do not deny that Meziriac made journies to Paris, but only that he came to ſettle there, which is Moreri's meaning.

(e) Peliſſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 104.

(f) Colomiés, Recueil de Particularitez, pag. m. 109, 110. He obſerves that he learned this from Mr Patin.

(g) Guichenon, Hiſt. de Breſſe, Part iii, pag. 10.

(h) Peliſſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 262.

(i) Guichenon, ubi ſupra.

[A] He was of a noble and antient family.] It owes its nobility to learning. 'Peter Bachet, lord of Mey- 'ſeria, Vauluyſant, and Lyonnieres, whom the family 'of the Bachets owns for their ſtock, was a coun- 'ſellor, and lieutenant-general in the bailliwick of 'Breſſe, under king Henry II, and then chief-judge, 'after reſtitution was made to duke Emanuel-Philibert 'of his dominions. He did homage to this prince 'in the year 1563, for the lordſhips of Meyſeria, 'Vauluyſant, and Lyonnieres, his laſt will is dated 'September 5, 1565. He was one of the great men 'of his time, admired for his probity and learning; 'a noted Civilian whom the people came to conſult 'from all the neighbouring countries; and a great 'Latin Poet. There are ſtill to be ſeen two manu- 'ſcript tomes of his conſultations, a collection of his 'Latin Poems, and a book of epiſtles which he wrote 'to the moſt learned men of his age, and their an- 'ſwers to him, the publication whereof would con- 'firm the teſtimony I give to his memory (1).' He married, the tenth of December 1540, Frances de Soria, the daughter of Antony de Soria a Portugueſe gentleman, and chief Phyſician to Beatrix of Portugal, ducheſs of Savoy. From this marriage came John Bachet, who was counſellor to the duke of Savoy, and judge of the appeals of Breſſe, which was the chief magiſtracy in that county while it was under the duke of Savoy; he was a perſon of as much learning and integrity as his father, his laſt will is dated July the 5th 1586. He left, beſide other children, our Mr de Meziriac, and William Bachet (2), Lord of Vauluyſant, counſellor to the king, and preſident in the election of Breſſe, who made his will April 22, 1631, and died without children. Among other qualities which recommended him, he was a very good French and Latin Poet, of which he has left us many proofs, particularly in that excellent and natural tranſlation of ſome of Ovid's Epiſtles, which are printed with thoſe of Claudius-Gaſpard Bachet, Lord of Meyſeria, his brother (3). You may obſerve, that Guichenon, the Hiſtoriographer of that country, always calls the lordſhip Meyſeria, which the author, of whom I here give an article, always calls Meziriac in the title of his books. Doubtleſs he took the liberty to change the name to make it more ſmooth, and leſs grating to the ears of the French, and more capable of being brought into Poetry.

(1) Guichenon, Hiſt. of Breſſe, part iii, pag. 9.

(2) He was the eldeſt.

(3) Id. ib.

[B] It will appear by the remark . . . . concerning his writings.] The firſt book he publiſhed was printed in 1613, with the title of Problemes plaiſans & delectables qui ſe font par les nombres. He publiſhed it as well to give an eſſay of his ability, as to try what judgment would be made of his works, and that it might ſerve as a forerunner to his Diophantus (4). Eleven years after he put out a ſecond edition (5) of it, corrected, with the addition of ſeveral propoſitions and problems. And becauſe he feared leſt, his Diophantus being already publiſhed, any one ſhould wonder, that he who wrote a work ſo ſerious, and full of profound ſpeculations as his Diophantus was, ſhould trifle away his time in reviſing his Problems, he gave this anſwer among others in

(4) Meziriac, Preface to the ſecond edition of his Problems.

(5) At Lyons, by Peter Rigaud, 1624, in 8vo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google capacity, that he could find convenient room for the ſciences which have no relation to one another. He was a pretty good Poet in French, Italian, and Latin, an excellent Grammarian, an eminent Grecian, and a great Critic. He knew the ſmalleſt particulars relating to fables: he was ignorant of nothing in Mythology. He was a Philoſopher, and a Divine well verſed in controverſies (k), and underſtood admirably well the moſt abſtracted queſtions of Algebra and Mathematics. Guichenon ſays, that 'without 'doing any injury to his memory, one may give him the elogium which Quintilian 'gave to a great perſon of his time, that he might have left better works if he had 'pleaſed, Felix ingenium, quod voluit potuit! ô utinam meliora voluiſſet (l).' I ſhall ſpeak, in a ſeparate remark, of his writings which he deſigned for the preſs [C]. It is a miſtake to affirm in his Preface (6): 'That books are the children of 'our minds, and that beſides the natural diſpoſition 'which all fathers have to love their children in ge- 'neral, they have a particular affection to their firſt 'born; wherefore this book being the firſt that came 'from my hand, and as it were the firſt born child 'of my mind, I have reaſon to cheriſh it particularly, 'as not to be contented with having brought it into 'the world, but moreover to take care of its preſer- 'vation and growth.' Mr Pelliſſon obſerves (7), 1. That the book of Arithmetical Recreations, is a work, wherein Mr de Meziriac taught all manner of ſubtleties, in playing with numbers, and from whence is taken part of the Recreation Mathematiques (8). 2. That his Diophantus tranſlated out of Greek into Latin with a Commentary, is a work, which Mr de Fermat, and all thoſe who underſtand Algebra, do highly eſteem, and that Mr de Meziriac ſaid himſelf, he wondred how he could compaſs this work, and that he had not finiſhed it had it not been for a melancholy and ſtubborneſs, proceeding from a quartan ague, of which he was then ill. Voſſius (9) is miſtaken as to the year of this edition of Diophantus, which he places in the year 1623, he ſhould have placed it in the year 1621. The Hiſtoriographer of Breſſe was not guilty of this fault; but he too much multiplied the editions of his book. The works which Meziriac printed, ſays he (10), are, 'Dio- 'phanti Alexandrini Arithmeticorum libri ſex, & de nume- 'ris multangulis liber unus, a book very rare, which he 'reſtored in a great meaſure, and enriched with very 'learned Commentaries: it was printed firſt at Paris 'in the year 1621, and dedicated to the great Oracle, 'Antony Faure, firſt preſident of Savoy; afterwards it 'was reprinted ſeveral times in Germany. Problems 'of Arithmetic and Mathematics. A tranſlation of ſome 'Epiſtles of Ovid into French verſe, with very curious 'Commentaries. A Treatiſe of Tribulation, tranſlated 'from the Italian of Cacciaguerra. Epiſtolæ, & Poe- 'mata Varia. The Life of Alexander Luſaga. The 'Life of Æſop, wherein, according to the judgment 'of all the learned, there are very excellent and fine 'remarks.' Mr Pelliſſon clears what is there ſaid confuſedly of the Poems of our author. There is a little book of Italian poems done by him, wherein are imitations of the beſt compariſons, which are in the eight firſt books of the Æneids. Another of Latin poems; ſeveral poems in French; ſome of which have been inſerted in the collection printed in 1621, with this title, Delices de la Poeſie Françoiſe, and in that of the year 1627 (11). Note, that Diophantus had never appeared but in Latin. Xylander publiſhed it in this language, in the year 1575. Theſe words of Mr Konig, 'Caſp. 'quoque Bachetus An. 1613. profundiſſimis ſpecula- 'tionibus eum (Diophantum) illuſtravit (12). - - - - 'Caſp. Bachet likewiſe illuſtrated Diophantus with 'moſt profound ſpeculations in the year 1613,' would be right, if inſtead of 1613, it had been 1621. I believe his Printers inſtead of 1623, have put 1613, for doubtleſs Mr Konig had it from Voſſius; and of this I am the more eaſily perſuaded, becauſe I find theſe words in Voſſius: 'Anno CIↃ IↃ 'CXXIII. Gaſper Bachetus Diophantum illuſtravit. Imo 'profundis in eum ſpeculationibus immortalem ſibi 'gloriam comparavit ut judicium eſt Jacobi de Billy 'Compendienſis, præfatione in Algebram (13). - - - - 'In the year 1623, Gaſper Bachet illuſtrated Diophan- 'tus: Nay, by his profound ſpeculations on it, he has 'acquired to himſelf immortal honour, according to the 'opinion of James de Billy of Compiegne, in the Pre- 'face to his Algebra.' As to the Remark of Mr Konig, that Bulialdus publiſhed an edition of Diophantus, I believe it to be falſe. I will here give you a blunt expreſſion of Malherbe. '\Mr de Meziriac, 'attended with two or three of his friends, brought 'him a book of Arithmetic, written by a Greek au- 'ther, called Diophantus, whom he had commented 'upon. His friends praiſed the book exceedingly, 'as being very uſeful to the public; whereupon 'Malherbe aſked them, whether it would bring down 'the price of bread (14).' We ſhall ſee, in the next remark, what eſteem Mr Des Cartes had for that work of Mr de Meziriac.

(k) Id. ib.

(l) Id. ib.

(6) Meziriac, ubi ſupra.

(7) Pelliſſon, Hiſt. of the French Academy, pag. m. 263.

(8) It is the title of a book which was printed many times. I have an edition of it printed at Paris, 1630, in 8vo, with the remarks of Claudius Mydorgius.

(9) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 341, 464.

(10) Guichenon, ubi ſupra, pag. 10.

(11) Pelliſſon, ubi ſupra, pag. 262.

(12) Konig, Bibl. pag. 252.

(13) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 341.

(14) The Life of Malherbe, pag. 10.

[C] I ſhall ſpeak of the writings which he deſigned for the preſs.] 'He had undertaken a new tranſlation 'of all the works of Plutarch, with notes, wherein 'he intended to ſhow the faults which Amyot had 'committed in his verſion of this author, to explain 'many paſſages which had never been underſtood, and 'to lay open to us the treaſures of antiquity. There 'wanted but a ſmall matter of this great and labo- 'rious work to be done, when he died, which is an 'inexpreſſible loſs to the public; all learned men ex- 'pected it with impatience, which was increaſed by 'the fine letter which he wrote to the Academy 'of Paris, to thank them for the honour they had 'done him, to admit him into their ſociety, wherein 'he gave an account of his deſign. He has alſo left 'us many pieces finiſhed, but not printed, which it 'were to be wiſhed the public might no longer be de- 'prived of, viz. Elementorum Arithmeticorum, lib. 13. 'Tractatus de Geometricis quæſtionibus per Algebram. 'Theſe are the two works which he promiſed at the 'end of his Preface upon Diophantus. The reſt of 'Ovid's epiſtles without Commentaries. Apollodori A- 'thenienſis Grammatici Bibliotheces, ſive de Deorum Ori- 'gine libri tres, tranſlated by himſelf, with very learn- 'ed obſervations. Agathemeres, a Greek Geographer 'not yet printed (15).' This paſſage of Mr Guichenon is not very exact; for he give us, as a letter of thanks, written to the gentlemen of the French Academy, a diſcourſe which Mr de Meziriac compoſed in conformity to the rules of the Academy. 'They 'made by lot with billets, a catalogue of the mem- 'bers of the Academy; it was ordered, that every 'one ſhould be obliged to make in his turn a diſcourſe 'upon ſuch a ſubject, and of ſuch a length as he 'pleaſed (16) . . . . . There were twenty of theſe diſ- 'courſes ſpoken ſucceſſively in the Accademy (17) . . . 'The ſeventeenth was ſent by Mr de Meziriac, and 'read in the aſſembly † by Mr de Vaugelas: It was 'intituled De la Traduction. In this diſcourſe the au- 'thor who was reckoned very ſkillful in the Belles Let- 'tres, and chiefly in the Greek Tongue, after he had 'commended the genius, the pains, and the ſtyle, of 'Amiot in his verſion of Plutarch, and, as it ſeems, with 'ingenuity enough, pretended to ſhow that in divers 'paſſages which he obſerved, to the number of two 'thouſand, this great tranſlator has committed very 'great faults of divers ſorts, of which he gives ſeve- 'ral examples (18).' I know that the abbot Nicaiſe, whoſe zeal for the advancement of learning is very well known, has been very buſy in finding out the Apollodorus of Meziriac, and it is none of his fault that the Bookſellers have not printed it.

(15) Guichenon, ubi ſupra.

(16) Pelliſſon, ubi ſupra, pag. 99.

(17) Id. ib. pag. 100.

† The tenth of December 1635.

(18) Pelliſſon, ubi ſupra, pag. 104.

Here follow ſome matters of fact, which concern another work of this writer. Mr Baillet relates that Mr de Des Cartes in a very particular manner eſteemed the genius and capacity of Mr Meziriac, chiefly for Arithmetic and Algebra, which he was maſter of to ſo great a degree, as equalled him to Vieta . . . His work on Diophantus of Alexandria, is more than ſufficient to juſtify the eſteem which Des Cartes had for him: but it is likely that the public would have ſtill out done him in this eſteem, if they had ſeen the treatiſe of Algebra of Mr de Meziriac, and ſome other manuſcripts of this author, the chief of which is that of the † thirteen books, of the Elements of Arithmetic ſubſervient to Algebra, written in Latin, and purchaſed of the heirs of Mr de Meziriac

† A catalogue of the manuſcripts of Meziriac, ſent me from Bourg in Breſſe.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google affirm that he was not much above forty five years old when he died [D]: but I cannot precisely tell the number of his years. It is said (m), that 'Mr D. S. who is . . . of the 'family of this famous academist, seems to have inherited his knowledge of Mytho- 'logy: he is writing the history of it, every circumstance of which will be supported by, 'or adorned with, some passages of a Greek or Latin Poet.'

(m) Diverfitez Curieuses, Tom. VII, pag. 121, 122, Dutch Edit.

One of his sons was president of the presidial of Bourg in Bresse. He was admired by all the court, when he went, in the year 1660, to compliment His Majesty at Lyons (n). He was still alive in the year 1704.

(n) Taken from the Mercure Galant of January 1705, pag. 132.

Meziriac about fifteen or sixteen years ago, by one of the Reformed religion, who did not fail to carry it out of the kingdom, at the time of that revolution, in which the Protestants were before the revocation of the edict of Nantes (19). There is in this narrative a circumstance that should be rectified, about which I have received the following memoir (20). Besides the three books which Mr Backet de Meziriac wrote about numbers, and which he prefixed to his commentaries upon Diophantus, he wrote the Elements of Arithmetic, divided into thirteen books, which were never printed. After his death Mr de Meziriac, his son, was sollicited to publish them, but he set so great a price upon the manuscript, that no body would buy it. At last he sold it to Mr d'Alibert, Treasurer of France at Montauban, for 1500 livres. Mr d'Alibert intended to print it at his own expence, but being surprized by death before he could execute his design, he gave this manuscript as he was dying to one of his friends, which is all written with the hand of Mr de Meziriac the father. This friend gave it afterwards to Mr Case, who gave it to Mr Picard one of the royal academy of sciences. In the year 1679, Mr Picard gave it to the abbot Galloys, who, to fulfil the good intentions of Mr d'Alibert, offered it to several Booksellers to print it. But because these elements are of an abstracted science, and in Latin, he has not as yet met with any Bookseller, that would undertake the printing of it. There is therefore something to be corrected in the 291*st page of the first part of the Life of Des Cartes; for he who purchased this manuscript was not of the Reformed religion; and he to whom it was given, did not carry it out of the kingdom; and the manuscript is still at Paris.* It appears by a letter of Sarravius (21), that Mr Morus had undertaken to collect the manuscript books of Mr de Meziriac, and that it was wished he would perform his promise. Doubtless Sarravius had inspired him with this good design, when he desired him to buy for him all the works of that learned man (22), for he spoke of them with peculiar encomiums. This was in a letter which he wrote March the fourteenth 1644. He thought that Meziriac had been dead about ten years; and consequently was ignorant of the true time.

(19) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. I, pag. 291.

(20) Drawn up by the abbot Galois, and sent by Mr Simon de Valhebert.

(21) It is the 18th, at pag. 190, of the edition of Utrecht.

(22) See his LXXth letter, at pag. 68, he calls him always Mezeriacus instead of Meziriacus.

The decay of learning.

For the rest it is not to be wondered, that no Printer could be found for the commentary of Meziriac upon Apollodorus. The taste for this kind of learning is wholly lost, and it is very probable, that if Meziriac was now alive, they would not do him the honour to go to seek for him in Bresse, to give him a place in the French Academy. That which formerly procured him this advantage, would now be a reason for not thinking of him. The politeness of his stile, the beauty of the French verses, were not the cause why he was thought worthy to be one of the academy; for it must be ingenuously confessed, that neither his prose nor his verses in our language had any thing that was exquisite, and in this respect he was much inferior to almost all his fellow members. It was the only reputation of his knowledge, and the proofs he gave of his vast learning that made him be chosen. The times are changed; and an author is now of no account who perfectly understands Mythology, the Greek Poets, their scholiasts, and can make use of them to clear, or correct, some difficult passages, a point of Chronology, a question of Geography, or of Grammar, a variation of narratives, &c. Men not only prefer to the works of such an author, those that have no such thing in them; but also call this kind of learning pedantry (23). Which is the ready way to discourage all young people of good parts from following the study of Philology. There is no greater affront than to be called a Pedant, and therefore men will not take the pains to acquire much learning; because they are afraid of being exposed to this scandalous treatment if they should make it appear, that they have read the ancient authors. And where is the man who does not love to be respected for his knowledge, and who is not animated by the hope of glory? take away this hope, and you cool the most ardent, you increase the laziness of those who fear a painful application. Without doubt, one of the principal reasons why the study of the Belles Lettres is so much disused, is, that several who either pretend to be, or really are, fine wits, have introduced a custom of condemning, as a science fit only for the schools, and a gross piece of pedantry, all citations of Greek passages, and learned remarks. They have been so unjust as to extend their railleries to writers who were polite, and knew the world; as Costar for instance. Who would after this have aspired to the glory of a fine wit, by setting off his reading and critical remarks? If they had only condemned those who cite impertinently Plato and Aristotle, Hippocrates and Varro, to prove a thought common to all ages and nations (24), they had not discouraged so many people; but in a disdainful manner they have banished those from the number of fine gentlemen, and confined them to the colleges, who durst declare that they had made collections: they laughed at the Costars, and even at the letters of Voiture, which were intermixed with Latin. The effect of this censure was so much the greater, because it was cloaked with a very fair pretence, which was, that we should labour to polish our mind, and form our judgment, and not heap up in our memory what others have said. The truer this maxim is, the more it flatters superficial and lazy tempers, and pushes them on to ridicule all shew of learning. Their principal motive was, perhaps, to undervalue the merit of others, in order to magnify their own; for if one should tell them, You condemn this author who cites Greek and Latin: Could you do as much? Lay your hand upon your heart, would you blame him if you were able to imitate him? It is very probable, their sincerity would be put to an hard trial. But let us abridge this digression, and conclude, that things are come to such a pass, that the Nouvelles de la Republique des Letters for the last month (25) inform us, that the Bookseller of Paris, who would print the version of Homer, made by Madam Dacier, will not print the original with it. He is afraid, no doubt, that the sight of the Greek character will fright the readers, and hinder the sale of the book. Consider, I beseech you, what was written from Paris to Mr Bernard, and what he has inserted in his Nouvelles for the month of October last. The Telemacomania is a book full of wit and fire (26). It is divided into two parts: the author (27) shows, in the first part, that the church had always an aversion for romances. The second part is much longer than the first, but it is also more tedious, because the author makes it his only business to shew the anachronisms and faults in History and Mythology which are in Telemachus (28). By this you may judge what is the prevailing humour, and conclude, that the commentary upon Apollodorus would be laughed at in Paris; and this the Booksellers know very well, and therefore will not print it. It is a work of too much learning.

(23) See La Bruyere, in the chapter of Judgment, pag. m. 498, &c. seq.

(24) Herillus will always cite whether he speaks, harangues, or writes. He makes the princes of Philosophers say, that wine inebriates, and the Roman Orator, that water tempers it. If he falls upon the subject of Morality, it is not he but the divine Plato, who affirms, that virtue is amiable, and vice odious, and that both the one and the other grow into a habit. The most common and trivial things, which he himself is able to think of, he will be indebted to the Antients for, to Latin and Greek authors. La Bruyere, ibid. pag. 525.

(25) Bernard, Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Nov. 1700. pag. 586, 587.

(26) Idem, Nouvel. for the month of October 1700, pag. 385.

(27) That is, the abbot Faydit.

(28) Id. ib. pag. 389, 390.

[D] It is a mistake to affirm that he was not much above forty five years old when he died.] This age only is assigned him in the History of the French Academy. Others say, he lived forty seven years (29). But it is certain he died not so young; for his father who had him by the first marriage, married again in 1586. The contract of this second marriage is dated September 27, as Mr Guichenon informs us. I wish he had been as careful to set down the day of people's birth, as the day of their marriage and wills. The one would not have been more difficult to him than the other as to the family of Mr de Meziriac. He knew the son of this learned man, and by him probably he recovered the memoirs which taught him what he relates of this family. Why then did he not ask him the days of their births? If he had done it, we might have known certainly how long this member of the French academy lived.

(29) Baillet, Judgm. on the Poets, num. 1432.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MICRÆLIUS (JOHN) professor of Divinity at Stetin, was born at Cuslin in Pomerania the third of September in the year 1597. He began his studies in the college of his own country, and, in the year 1614, he continued them at Stetin under Daniel Cramer who taught Theology there (a), and under Joachim Prætorius, &c. He there maintained a dispute de Deo uno & trino in the year 1616, which procured him great esteem. He went the year following to the university of Konigsberg, and there held a dispute de Veritate transcendentali. He received in the year 1621 at the university of Griphswald the degree of Master in Philosophy, after having maintained a thesis de Meteoris: some time after, he went to Leipsic to finish his studies, and was made professor of Rhetoric in the Royal College at Stetin in the year 1624, and rector of the senate school in the year 1627, and rector of the Royal College and professor of Theology in the year 1649, having received the degree of Doctor of Divinity in the university of Griphswald the same year 1649 [A]. He had obtained by his sollicitations in the 1642, that there might be professors of Law, Physic, and Mathematics, in the Royal College, and that a certain number of students might be maintained there at the public charge. He made a journey to Sweden in the year 1653, and had the honour to pay his respects to queen Christina, who gave him very obliging marks of her liberality. He died the third of December in the year 1658. He had been married three times (b) [B]. I shall set down the titles of his principal works [C], and make some observations [D] on the additions to his

(a) He was afterwards superintendant of the churches of Pomerania.

(b) Taken from his Life, writ by Daniel Hartnac. It is prefixed to his Syntagma Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, and to his Syntagma Historiæ Politicæ. I have also taken something from Witte, Memor. Theolog. pag. 1282, & seq.

[A] He was made Doctor of Divinity .... in the year 1649.] He was put upon asking this degree, because in a famous dispute he had had with John Bergius (1), the latter arrogantly boasted of his being an old Doctor in Divinity, to which Micrælius could only answer, that he had received the degree of Master in Philosophy before Bergius. Queen Christina was at the charge of promoting Micrælius to the degree of Doctor of Divinity (2). The dispute I speak of related to the differences between the Lutherans and Calvinists.

(1) First preacher at the court of the elector of Brandenburg.

(2) Ex Dan. Hartnaccio, in Vita Micrælii.

[B] He was married three times.] He married his first wife in the year 1627. She was daughter to Joachim Prætorius, archdeacon, and professor at Stetin. He lost her at the end of one year with a child he had by her. He married again in the year 1630 a daughter of David Reutz, superintendant of eastern Pomerania, and had by her nine children, of which there were but two (3) alive when he died. He took a third wife in the year 1642, by whom he had six children who all survived him. She was daughter of Michael Hecken, superintendant of Primislaw (4). All these marks of the fruitful blessing which GOD shed upon him having been specified in his funeral Programma, I did not think it proper to pass them over in silence.

(3) A daughter, who was married, and a son who studied Divinity.

(4) Taken from his Funeral Programma, apud Witte, Memor. Theolog. pag. 1286, 1287.

[C] I shall set down the titles of his principal works.] His Ethnophronius contra Gentiles de Principiis Religionis Christianæ was printed at Stetin in the years 1647, 1651, and 1674, in 4to. He published a continuation of it in the year 1652 in 4to, contra Judaicas depravationes. His Lexicon Philosophicum was printed in the same city in the years 1653 and 1661, in 4to. Heterodoxia Calviniana de Prædestinatione, at Stetin in the year 1651 in 4to, and 1665 in 12mo. Syntagma Historiarum Ecclesiæ, in the same city in the years 1630, 1644, and 1660, in 8vo. It has been since printed in 4to, with the continuation of Mr Hartnac. I make use of the fifth edition which is of Leipsic 1699, in two volumes. Monstrosæ opinionis Isaacii Peyrerii scriptoris Galli de Præ-Adamitis abominanda fœditas, at Stetin in the year 1656, in 4to. Syntagma Historiarum Politicarum, at Stetin in the years 1627, 1633, in 8vo, and 1654 in 4to. I shall speak of it in the following remark. Those who have a mind to see the titles of the other works of Micrælius, both Latin and German, need only read the Sieur Witte (5).

(5) Witte, ibid. pag. 1289, & seq.

[D] I shall make some observations on the additions to his Political History.] The last edition is of Leipsic in the year 1702, in two volumes in 4to. The whole title of it is as follows: Johannis Micrælii Pomerani Historia Politica, qua Imperiorum, Regnorum, Electoratuum, Ducatuum, Rerumque publicarum omnium origines, incrementa, fata, bello paceque gesta ad annum à Christo nato 1648 describuntur, cum Continuatione Danielis Hartnaccii Pomerani, qui ad exitum usque superioris seculi eandem eadem methodo juxta annorum seriem pertexuit, & totum Opus Autoribus in margine, unde isthæc desumta, adductis, Tabulis Chronologicis & Genealogicis Indicibusque plane novis & locupletissimis exornavit. I am persuaded Mr Hartnac will not take it ill that I point at some things, which seem to me faulty in his additions, and by that means do all I can, that those who reprint general histories may give us good Appendixes. It is their custom to add to them such things as have happened between the former edition and their own (6): and when they find a continuation ready done, as that for instance of Mr Hartnac, they chuse rather to copy it than be at the trouble to compose a new one: but they will at least endeavour to correct what they copy, when they are advertised of the faults.

(6) Compare what I say in the Dissertation on defamatory Libels, num. viii. and remark [A] at the beginning.

I say then in the first place, Mr Hartnac does not sufficiently distinguish persons, their proper names, titles, &c. He tells us of one Condé, Condæus, who took Gernshac in Germany in the year 1691, and the fort of Haberstein (7). But there was no general of the name of Condé that year in the armies of France. He says, prince Eugene, a Frenchman, is a brother's son of the duke of Savoy (8): which is a mistake; for this duke has no brother, and the relation between these two princes arises only from their being descended of Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, great-grand-father of prince Eugene. He gives to the mareschal de Lorge, the title of Marquis (9), which should have been that of count.

(7) Hartnaccius, Tom. i, pag. 565.

(8) Ibid. pag. 566.

(9) Ibid. Tom. ii, pag. 134.

II. I observe, he does not sufficiently characterize events: he sometimes forgets the most essential circumstances, or at least those the reader ought to be informed of, in order to judge rightly of the state of affairs. I shall instance but in one example: he affirms prince Eugene forced the marquis de Catinat to raise the siege of Susa in the month of July 1693, that he bombarded Pignerol in the month of September, and blew up, by mines, the fort of St Brigitt: that he fought a battle in the month of October, in which both sides lost a vast number of men, and yet the victory was doubtful; and lastly that he drove the enemy beyond the Alps. Marchionem de Catinat Eugenius Dux ab urbis Susæ obsidione Julio Mense fortiter repulit: Septembri Pignarolum injectis ignibus globisque majoribus vastavit, fortalitium Brigittæ actis Cuniculis evertit; Octobri denique ambiguo marte & plurimis utrinque cæsis pugnavit, hostem denique difficillimo montes niveque gradu finibus excedere coegit (10). These are the words of Mr Hartnac, and may be censured in many respects, for, I. Prince Eugene did not command all the troops, he commanded only those of the emperor, the duke of Savoy commanded in chief, and in person, the whole army: to him therefore he ought to have ascribed all the exploits, since he did not enter into particulars, but only took notice of the most remarkable successes of the campaign. II. It is not true that Mr de Catinat was ever forced to raise the siege of Susa. He took this town in the month of November 1690, and kept it till it was restored by the peace in the year 1696. It may be thought that Mr Hartnac by mistake put Susa instead of Coni. I allow it; but, III. I observe that the siege of Coni was raised in the year 1691, and not in the year 1693. I observe, IV, that Mr de Catinat was not there in person: V. that prince Eugene did not force the lines of the besiegers: he did not even attack them. Mr de Dulonde who commanded the besiegers

(10) Hart. Tom. i, pag. 568, 569.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his political history.

besiegers retired out of hearing, and that without any necessity as the French believed: and indeed he was taken up, and turned out of favour (11). Therefore the expressions of the Historian, ab obsidione. . . . fortiter repulit Marchionem de Catinat, are deceitful, since they lead one to think that Mr de Catinat raised the siege in person after he had been soundly beaten. An exact Historian always chuses his words with so much care; that he does not leave his readers to guess whether the besigers retired of themselves, or waited to be attacked. VI. The circumstance should not have been suppressed, that the fort of St Brigitt was besieged in form, and that the French defended it many days and afterwards retreated to Pignerol. VII. He ought not to have confined himself to the bombarding of Pignerol, nor have said that the bombs utterly destroyed that place, vastavit. Fair dealing required of him to intimate, that the allies besieged it, and were not able to take it, and that their bombarding did no great mischief to it (12). VIII. Sincerity will not permit one to reckon the battle of Marsaglia among those whose success is doubtful. The writers against the French acknowledge, whether they will or no, that the mareschal de Catinat gained it (13). Mr Hartnac makes the same confession in other parts of his book, and that where he owns the raising of the siege of Pignerol (14). IX. It is false, that Mr de Catinat was forced by the Allies to return beyond the Alps; and therefore it is an improper expression to say, finibus excedere coegit: they could not hinder him from staying in Piedmont, and from consuming the forage there as long as he thought fit, nor did he depart from thence but by the orders of the king his master (15).

It is easy to see after all this, that I might have said, not only that he omits some essential circumstances, but likewise that he substitutes false ones, which alter the nature of the fact. He has committed this fault very palpably where he speaks of the taking of Valenciennes; for, not contented with concealing that this place was carried by assault the eighth day of the siege; he says, that the French became masters of it by treachery (16). If I had a mind to set down all the mistakes like that which follows, I should have a long catalogue to make. He affirms that John Barth, having beat the Dutch Fleet in the year 1694, found a great quantity of corn in the ships he took from them (17). Here is a false circumstance substituted by suppressing a true one. He should have said that John Barth was convoy to several vessels loaded with corn, and that having beat the Dutch men of war he saved the corn and carried it to France (18).

I say, in the third place, he does not always observe the order of time: he sometimes transposes, he anticipates, he confounds the dates. I shall give some instances. He asserts that Lewis XIV having taken Grave in the month of July in the year 1672, besieged and subdued Maestricht, ravaged the country of Triers, seized on several towns there, and became master of the principality Orange, and of the county of Burgundy; but that the town of Groningen defended itself vigorously against the bishop of Munster (19). Every body may see, that this is confounding of the times. Maestricht was not subdued till the year 1673, nor the Franche-Comté conquered till the year 1674. But the taking of Grave, and the resistance of Groningen belong to the year 1672. Our author adds, that France received a very great blow by the loss of Philipsburg, and by that of mareschal de Turenne, and yet that after this she laid Haguenau in ashes, and many other towns, and took Condé and Bouchain. Observe that Mr de Turenne was killed in the year 1675, and Philipsburg fell into the hands of the Germans in the month of September 1676, and Condé and Bouchain were taken in the spring of the year 1676, and that Haguenau was a town which the French made to serve as a rampart (20). They were far from burning it. I shall give two examples more. He says that in the year 1689 the duke de Noailles took Campredon in Catalonia (21), and that the marquis de Bouflers having almost ruined Kocheim, at last took Mentz (22). Every body knows that Mentz, without having been in the least attacked, received a French garrison in the month of October in the year 1688, and that Cocheim was taken by the marquis de Bouflers the twenty sixth of August in the year 1689, and that the French lost Mentz after a long siege the eighth of September in the year 1689 (23). The last example contains a fault in Geography. Mr Hartnac tells us that in the month of September in the year 1688, the French, under the conduct of the Dauphin, entring the dominions, of his highness the elector Palatine by Fort-Louïs, which is built on an island of the Rhine, took Neustad and Keiserslauthern, and afterwards Spire and Worms (24). It is obvious to every one, that the taking of these places should have preceded the passage of the Rhine, and that however it is not by Fort-Louïs that one is to pass in order to seize on Neustad.

It is certain, that, in order to rank things according to their dates, it is not sufficient to be provided with good Chronological tables; it is necessary even to consult a very good Journal, and in this the news papers may be useful. It would be of great service to the compilers of History, if Chronological accounts were published like that of Father du Londel (25).

(11) See the Life of prince Eugene, printed at the Hague, in the year 1702, pag. 109, & seq.

(12) See the Life of prince Eugene, pag. 181, & seq.

(13) Ibid. pag. 360.

(14) Subaudi anno 1692, (it should have been 1693) à Pignarolii obsessione rejecti, itemque fusorati iterum prope Marsiglium gravi clade mulctati sint. Hartnac. Synagma Hist. Pol. Tom. ii, pag. 54. See alſo pag. 134.

(15) See the Life of prince Eugene, pag. 205, 206.

(16) Valenciennam prodidere expertus. Ibid. pag. 131.

(17) Per Johannem Barthium quoque Batavorum naves, annono licet superiores profligat (Rex Gallie) eique copia magnam frumenti copiam subtrit. Ibid. pag. 134.

(18) See the Letters of Father du Londel, under the twenty ninth of June 1694.

(19) Hart. Tom. ii, pag. 130, 131.

(20) Montecuculi had besieged it in the year 1675.

(21) Hartnaccius; Tom. ii, pag. 133.

(22) Kocheimium graviter affligit, Moguntiam denique expugnat. Ibid.

(23) See Mr Hartnac himself, Tom. i. pag. 561, 562.

(24) Tom. i, pag. 561.

(25) See the Nouvelles de la Republiq. des Lettres, Feb. 1699, pag. 223.

MICYLLUS (JAMES) born at Strasburg, April 6, 1503, holds a very honourable place among the learned men of his age. He studied in the most famous universities of Germany, and spent near five years at that of Erford, where he contracted a very close friendship with Joachim Camerarius, which lasted as long as his life. His family name was Moltzer (a). The name of Micyllus was given him, because he admirably acted the part of Micyllus [A] in a piece upon the stage, wherein a Dialogue of Lucian (b) was repeated before a great number of auditors. He was soon known to be very well qualified to make a college flourish; for, in the year 1527, he taught the Latin and Greek tongues in that of Francfort: and he acquitted himself so well in that station that at Heidelberg he was chosen professor of the Greek tongue in the year 1532. Thither he went; but he stayed not long there, for the magistrates of Francfort having recalled him

(a) Moreri says Moltzel; Mr Teissier, in his additions to Thuanus, Melcher, Konig, in his Bibl oth. Motzlerus.

(b) That whose title is Somnium, seu Gallus.

[A] He acted . . . . the part of Micyllus.] Hagius in the Life of Peter Lotichius, gives an exact account of this adventure; but instead of saying he had it from one who was a spectator of it at Francfort (this was John Lonicerus Greek professor at Marpurg) he should have cited Micyllus himself (1), as Melchior Adam has done.

(1) Lib. i, Sylvarum.

Fortuito quondam Micylli nomina casu
Repperi, & in mores transiit ille meos.

It was by chance I found the name
Micyllus, which my own became.

There is in Moreri fortitudo instead of fortuito, which was corrected in the Dutch Edition, by Ludendo. For the rest I have every where put Micyllus, tho' I know that d'Ablancourt, who calls him Micyle in his translation of Lucian, was approved by Mr Menage (2). If I had been condemned for this by that learned man, yet I should not have been censured with regard to orthography; for I do not say, Mycillus, as the greatest part of the German writers call him when they speak of Jacobus Micyllus, wherein, says he, they are so much the more to blame, because this name was given him, for acting well the part of Micylus in Lucian, when he was a school-boy. Menage is not the only person who has said that Micyllus was then a school-boy (3), which is very likely: but it is not very easy to reconcile this with what is related above, that this piece was acted at Frankfort; for it does not appear, that Micyllus studied there. Melchior Adam makes

(2) Observations upon the French tongue, vol. i, pag. 346.

(3) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 78. Teissier, Addit. Tom. i, pag. 139. Konig. Bibliotha. pag. 540.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him, he re-assumed his former post in their city. He returned to Heidelberg [B], when the Reformation was received there (c); and taught publickly the Greek tongue, and and at his own house the Latin tongue with good success, till he died, which happened the twenty eighth of January 1558 [C]. He had not long before a conference with Melanchthon who was come to Heidelberg at the desire of the elector Otho Henry, to concert the new statutes of the university. Micyllus was one of the best Poets of his time in Germany [D]. He had a great many children; but he left only two sons, whereof one studied the Law, and was chancellor to the elector Palatine; the other was a Taylor by trade in Heidelberg (d). I shall say something of his works [E].

(c) That is, in 1546, ex Sleidano, lib. xvi.

(d) Taken from Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philosoph.

makes him go from Strasburg to the most famous universities of Germany.

[B] He returned to Heidelberg.] Melchior Adam describes the time of this return only by the two circumstances of the war of Smalcald, and the reception of the Gospel in Heidelberg. Donec sub bellum Smalcaldicum cum variis Germania concuteretur motibus, atque Heidelbergæ Evangelii doctrina reciperetur, eodem ad Græcanicæ linguæ professionem accersitus rediit. This denotes the year 1546, or 1547, and agrees with the marginal note, wherein this author says, that Micyllus was twenty years in the service of the city of Francfort, and more than ten, tho' with some interruption, in the service of the electors Palatine.

[C] He died the twenty eighth of January 1558.] This shows that John Hagius, who says (4), that Micyllus, Melanchthon, and Lotichius Secundus, died the same year, is mistaken: he should have said it only of the two last, for they indeed died in 1560. Moreri is mistaken only in the day, who says, that Micyllus died the twenty third of January: probably the duodetrigesimo of Melchior Adam had dazzled him.

(4) In Vita Lotichii Secundi, pag. 69.

[D] He was one of the best Poets of his time in Germany.] Nevertheless the critics have observed a great many faults in his verses, and even some in respect of quantity. See the censure or the Promulsis Critica of John Peter Lotichius, in chap. 14, wherein there is an error of the press concerning the year of the birth of Micyllus, which is said to be 1553, instead of 1503. We learn from that book, that Micyllus after the example of the Poets of antiquity, had a very small share in the favours of fortune: Variam ac novercantem, dum viveret, expertus fortunam . . . quæ fors illi cum majorum gentium veteribus poëtis fuit communis.

(5) Apud Melch. Adam. pag. 181, Philosoph. German.

[E] I shall say something of his works.] His treatise De re metrica, is a master-piece, as Melanchthon says. See what he says of it (5). 'De re metrica extant 'eruditissimi & consummatissimi libri tres Jacobi Micylli, 'quo nemo Latinè scripsit prosodiam eruditius aut 'diligentius. - - - - There are three books of the most 'learned and accomplished James Micyllus about quan- 'tity, than whom none ever wrote a prosody in Latin 'more learnedly or accurately.' His other works are notes upon Ovid (6) and Lucan, the translation of some pieces of Lucian with scholia; some notes upon the genealogy of the gods composed by Boccace; several Greek and Latin verses; a translation of Tacitus into the German tongue; Arithmeticæ logisticæ libri duo, &c (7).

(6) The Epitome of the Bibliotheque of Gesner, excepts the Metamorphosis; but we see in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, the notes of Micyllus upon the fifteen books of the Metamorphosis.

(7) See the titles of his other works in the Epitome of the Biblioth. of Gesner.

